Introduction

As you drive through the cornfields of northern Illinois, just north of the town of Aurora, you may see a massive brick building that seems out of place. It stands three or four stories high with an elaborate facade depicting pillars and cornices. Topped by towering spires with flapping banners, it looks as if it belongs to another world. In a sense it does—the architectural style comes from southern India, and the building itself is a Hindu temple.

I was there late on a Sunday morning, and the parking lot was about half full. There were cars from as far away as Michigan. The building’s main entrance was a little below ground level, and as is common with Hindu temples outside of India, the lowest level had a lobby, a kitchen, and a large meeting room that was comparable to the “church basements” of its Christian counterparts. The lobby was furnished austerely, with folding tables and chairs. There were a few people sitting near the kitchen, drinking tea and chatting informally.

By the staircases leading upstairs to the temple room were rows of simple shelves, fronted by low benches. I removed my shoes, as is customary before entering a temple, both to preserve the temple and to signify that one is walking on holy ground. The staircase marked the threshold between two regions, the outer and the inner world. Upstairs, the temple was richly decorated. The presiding deity was Venkateshvara, a form of the god Vishnu, whose image was placed in the center of the temple, the most important space. Yet, as in most Hindu temples, there were images of deities from throughout the pantheon: Ganesh, Shiva, Subrahmanya, other forms of Vishnu, different forms of the Goddess, and various subsidiary deities. Most of the images were carved from black South Indian granite and polished to a mirrorlike finish. Many were housed in small shrines built out of white marble. The primary function of a Hindu temple is to serve as the home for the deities it contains, and it was clear that the people who had commissioned the temple had spared no efforts. The temple had been lovingly built and has been carefully maintained.

The worshipers in the temple took little notice of me, and I was allowed to roam as I wished. Even though Venkateshvara was the temple’s presiding deity, the primary activity while I was there took place in front of one of the subsidiary shrines, an image of the Goddess in the form of Kumari (“virgin”). Seated around the image were about twenty members of an extended family. The young girls, who were clearly the focus of the rite, sat directly in front of the shrine. Brahmin priests took various offerings from the older women: plastic gallon jugs of milk, Ziploc bags of sugar, and Tupperware containers of yogurt and honey. Each offering was poured over the image in turn. A pitcher of water was poured over the image between each offering to wash it clean. The temple priests performing the rite were dressed traditionally, with white dhotis (garments worn around the waist, extending below the knees), bare chests, and the sacred thread over their left shoulders. They bore crisp red tilaks (sectarian identifying marks) on their foreheads, and intoned the rite in rapid-fire Sanskrit.

Although a Christian visitor might find the languages, deities, and rites completely alien, many of the other elements of the day would be soothingly familiar: a group of families coming for worship on a Sunday morning, dressed in their “Sunday best,” with others chatting over coffee and sweets in the “church basement.” Except for a few sari-clad older women, the people there were dressed no differently than anyone one might encounter on the street—the men in suits and jackets, the girls and women in long, flowing dresses.

Just as the Hindu temple in rural Illinois had introduced Indian customs to the local community, it was clear that the influence of American culture had set this temple apart from its traditional counterparts in India. Unlike in India, where temples serve mainly as places of worship, Hindu temples in America often serve as cultural centers for the Hindu community, sponsoring events such as dance, music, and drama performances, along with language study programs and festival celebrations.
In many cases, the membership of Hindu temples in America cuts across the traditional barriers that divide Indian society—social status, regional background, sectarian loyalty—giving these Hindu temples far more inclusive constituencies.

The cultural landscape of the United States has changed dramatically in recent years. Today it possesses a plurality of cultures that my grandparents and their generation probably would have found inconceivable. The Hindu temple outside of Aurora, Illinois, is but one small sign of the increasing visibility of Asian cultures in American society. Another sign of this pluralism is the growing number of ways that Americans are coming into contact with traditional Hindu culture—whether through practicing yoga, through alternative medical systems such as ayurvedic medicine, or through the piquant delights of Indian cuisine.

Despite the growing interchange between Indian and American cultures, Hinduism is still often stereotyped and misunderstood. On one hand are the remnants of an antiquated point of view that refuses to see the United States as anything but a Christian nation. Those holding this view either dismiss Hinduism as an alien or exotic set of rituals and beliefs or actively condemn it as idolatrous. On the other hand are people searching for an alternative spirituality who idealize Asian cultures as fountains of ancient wisdom. At the very least, such an uncritical embrace ignores these cultures' genuine tensions, problems, and inequities; at the extreme it can result in a "designer religion," in which beliefs and practices from various religious traditions are selectively adopted, wrenching each of these elements from its roots in a living culture.

Outright condemnation and idealized acceptance overlook the richness and complexity of India's religious and cultural traditions. To gain a genuine understanding, it is important that we discern the cultural context behind Hindu beliefs, practices, and history. In learning about this context, one quickly encounters familiar ideas: hard work, thrift, education, and the importance of the family. Along with these general similarities to American cultural values, one finds equally profound differences. To examine the nuances of Hindu culture is to enter into a rich and complex world with its own inner logic and consistency. Encountering and understanding a different worldview can throw one's own into sharper perspective, enriching it with new depth and understanding.

What Is Hinduism?
The very word Hinduism is misleading. The word was coined by the British as an umbrella term, referring to any and all forms of religion in India, many of which share few if any common features. It was used to describe all sorts of beliefs and practices, from simple nature worship to the most highly sophisticated ritual and philosophical systems.

Hinduism is a vast religious tradition, encompassing various and contradictory strands and ideas. It has usually defied all the usual strategies for categorization and classification. There is no founder, no definitive scripture, no centralized authority, no single supreme god, no creed of essential beliefs, and no heresy. Thus, it would be more accurate to think of the religion as Hinduisms rather than Hinduism, since this would reflect the rich diversity one encounters.

India is a land of contrasts and cultural variety. The subcontinent contains almost every type of environmental ecosystem, the inhabitants of each possessing their own local and regional culture. There are over a dozen distinct languages, each of which establishes and nourishes a regional identity that many Indians maintain with great care wherever they live. The combinations of language, regional identity, sectarian affiliation, and social status have given rise to overwhelming variation. For Hindus, diversity is a basic trait of Hindu life, and thus one person's practice may be very different from another's. This has given Hinduism little in the way of centralized doctrine or dogma, but its grounding in everyday life has made it extraordinarily resilient and adaptable.
Basic Beliefs

Hinduism is first and foremost a way of life. This means that Hinduism has tended to be orthoprax (stressing correct behavior) rather than orthodox (stressing correct belief). It tends to be woven through the differing elements of everyday life, rather than only performed as practices or rituals for certain days and times. Hindu religious expression is conveyed through every facet of society: music, dance, art and architecture, philosophy, politics, literature, and social life.

Some of the most important aspects of everyday life in the Hindu tradition are a person's family and social affiliations. Despite the incredible variety of Hindu belief and practice, each family and local community is tightly and carefully organized. Every individual, as a member of a particular family, has a well-defined role and an obligation to fulfill specific duties. As in any culture, one's individual identity is strongly shaped by the linguistic, regional, or sectarian characteristics of his or her family. This familial influence persists whether the family lives in its ancestral home or moves to a different region of India or a foreign country.

Families, of course, are members of a larger community. These communities share certain beliefs about a person's proper role in society based on status, age, and gender. Traditional Indian society was sharply hierarchical. According to the traditional social groupings, there should be four status groups: the brahmins, who are scholars and religious technicians; the kshatriyas, who are warriors and rulers; the vaishyas, who are artisans and farmers; and the shudras, who serve the others. Each person is born as a permanent member of a particular group. Society is seen as an organic whole, in which some parts have higher status than others, but every part is necessary for the whole to function smoothly. A common metaphor for social organization is the human body, which has many different parts performing many different functions, all of which are necessary for the body's maintenance and well-being. In actual practice, the picture was far more complex. Each of these four groups was split into hundreds of subgroups known as jatis. Jatis were most often identified with a certain hereditary occupation, and a jati's status in a particular place was subject to all kinds of local variables. These variables could include whether or not members of a jati owned land or the degree to which a jati's occupation was economically vital to its community.

These beliefs about social status are becoming less important in modern India, and have even less importance for Hindus who live abroad. In modern India, society is still functionally divided into four groups: brahmins; “forward castes,” which tend to control land, money, or power; “backward castes,” which have historically had very little influence, although the situation is changing rapidly; and Dalits (“oppressed”). Once called “untouchables,” many Dalits live in poverty and oppressive social conditions. Except for the brahmins, these social divisions bear little relationship to the four groups in the earlier model.

Reincarnation is still a pervasive belief within Hinduism, as it is in other Indian religions such as Jainism, Buddhism, and Sikhism. Almost all Hindus have generally accepted that although our bodies are transient, our souls are immortal. After the death of a particular body, the soul will inhabit a different body. The nature of one's incarnation in a future life is determined by the quantity and quality of one's karma. Karma literally means “action,” but it also can be generated by words or even thoughts. It is not produced only by the things one does or says, but also by one's underlying motives. An individual's good karma will bring a favorable rebirth in heaven as a god or on earth as a wealthy or high-caste human being. Bad karma will bring an unfavorable rebirth. A person's current social status reveals how properly he or she lived in the previous life. The notion of karmic rewards and punishments is a central justification for the traditional social hierarchy in India.

Karma is thought of as a purely physical process, like gravity, operating without any need for a divine overseer. An action one performs, for good or for ill, is seen as the cause, with the future reward or punishment as the effect. Some of these consequences occur in this life, while others occur in future lives. Since karma reflects the overall tone of one's life, it is comparable to the notion of a person's “character”: Both are formed over a long period of time, both are measures of the whole person, and both reflect how our habitual ways of feeling, thinking, and acting tend to shape who we are.

It is tempting to envision reincarnation as an opportunity to rectify past mistakes or to learn lessons still unlearned. For Hindus, as for Buddhists, Sikhs, and Jains, nothing could be further from the truth; reincarnation is never seen as an opportunity, but invariably as a burden. This is because all states of being, both good and bad, are ultimately impermanent and thus provide no sure refuge. Even the gods, who are enjoying the rewards of their past actions, will be born elsewhere when their stored merit is exhausted. Others are enduring punishment for their sins, but when this is done they will be reborn elsewhere.

Although most Hindus would grant that liberation from reincarnation (moksha) is the ultimate goal, traditional Hindu culture has sanctioned three other goals, all of which are more compatible with a normal life in society: the search for pleasure (kama); the quest for wealth, fame, and power (artha); and, above all, the search for a righteous, balanced life (dharma). This stress on multiple goals reflects the flexibility of Hindu religious life. Each person can pursue different goals according to his or her inclinations, although certain goals are considered to be more appropriate for particular stages of life. In this way a person is free to express his or her individual religious identity, although that identity is inevitably shaped by forces arising from a larger familial, social, and cultural context.

The Roots of Hinduism

The influences and developments of Hinduism are as expansive as the roots and branches of a banyan tree. A banyan tree is unusual in that in addition to the tree's upward spreading branches, it also has branches that grow down, take root, and become trunks in their own right. An old banyan tree can be hundreds of feet in diameter, and it is often difficult to discern which is the original trunk. In the same way, the religion that we call Hinduism is constantly evolving. New religious forms arise from the older ones, while many of the older ones continue to exist. Despite Hinduism's complex origins, its religious history can be roughly divided into six periods, corresponding to the development of varying religious tendencies and ideas.

The earliest and most mysterious of these is the period of the Indus Valley Civilization, named for the large ruined cities found throughout the Indus Valley and beyond. The ruins of prominently placed storage granaries indicate that the civilization's economic base was agricultural, and the striking uniformity of the ruins of these cities leads one to believe that the people were bound by some strong central authority. Archaeologists have recovered a wealth of physical artifacts, revealing a great deal about the layout of the cities, what the inhabitants ate and wore, and the animals they domesticated. At the same time, nothing is certain about the religious life of these people, although certain artifacts have raised intriguing speculations. It is not even known whether the religion and culture of the Indus Valley Civilization have continued to affect Indian culture, although some scholars have been more inclined to infer this than others.

This culture seemed to lose its vitality sometime around 2000 B.C.E. Within a few centuries it had largely disappeared from the Indus Valley, although it remained vital for much longer in outlying regions, particularly Gujarat. According to some theories, its decline was the result of a prolonged drought. The latter part of its decline was marked by the arrival of the Aryans. This brought Hinduism into its second period of religious history. The Aryans were a nomadic cattle-herding people whose earliest religious text, the Rg Veda, is believed to have been preserved unchanged for almost four thousand years. The later strata of the Vedas were composed as the Aryans moved through the Punjab into the Ganges basin. These later parts of the Vedas included the Brahmans literature, which stressed the importance of sacrifice, and the later Aranyakas and Upanishads, which tended to focus on more speculative and philosophical questions. During the period in which the Aranyakas and Upanishads were composed, asceticism became an increasingly important element of Hinduism. Asceticism denotes the use of physical discipline and deprivation as a way to attain religious insight and liberate the soul from the cycle of reincarnation. Part of the reason for asceticism's prominence was the growth of competing groups, such as the Jains and the Buddhists, whose monks lived an ascetic life. Asceticism has had an important place in Indian religious life since that time.

The period after the composition of the Vedic literature is sometimes called the Epic period. Between roughly 300 B.C.E. and 500 C.E., many of the ideas most important to classical Hinduism were developed and codified. This time was marked by the initial composition of the two great Hindu epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, although their final revisions came centuries later. The early part of this period also saw the composition of the religious literature known as the Kalpa Sutras. In theory, each Kalpa Sutra had three parts: a shruta sutra, a grhya sutra, and a dharma sutra, but this neat ordering is belied by the scarcity of complete three-part collections, and the abundance of one or another of these sections without its corresponding parts. Shruta sutras are manuals for Vedic sacrifice, which had become so complex that additional reference material was needed. The shruta sutra is the only element of the three that has not retained great importance in modern Hindu life. The grhya sutras are manuals for domestic sacrifices, which include the life-cycle rites known as samskaras. Some elements of the grhya sutras still remain vital and vibrant parts of modern Hindu religious life, probably because of their connection with the central transitions in human life: birth, marriage, and death. The dharma sutras provide prescriptions for an organized and stable society by means of a rigid social hierarchy. The prescriptions in the dharma sutras were later expanded in the dharma shastras, which are the theoretical basis of the Hindu social structure.

Aside from the epics and the Kalpa Sutras, this period was also notable for the development of the six classical philosophical schools: the Nyaya, Vaisheshika, Samkhya, Yoga, Mimamsa, and Vedanta (although the defining figure in the Vedanta school, Shankaracharya, is generally dated in the early ninth century). The philosophical system developed by each of these six schools had a common goal: liberating the soul from the bondage of reincarnation. Each of the schools believed that the soul could be liberated by avoiding conceptual errors and apprehending universal truths, although there was considerable disagreement about the nature of these universal truths. The foundational texts for each of these schools laid out their basic philosophical position; in some cases, these texts buttressed their position by appealing to authoritative religious texts such as the Vedas. Over the following centuries these foundational texts received further elaboration through multiple layers of commentaries, which in some cases have continued to be written almost up until contemporary times.

This period is also marked by the rise in importance of the deities Shiva, Vishnu, and the Goddess, who are still the primary deities worshiped in modern Hinduism. These deities had a central place in the sectarian literature known as the puranas, another of the important types of text composed in this period. The puranas’ most notable feature is their sectarian character, as they often exalt one particular deity over the others. They also include information on many other aspects of religious life, including sacred places, sacred times, instructions for various religious rites, and even descriptions of the heavens and hells. The final type of religious text first composed in this period were the tantras, which laid out esoteric and often hidden ritual traditions.
In later times, both the puranas and the tantras have been the subject of extensive commentaries. In addition, this period saw the development of new artistic and architectural styles. Many of the forces manifested or formed in this period remain integral parts of contemporary Hindu life.

The period following this was marked by the growth and flowering of the devotional (bhakti) tradition, which for more than a millennium has been one of the most powerful religious forces in Hindu culture. Bhakti stresses the necessity of a direct and personal relationship with God, in whatever form that deity is conceived. Its proponents tended to be contemptuous of the neatly constructed social order detailed in the dharma shastras, which stressed birth rather than devotional capacity as the most important criterion. Much of medieval Hindu thought was formed out of the tension between these two competing ideals, dharma and bhakti, and there was often no easy resolution of the conflict between their differing perspectives.

The growing presence of Europeans in India marked the next period in Hinduism’s history. Although there had been a European presence in India since the mid-1500s, when the Portuguese colonized Goa, the introduction of British colonists presented the greatest challenge to Indian society. In the early 1600s, the British East India Company gained its first foothold with a trading station at Surat in modern Gujarat and gradually put down additional roots in Bombay, Madras, and the Bengal region. With the effective collapse of the Moghul empire in the mid-1700s, the nobility that ruled peripheral regions such as Bengal began to function independently. This allowed the British to displace the indigenous rulers as the political authorities and the recipients of land revenue. The East India Company was a commercial venture, and its primary goal was to make money for its shareholders. Yet the Indian body politic was so fragmented that the company encountered little effective resistance and aggressively expanded its sphere of influence from Bengal up the Ganges River valley and into central India. In some cases the company would simply absorb small kingdoms under the pretense of protecting law and order, especially when the leadership had no clear line of succession. In other cases it would make agreements with local nobility to create small princely states, some of which survived until Indian independence in 1947. General discontent with the company’s aggressive expansion finally exploded in the rebellion of 1857–58, after which India was governed as part of the British Empire.

The company was primarily driven by economic motives, but it justified its paternal presence by portraying the Indians as unable to govern themselves effectively. Although the company’s policy was not to interfere with its subjects’ religious lives, since any such tensions would be bad for business, the company’s board of directors in England was under strong domestic pressure to open up their dominions to Christian missionary activity. Contemporary missionary polemics against Hinduism usually stressed repugnant practices such as sati (the burning of a widow on her husband’s funeral pyre), child marriage, the pitiable plight of many widows, or Hindu “idolatry.” Such political and religious critiques assumed the implicit superiority of European Christian culture and provided the moral sanction for colonialism that Rudyard Kipling described as the “white man’s burden.”

Hindus responded to these critiques in several ways. The most violent response came in the rebellion of 1857–58, in which popular discontent led various groups to try to drive the British out of India. Although there was widespread opposition to British rule, it was never unified, allowing the British to defeat their adversaries one by one. A far more effective response came in religious terms, as progressive Hindus attempted to respond to the missionary critiques. One result of this was the formation of various societies, such as the Brahmo Samaj, Prarthana Samaj, and Arya Samaj. The first two of these attempted to reform Hindu religious life by removing certain offensive practices in response to criticism from outsiders. These practices included the
The caste system, child marriage, and the ban on widow remarriage. The Arya Samaj was formed to regenerate and revitalize Hinduism, with the explicit position that Hinduism was far superior to Christianity and Islam.

The end of the nineteenth century was also marked by the gradual establishment of Hinduism as a viable religious tradition in the West, as Hindu teachers arrived in Europe and America. Some of the early figures were Swami Vivekananda and Paramahamsa Yogananda, and the more recent ones are Prabhupada, Muktananda, Yogi Bhajan, Guru Maharaj Ji, Krishnamurti, and Shri Chinmoy. This recent group of teachers had an explicit missionary goal, aiming to gain followers among native-born Europeans and Americans.

The most recent period in the development of Hindu religious traditions is marked by the emigration of Indians to America. Many Indians have settled abroad seeking education or to pursue specialized careers. They have established centers of Hindu worship, like the temple Aurora, to serve the needs of the Indian community, including the need to pass on a sense of Hindu identity to their children. Yet despite their efforts to preserve their traditions and culture, their very presence in a different society is causing changes in their religious lives. American society has made certain traditions more difficult to preserve. For example, the community often celebrates religious festivals on the weekend following the traditional festival day, since this is when people have more spare time. Life in American society and the influence of American values have also made it difficult to conform to certain traditional patterns. The traditional requirement that Hindus marry within their jati has been assailed both by the American emphasis on the importance of a “love marriage” and by the potential shortage of suitable partners. In the same way, certain dietary restrictions become harder to maintain but have greater complexity. A Hindu in America must decide not only if he or she should simply avoid eating beef but also whether to avoid any place where beef is served.

In India, the twentieth century has been marked by the development of an assertive and militant Hindu nationalism. Hindu nationalism’s “founding father” was V. D. Savarkar, but the most important body promoting this idea in the recent past has been the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS). The RSS is the mother organization for many different affiliates, ranging from labor unions to student organizations to social relief bodies. Its two most important affiliates for promoting Hindu nationalism are the Vishva Hindu Parishad (VHP), a religious organization, and the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), a mass-based political party. In the early 1990s, both organizations were instrumental in radical Hindu politics, particularly in the destruction of a mosque alleged to have been built on the site of the god Rama’s birthplace in the North Indian city of Ayodhya. Since that time, the VHP has retained its radical edge, but the BJP has not. The BJP has put greater distance between itself and the VHP, seeking to move toward the political center and thus expand its reach in electoral politics. It has begun stressing issues that are vital to a broader spectrum of Hindu voters, such as corruption and the rising cost of living.

This encyclopedia offers the student of religion a place to begin exploring the key elements of Hindu religious culture and practice. I hope that the entries will be a springboard for further study of this great, living religious tradition.
How to Use This Book

This encyclopedia includes the following features:

- The Contents by Subject lists related entries in the following categories: Art, Architecture, and Iconography; Astrology and Cosmology; Biographical Entries; Calendar and Time; Ceremonies, Practices, and Rituals; Communities, Groups, and Organizations; Dance; Dynasties; Geography; Literature, Language, and Drama; Medicine, Physiology, and Alchemy; Music, Hymns, and Prayers; Mythology and Beliefs; Philosophy and Logic; and Yoga and Tantra.

- Cross-referenced terms within entries are indicated in boldface type.

- Parenthetical citations are used to refer to selections from primary Hindu texts. For sources from the Vedas, the first number refers to the book and the second to the hymn. For later sources, including the Upanishads, the Bhagavad Gita, and all of the dharma literature, the first number refers to the chapter and the second to the verse.

- Lineage charts for characters in the Hindu epics the Mahabharata and the Ramayana appear on pages 401 and 556, respectively.

- Words with distinctive pronunciations are listed in the back of the book with diacritical marks—symbols above or below the letters to indicate their proper pronunciation.

- Abbreviated bibliographic citations appear at the end of some entries. The full citations are grouped together in the bibliography.

Note on Dates

In many cases, determining dates for the lives of Indian figures is problematic because there are not good records for many figures, even in comparatively modern times. The most definite dates tend to be from inscriptions, and thus this evidence is best for kings and others who were able to commission inscriptions. Philosopheres, devotional poets, and writers often could not. In this book, a question mark follows dates that scholars have determined by inference (for example, based on internal evidence in texts, such as references to historical events) but are not backed up by documentary evidence.

Abhang
("unbroken") Poetic form characteristically used by the saint-poets of the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba. Each abhang is usually made up of four lines, with an abbc rhyme scheme. Although each abhang is a complete poem in its own right, they are often strung together in groups, to create either a longer narrative poem (in which each abhang stands as one segment) or a group of poems devoted to a common theme. Such versatility made it one of the dominant poetic forms in the Marathi language, just as the doha form is ubiquitous to medieval and modern Hindi.

Abhava
("[knowledge from] absence") Abhava is one of the two means of valid knowledge (pramana) unique to the Purva Mimamsa school of philosophy, the other being presumption (arthapatti). All Indian philosophical schools concern themselves with codifying pramanas, that is, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge. Behind this concern lies the basic Hindu religious goal of learning to live, act, and think in a way that leads to the final liberation of the soul from the cycle of reincarnation (samsara). Almost all schools accept perception (pratyaksha), inference (anumana), and authoritative testimony (shabda) as pramanas. The Purva Mimamsa school claims that abhava, or perception of the absence of something ("there is no jug in this room"), is a means of knowledge that cannot be accounted for by the other pramanas.

Abhaya Hasta
In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, a particular hand gesture (hasta) in which the hand is held with the palm facing out, with the fingers together and pointing upward. The word abhaya means “without fear,” and the gesture is meant to reassure the viewer that all will be well. This hand gesture can be found in most depictions of the Hindu gods and goddesses, particularly when the deity in question has multiple hands.

Abhijnanashakuntala
("Recognition of Shakuntala") Drama written by Kalidasa (5th c. C.E.), who is widely considered the greatest classical Sanskrit poet. The Abhijnanashakuntala describes the trials and troubles of the mythical heroine Shakuntala and is considered Kalidas's greatest drama. In the story, Shakuntala, the daughter of the sage Vishvamitra and the celestial nymph Menaka, attracts the eye of King Dushyanta while he is away from his kingdom on a hunting trip. Shakuntala and Dushyanta marry by mutual consent, in what is known as a gandharva marriage. After their marriage, Dushyanta returns to his kingdom. Shakuntala remains at her home and has the misfortune to irritate the sage Durvasas, who curses her to be forgotten by her beloved. Shakuntala pleads with Durvasas, who is moved to mitigate the curse such that Dushyanta will remember everything if Shakuntala can show Dushyanta a sign of their union. Dushyanta had given Shakuntala his signet ring, but she loses it before she can see him. Denied by Dushyanta, Shakuntala endures numerous trials until she finds the ring in the belly of a fish. When Dushyanta sees the ring, he immediately recognizes Shakuntala (hence the play’s name), and they live happily ever after.

The Abhijnanashakuntala has two features that characterize most classical Sanskrit plays. One is the preference for a happy ending, although this resolution is usually preceded by trial and tribulation. The other is that the drama’s dialogue is in two different languages. Characters from the higher classes speak Sanskrit, the language of high, learned culture. Characters from the lower classes (including many of the women) speak in Prakrit, an umbrella term for the grammatically simpler vernacular languages that developed from Sanskrit through natural linguistic change. This difference in dialogue doubtless reflected the social realities of the time in which the play was written, when Sanskrit would have been the elite language but was always learned as a second language after learning one’s “natural” language. The play has been translated into English by Michael Coulson and published in an anthology titled Three Sanskrit Plays, 1981.

Abhimanyu

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Abhimanyu is one of Arjuna’s sons by his wife, Subhadra. Abhimanyu is known as a great warrior who fights with valor in the Mahabharata war. As he fights in battle, he enters the enemy’s chakravyuha formation, a battle array that is widely believed to be virtually impenetrable. According to tradition, Arjuna is one of the few people who knows how to counter the chakravyuha. While Abhimanyu was in his mother’s womb, he heard his father describe how to penetrate it. Once Abhimanyu is in, however, he realizes that he does not know how to get out, and although he kills a great number of the enemy, he is eventually slain.

Abhinavagupta
(10th c. C.E.) Kashmiri writer famous for his works on poetics and aesthetics. Abhinavagupta was a pivotal figure in the development of Trika Shaivism, a particular religious community devoted to the god Shiva. The writer’s most famous religious work is the Tantraloka, a twelve-volume work elucidating the metaphysics and ritual of Trika Shaivism. His Dhvanyaloka gives similar attention to aesthetics and poetics. See also Kashmir and Shaiva.

Abhinaya
(“bringing near”) In Indian drama, the general name given to acting. Its ultimate purpose is to convey an emotion through a look or gesture and thus “bring” it to the audience. In Indian dance, this term refers to a piece in which the dancer acts out a story, with the aim to convey to the viewers the emotions of her character. Particularly with Indian dance, this sort of acting is not mere artistry, however refined, but carries explicit religious meaning. Not only is the story’s content often drawn from religious literature, but most Indian dance forms were first performed in temples as entertainment for the resident deity.

Abhira
Sanskrit term for Ahir. See Ahir.

Abhisheka
(“anointing”) Ritual bathing (snana) or anointing with water, particularly of the image of a deity during worship. In earlier times this term referred to the ritual anointing of a king at his coronation (rajabhiseka). In modern times the term can also apply to anointing or sprinkling individuals with water during religious or life cycle rituals, particularly rites of initiation (diksha) involving a change of status for the initiate—such as the shift from householder to initiated ascetic or in the ritual tradition known as tantra, an initiation bestowing certain ritual and religious qualifications (adhikara). In both cases the anointing is intended to honor the initiate, to evoke images of royal coronation, and to suggest the importance of the occasion.

Abortion
Hindu views toward abortion have varied widely over the course of time. It is unequivocally condemned in the dharma literature, which prescribes loss of caste for a person procuring an abortion or for a woman having one. This prescription may have been based on the use of abortion to conceal illegitimate births, but it may well have been condemned because it entailed the loss of a potential son. In modern times attitudes have changed somewhat, in part because of family planning initiatives and in more recent times because of the technology available for sex determination. Abortion facilities are now more widely available in India due to the government’s emphasis on family planning and population control, and there is less social stigma associated with the procedure. However, traditional proscriptions remain. With the advent of methods for prenatal sex determination, couples began selectively aborting female fetuses because sons are more highly valued in Hindu society. This practice was widespread and generated such concern that it was outlawed in 1995, although the law has reportedly only succeeded in driving this practice underground.
Achala Ekadashi
Festival falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Jyeshth (May–June). As are all of the eleventh-day observances, this is dedicated to the worship of the god Vishnu. The name Achala means “immovable”; another name for this ekadashi is apara, meaning “matchless.” The name refers to the religious merit generated by observing this festival, which, according to tradition, cannot be nullified or overturned. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, usually involving fasting (upavasa) and worship, and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. Individual observance varies depending on a person’s piety and inclinations. Fasting, for instance, can vary from abstaining only from certain foods to refraining from all foods during the day. Individuals may go to temples for worship, or they may worship in their homes. Faithfully observing this festival is believed to absolve one of the evil effects of one’s past deeds, particularly deeds that would result in birth as a pret, or unquiet spirit, and also to increase one’s fame, wealth, and religious merit.

Achamana
(“sipping”) The act of sipping water that has been poured or scooped into one’s right hand. This is performed as a rite of purification. Achamana is a symbolic action that has been incorporated into many religious rituals. It is also part of the required early morning ablutions, the purpose of which is to remove any impurity (ashaucha) encountered while sleeping. In the Hindu tradition, human beings are considered impure upon waking for a number of reasons. Since sleep entails loss of consciousness, one may not know whether one has come into contact with impurity. Further, bodily functions that may occur while sleeping cause impurity. In addition, it is popularly believed that one’s soul (atman) leaves the body during sleep and then reenters it before the body awakens. While the soul is gone, the body is believed to be a corpse, which is an impurity that must be cleansed.

Achamaniya
(“to be sipped”) The fifth of the sixteen traditional upcharas (“offerings”) given to a deity as part of worship, on the model of treating the god as an honored guest. In this upachara, the deity is offered water for rinsing and cleaning the mouth. The actual act of offering can be done in various ways and often depends on the worshiper’s inclinations. In some cases the water vessel will simply be presented before the deity’s image, with the understanding that the water has been taken, whereas in other cases the devotee (bhakta) will actually rinse the image’s mouth. In either case the underlying motive is to show love for the deity and to minister to its needs.

Achara
(“conduct”) Appropriate or approved behavior according to customary law, which is established in the dharma literature. The dharma assumes that society is made up of different social subgroups known as jatis, which are usually defined (and hierarchically arranged) by the group’s hereditary occupation. Each jati had its own customary code of appropriate behavior, and there were often sharp differences between them. For example, it was often acceptable for members of lower-status jatis to eat meat and drink liquor, whereas these practices were forbidden to higher-status groups. Aside from the customary rules of one’s social group or subgroup, notions of appropriate behavior for a particular person would also be shaped by age and gender considerations: A young and sexually fertile woman would be subject to far greater restrictions than a postmenopausal woman, since any sexual scandal (or even the hint of it) could ruin a young... woman's opportunities for a good marriage or produce an illegitimate child.

Acharya
Traditional term of respect for a religious leader or a spiritual teacher; the word connotes great learning as well as a religious life. The term literally means someone who knows or teaches about achara, the traditionally accepted way of life prescribed in the dharma literature. As a title in modern Hindu life, it indicates the respect and social standing conveyed by the English word doctor.

Achintyabhedabheda
(“inconceivable identity and difference”) Key philosophical concept of the Gaudiya Vaishnava school, which was founded by the Bengali saint Chaitanya (d. 1533) and is devoted to the worship of Krishna as the Supreme Being. The concept was first enunciated by Chaitanya's disciple Jiva Goswami (late 16th c.) and explains the relationship between God (Krishna) and the human soul, and between God and his divine powers. In both cases these relationships are described as simultaneously involving sameness and difference. On one hand, human souls are clearly different from God, as shown by their imperfections and their susceptibility to the action of karma, both of which contrast with God's utter transcendence and perfection. Yet since it is possible for human souls to gain ultimate liberation (moksha) from the action of karma, they must also share some part of God's nature, since liberation would be impossible if human souls were completely different. Even though human souls partake in the divine nature, their distinctness is upheld even after liberation, when the human soul does not merge with Krishna but remains separate.

This same concept is used to describe the second relationship, between God and his divine powers.

The divine powers are often conceived not just as attributes (e.g., the ability to create, preserve, and destroy the universe) but as actual embodied deities, particularly in the form of goddesses. These powers are both the same as God, since they come from Him, but also different since each of the embodied powers does not contain the glory of the whole. In both cases the precise nature of this simultaneous identity and difference is “inconceivable,” which here carries a mystical sense. For further information see Sushil Kumar De, Early History of the Vaishnava Faith and Movement in Bengal, from Sanskrit and Bengali Sources, 1961.

Achyuta
(“imperishable”) Epithet of Vishnu, referring to the devotees’ (bhakta) beliefs that nothing can stand against Vishnu and that his power will never wane. Hindu deities often have many names that sometimes denote unique form of the deity and at other times denote a special quality of the deity. No two deities will ever share the same epithet. The proliferation of names for deities may be related in part to the characteristics of the Sanskrit language, which is rich with synonyms. This allows words to fit into various poetic meters. See Vishnu.

Act of Truth
In Hindu mythology, a ritual action that is described as being able to neutralize poison, bring rain, make a river flow backward, or even compel the gods to grant one's wishes. The act of truth draws its effectiveness from the power of truth and is usually performed as a last resort when all other avenues have been blocked. The act of truth is a conditional statement: the first part is a true statement about one's past behavior, the second part a request for some specific result (“If I have always given to those who begged from me, may this fire not burn me”). The rite’s success stems from the truthfulness of the first condition—that the power of truth in the condition actually causes the second part to come true. One example of the act of truth being used to compel the gods to grant a wish occurs in the story of the lovers Nala and Damayanti. Damayanti intends to choose Nala as her husband but finds that four of the gods have taken Nala’s form, in an effort to foil her. Damayanti’s act of truth affirms that she had chosen Nala as her husband and has never wavered in this choice, and it then directs the gods to take their true forms again. The gods take their true forms, and Nala and Damayanti are married.

As Sanskritist and Indologist W. Norman Brown observes, in cases where the act of truth is successful, the people making the act of truth have perfectly fulfilled their social roles, and this perfection allows them to make the conditional affirmation so central to the act of truth. Successful men have been either great kings, ascetics, or householders; successful women have usually been absolutely faithful to their husbands (fulfilling one idealized women’s role). One story tells of a prostitute who affirmed that she had serviced all of her clients without partiality, thus perfectly fulfilling her particular social role. In any of these cases, perfection of one’s role is believed to bring spiritual merit as well as the ability to unleash it by performing the act of truth. For further information see W. Norman Brown, “The Metaphysics of the Truth Act,” in Mélanges D’Indianisme à la Mémoire de Louis Renou, 1968.

Adhikamasa
See Intercalary Month.

Adhikara
(“qualification”) In any sort of Hindu worship, but particularly in tantra, adhikara indicates that one has the religious qualifications to perform certain ritual actions. This refers partly to knowing how to perform the ritual, and thus being “qualified” in that sense of the word. More importantly, it refers to having gained the ritual status that entitles one to perform the ritual. This status is usually conferred by some sort of formal initiation or initiations given by one’s teacher, who decides what type of and how much adhikara to transmit based on an assessment of the student’s abilities, temperament, and desire to learn.

Adhiratha
The foster father of Karna in the great Hindu epic, the Mahabharata. Karna is born when his mother, Kunti, uses a special mantra given to her by the sage Durvasas, which gives a woman the power to conceive and bear children by the gods. Kunti impulsively uses the mantra to invoke the Sun, by whom she conceives and bears Karna. In her panic at unexpectedly becoming a mother—she is still unmarried, and concerned about what people might think—she puts the child in a box and abandons him in the Ganges. When Adhiratha goes to the Ganges to bathe (snana), he finds the child, and since he and his wife are childless, they raise the boy as their own.

There are a number of interesting aspects to the story of Adhiratha. Although he is not of high status, he becomes the king of the country. He comes from a social group whose traditional occupation is driving chariots.

There are a number of interesting aspects to the story of Adhiratha. Although he is not of high status, he becomes the king of the country. He comes from a social group whose traditional occupation is driving chariots.
One can read this dissonance in the epic’s recognition that the hierarchical, occupationally based social model is an idealized projection and not always the reality. It can also be argued that since Adhiratha is not fulfilling his particular religious duty (dharma) but has usurped that of the ruling class, both he and the country are destined for ruin. The reality of his family’s lowly status and the uncertainty about his birth trouble Karna for most of his life.

Adhishtana
(“foundation”) In Hindu temple architecture, the raised base on which a temple was built. These are particularly high in the temples at Khajuraho, and their height accentuates the upward thrust of these temples. Whether high or low, the adhishtana is important as the temple’s foundation, the stable base on which all else rests.

Adhvaryum
A type of sacrificial priest described in the Brahmana literature, one of the later strands of the sacred literature known as the Vedas. The Brahmanas largely functioned as manuals describing how to perform sacrificial rites—which primarily involved burning offerings in a sacred fire—and the care and attention devoted to detailing these sacrifices, which leads to the inference that these were the primary religious acts. These rites were so complex that they required specialized ritual technicians: the adhvaryum, the hotr, the udgatr, and the brahman. The adhvaryum was the sacrificial priest who chanted the hymns from the Yajur Veda that were used in the sacrifice. He was also responsible for preparing the sacred altar, assembling the sacrificial materials, kindling and feeding the sacred fire, and actually offering the sacrificial animals.

Adhyasa
(“superimposition”) In Advaita Vedanta, one of the six schools of classical Indian philosophy, this is a key concept used to explain the ultimate unreality of the world around us, despite its apparent reality. For the Advaita Vedanta school, there is ultimately only one real idea in the universe, namely Brahman. All things are in fact that one thing, and this never changes. Since Brahman is the all in all, it can never actually be an object of perception (pratyaksha). What the Advaitins then have to explain is how things in the world apparently change, or seem diverse and different. This is explained as stemming from our mistaken perception and understanding. They call this notion adhyasa, which is rooted in the human tendency to “construct” a picture of world. According to this explanation, human beings superimpose a false understanding (that reality is diverse and differentiated) on top of the correct understanding (that all reality is nothing but undifferentiated Brahman). According to the Advaitins, the world is real because Brahman is real. What is not real is the world as most unenlightened people perceive it.

Advaitins illustrate this concept by two well-known errors in judgment: the case of a rope that one briefly mistakes for a snake, or a post that one imagines is a man. Although these judgments are erroneous—as one quickly discovers—they are not made up out of nothing. In each case, one is perceiving something real—the rope and post both actually exist—but “superimposing” a different and mistaken identity on these things, and thus “transforming” them into something they are not. In the same way, it is argued, human consciousness begins with the Supreme Reality (Brahman), which is actually there, but superimposes onto it something which is not (the judgment of a diverse world).

According to the Advaitins, the real problem is epistemological, that is, how human beings come to know things, rather than in the nature of the things themselves. One comes to a true understanding not when the things themselves change—to refer back to the example, the rope always was and always will be a rope—but with the destruction of the mistaken notions that led to the initial error, and their replacement by true understanding. For the Advaitins, adhyasa is a manifestation of avidya (lack of true knowledge); this avidya is reinforced and upheld by the karmic power of one’s mistaken thoughts and actions. Adhyasa immediately disappears at the moment true understanding is gained, when one comprehends that the world (and oneself) are both nothing but Brahman. This moment of realization brings ultimate wisdom that can never be lost, just as that once one has recognized the piece of rope, it can never again become a snake. Adi

Fourth month in the Tamil solar year, corresponding to the northern Indian solar month of Karkata (the zodiacal sign of Cancer), which usually falls within July and August. The existence of several different calendars is one clear sign of the continuing importance of regional cultural patterns. One way that the Tamils retain their culture is by preserving their traditional calendar. Tamil is one of the few regional languages in India with an ancient, well-established literary tradition. See also Tamil months, Tamil Nadu, and Tamil language.

Adigranth

(“Primal Book”) One of the names for the Sikh scripture, most often used by people outside the tradition. Sikhs themselves are more likely to use the honorific title Shri Guru Granth Sahib, which reflects the scripture’s status as the spiritual leader (guru) of the Sikh community. This status was conferred by the tenth Sikh guru, Gobind Singh (d. 1708), who proclaimed that after his death the community would have no more human leaders, but only their scripture to guide them. The book's religious authority can be seen in the way that the Sikhs treat it. They accord the Adigranth the status of a living person. In Sikh temples the Adigranth is ceremonially put to bed at night and woken up in the morning. It is enshrined under a canopy (a sign of royalty) for worship, is fanned during hot weather and warmed during cold, and if it has to be taken anywhere, is carried on the bearer's head, considered the purest part of the body. In according this respectful treatment to a physical book, the Sikhs were probably influenced by Muslim practice with regard to the Qur'an, since in general Hindus pay little heed to a book itself, however important the text may be.

The Adigranth plays a central role in Sikh life: Children are named by opening the book at random and taking the first consonant on the upper-left-hand page as the first letter of the child's name; Sikh couples are married by circling the book, as Hindu couples circle the sacred fire (agnipradakshinam), and a commonly performed death rite is an unbroken reading (akhanda path) of the entire text.

The text itself was compiled in 1603–1604 by Guru Arjan, the fifth Sikh guru. According to tradition he compiled the book in response to certain rivals contesting his authority, some of whom had compiled and were circulating books purporting to be the teachings of Guru Nanak, the Sikhs' founder and first guru. There may be some truth in this tradition, but it is now well established that Arjan himself was working from a compilation made a generation before. The text's opening verses are known as the mul mantra, which gives a collection of attributes and qualities ascribed to the Supreme Being. After this opening, the Adigranth has three main parts. The first is the Japji, a sequence of thirty-eight poems written by Guru Nanak that is considered the essence of the Sikh faith, and which is recited by the faithful as the morning prayer.

The second section contains the hymns of the Sikh gurus, arranged by raga, or melodic mode. Within each raga the hymns are arranged according to poetic meter, and within each meter the hymns are arranged sequentially according to which of the gurus composed them. Since the Sikh tradition holds that all ten gurus contained the same divine spirit, they all identified themselves as “Nanak.” But introductions to the songs differentiate between them by calling them Mahala (literally “house,” but figuratively “body”) followed by a number—from Mahala 1 for Guru Nanak to Mahala 5 for Guru Arjan.

The final section of the Adigranth contains hymns by various other devotees (bhakta), both Hindu and Muslim, whom the Sikh gurus believed to be propounding the essential Sikh message of monotheism and the need to serve God. Among the Hindu devotional (bhakti) poets whose works can be found in this section are Trilochan, Jayadeva, Pipa, Ramananda, Sen, Namdev, Kabir, and Ravidas, with significant collections for the last three. Even for those not interested in the Sikhs, this last section makes the Adigranth an extremely important document. Not only does this section provide manuscript tradition that can be precisely and accurately dated, but the sacred status of the text has ensured that it has remained unchanged since the beginning of the seventeenth century. Many other manuscript sources for these poets are far more recent and are made problematic by textual corruption and pseudonymous additions.

Adishesha
("Primal Shesha") Epithet of Shesha. See Shesha.

Aditi
In Hindu mythology, one of the wives of the sage Kashyapa, who also married Aditi’s twelve sisters and through them begat all living creatures. Aditi is first mentioned in the Rg Veda, where she is one of the few female figures, although a minor one. The epic Mahabharata describes her as giving birth to twelve divine sons, the Adityas: Dhata, Aryama, Mitra, Shakra (Indra), Varuna, Amsha, Bhaga, Vivasvan (Surya), Pushan, Savitr (Surya), Tvashtr, and Vishnu. Both Hindu epics, the Mahabharata and the Ramayana, also describe how Aditi gave birth to the Vamana avatar, that is, the “divine descent” of the god Vishnu, in his form as a dwarf.

Aditya
In the Hindu epic the Mahabharata, a group of twelve divine sons born to the sage Kashyapa and his wife Aditi, from whom these sons get their collective name. The twelve are named Dhata, Aryama, Mitra, Shakra (Indra), Varuna, Amsha, Bhaga, Vivasvan (Surya), Pushan, Savitr, Tvashtr, and Vishnu. Several of these deities are important figures in the religious scriptures known as the Vedas, and Vishnu later gained prominence as one of the primary Hindu gods. On one hand, the Adityas illustrate the Hindu concept that the divine beings (devas) have many similarities to humans, although they are more powerful and live in a different world, the heavens. On the other hand, they also demonstrate how the Hindu tradition changes over time. Among the Adityas, Vishnu is one of a number of divine beings who are all subject to birth, death, and the operation of karma, whereas in his later aspect as the Supreme Being, he is considered not only to be beyond all these forces, but to wield control over them.

The twelve Adityas are the sun in the twelve months of the year. In at least one of the Puranas these twelve Adityas are each connected with a particular sign of the zodiac.

Adivasi
("first inhabitant") General term for different groups of tribal peoples. They are usually associated with forests and other less developed areas, often making their living by hunting, woodcutting, gathering honey and medicinal plants, and through subsistence agriculture. The largest concentrations are in Orissa, Madhya Pradesh, and Bihar, on both sides of the Vindhya Mountains separating northern and southern India, but they are also found in regions such as the Nilgiri Hills in southern India. Adivasis are still largely unassimilated into caste Hinduism. Many are illiterate and desperately poor, despite programs giving them reservations for higher education and government employment. In recent years they have been the focus of intense missionary activity by both Christians and Hindu missionaries sponsored by the Vishva Hindu Parishad.

Adoption
One of the most important requirements for every Hindu male is to have at least one son, so that the funeral rites for himself and for his ancestors will be correctly performed and maintained. These rites are considered central for the well-being of the dead, particularly the recently departed. Even in modern times, only men are allowed to perform funeral rites. Given the importance of these ceremonies, men with no biological sons adopt a son to guarantee the performance of the ceremony. The ideal candidate is a blood relative, such as a brother's son, who is of equal social status with the adoptive father. Through adoption the boy becomes a member of another family, but the legal texts disagree on his continuing relationship with his natal family. Many sources claim that an adopted son has no right to the inheritance of his natal family and no entitlement to offer funeral rites for those ancestors, since by adoption he has become part of another family. Other texts speak of special arrangements by which an adopted son is considered to have two fathers, one biological, one adopted. He inherits from, and performs ancestral rites for both fathers.

Adultery
Given the traditional Hindu belief that women are the vessels and guardians of family status, rules about adultery outlined in the dharma literature are mostly concerned with the conduct of women, although these texts do prescribe a penance (prayashchitta) for a man who commits adultery with another man's wife. As outlined in the dharma literature, adultery is much more serious for women. It is notable that in most cases the dharma does not recommend the woman be driven from her home. An adulterous woman is to perform a rigorous penance until her next menstrual period—sleeping on the ground, wearing dirty clothes, and getting very little food; during this time she also loses her status as a lady of the house and whatever domestic authority she may have wielded. According to the dharma literature, all of this is to end with a bath at the end of her menstrual period, after which she is accepted back at her former status. Women who conceive as a result of adulterous liaisons are to be abandoned. In practice this often means being secluded and cut off from the family, although she still receives food. Abandonment is also recommended in certain other cases: in adulterous liaisons with a man's student or his guru, if a woman attempts to kill her husband, or if she kills her fetus. The reluctance to completely cast a woman away, and the willingness to bring her back to her former status after doing penance, both reflect the importance of marriage and family life in Hindu culture, as well as women's importance in the family.

Although these prescriptions in the dharma literature seem relatively humane, often there has been a considerable difference between these prescriptions and a particular group's actual practice. In general, the higher the group's social status (or the more a group is trying to improve its social status), the more harshly it treats such infractions, since these infractions injure its social standing. At present this disjunction is also affected by the differing attitudes toward sexuality between rural and urban contexts, with the latter tending to be more permissive and the former far more restrictive. These differences are illustrated by occasional reports of adulterous women being killed to restore the family's honor; this far exceeds even the harshest penalty prescribed in the dharma literature.

Advaita Vedanta

One of the branches of Vedanta, the philosophical school claiming to reveal the ultimate (anta) teaching of the ancient sacred texts known as the Vedas. The Advaita school upholds a philosophical position known as monism, which is the belief that a single Ultimate Reality lies behind all things. Advaita proponents believe that reality is non-dual (advaita)—that is, that everything in the world is actually the formless, unqualified Brahman, despite the appearance of difference and diversity. To support this claim, the Advaitins provide a convincing explanation for the world one perceives to have many separate and diverse things.

Advaitans account for this apparent diversity by using the concept of adhyasa (superimposition), in which a false, mistaken understanding is projected upon a real object—in the classical Advaita example, seeing a rope in the twilight and mistakeing it for a snake. For the Advaitins, the “snake” is not completely unreal, since it depends on the rope for its existence—one cannot see the snake unless the rope is there. At the same time, the “snake” is clearly not real since one does not persist in this error, and once the illusion of the snake has been dispelled, one can no longer see it.

In the same way, the Advaitins believe that our idea of the phenomenal everyday world is projected upon the one thing in the universe that is truly real—Brahman. Like the snake, the world is unreal as it is perceived but real insofar as it depends on Brahman. For the Advaitins, the roots of adhyasa are epistemological, that is, related to how human beings come to know things, but the results of adhyasa are both epistemological and ontological (related to how things actually are). On one hand, adhyasa obscures the Ultimate Reality and prevents one from accurately perceiving it, and on the other, its projective character creates our notions of the world. For the Advaitins, the source of all this confusion is ultimately rooted in avidya, or primal ignorance, under the influence of which one forms mistaken ideas about the world. The operation of this ignorance is said to have no beginning, but one of the things that keeps it going is one’s karma, based on the continuing actions caused by this mistaken understanding. Another source of this ignorance is the power of illusion (maya) wielded by God (Ishvara), which bewilders human beings. For the Advaita Vedantin, God is identified as a qualified (saguna) form of Brahman—thus below the highest unqualified (nirguna) Brahman, and himself a product of superimposition.

Since the Advaita school believes that the source of bondage to karma results from mistaken understanding, the only way to destroy bondage is to gain the correct understanding. Although the Advaitans say that people must perform obligatory religious actions (nitya karma) as a matter of duty, actions can never bring about the understanding that is necessary for salvation, although they may aid the process by removing some of the karmic obstacles. To support this understanding, the Advaitins begin their analysis with an appeal to the knowing subject as the one thing that can never be doubted, and claim that this self-consciousness is evidence for the existence of the inner Self, or atman. Aside from this appeal to experience, they depend heavily on the authority of the sacred texts, particularly the Upanishads, to uphold their key doctrines: that Brahman is the source of all things; that the human soul is ultimately identical to Brahman, although hampered by obstructions.
based on past karma; and that gaining true knowledge is the basis of liberation. The first and greatest Advaita thinker was the philosopher Shankaracharya; other significant figures were his two disciples, Sureshvara and Padmapada, as well as Mandana Mishra and Vachaspati Mishra. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Advani, Lal Krishna
(b. 1927) Modern Indian politician as well as past president and leader of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), a party often considered the political wing of the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS). Advani joined the RSS as a young man and was encouraged by the RSS to become active in politics, first in the Jana Sangh and later in the BJP. In the fall of 1990, Advani embarked on a tour of northern India to raise public support for building a Rama temple in Ayodhya, on a site which at the time was occupied by a Muslim mosque. The public response to this rath yatra (“chariot journey”) was positive and brought great political benefits to the BJP; the BJP has since run the state governments in some of India’s most important states and has become the largest opposition party in Parliament. During the 1990s the BJP’s influence waxed and waned, but for much of this time, Advani has been one of the leading figures in the party. In the spring of 1996, however, he was one of many Indian political figures whose name was connected with a major bribery scandal. He immediately resigned his seat in Parliament and promised that he would not seek office until his name had been cleared. The allegation was found to be completely baseless, and Advani was reelected to Parliament in March, 1998. During the thirteen months of BJP government rule in 1998–99, Advani served as Home Minister (the Cabinet officer responsible for all domestic affairs) and has continued in this position during the BJP-led National Democratic Alliance.

Aerial Cars
One of the standard images in Hindu mythology. The most famous of the cars is the Pushpak Viman, which is originally owned by Kubera, a minor deity associated with mountains and their mineral wealth. The Pushpak Viman is commandeered and stolen by Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka. In modern times, mythological references to such aerial cars are often cited as evidence that ancient Indians possessed the technology for flying machines, an assertion for which there is no historical evidence.

Agama
In its most general meaning, this refers to any authoritative text. In a philosophical context, this word designates one of the pramanas, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge. As a pramana, the agama denotes testimony from a reliable source, particularly from scriptures such as the Veda. Within specific sectarian communities, such as the devotees (bhakta) of the gods Shiva (Shaivas) and Vishnu (Vaishnavas), the word also commonly designates the particular texts deemed most authoritative by that community.

Agastya
In Hindu mythology, Agastya is one of the rishis (sages) of ancient India and is attributed with various supernormal powers. As with many of the rishis, Agastya is marked as different even by his birth, which is far outside the normal manner. According to the story, Agastya is conceived when the semen of the deities Mitra and Varuna is placed in a pot and develops there into a baby boy. Agastya is described as preferring a detached, ascetic lifestyle, but he compromises in deference to his ancestors. The ancestors appear to Agastya in a vision, imploring him to marry and have children, so that his sons can continue performing the ancestral offerings; this is one of the three debts that every Hindu man must pay. Agastya consents and marries Lopamudra.

Agastya’s ascetic lifestyle is said to have generated immense powers, which he demonstrates by performing many marvelous deeds. According to some accounts, he curses king Nahusha to become a giant serpent, in retribution for the insults Nahusha has heaped upon him. Agastya also curses King Indradyumna to become an elephant, and the gandharva named Huhu to become a crocodile; the two are released many years later through the god Vishnu’s divine grace.

Not all of his exploits stem from his readiness to curse—a trait found in many of the sages—and some are performed for the benefit of human beings. He is reported to have humbled the Vindhyा Mountains (here personified), which through envy of Mount Meru have grown so tall that the sun and moon are unable to get around them. Agastya does this by asking Vindhya to bow down to let him get through on his journey to southern India. Agastya promises that Vindhya can stand up again when he returns, which has yet to happen. In other cases Agastya is reported to have used his powers to help get rid of demons. On one occasion, when a group of demons is hiding in the sea by day and coming out to pillage at night, Agastya exposes them by drinking up the ocean and thus taking away their place of refuge. On another occasion he foils a demon who has been taking the form of a goat to be cooked and eaten by unsuspecting diners. The demon has been killing the diners by exploding out of their stomachs. Agastya eats the demon as usual, but it is then completely destroyed by Agastya’s prodigious digestive powers. See also Gajendramoksha.

Aghori

In one context this term refers to one of the two loosely organized groups of the Jogi ascetics, the other being the Nathpanthis. There are three major groups of ascetics devoted to the god Shiva; they are the Aghoris, Nathpanthis, and Dashanami Sanyasis. The difference between these is that the Dashanamis are said to have been founded by the philosopher Shankaracharya, while the Aghoris and Nathpanthis are believed to be descended from earlier Shaiva ascetic orders, particularly the Kapalikas, Kalamukhas, and Pashupatas. The term aghori also refers to ascetics whose reputed practices make them both respected and feared by the general population. The Aghoris draw their name from one of the names of the god Shiva, Aghora, which despite its literal meaning (“not terrifying”), designates one of the most frightful and powerful forms of Shiva. As devotees (bhakta) of this form of Shiva, the Aghoris are famous for their disregard of all social conventions and boundaries. They often eat from a vessel made of a human skull and are popularly reputed to eat anything, including dung and human flesh. Such behavior generates fascination and sometimes respect among the larger Hindu populace, but also considerable fear; Aghoris are so far outside the normal social boundaries that most people would rather avoid interaction with them.

Agni

(“fire,” cognate with Latin ignis) Hindu deity present in every fire. Agni is also one of the eight dikpalas, or Guardians of the Directions, with responsibility for the southeast quarter. As fire, Agni is also one of the five elements in classical Hindu cosmology.

Agni is important in the samhitas (hymns) of the Rg Veda and in the Brahmanas, a later strand of Vedic liter-nature emphasizing sacrificial rites. The Rg Veda opens with a hymn to Agni and describes him as “the household priest, the god and officiant of the sacrifice, [and], . . . the giver of blessings.” Agni remained important in the Brahmanas since, as the sacrificial fire, he was essential to all ritual. Agni’s importance in these texts stems from his presence in all three levels of the Vedic universe—on the earth as fire, in the middle atmospheric realm (antariksha) as lightning, and in the sky as the sun. This ability to move between these levels made Agni the intermediary between the gods and human beings. From above, Agni served as the messenger of the gods, while as the sacrificial fire on earth, Agni not only consumed the offerings but conveyed them in the smoke to the gods above. Because of his role in bringing about the sacrifice, another epithet for Agni is the “mouth of the gods.”

Unlike many of the other Vedic deities, Agni has retained a certain prominence even in the present day. Although Vedic sacrifices are uncommon, sacrificial motifs have been incorporated into many contemporary rites.

Ceremonies often have a part in which offerings (often of clarified butter) are ladled into a sacrificial fire. Fire plays an important role in many rituals, particularly that of arati, in which lamps are waved before the image of a divinity as an offering of light. Agni also serves as the divine witness to the single action widely believed to seal a marriage. This is agnipradakshinam, in which the bride and groom make seven revolutions around a lamp or fire. Even on the most prosaic level, fire is still essential to daily life since most Indians continue to cook over an open flame—whether coal, wood, dung, or bottled gas. This everyday utility, combined with his abiding ritual presence, have assured Agni a continuing presence in Hindu life.

Agni Akhara

The name of a particular subgroup of the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, a particular type of renunciant ascetic. The Dashanami Nagas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, organized into different akharas or regiments on the model of an army. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Nagas’ primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests; both of these occupations have largely disappeared in contemporary times. The Agni akhara is a subunit of the Juna akhara, one of the largest and oldest of the Naga akharas.

The Agni akhara’s membership is very different from that of the other established akharas. Whereas the other Naga sanyasi akharas will accept men from all levels of society—in some cases even the lowest status group, the shudras—the Agni akhara admits only unmarried brahmins who have been lifelong celibates. Perhaps as a consequence of their more exclusive membership criteria, the Agni akhara is the only Dashanami Naga akhara that has no naked (naga) ascetics. All of its members remain fully clothed during the procession for their bath at the Kumbha Mela.
The Agni akhara was first established in Benares, and this remains their most important site. All of the akharas have particular features that define their organizational identity, including specific patron deities; the Agni akhara’s patron deity is the goddess Gayatri, considered the embodiment of the Gayatri Mantra.

Agnihotra

("fire sacrifice") Religious rite in which offerings are made to the sacred fire, considered to be the god Agni in material form. The term can also refer to the maintenance and care of the sacred fire itself. The roots of worship based on a sacrificial fire go back to the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu sacred texts. This type of worship is still present in modern times, although much diminished in emphasis.

Agnikula

("fire lineage") A collective name for the four main clans of Rajputs (warrior princes): the Pariharas, Chauhans, Solankis, and Pawars. According to tradition, this collective name refers to the Rajputs’ descent from a single mythical king who had arisen from a sacrificial fire pit at Mount Abu in the state of Rajasthan. Although their historical origin is unclear, these four clans ruled over much of northwestern India, either as independent kings or feudal vassals, after their appearance at the end of the first millennium. The Pariharas ruled southern Rajasthan. The Chauhans ruled the region around Delhi. The Solankis ruled in Gujarat. The Pawars ruled in western Madhya Pradesh. Although their days as warrior princes have passed, they remain influential in politics, both as politicians and as constituent communities.

Agnipradakshinam

("circling the fire") A common rite in many modern Hindu marriage ceremonies, usually performed as part of the saptapadi, in which the bride and groom take seven steps to definitively seal their marriage. The saptapadi and the agnipradakshinam are combined so that the bride and groom make seven revolutions around a small fire. As the god Agni, the fire is the divine witness to the marriage bond between bride and groom, a bond often symbolized by tying the end of the groom’s turban to the fringe of the bride’s sari. The fire is also a sign that the celebration of marriage is a yajna, or sacrificial rite.

Agnipravesha

("entering fire") Death by fire, which could occur in several different contexts. This was often used to refer to the practice of sati, in which a widow would be burned on her husband’s funeral pyre. Death by fire was also one of the mandated forms of religious suicide; this could be done either as a means of relief for someone afflicted by an incurable disease, or as part of certain rites of sacrifice such as the sarvasvara, which was performed to send the sacrificer to heaven. By the beginning of the eighteenth century, religious suicide had been condemned and had fallen into disuse. In the nineteenth century, British horror at the practice of sati led them to ban it wherever they were able to do so.

Agnishtoma

Particular rite of sacrifice prescribed in the later strands of the Vedas, the earliest Hindu sacred texts. The agnishtoma was most often performed in the early spring and was dedicated to the Vedic god Agni (fire). The rite’s two central elements were the pressing and consumption of the mysterious sacrificial drink called soma (seen as a material form of the Vedic god Soma), and the slaughter of sacrificial animals, which were burned on the sacrificial fire (the god Agni in material form). A final chant during the sacrifice was addressed to Agni. During the Vedic period, this rite became largely the province of kings since they were the only people who could command the necessary resources for it. With the later reaction against animal sacrifice, the rite fell out of favor, although it is still performed occasionally in a modified fashion without sacrifice.

Agrahara
A brahmin residential enclave, usually established by a land grant from a wealthy land owner or royalty to a particular brahmin. Brahmins had the highest status in traditional Hindu society, based on the belief that they had higher ritual purity. The purpose of the agrahara was to protect this ritual purity since it could be compromised fairly easily. Agraharas were most common in southern India, where brahmins formed an extremely small percentage of the general population—on average, about four percent. As a small minority, southern Indian brahmins could maintain a more controlled environment, thereby reducing the possibility of having their purity tainted. In northern India, brahmins formed a significant part of the population and tended to live within the towns and cities, although they often inhabited particular sections of these places.

Ahalya
In Hindu mythology, Ahalya is the wife of the sage Gautama. She is turned into stone by Gautama’s curse and later restored to life by being touched by the foot of the god Rama. Gautama’s curse is brought on by the actions of the god Indra, who lusts for Ahalya. One day, when Gautama has gone to the river to bathe (snana), Indra takes Gautama’s form and goes to Ahalya in a bid to make love to her. Accounts differ on whether Ahalya is aware of her lover’s identity—in some she is flattered by Indra’s attention, in others she is genuinely deceived. When Gautama discovers what has happened, he curses Ahalya to become a stone and Indra to have a thousand vaginas on his body, as a punishment for his lust. Gautama is later mollified into modifying the curses, so that Ahalya will remain a stone until she is touched by Rama’s foot, and Indra will be covered instead with a thousand eyes. This story primarily illustrates the power of the sages to curse even the gods, but the different versions also reveal varying assumptions about the nature of women.

Aham Brahmasmi
(“I am Brahman.”) In the Hindu philosophical tradition, this is one of the four “great utterances” (mahavakyas) expressing an ultimate truth. The truth expressed in this utterance is the idea that atman (the individual Self) and Brahman (Ultimate Reality) are one and the same—identical; this truth is at the heart of the speculative texts called the Upanishads. The four mahavakyas, aside from their philosophical importance as capsulizing fundamental truths, were also appropriated by the four divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasi ascetics as identifying symbols. Each division had a different mahavakya, just as each had a different Veda, a different primary sacred center, and a different paradigmatic ascetic quality. Aham Brahmasmi is the mahavakya associated with the Bhuriwara division of the Dashanami Sanyasis.

Ahamkar
(“I-making”) In the Samkhya school of Hindu philosophy, ahamkar is one of the stages in the evolution of prakrti (primal matter) away from its initial undifferentiated unity toward differentiation of the Self and other things. The final result of this degradation is the world that we see around us, in which human souls are subject to reincarnation (samsara). Prakrti evolves first into mahat ("the great one") and then into ahamkar, which is the first stage in which there is a sense of self and subjectivity. This sense of subjectivity colors the entire devolution after that. Ahamkar then evolves further, forming the basis for both the subjective and objective world: on one hand, the individual's organs of sense (jnanendriya) and organs of action (karmendriya) develop, and on the other hand, the five subtle elements (tanmatras), which are the basis of the gross material elements, evolve. In colloquial speech, ahamkar is used to mean “self-pride,” invariably in a pejorative sense.

Ahimsa
("refraining from harm") Ahimsa refers to the conscious commitment to refrain from harming other living beings, either directly or indirectly. The emphasis on ahimsa originated with the Jains, for whom all actions carry karmic consequences, but who also believe that the karmic consequences generated by intentional evil acts are far more severe than those from unintentional ones. Jain and Buddhist commitment to ahimsa brought it further into Indian society, and it has been an important feature of Hindu practice for well over two thousand years. In the Yoga Sutras, Patanjali mentions ahimsa as one of the restraints (yama) and thus recommends it as one of the basic foundations for religious life. This commitment to ahimsa is believed to be one of the major forces responsible for the decline of animal sacrifice, which was one of the most important types of religious practice as described in the Vedas, the oldest Hindu scriptures. Far more recently, in the twentieth century, ahimsa was one of the guiding principles of Mohandas Gandhi during the struggle for Indian independence. Although Gandhi did not rule out the use of violence in principle, his commitment to ahimsa reflected his judgment that means and ends are karmically linked, and that the means one employs will determine both the nature and tone of one's ends. See also karma.
Ahir
The model for traditional Indian society was as a collection of endogamous subgroups known as jatis (birth). These jatis were organized (and their social status largely determined) by the group's hereditary occupation, over which each group had a monopoly. In traditional northern Indian society, the Ahiras were a jati whose hereditary occupation was herding and selling milk.

Aihole
Historical site in the state of Karnataka, just south of the modern city of Bijapur. Aihole was an important city during the Chalukya dynasty (4th–8th c. C.E.), and its surviving buildings are some of the oldest standing Hindu temples. These temples represent an early stage in the evolution of Hindu architecture from earlier architectural forms, such as the rock-cut cave temple (chaitya) or enclosed courtyard (vihara). One of the earliest temples (ca. 450 C.E.) is a simple square pavilion (mandapa) with a tower (shikhara) over the main image of the deity, one of the hallmarks of later Hindu temples. A temple to Durga built about a century later has the general plan of a chaitya, but a shikhara was also added. Although the temples at Aihole are related to the earlier forms, they also prefigure the mature development of medieval Hindu architecture.

Aims of Life
(purushartha) Four general goals that Hindu society has accepted as legitimate ends for all human beings: artha (wealth and power), kama (desire, especially sexual desire), dharma (righteousness or religious duty), and moksha (final liberation of the soul from the cycle of reincarnation). Hindus have affirmed that all of these are worthy ends, but have generally accepted that the last goal is qualitatively different from the other three, which are more strongly interrelated. There is nothing wrong with seeking money or pleasure, and Hindu culture affirms both of these aims with the understanding that their pursuit and enjoyment should ultimately be regulated by a commitment to dharma. Although there are paths to moksha that allow one to remain in the world, it is generally accepted that a person pursuing moksha will be less attuned to worldly desires because they are incompatible with this ultimate goal.

Aippasi
Seventh month in the Tamil solar year, corresponding to the northern Indian solar month of Tula (the zodiacal sign of Libra), which according to the Indian calendar usually falls within October and November. The existence of several different calendars is one clear sign of the continuing importance of regional cultural patterns. One way that the Tamils retain their culture is by preserving their traditional calendar. Tamil is one of the few regional languages in India with an ancient, well-established literary tradition. See also Tamil months, Tamil Nadu, and Tamil language.

Airavata
In Hindu mythology, the divine elephant who is the vehicle of Indra, king of the gods. The only significant role Airavata plays in any myth is as the ultimate cause for why the gods have to churn the Ocean of Milk. One day the powerful and irascible sage Durvasas gives a garland to Indra. Indra places the garland on Airavata, who throws it on the ground. The reasons for this differ—in one account Airavata is plagued by the bees gathering on it, and in another he is intoxicated by the scent of the flowers. Durvasas understands this as an insult and, in his anger, curses the gods to be subject to old age and death. The only way the gods can escape the effects of the curse is to obtain the nectar of immortality, which is done by churning the Ocean of Milk. See also Tortoise avatar.

Aiteraya Brahmana
Along with the Shatapatha Brahmana, the two most important texts in the Brahmana stratum of Vedic literature. The Brahmanas are primarily manuals describing the correct performance of Vedic ritual sacrifices. Because they were composed later than the actual Vedas, each Brahmana is connected in theory with one of the Vedas, to give it authority as a sacred Vedic text. According to tradition, the Aiteraya Brahmana is associated with the earliest of the Vedas, the Rg Veda.

Aiyanar
Southern Indian regional deity. In the state of Tamil Nadu Aiyanar is an important village deity, generally considered to be the guardian of the village tank, bringer of rain, and protector of the village. It is likely that he is an indigenous deity who has been assimilated into the Hindu pantheon. Aiyanar is sometimes identified with Aiyappa, although there are some discrepancies between the two—Aiyanar is a deity associated with the protection of villages, whereas Aiyappa is associated with the hills, the jungle, and the hunt. For further information see Louis Dumont, "A Folk Deity of Tamil Nad: Aiyanar, the Lord," in T. N. Madan (ed.), Religion in India, 1991.

Aiyappa
Hilltop deity of the southern Indian state of Kerala, who at the local level is often identified with Aiyanar, the Tamil village deity. The most important of Aiyappa's shrines is at Shabarimalai in the hills of central Kerala, to which there is an important pilgrimage each winter in December and January. Aiyappa's strong associations with the hills and the hunt make it likely that he was originally a local deity of the hills of Kerala, but in more recent times he has been assimilated into the larger Hindu pantheon as the son of Shiva and Vishnu. Although both of these gods are male, Aiyappa's conception is said to happen when Vishnu takes the form of the female enchantress Mohini, to beguile the demons into parting with the nectar of immortality. Because of his parentage, Aiyappa is also called Hariharaputra, “the son (putra) of Hari (Vishnu) and Hara (Shiva).”

Due to his unusual conception, Aiyappa is fated to kill a particularly troubling buffalo demoness, Mahishi, who has been given the boon that she cannot be killed by anyone born from the union of male and female. After his birth the infant Aiyappa is abandoned by a riverbank, and adopted by King Rajashekhara, who names him Manikanta. Manikanta's stepmother is very jealous of her stepson and wishes to clear the path to the throne for her own child. When Manikanta is twelve his stepmother feigns an illness that she says only tiger's milk can cure. Everyone is understandably reluctant to try to get the tiger's milk, but Manikanta finally agrees to do so.

On his way to get the tiger's milk, Manikanta is met by messengers of Shiva, who remind him that his life's ultimate purpose is to kill Mahishi. After a long struggle, Manikanta dispatches the demon, but while he is dancing on the she-buffalo's body, another female figure rises out of it. She identifies herself as Lila, and wants to marry Manikanta, but as a celibate student he does not desire this. He appeases Lila... with the conditional vow that he will marry her the year that a celibate pilgrim does not come to visit him on Shabari Malai—a vow that will never come true since celibacy is the single most important requirement for the Shabari Malai pilgrimage. Manikanta then placates Lila by establishing a temple for her on a neighboring hilltop.

Returning to his original task of retrieving the tiger’s milk, Aiyappa then bids Shiva to take the form of a tiger, upon which he rides back to his stepparents, inviting them to milk the tiger to their heart’s content. This image of the young boy returning astride the tiger is one of the most common Aiyappa images. For further information see E. Ajatashatru

(“[he whose] enemy is unborn,” 5th c. B.C.E.) King in the Magadha region in the modern state of Bihar. Ajatashatru deposed and murdered his father, Bimbisara, around 494 B.C.E., then expanded his father’s territorial gains. Ajatashatru first annexed the area around the city of Benares and then conquered the city of Vaishali, capital of the kingdom of the Vrjjis. Ajatashatru and his father both aimed at building an empire in the Ganges River basin, and they were among the first Indian kings to conceive of a far-flung empire.

Ajatashatru

(2) In the Brhadaranyaka Upanishad, a great sage who was also the king of Benares. Ajatashatru is notable for instructing Gargya, a brahmin priest, on the nature of Brahman, even though this was inappropriate by contemporary standards since Ajatashatru was a kshatriya warrior king and thus should have been receiving instruction from Gargya. The Upanishads have several episodes in which, contrary to the norm, kshatriyas instruct brahmins. Such episodes reveal the nature of wisdom as conceived in the Upanishads—it is achieved by individual striving and realization and not conferred by birth or social position.
Ajita Keshakambalin

In classical Indian philosophy, the reputed founder of a materialist philosophical school and whose name reflects his usual garb—a hair blanket (kesha-kambal). Ajita was a contemporary of the Buddha, and information about him comes from the Buddhist scriptures. Ajita’s materialist philosophy was that human beings are composed of four elements, that these elements disperse after death, and that the individual then ceases to exist. Given this philosophy, Ajita believed that one should enjoy life while one could, taking pleasure in the good and accepting the bad, and that all religious observances were a waste of time and a futile hope. Ajita was the first in a long tradition of materialists, and one finds evidence of this materialist perspective as late as the eighth century of the common era.

Ajivika

Ancient philosophical school traditionally believed to have been founded by Gosala Maskariputra, a contemporary of the Buddha. The Ajivikas were fatalists who believed that all things are inexorably predetermined by destiny (niyati). Since, according to this philosophy, all things are predetermined, religious practice has no effect on one’s future lives, and in doing such things people are only doing what they are already predetermined to do. The Ajivikas compared the process of reincarnation (samsara) to a ball of string, which would unroll until it was done and then go no further. The Ajivikas shunned clothing and lived a strict ascetic lifestyle, believing that this was the lifestyle preordained for them. The school had a significant presence in southern India well into the common era but finally disappeared around the fourteenth century. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; and Philip S. Rawson, The Art of Tantra, 1973.

Ajna Chakra

In many schools of yoga and in the esoteric ritual tradition known as tantra, the ajna chakra is one of the six psychic centers (chakras) thought to be in the subtle body. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system, believed to exist on a different plane of existence than gross matter but with certain correspondences to the material body. The subtle body is comprised of a set of six chakras, which are visualized as multipetaled lotus flowers running roughly along the course of the spine, connected by three vertical channels. Each chakra has important symbolic associations—with differing human capacities, different subtle elements (tanmatras), and different seed syllables (bijaksharas) formed from the letters of the Sanskrit alphabet, thus encompassing all sacred sound. Above and below the chakras are the bodily abodes of Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power), the two divine principles through which the entire universe has come into being. The underlying assumption behind this concept of the subtle body is thus the homology of macrocosm and microcosm, an essential Hindu idea since the time of the mystical texts known as the Upanishads.

The six chakras are traditionally enumerated from the bottom up, and the ajna chakra is the sixth and highest of these. It is visualized as a two-petaled lotus located in the forehead just above the top of the nose. Its petals contain the bijaksharas Ham and Ksam, formed from the last two letters of the Sanskrit alphabet. The ajna chakra is associated with the capacity for thought, considered a distinctively human capacity and thus the most important human faculty. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakti, 1978; and Philip S. Rawson, The Art of Tantra, 1973.

Akasha

(“space”) One of the five elements in traditional Indian cosmology, the others being earth, fire, water, and wind. In some philosophical schools, each of the elements is paired with one of the five senses; akasha is associated with hearing since it is believed to convey sound from place to place.

Akbar
(r. 1555–1605) Third and greatest ruler in the Moghul dynasty, a Muslim dynasty that controlled large parts of India between 1525 and 1707, existing in reduced form until 1857. Akbar's long reign was marked by generally good relations with his Hindu subjects, many of whom were put into positions of authority and for whom he seems to have had genuine sympathy and understanding. One of his most important gestures was to repeal a poll tax on non-Muslims, which had been customary but was highly unpopular among Hindus. Although more orthodox Muslims insinuated that Akbar was a closet Hindu, the goodwill and cooperation that he fostered helped keep things peaceful throughout his reign.

Akhand Path
("unbroken recitation") The unbroken recitation of an entire religious text, which is believed to bring religious benefits; individuals may perform such recitations for their own benefit, or they may hire another person to perform the recitation for them. The benefits of this action are believed to come from the perceived power of the sacred text itself. The recitation may be done as a pious act, simply for the merit in sponsoring it, or as part of a festival observance; it may also be a last resort in times of dire emergencies or a religious act performed after a death in the family. One of the texts often recited without a break is the Ramcharitmanas, a retelling of the Ramayana by the sixteenth-century poet-saint Tulsidas; in the Sikh community, the Adigranth is recited.

Akhara
In its most basic meaning, an akhara is a “wrestling ground,” a place in the village or city where young men come to train, tone, and compete. Such practices at an akhara are not merely physical exercise but also a form of religious practice, since wrestlers often begin by worshiping Hanuman, a deity associated with strength and power. Among the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, the word akhara means something closer to “regiment.” The Dashanami Nagas were ascetics devoted to the god Shiva and who formerly made their living as traders and mercenary soldiers. These Nagas were organized into different akharas based on the model of an army, and here the word primarily marks group affiliation, although it can also refer to the buildings in which the group lives. The Nagas are divided into seven main akharas—the Juna or Bhairava, Agni, Araham, Niranjani, Ananda, Mahanirvani, and Atala. Among the Bairagi Naga ascetics—militant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu—the largest division of forces is into anis (“armies”), which are then subdivided into akharas.

Akhyati
(“nondiscrimination”) Theory of error propounded by Prabhakara, a member of the Purva Mimamsa philosophical school, who lived in the seventh or eighth century C.E. All the theories of error aim to explain why people make errors in judgment, such as the stock example of mistaking the silvery flash of a seashell for a piece of silver. Prabhakara explains this error as rooted in the inability to make sharp distinctions. The person uncritically connects two simple judgments, “that object is silvery” and “silver is silvery.” By themselves, both of these statements are true; what is false is their combination into the complex judgment, “that object is silvery.” According to Prabhakara, the problem lies not with the simple impressions given by perception (pratyaksha) or memory—both of which are true—but with their uncritical connection, in which the mind fails to recognize that other judgments are possible. For further information see Bijayananda Kar, The Theories of Error in Indian Philosophy, 1978; and Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India’s Philosophies, 1972.

Akkadevi
Sister of King Jayasimha II (1015–1042 C.E.), a monarch in the Chalukya dynasty that ruled large parts of the Deccan peninsula. Akkadevi was important not only through her family connections but also because she served as a provincial governor in her brother’s kingdom. Her example shows that women in powerful families have often been able to overcome the seeming social disadvantages imposed by their gender, a maxim proven most recently by Sonia Gandhi.

Akrura
In Hindu mythology Akrura is most famous as the envoy from the royal court at Mathura, who takes the god Krishna away from Krishna’s childhood home in Braj, never to return. Krishna’s wicked uncle, King Kamsa, instructs Akrura to lure Krishna and his brother Balarama to a festival, where they will be killed in a “friendly” bout with some wrestlers. Akrura sees through the plot and warns Krishna about it, but he remains indelibly associated with Krishna’s departure from Braj, which for his devotees (bhakta) is the bitterest moment in all of Krishna’s mythology. For a moving, dramatic account of this incident, see John Stratton Hawley, At Play with Krishna, 1981.

Akshakumara
In the Hindu epic the Ramayana, this is one of the sons of Ravana by his wife Mandodari. Akshakumara fights bravely and valiantly in the war against Rama’s army but is eventually killed by Rama’s servant, the monkey-deity, Hanuman.

Akshamala
A string of beads used to keep count when reciting prayers or mantras, sometimes translated by the accessible but misleading term “rosary.” An akshamala is one of the most common religious articles, and the materials from which it is made can often reveal sectarian affiliations. Shiva is often depicted wearing beads made of the seeds of the Elaeocarpus ganitrus tree, which are known as rudraksha ("eye of Rudra"). Devotees (bhakta) of Shiva emulate this practice. Devotees of the god Vishnu often carry beads made of wood from the tulsi plant, which is considered a form of Vishnu's wife Lakshmi. Other commonly used materials are sandalwood and crystal, but akshamalas can also be made from expensive materials such as coral and amber. In Hindu iconography the akshamala is one of the items commonly held by the goddess Saraswati, in keeping with her identity as the patron deity of learning and, by implication, sacred sound. The akshamala is also one of the items commonly held by the god Brahma, but in his case it has less specific significance.

Akshaya Vata

("indestructible banyan tree") In Hindu mythology, a particular banyan tree that existed before the creation of the universe and will be the only thing to survive the cosmic dissolution (pralaya) at the end of the cosmic cycle. According to one mythic account, the sage Markandeya saw a vision of pralaya in which the only thing remaining was this single tree, under which lay the god Krishna in infant form, sucking on his toes. The akshaya vata is identified with a particular banyan tree in Allahabad at the junction of the Ganges and Yamuna rivers, where it is now enclosed within the fort built by the Moghul emperor Akbar. Earlier writers report an enormous tree on the site, but in modern times the tree is quite small. In some stories it was cut down by one of Akbar's successors. According to the seventh-century Chinese pilgrim Hsuan Tsang, Akshaya Trtiya (also called Akha Teej) Festival celebrated on the third day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Baisakh (April–May). The festival's name reflects the belief that the religious merit from rites performed on this day is indestructible (akshaya). This is thought to be the day on which the Treta Yuga (a previous cosmic age) began, and as a transitional day is believed to be highly auspicious. This day is marked by worship of Vishnu and his consort Lakshmi; it is also believed to be the birthday of Vishnu's sixth incarnation, Parashuram avatar. Consistent both with the worship of Vishnu and the belief that this is a transitional day, on Akshaya Trtiya the temple doors are opened at the Four Himalayan Dhams (the holy towns of Yamunotri, Gangotri, Kedarnath, and Badrinath) after having been closed all winter, and worship in those places is resumed until after the festival of Diwali in the fall. See also Four Dhams.
one of the preferred methods for committing religious suicide was to jump from the branches of the vata tree; this practice is also mentioned four centuries later by the Islamic scholar Alberuni.

Alakananda River
The longest and largest Himalayan tributary of the Ganges River; the Ganges forms at Devprayag, where the Alakananda unites with a second major tributary, the Bhagirathi River. As with all the Himalayan tributaries of the Ganges, the Alakananda River is considered sacred. Important pilgrimage places (tirtha) along the river include the temple town of Badrinath near its headwaters, its junction with the Pindara River at Karnaprayag, its junction with the Mandakini River at Rudraprayag, and Devprayag.

Alakhiya Akhara
The name of one subgroup of ascetics within the Naga class of the Dashanami order of Sanyasi. The Dashanami Nagas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, organized into different akharas or regiments that follow the model of an army. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Nagas’ primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests; both of these occupations have largely disappeared in contemporary times. The Alakhiya akhara is a subunit of the Juna akhara, one of the largest and oldest of the Naga akharas. The name Alakhiya comes from the word alakh (“without characteristics,” a name for the Supreme Being), which many Shaiva ascetics utter when begging for alms.
Until the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Nagas were fighting ascetics, drawn largely from the ranks of the shudras, the lowest Hindu varna. According to tradition, these fighting ascetics were recruited to protect the learned ascetics who, because they were saintly and scholarly men, could not protect themselves. The Nagas also had substantial trading interests. Two and three hundred years ago, these akharas were very powerful, especially in parts of the country where the centralized government had broken down. The Naga akharas sold their services as mercenaries, lent money at interest, engaged in trade, and often owned large amounts of property. The one place where the divisions and subdivisions of the akharas are still quite important is at the celebration of the Kumbha Mela, a bathing (snana) festival. There is a strict order for bathing, and individuals get a place in line based on their affiliation. Two hundred years ago, being first in line signified political, economic, and/or military dominance. The present bathing order reflects each group’s relative importance from that time.

Alambhusha
In Hindu mythology, a celestial woman who was the daughter of the sage Kashyapa. As with many of the celestial women, she was often sent by Indra, the king of the gods, to seduce sages whose spiritual merit was great enough to pose a threat to Indra’s lordship. The assumption behind this is that celibacy builds spiritual power, through which one can become a rival to the gods themselves. Sexual activity quickly drains this accumulated power, although the release of such power usually has positive consequences. Alambhusha is best known for her dalliance with the sage Dadhichi, by whom she had a son named Saraswat.

Alamkara
(“ornamentation”) A term for figures of speech in Sanskrit poetry, of which there are more than one hundred types. Many of these are the same as those used in English poetics, such as metaphor, simile, contrast, hyperbole, alliteration, and puns. The Sanskrit literati distinguished these figures of speech even further into more specific types, such as a simile expressing wonder, a simile expressed by doubt, and poetic error, which is the inverse of a metaphor (“that’s not the moon, but her face . . .”). Other forms are unique to Indian poetry, such as respective enumeration, an extended comparison in which one line mentions several referents and the following lines describe their attributes, always in the same order as the first line. Another form unique to Indian poetry is denial in which the speaker’s real intent is expressed by denial, but is accompanied by enough suggestion to indicate the true meaning. The use of alamkara marked all kinds of Sanskrit poetry, both religious and nonreligious, and many of these forms were brought into the later devotional poetry in the vernacular Indian languages. For further information on Sanskrit poetics, see Daniel H. H. Ingalls, Sanskrit Poetry, 1968.

Alandi
Maharashtra village famous as the home of the poet-saint Jnaneshvar and the site of his samadhi (burial) shrine. Jnaneshvar was the first great figure in the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba. Varkari religious practice centers primarily around two annual pilgrimages, in which all the participants arrive in Pandharpur in the modern state of Maharashtra on the same day. Despite having been dead for over 700 years, Jnaneshvar still symbolically travels from Alandi to Pandharpur twice each year; a palanquin (palkhi) carrying his sandals is at the head of the procession bearing his name.
Alberuni
(973–ca.1050 C.E.) Anglicized version of the name of Abu Rayhan Biruni, a central Asian scholar-scientist who was one of the greatest intellectual figures of his time. Alberuni was a member of the court of King Mahmud of Ghazni—by most accounts, quite reluctantly—and was forced to accompany Mahmud on some of his pillaging raids in India. Alberuni used this involuntary “fieldwork” as an opportunity to study Hindu life, culture, and sciences, and his work shows him to be a perceptive, careful, and passionate observer. In 1030 C.E. he published his findings in his Tahqiq ma li’l-Hind, which was translated in 1888 by Edward Sachau as Alberuni’s India. An abridged edition edited by Ainslee Embree was published in 1971.

Alchemy
Esoteric tradition that seeks to transform, transmute, and perfect the body through the use of various chemicals, with the ultimate goal of rendering the body immortal. Both Hindus and Buddhists have alchemical schools. The reported difference between the Buddhist rasayana school and the Hindu dhatuvada school is that the latter is solely materially based, whereas the former stresses meditation to gain final enlightenment. These two schools agree on many basic points of alchemy.

Hindu alchemists view the world as a series of bipolar opposites in tension with one another, and they are convinced that unifying these opposing forces brings spiritual progress and the end of reincarnation (samsara). Hindu alchemy shares this model of uniting or transcending opposing forces with Hindu tantra, an esoteric, ritually based system of religious practice, and with hatha yoga, which is based on a series of physical exercises that are also believed to affect the subtle body. Although all three traditions share a common assumption, they prescribe different forms of practice to effect the final goal: in tantra, ritual; in hatha yoga, physical exercises; and in alchemy, physical consumption of various substances.

In the alchemical tradition, the governing metaphor for this combination of opposites is the union of sun and moon. In Hindu tradition the sun and moon are connected to other opposing principles through an elaborate series of associations. The sun is identified with heat, drying power, fire, Shakti, and menstrual blood; the moon with coolness, healing power, water, Shiva, and semen. In alchemical practice the two essential chemical elements are mercury and sulfur—the former identified with Shiva’s semen and the latter with Shakti’s uterine blood. By properly mixing and consuming these elements, the aspirant’s body is purified and refined, eventually rendering it immortal. Modern descriptions of this practice invariably warn that it should only be carried out under the direction of one’s guru (spiritual teacher), since otherwise these combinations will be harmful. This warning is not surprising since mercury is a deadly poison. For further information see Shashibhushan B. Dasgupta, Obscure Religious Cults, 1962; and David Gordon White, The Alchemical Body, 1996.

Alidhasana
(“shooting posture”) Bodily posture (asana) characteristic of certain images in Hindu iconography. This position is like that of an archer drawing a bow, in which one knee is thrown forward, the other leg pushed back, and the trunk twisted in the direction of the front leg. The god Shiva in his manifestation as Tripurari, “the destroyer of the Triple City,” is often shown in this posture. The god Rama is also portrayed in his warrior pose.
Allahabad
(“City of Allah”) City at the junction of the Ganges and Yamuna rivers. The city was named Allahabad by the Moghul emperor Akbar, who built a fort there in 1583 to signify Moghul control of the region. Traditionally, the place where the rivers meet is considered a sacred bathing (snana) place, and the city was called Prayaga (“place of sacrifice”) by the Hindus. This name is still used to distinguish the sacred site (tirtha) from the city surrounding it. Another name for the junction is Triveni (“triple stream”), reflecting the traditional belief that the two visible rivers are joined at the confluence by a third underground river, the Saraswati. Near the bathing place is a banyan tree believed to be the akshaya vata (“indestructible banyan tree”), which despite its powerful name is at present very small.

As with all places where the Ganges makes some natural transition—here its confluence with another sacred river—Prayaga is considered especially holy, and bathing there is believed to confer even greater religious merit than a normal Ganges bath. This sanctity can be further amplified by bathing during particularly auspicious times in the calendar. For example, the annual Magh Mela is a bathing festival held during the lunar month of Magh (January–February). The holiest time for bathing is during a festival called Kumbha Mela, which is held approximately every twelve years when Jupiter is in Taurus. The Kumbha Mela is followed six years later by the Ardha (“half”) Kumbha Mela, which carries less sanctity than the “full” Kumbha Mela but is still considered a highly propitious event. Allahabad’s Kumbha Mela in 1989 was the largest religious festival on earth, attended by an estimated fifteen million people on a single day.

Allama Prabhu
(12th c. C.E.) Poet-saint and religious leader in the Lingayat community, a bhakti (devotional) community that worships Shiva as the single supreme god and rejects all caste regulations. The Lingayats formed in the southern Indian state of Karnataka, where they still have a considerable presence, and the collections of poetry that form their most important religious texts are composed in the Kannada language. According to legend, Allama was Shiva himself on earth, and the honorific title “Master” (Prabhu) indicates the respect that his Lingayat contemporaries granted him. In his poetry, Allama spoke from the perspective of one who had gained final liberation and had completely transcended all ritual and worldly ties. For further information see A. K. Ramanujan (trans.), Speaking of Siva, 1973.

Alvar
Collective name for twelve poet-saints devoted to the god Vishnu who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. In conjunction with the Nayanars, who were devoted to the god Shiva, the Alvars spearheaded the revitalization of Hindu religion vis-à-vis the Buddhists and the Jains. Both the Alvars and the Nayanars stressed passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god and conveyed this devotion through hymns sung in the Tamil language. The earliest Alvars were a group of three seventh-century contemporaries: Poygai, Pey, and Bhutam, whose propitious meeting on a rainy night is described as sparking the devotional flame. The next group: Tiruppan, Tirumalisai, Tondaradippodi, Kulashekhara, Periyalvar, Andal, and Tirumangai, are believed to have lived in the ninth century. They were followed by Nammalvar and his disciple Mathurakavi, who can be reasonably placed in the beginning of the tenth century, as can Nathamuni, who collected all of the Alvars’ hymns in the Nalayira Prabandham. Although the Alvars described themselves only as human devotees (bhakta), by the tenth century they were revered by the Shrivaishnava religious community as anshavatars, or incarnations of Vishnu's attributes or companions. Their collected hymns were (and are) popularly known as the Tamil Veda and became a vital part of later Vaishnava piety in southern India. This is particularly true for the Shrivaishnava tradition, in which one of the major figures was Nathamuni himself.

Amalaka

In the Nagar style of Hindu temple architecture, the amalaka is a stone disk, usually with ridges on the rim, that sits on top of the temple's main tower. According to one interpretation, the amalaka represents a lotus and is thus the symbolic seat for the deity worshiped below. Another interpretation is that it symbolizes the sun and is thus the gateway to the heavenly world. The amalaka itself is crowned with a kalasha (finial), from which a temple banner is often hung. See also heavens.

Amalaki Ekadashi

Festival falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Phalgun (February–March). As are all of the eleventh-day observances, this is dedicated to the worship of Vishnu. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, usually involving fasting (upavasa) and worship, and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. On this day, one should worship the amvala tree since this is one of the places in which Vishnu is believed to reside.

Amarkantak

Sacred site (tirtha) at the headwaters of the Narmada River, in the Vindhya mountains in the state of Madhya Pradesh. As with all the junctions of India's sacred rivers, Amarkantak is held to be an especially holy place for religious actions. Most pilgrims go there to perform common pilgrimage rites such as snana (bathing) and shraddha (memorial rites), but Amarkantak is also one of the places mentioned in Sanskrit texts as a site for religious suicide.

Amarnath

(“The Undying Lord”) Sacred site (tirtha) and pilgrimage place located high in the mountains of Kashmir, dedicated to the god Shiva in the form of Amarnath (The Undying Lord). The focus of the site is a limestone cave, where each year melting snow trickling through the limestone fissures naturally forms a pillar of ice. At its largest, this pillar can be more than seven feet tall, but this can vary significantly from year to year depending on the weather. The most common aniconic image of Shiva is the linga, a cylindrical form imperfectly described as a “phallic symbol.” Hindus believe that the ice pillar in the Amarnath cave is a swayambhu, or “self-manifested,” linga of Shiva. Such lingas are not made by human beings but are places where Shiva decides to reveal himself, out of love for his devotees (bhakta). Any swayambhu image is believed to be particularly holy because Shiva is thought to be uniquely present. These sites are often seen as places where prayers and worship are particularly efficacious.

The Amarnath cave is in a remote spot that is inaccessible for most of the year due to snow. The pilgrimage takes place during the month of Shravan (July–August), with travelers timing their trip to arrive on the day of the full moon. The pilgrimage officially begins at the Dashanami Sanyasi akhara in Shrinagar and is led by the akhara’s leader (mahant), who carries a silver mace as an emblem of his authority. This preeminence is given to ascetics because they are living symbols of Shiva himself, who is the perfect ascetic. Most pilgrims start their journey at the town of Pahalgam. From there they walk almost thirty miles to Amarnath, crossing two mountain ranges on the way. Although the region is thinly settled for most of the year, during the pilgrimage season, camps and businesses spring up along the route; many are run by local Kashmiri Muslims, for whom this is a major source of livelihood. The offerings at the shrine are evenly split between the mahant, the local pandas (Hindu pilgrimage priests), and a group of Muslims from a village near Pahalgam who traditionally maintained the road, although the state has done this since India has gained independence. During the early 1990s, parts of Kashmir were a war zone between Indian government forces and a variety of Kashmiri Muslim groups, some of which pressed for greater self-determination and others for unification with Pakistan. These problems have affected the pilgrimage, which passes through some of the most contested areas. In 1994 there were several attacks on travelers, reportedly prompted by pilgrims chanting anti-Muslim slogans, and in 1995 the pilgrimage took place under heavy security provided by the Indian army. The 1996 pilgrimage had no political turmoil, but several hundred people died of hypothermia caused by a sudden unseasonable snowstorm.

Amaru
(7th c.?) Sanskrit poet traditionally thought to be the author of the Amarushatakam (“Amaru’s Hundred”), a collection of poems on the theme of erotic love. The text’s name is doubly misleading since present editions contain almost 200 poems, and there is strong evidence that it was compiled from several earlier collections, making its authorship uncertain. Although Amaru’s poetry explores the joys of carnal love and is thus not explicitly religious, the themes of lover/beloved and union/separation treated in this poetry later became standard themes in bhakti (devotional) poetry. In the Shankaradigvijaya, a legendary biography of the philosopher Shankaracharya. Amaru is described as a king who becomes mythically connected with the great sage. In response to the challenge that he knows nothing about sexuality, Shankaracharya uses his yogic powers to animate Amaru’s body immediately after the latter’s death. In this form Shankaracharya experiences this facet of human life, although reportedly without desire on his part. Shankaracharya has sexual relations with Amaru’s wives, enjoys the fruits of passion, and pens the Amarushatakam to record his deeds. Although this claim is highly doubtful, it helps to illustrate some important thematic connections between religious and erotic poetry. For further information see Lee Siegel, Fires of Love—Waters of Peace, 1983.

Amaruka
Another name for the legendary poet Amaru. See Amaru.

Amarushatakam
(“Amaru’s Hundred”) Collection of poems on the theme of erotic love, traditionally ascribed to the seventh-century poet Amaru. The text’s name is doubly misleading since present editions contain almost 200 poems, and there is strong evidence that it was compiled from several earlier collections, making its authorship uncertain. Although the poetry explores the joys of carnal love and is thus not explicitly religious, the themes of lover/beloved and union/separation treated in this poetry later became standard genres of bhakti (devotional) poetry.

Amba
In the Hindu epic the Mahabharata, Amba is the elder sister of Ambika and Ambalika. In the story she is abducted with her sisters by Bhishma, to be married to his stepbrother Vichitravirya. Ambika and Ambalika happily marry Vichitravirya, but when Amba confides that she has already given her heart to King Salva, Bhishma releases her to go to him. When Amba returns to Salva, he rejects her on the grounds that her virginity is suspect because she has been abducted by another man. Amba returns to Bhishma and demands that he marry her, since he is responsible for her plight. Bhishma refuses to do so because he has promised his father, King Shantanu, that he will never marry, to ensure that his stepbrothers will have no rivals for the throne. His refusal leaves Amba with no source of support, and she vows to get revenge. She is later reborn as the man-woman Shikhandi, behind whom Arjuna hides to shoot the arrows that eventually kill Bhishma.

Ambakeshvar
Another name for Tryambakeshvar, the presiding deity of a sacred site (tirtha) at Trimbak, in the Nasik district of the state of Maharashtra. Tryambakeshvar is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, the “lingas of light” that are considered especially sacred to Shiva. See Tryambakeshvar.

Ambalika
In the Hindu epic the Mahabharata, Ambalika is the daughter of the king of Kashi and one of the wives of King Vichitravirya. When Vichitravirya dies childless, his mother, Satyavati, calls upon her eldest son, Vyasa, to sleep with Ambalika and her sister Ambika in the hope that the women will conceive and continue the family line. According to tradition, Vyasa is very ugly, and each woman involuntarily reacts when Vyasa appears in her bed. Ambalika turns pale, causing her son Pandu to be born with an unnaturally pale complexion, and Ambika covers her eyes, causing her son Dhrtarashtra to be born blind.

In Hindu mythology, a king of the Ikshvaku dynasty about whom various sources paint very differing pictures. In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics, he is portrayed as a man who is willing to sacrifice a boy, Sunassepha, in place of a sacrificial cow that Indra has stolen. At the moment of the sacrifice, Sunassepha prays to the gods, and Indra appears to bless both Ambarisha and Sunassepha. In another story, from the Bhagavata Purana, Ambarisha is portrayed as a fervent devotee (bhakta) of Vishnu. When the sage Durvasas tries to disrupt Ambarisha’s ekadashi (“eleventh day”) observances, Ambarisha calls for help from Vishnu’s discus weapon, Sudarshana. At Ambarisha’s prayer, the discus pursues Durvasas throughout the universe and gives him no place of refuge. In the end, a humbled Durvasas is forced to beg Ambarisha’s forgiveness, and the latter informs Durvasas of the powers of ekadashi observance.

Ambika

(“mother”) Epithet of the Goddess. In many cases it refers specifically to Shiva’s wife Parvati, but it is also used as the name of a powerful female deity in the Devimahatmya, the earliest text in which a female divinity is presented as the Ultimate Reality in the universe.

Ammonite

Spiral-shaped fossil shell of a prehistoric sea creature. The black stones in which these fossil shells are embedded are known as shalagrams and are found in great numbers in the Kali Gandaki River in Nepal. The name ammonite comes from the Latin expression meaning “horn of Ammon,” which refers to a form of the god Jupiter that bears rams’ horns. In India the ammonite’s circular form is understood as a symbol of Vishnu’s discus (chakra), and thus the shalagram is considered a svayambhu “self-manifested” image of Vishnu himself. As with all svayambhu forms of a deity, the shalagram is considered to be extraordinarily holy and is usually kept as an object of worship.

Amritanandamayi
(b. 1953, as Sudhamani) Modern Hindu teacher and religious leader, whose devotees (bhakta) worship her as an incarnation of the Goddess. She was born the daughter of a poor fisherman, and from her earliest childhood she focused on religious life. Her teachings stress the importance of devotion (bhakti), particularly to one’s spiritual teacher (guru), and her devotees credit her with healing and spiritual awakening. The Mata Amritanandamayi Math, located in the city of Quilon in the state of Kerala, was formed to spread her teachings in India and abroad.

Amrta
(“imperishable”) In Hindu mythology this is the nectar of immortality, which is churned from the Ocean of Milk through the combined efforts of the gods and the demons. The word is also used metaphorically to describe anything believed to be especially purifying and powerful, such as charanamrta (“foot nectar”). Charanamrta are the liquids (milk, water, etc.) given to devotees (bhakta) to drink, which are often the fluids in which their guru’s feet or the image of a deity have been bathed. See also Tortoise avatar.

Anahata Chakra
In many schools of yoga and in the esoteric ritual tradition known as tantra, the anahata chakra is one of the six psychic centers (chakras) believed to exist in the subtle body.

The subtle body is an alternate physiological system, thought to be on a different plane of existence than gross matter but with certain correspondences to the material body. It is comprised of a set of six psychic centers, which are envisioned as multi-petaled lotus flowers running roughly along the course of the spine, connected by three vertical channels. Each of these chakras has important symbolic associations—with differing human capacities, different subtle elements (tanmatras), and different seed syllables (bijaksharas) formed from the letters of the Sanskrit alphabet, thus encompassing all sacred sound. Above and below these centers are, respectively, Shiva (embodying awareness) and Shakti (embodying power), the two divine principles through which the entire universe has come into being. The underlying assumption behind this concept of the subtle body is thus the harmony of macro-cosm and microcosm, an essential Hindu idea since the time of the mystical texts known as the Upanishads.

The six chakras are traditionally listed from the bottom up, and the anahata chakra is the fourth. It is visualized as a twelve-petaled lotus located in the region of the heart. These petals each contain a seed syllable formed from a letter of the Sanskrit alphabet, in this case the first twelve consonants. On a symbolic level, the anahata chakra is associated with the circulation of blood throughout the body. It is also identified as the bodily seat for the subtle element of wind, the action of which (through the operation of the five vital winds known as pranas) is believed to be responsible for circulating things through the body. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; and Philip S. Rawson, The Art of Tantra, 1973.
Analogy
In certain schools of Indian philosophy, analogy is considered to be one of the pramanas, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge. See upamana.

Ananda
(“bliss”) One of the three traditional attributes of the Supreme Reality (Brahman), usually described as being-consciousness-bliss (sacchidananda). Ananda, or bliss, is heavily stressed in certain forms of tantra, an esoteric ritual tradition. In tantra, ananda is both an aspect of mundane physical enjoyment and a way of describing the ultimate realization. In this understanding, even ordinary pleasures are reflections of ultimate bliss. Ultimate bliss differs from ordinary pleasure both because it is permanent, and because you lose your sense of self and are aware only of bliss.

Ananda Akhara
The name of a specific group of the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, a particular type of renunciants ascetic. The Dashanami Nagas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, organized into six different akharas or regiments on the model of an army. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Nagas’ primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests; both of these occupations have largely disappeared in contemporary times.

For organizational purposes, the Ananda akhara is considered a subsidiary of the powerful Niranjan akhara, one of the other seven akharas. All of the groups have particular features that define their organizational identity, especially specific tutelary deities; the tutelary deity of the Ananda akhara is fire.

Ananda Marga Yoga Society
Modern Hindu organization founded by Shri Anandamurti. The Society emphasizes yoga and meditation, which are intended to set its practitioners on the path (marga) to bliss (ananda). The movement is the strongest in the state of West Bengal, and has been dogged by controversy in India, particularly after Anandamurti was indicted for the murder of two of his disciples. In the end he was acquitted of all charges, but the organization’s legal troubles made its members withdraw from society. Many Indians view them with suspicion, if not outright hostility, and the movement is associated with ritual murder and black magic. In recent times, it has even been suspected of terrorism, after a large shipment of black-market arms was mysteriously parachuted into a nearby region in early 1995. Although it has never been proved that the arms were for the Society, this incident is one more element in the surrounding cloud of secrecy and suspicion.

Anandamath
Novel by the Bengali nationalist author Bankim Chandra Chatterjee (1838–1894). It is set in eighteenth-century Bengal during the so-called Sanyasi Rebellion, which involved bands of Hindu and Muslim militant ascetics. Both groups fought with the British East India Company for control over the region.

Historical inquiry suggests that the roots of this conflict lay in the extreme social tensions in Bengali society, particularly changes in land ownership patterns and the havoc wreaked by the great famine of 1770–1771. Chatterjee was an ardent Indian nationalist and portrayed the Sanyasi Rebellion as a struggle by Mother India’s loyal children to expel the parasitic British invaders from her shores.

Although the novel was set in an earlier era to avoid problems with the British authorities, Anandamath is clearly allegorical and nationalistic, and it is viewed by contemporary critics as Chatterjee’s way to symbolize the need for continuing the struggle against British imperialism in the mid-nineteenth century.
Anandamayi Ma
(1896–1982) Hindu mystic and saint, who during her lifetime gained a wide following in all parts of Hindu society as a manifestation of the Mother Goddess. She was born in Dhaka in modern Bangladesh and from a very young age showed strong spiritual tendencies. These intensified after her marriage, when she would slip into blissful meditation, oblivious to her surroundings and the passage of time. The marriage was never consummated and her husband became one of her primary disciples. For some time she lived in an ashram in the city of Benares, which is famous as a sacred site (tirtha). Later she built an ashram just outside the city of Haridwar, where her samadhi ("burial") shrine can be found.

Anandapala
The last great king in the Pratihara dynasty, which ruled large sections of the northwestern part of the Indian subcontinent between the eighth and eleventh centuries. In 1001 C.E., Anandapala assembled a coalition of Hindu princes to do battle with Mahmud of Ghazni in a desperate attempt to halt the latter's expansion. Anandapala and his allies were annihilated in a battle near Peshawar in modern Pakistan, and the Pratihara dynasty's power was completely destroyed. With this powerful dynasty out of the way, there was no political force in northern India strong enough to stop Mahmud. He began making annual raids into India.

Anandawara
One of the four major groups of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva; the other three divisions are Kitawara, Bhuriwara, and Bhogawara. Each of these groups has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by the philosopher Shankaracharya. Each group also has particular religious associations: with one of the four Vedas, with a particular quarter of the Indian subcontinent, with one of the “great utterances" (mahavakyas) expressing ultimate truth, with a specific ascetic quality, and with several of the ten Dashanami divisions.

The Anandawara group is affiliated with the Jyotir Math in the Himalayan town of Joshimath and is thus connected with the northern quarter of India. Their Veda is the Atharva Veda, their mahavakya is Ayamatma Brahman ("This Self is Brahman"), and their ascetic quality is to be satisfied with whatever food they get without begging, since they are not attached to worldly pleasures. The particular Dashanami divisions associated with this group are Giri, Parvata, and Sagara.

Ananga ("bodyless") Epithet of Kama, a deity who is the personification of desire. Kama was given the name Ananga because his body was destroyed by the fire from Shiva's third eye. See Kama.

Ananta ("endless") Epithet of Shesha, the god Vishnu's serpent couch. See Shesha.

Anantadas (late 16th c.) Poet and hagiographer who wrote “introductions" (parchais) for some of the best-known northern Indian devotional (bhakti) poet-saints, among them Ravidas, Kabir, Namdev, Trilochan, Angada, and Pipa. His era can be fixed with reasonable assurance since Anantadas himself gives 1588 C.E. as the date of composition for his Namdev Parchai. Anantadas was contemporary with another famous hagiographer, Nabhadas, whom Anantadas names as a “guru" brother to his own guru, making Nabhadas a “spiritual uncle" of Anantadas. Although both hagiographers provide valuable information, the descriptions by Nabhadas are quite brief, whereas Anantadas gives extended information about his subjects. Anantadas’s works are by far the earliest detailed accounts of these literary figures, although the marvelous events included in the introductions render them suspect as historical sources. Because his collected works have never been published, he remains virtually unknown. For further information see David Lorenzen, Kabir Legends and Ananta-Das’s Kabir Parachai, 1991; and Winand Callewaert and Peter G. Friedlander (trans.), The Life and Works of Raidas, 1992.

Anant Chaturdashi

Festival falling on the fourteenth day (chaturdashi) of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Bhadrapada (August–September). This festival falls during the four-month period when the deity Vishnu is believed to be sleeping on Shesha, his serpent couch, while his wife Lakshmi massages his feet. The festival itself is named after Shesha, one of whose epithets is Anant (“endless”). On this day, devotees (bhakta) of Vishnu should worship and meditate on this particular image of Vishnu, with Shesha and Lakshmi.

Before beginning worship, devotees tie onto their forearm a string dipped in turmeric, an eastern Indian spice, in which fourteen knots have been made. Each of these elements is symbolic: The string is a symbol of Shesha, the color yellow is associated with Vishnu, and the fourteen knots signify the fourteenth day.

Aside from worshipping Vishnu, devotees should also fast (upavasa) on this day. Carefully observing the requirements for this festival is believed to ensure prosperity and freedom from exile. According to mythic tradition, keeping this vow enables the five Pandava brothers, the heroes of the epic Mahabharata, to escape from exile and regain their kingdom.

Anasuya

In Hindu mythology Anasuya is the wife of the sage Atri. On one occasion Anasuya is begged by the gods Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva to help them. A woman named Silavati has cursed the sun not to rise, and the creatures on earth are very distressed. Anasuya succeeds in persuading Silavati to recall her curse, and in their gratitude the three gods tell her she can ask for whatever she wants. Anasuya requests that each be born as one of her sons, and this is granted: Vishnu is born as Dattatreya, Shiva as Durvasas, and Brahma as Chandra.

Ancestral Spirit

(pitr) This term is a translation of the word that literally means “fathers”; these ancestral spirits are seen as a collective group to whom every man has duties. One of these duties is to perform certain memorial rites for them, such as the rite of sapindikarana. Like most funerary rites (antyeshthi samskara), the major objective is to transform the recently deceased and potentially malevolent spirit into a benign and helpful ancestor. Another duty is to procreate sons, so that the rites may be performed without interruption. Both of these are weighty responsibilities, and Hindu mythology is replete with tales of lifelong ascetics, such as Jaratkaru, who are rebuked by their ancestral spirits for shirking their duty to procreate. By virtue of their stable ancestral status, these spirits are also well-defined and generally benevolent.

Andal

(9th c.) The only woman among the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life.
As with many female bhakti figures, Andal had a particularly passionate relationship with her chosen deity, whom she considered her betrothed husband. This deity was Ranganatha, a particular form of Vishnu resident at the temple of Shrirangam in the state of Tamil Nadu. According to legend, Andal was an earthly manifestation of Vishnu's wife Bhudevi ("Earth Goddess") and appeared as an abandoned baby to her foster father, Periyalvar, another of the Alvars. When she came of age, she was adamant that she would have no human husband and merged into the image of Ranganatha at Shrirangam.

Although many of the details about her life are uncertain, Andal did compose two collections of poetry, the Tiruppavai and the Nacciyar Tirumoli, both of which are dedicated to Vishnu in his form as Krishna. For further information see Vidya Dehejia (trans.), Antal and Her Path of Love, 1990.

Andhaka
("blind") In Hindu mythology, a demon born from the darkness that arises when the goddess Parvati playfully covers her husband Shiva's eyes with her hands. Shiva names him Andhaka because he arises from darkness. Andhaka lusts after Parvati and continues to pursue her, despite repeated remonstrances that approaching another man's wife is improper. Eventually he goes all the way to Shiva's home on Mount Kailas, where the god kills him.

Andhra
Brahmin subcommunity that is one of the five southern brahmin communities (Pancha Dravida). As their name would indicate, the core region for the Andhra brahmins is located in the modern state of Andhra Pradesh.

Andhra Pradesh
Modern southern Indian state. Andhra Pradesh is one of the so-called linguistic states formed after independence to unite people with a common language and culture (in this case, Telegu) under one state government.

In the case of Andhra Pradesh, this was done by combining the princely state of Hyderabad with the Telugu-speaking provinces of the former state of Madras. This merger did not happen without some drama; when independence arrived, the Nizam of Hyderabad, a Muslim ruler whose subjects were mainly Hindus, was initially reluctant to join the Indian union, although he acceded after troops were deployed by the Indian government. The state capital has remained at Hyderabad, which is the largest and most important city.

Andhra Pradesh is overwhelmingly agricultural, with fertile land in the Krishna and Godavari river deltas, but it is relatively undeveloped, and there is still a great disparity between the rich and the poor. In recent years it has become the home of an important regional political party, the Telegu Desam, as well as a base for the Marxist revolutionary group known as Naxalites, who are carrying on an armed struggle against the landlords.

Andhra is also home to India’s richest temple, the temple of Venkateshvara at Tirupati, and to Mallikarjuna, one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a group of sites especially sacred to Shiva. For general information about Andhra Pradesh and all the regions of India, an accessible reference is Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.

Anekantavada
One of the three causal models in Indian philosophy, along with asatkaryavada and satkaryavada. All three models seek to explain the workings of causality in the everyday world, particularly the relationship between causes and their effects, which has profound implications for religious life. Philosophical theory assumes that if one understands the causal process correctly and can manipulate it through one’s conscious actions, it is possible to gain final liberation of the soul (moksha). Disagreements over differing causal models are grounded in varying assumptions about the nature of things.

The asatkaryavada model assumes that effects do not preexist in their causes; the satkaryavada model assumes that they do. The third model, Anekantavada (“the view that things are not single”), seeks to occupy the middle ground between these two.

Anekantavada stresses how one looks at things and the way that this can color a judgment. In viewing the transformation of milk to curds, butter, and clarified butter, an anekantavada proponent would claim that the substances in question were contained in the causes (supporting the satkaryavada notion), but that the qualities each of these substances possessed were newly created each time (supporting the asatkaryavada notion).

Thus, causes and effects are simultaneously both the same and different, depending on the lens through which one looks at them. This theory is an attempt to find a middle ground between the other two causal models by showing that each is possible, but it runs the risk of being seen as not taking any position at all. The major proponents of this position are the Jains, who are outside the scope of the present work. For further information see Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India’s Philosophies, 1972.

Anga
The traditional name for the region and people of the border area in eastern India shared by the modern states of West Bengal and Bihar.

Angada
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics, Angada is the son of the monkey-king Bali and his wife Tara. Even though Rama, the seventh incarnation of Vishnu, has killed his father under questionable circumstances, Angada is one of Rama’s loyal allies. Angada takes part in the search for Sita, and then in the battle in Lanka to free...
her, in which his major contribution is combat with Ravana’s son Meghanada (an epithet of Indrajit).

After the conquest of Lanka, Rama appoints Angada as the crown prince of Kishkindha, a forest in southern India. Many of the characters in the Ramayana are paradigms for Indian cultural values. Angada exhibits bravery, loyalty, and sincere devotion to Rama, all of which bring their eventual rewards.

Angiras
In Hindu mythology, one of the six sons of Brahma, all of whom become great sages. All are “mind-born,” meaning that Brahma’s thoughts are enough to bring them into being. The others are Marichi, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, and Kratu.

Angkor
Temple complex built in northwestern Cambodia by the Khmer ruler Suryavarman II (1112–1153 C.E.). The Khmer people were indigenous to Kampuchea, but the temples at Angkor were dedicated to Hindu gods. This reflects the prodigious influence of Hindu culture, which by the end of the first millennium C.E. had been spread throughout Southeast Asia by Indian (primarily southern Indian) merchants and traders.

Ani
(according to tradition, a shortened form of the Sanskrit word anika, meaning “army”) A major organizational division of the Bairagi Nagas, ascetic traders and mercenary soldiers who were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. At present there are three Bairagi anis: the Digambara, Nirmohi, and Nirvani. In earlier times these anis were actual fighting units, but in modern times these distinctions are mainly important to determine bathing (snana) order in the bathing processions at the Kumbha Mela. Of the three anis, the Digambaras are by far the most important and at the time of the Kumbha Mela take precedence over the others.

Ani
(2) In the region of Tamil, which lies at the southern tip of the subcontinent on the Bay of Bengal, the month of Ani is the third month of the solar year. It corresponds to the northern Indian solar month of Mithuna (the zodiacal sign of Gemini), which usually falls within June and July. The existence of several different calendars is one clear sign of the continuing importance of regional cultural patterns. One way that the Tamils retain their culture is by preserving their traditional calendar. Tamil is one of the few regional languages in India with an ancient, well-established literary tradition. See also Tamil months, Tamil Nadu, and Tamil language.

Aniconic Image
A symbol that is meant to represent a deity. Although it is more common for human or animal likenesses to stand for deities, some deities are represented by symbols or non-pictorial images. Examples of this would be the linga or the shalagram, both of which are well-known symbolic forms of particular deities—Shiva and Vishnu, respectively.

Anima
(“minuteness”) One of the eight superhuman powers (siddhi) traditionally believed to be conferred as a result of high spiritual attainment. This particular power gives one the ability to become as small as an atom.

Animals
In the Hindu religion, it is believed that some human beings can be reincarnated as animals. According to generally held notions about karma, being born as an animal is an unfavorable rebirth in punishment for a previous grave sin. One is born as an animal to expiate, or atone for, one’s evil deeds through suffering, in many cases by being born as a particular type of animal thousands of consecutive times.

Unlike the Jains, who see all matter (even stones) as possessing souls, most Hindus would consider this possible only for sentient, or fully aware, beings, including animal life. The conviction that animals have souls is one of the reasons why many Hindus are vegetarian, since this diet does the least harm to other living things.

For Hindus, the animal realm is considered a place of punishment. From a karmic perspective, being born as an animal is an unenviable state, since animal behavior is run entirely by instinct, and thus as animals they can make no conscious effort to better themselves. From a more concrete perspective, animals in India often lead very difficult lives—including, in many cases, the "sacred" cow.

As with all other unfavorable karmic states, one's animal life will eventually end, but only after one's sins have been fully expiated. This suffering and lack of control over one's destiny makes birth as an animal a state to be avoided.

Animal Sacrifice

The practice of animal sacrifice can be found in two different strands of the Hindu tradition. The first, and by far the earliest, is in the cult of sacrifice described in the later strata of the Vedas, particularly in the Brahmana literature. The cost of these rites virtually ensured that they could only be performed by royalty and nobility, since some entailed the slaughter of hundreds of animals.

Perhaps the most famous of these rites was the horse sacrifice (ashvamedha), which served to prove a king's great power. In the early centuries before the common era, these sacrifices grew less frequent—a trend often connected to the stress on ahimsa by the Buddhists and Jains, two groups that opposed the slaughter of any life—and by the early centuries of the common era, even Hindu commentators denounced the Vedic sacrifices because they entailed animal slaughter. In modern times, these rites have largely fallen into disuse, and even when they have been revived and re-created, they usually do not involve animal slaughter but substitutions of some sort, such as vegetables or fruits.

The other context in which animal sacrifice can be found, and is still performed quite regularly, is in the worship of village deities, or certain powerful and terrifying forms of the Goddess. In this worship the animals (usually goats) are decapitated, and the blood is offered to the deity, often by smearing some of it on a post outside of the temple.

In Hindu culture, blood is considered a "hot" substance—highly impure, extremely powerful, and readily contaminating other things. Any deity that requires sacrifice is also "hot"—powerful enough to grant favors to their devotees (bhakta), but also marginal, potentially dangerous, and requiring frequent animal sacrifice to maintain their power.

The most extreme example is at the temple of the goddess Kamakhya in modern Assam, a region located in northeastern India. This is one of the few reported instances of human sacrifice, although the custom was halted by the British in 1832. When Kamakhya's present temple was consecrated in 1565, she was supposedly offered the heads of 140 men, all of whom had volunteered themselves as offerings.

Although such blood-drinking deities are often very powerful, many Hindus do not approve of the impurity (ashaucha) and slaughter connected with animal sacrifice. For this reason, one of the first ways to make a particular deity acceptable to a more cultured public is often to make the sacrifices vegetarian, by substituting a gourd or cucumber in place of the sacrificial animal.

Aniruddha

("unobstructed") In Hindu mythology, the son of Pradyumna and the grandson of Krishna.
Anirvachaniyakhyati

"indescribable discrimination") This is a particular theory of error that aims to explain why people make errors in judgment, such as the stock example of mistaking the silvery flash of a seashell for a piece of silver. This theory was advanced by the philosophical school of Advaita Vedanta, a group that would consider this judgment to be a false one; they would also believe, however, that until one realizes that the object is just a shell, one actually sees the silver there.

The Advaita theory of error is based on the fundamental concept of superimposition (adhyasa), in which one perceives something that is actually there (in this case, the shell). This real object is the basis for the illusory perception (the silver), which is a mistaken projection. The Advaitins claim that the “silver” is real insofar as it is based on the shell, and false insofar as one believes it to be precious metal.

Of course, according to the Advaitins, the shell and all the other “real” things of the world are themselves ultimately illusory since they are superimposed on Brahman, the only thing in the universe that is truly real. For further information see Bijayananda Kar, The Theories of Error in Indian Philosophy, 1990; and Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India’s Philosophies, 1972.

Anjali Hasta

In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, the anjali hasta is a particular hand gesture (hasta) in which the palms of the two hands are joined together with the fingers pointing upward, often with the base of the thumbs resting against the chest. This gesture conveys respect and prayerful devotion.

In modern India this is also the most common gesture of greeting and salutation. Since traditional Indian society was (and to some extent, remains) so intensely conscious of purity, it is not surprising that this greeting can convey respect without requiring one to touch another person, which could transmit impurity (ashaucha) from one person to another.

Anjana

In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics, Anjana is the mother of the monkey-deity Hanuman. In her previous birth, Anjana was a goddess, but as the result of a curse, she is born as a monkey. With the birth of Hanuman (fathered by Vayu, the god of wind), the curse was lifted and she returned to heaven.

Ankusha

("elephant goad") This is a weapon with a wooden or metal handle, with a point and a sharp hook that real elephant handlers use to coax and goad elephants—sometimes by poking them with the hook, sometimes by hitting them with the butt of the handle.

The ankusha is an important symbol in Hindu iconography and is primarily associated with the god Ganesh—perhaps partly because of his elephant head. This weapon also corresponds with Ganesh’s stature as the Lord of Obstacles, since he can use the ankusha to poke and prod them out of the way.

Aside from Ganesh, the ankusha is also a symbol associated with certain powerful forms of the Goddess. This may originate with the myth that describes her as being formed from the collected radiance of all the gods, and receiving duplicates of their weapons from them.

Annakut

("Mountain of food”) Northern Indian festival celebrated on the day after the festival of Diwali (October–November). This festival is more popularly known as Govardhan Puja.
Annaprashana
(“food-eating”) Samskara

Traditionally, this is the seventh of the life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras) in which the young child is first given solid food. In many of the traditional texts on dharma, the Dharma Shastras, parents are directed to feed the child animal flesh. In modern times children are more commonly fed rice; as the most popular grain in much of India, rice can be considered a symbol for food in general.

A woman displays the anjali hasta hand gesture. This gesture conveys respect and is a common greeting and salutation.
As in any society, the introduction of solid food marks a major transition in the infant’s young life, even though the infant may not wean for some time after that. Unlike many of the traditional samskaras, this is still an important childhood rite in modern India.

Anrta

In the Vedas, the earliest Hindu scriptures that are still the most authoritative religious texts, anrta is characterized as the opposite of rta, the cosmic order. Anrta is particularly associated with falsehood and untruth, and it involves acts of deliberate perversions of speech. Hindus believe that these mistruths undermine the established order of the cosmos.

Anshavatara

A “partial” (amsha) incarnation of a divinity, which is believed to have only part of the divine power. See also avatar.

Anshuman

In Hindu mythology, the grandson of King Sagar. After the death of his sixty thousand uncles, who because of their disrespect were killed by the sage Kapila, Anshuman was the sole surviving member of the royal line. Anshuman and Dilip, his son, labored mightily to bring the Ganges (the earthly embodiment of the goddess Ganga) from heaven down to earth, so that by her touch the souls of their relatives might find peace. Their efforts were unsuccessful, but Dilip’s son Bhagirath was finally able to bring the Ganges to earth.

Antahpura

(“inner city”) In classical times, the name for the women’s quarters of the palace, so designated because they were the most stringently protected. Although most Hindus had only one wife, in earlier times it was not uncommon for kings to have a number of wives and concubines, who would be housed in the antahpura. In such cases the king’s first wife would generally have higher status, since this marriage would often be used to cement a political alliance.

Antarala

(“intermediate space”) Theantarala was a transitional space between a temple’s main hall and the inner sanctum (garbhagrha), where the image of the temple’s primary deity would be housed. Theantarala is characteristic of Nagararchitecture, which is one of three primary styles of Hindu temples. This space was found only in the largest temples and in many smaller ones was omitted entirely.

Antariksha

In the cosmology found in the Vedas, the earliest Hindu scripture, theantariksha is the middle region of the sky between the earth and fixed stars; it corresponds to what might now be called the atmosphere. This region is considered the theater of activity for Indra, god of the storm and the most important Vedic deity; it is also home to one manifestation of the Vedic god Agni (fire), in his form as lightning.

Antaryaga

(“internal sacrifice”) In Hindu worship, but especially in the secret ritual tradition known as tantra, antaryaga refers to the internalization of worship. In this process, worship involving external actions is replaced by worship based on mental acts.

This is a later phase of the initiate’s spiritual path, and is attempted only after the initiate has mastered the external forms of worship. The process of internalization becomes progressively more subtle and sophisticated. This step also demonstrates that the initiate has achieved more highly developed religious capacities, in which external objects are no longer needed.
Antinomianism
This word has its origins in the convictions of an early Christian sect, whose members believed that the only thing needed for salvation was faith, and not obedience to moral rules. In an extended sense, this term describes an attitude in which people ignore accepted social rules.

In Indian society (as in all societies) most people uphold the accepted behavioral norms, but certain groups—particularly renunciant ascetics and practitioners of tantra, a secret ritual tradition—emphasize the breaking of society's normally held rules. For the ascetics, such intentional disregard was (and is) a symbol of their separateness from conventional society; they believe that such rules no longer apply to them. As a class, ascetics are well-known for their unpredictable and sometimes uncontrolled behavior.

The process is more controlled for practitioners of tantra and most often takes place in a formal ritual setting. The stereotypical pattern is to partake of the "five forbidden things" (panchamakara), thus consciously breaking societal norms by consuming intoxicants and nonvegetarian foods, as well as practicing illicit sexuality. Although tantric antinomianism deliberately breaks social taboos, in theory it is an attempt to make sacred what is normally forbidden. By doing this, tantric practitioners destroy embedded dualistic ideas that are exemplified by notions such as pure and impure.

From a tantric perspective, the entire universe is one principle—often the activity of a particular deity—which means that one must reject all concepts based on dualistic thinking. Such practices are also seen as proof that tantra is superior to other sorts of religious activities, since it uses things that are normally forbidden. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1977; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

The sixteenth and last of the traditional life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras), comprising what can be described as

A woman prepares a deceased man for cremation.
This ritual is one stage of the antyeshthi samskara, the traditional Hindu funerary rites.
These rites have a twofold purpose. The first is to get rid of the corpse, which is a source of contagion and impurity (ashaucha), and thus to protect the living from the dead. The second is to ease the passage of the dead person’s spirit into the next world. Aside from these functions, performing familiar and ceremonial rites for the dead undoubtedly gives psychological relief to the living and aids in the process of grieving. What follows is merely an overview of these rites; for more detailed information see the individual entries.

Ritual activities are the most concentrated during the first ten days after death, which is believed to be the period of greatest impurity. Cremation usually takes place on the day of death, not only to prevent decay and disease in a hot climate but also to destroy the body so it will not be reanimated by a wandering spirit. Gathering the ashes (asthi-sanchayana) is done on the second or third day. In earlier times they would have been kept in a safe place, sometimes for years, until a relative visiting a sacred river could perform asthi-visarjana (immersing the ashes); with the advent of modern transportation, this is generally performed a few days after death.

During this ten-day period, the spirit is given symbolic nourishment to help build a “new” body. On the eleventh day, the family performs the first of the memorial ceremonies known as shraddhas; in this case an ekoddishta shraddha is performed in which brahmin guests, considered surrogates for the ancestors, are fed. On the twelfth day after death, the family performs the rite of sapindikarana, through which the deceased is incorporated into the ranks of the ancestral spirits (pitr) and is thus no longer considered a restless spirit. This is followed by anniversary shraddhas at regular intervals during the first year; after this period there is an annual shraddha once a year during the Pitrapaksha (“fortnight of the ancestors”), the waning moon period in the lunar month of Bhadrapada (August–September), which is solely devoted to such memorials. For further information see Pandurang Varnan Kane (trans.), A History of Dharmasastra, 1968; and Raj Bali Pandey, Hindu Samskaras, 1969. For accounts of modern practice, see David M. Knipe, “Sapindikarana: The Hindu Rite of Entry into Heaven,” in Frank E. Reynolds and Earle H. Waugh (eds.), Religious Encounters with Death, 1977; Lawrence Babb, The Divine Hierarchy, 1975; and Anne Grodzins Gold, Fruitful Journeys, 1988.

Anulepana

("smearing") The ninth of the sixteen traditional upcharas offered to a deity as part of worship, which are meant to treat the deity as an honored guest. In this offering, the deity is presented scented unguents, or ointments, such as sandalwood paste. These ointments are not only used for their fragrance but are also believed to be good for the skin.

Anuloma

("with the hair") See hypergamous marriage.

Anumana

("measuring after") In Indian philosophy this is the term for an inference, which is generally accepted as one of the pramanas, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge. The word’s literal meaning reflects the Indian conviction that any inference... must be grounded in perception (pratyaksha), the most direct means of knowledge, and must ultimately appeal to perception for evidence.

A classic inference includes three terms: a hypothesis (pratijna), a reason (hetu), and examples (drshtanta), each of which is made up of parts. One part of the hypothesis is the idea to be proved (sadhya), which is predicated on a certain class of objects, called the paksha. In the statement “there is fire on this mountain,” the sadhya is the assertion that there is fire, and the paksha is the particular mountain. The object mentioned in the paksha must also appear in the second term, the hetu, along with the stated reason. In the example cited above, the hetu could be “because there is smoke on this mountain.”

As proof, it was necessary to cite positive and negative examples, known as the sapaksha and vipaksha, respectively. An appropriate sapaksha could be “like kitchen,” since ancient kitchens had both fire and smoke; a vipaksha could be “unlike lake,” since lakes contain neither of these.

This general form of an inference is subject to numerous tests for validity; one of the most important of these is vyapti, the requirement that the reason given must account for all cases of the idea to be proved. For further information see Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India's Philosophies, 1972.

Anyathakhyati

Anyathakhyati ("discrimination of something else")

A theory of error that aims to explain why people make errors in judgment, such as the stock example of mistaking the flash of a seashell for a piece of silver. This particular theory of error originated with the Naiyayika philosophical school. Like the Purva Mimamsa philosopher Prabhakara, the Naiyayikas believe that the simple judgments “that object is silvery” and “silver is silvery” are both true and indisputable. Whereas Prabhakara explains the error as an error of omission, in which one fails to notice the non-relationship between these judgments, the Naiyayikas explain this as an error of commission, by projecting something that actually is not there.

In Naiyayikan metaphysics all objects and their attributes are connected by a dependent relationship known as inherence (samavaya), which in this case connects a silvery color with two different objects: elemental silver, and a shell. They believe that the perceiver is projecting a wrong inherence relationship (silver) onto the perceived object (shell).

The Naiyayikas can claim this projection is real because they accept the reality of nonexistent things (e.g., the nonexistence of a crocodile in my bathtub). For the Naiyayikas all such projections are rooted in karmic dispositions stemming from avidya, or primal ignorance, specifically the greed for silver that prompts people to look for such items of value. For further information see Bijayananda Kar, The Theories of Error in Indian Philosophy; 1978 and Karl H. Potter

Anushtubh

By far the most widely used meter in Sanskrit poetry, composed of two lines of sixteen syllables each with eight syllables per half line. The metric pattern for each half line is based on the distinction between “heavy” and “light” syllables. A heavy syllable is any syllable with a long vowel or consonant cluster; all other syllables are light. According to the prescribed pattern, the fifth syllable of each half line should be light, the sixth heavy, and the seventh alternately heavy and light. The anushtubh’s simplicity makes it the meter of choice for many religious texts, including much of the Bhagavad Gita.
Apabhramsha

(“fallen away”) An important northern Indian Prakrit, one of the vernacular languages that developed naturally from Sanskrit. Apabhramsha was the latest addition to the Middle Ind-Aryan languages and is considered a direct precursor of early modern Hindi, which was becoming established as early as the twelfth century. Although Apabhramsha has lesser status than Sanskrit, it was nevertheless an important regional literary language.

Apaddharma

Religious protocol that comes into effect in times of distress, disturbance, natural disaster, or social deterioration. The practical effect of apaddharma is to suspend most of the normal social rules, particularly those governing interaction and commensality between different social subgroups (jatis). In ordinary circumstances these rules are affected by concepts of purity, impurity (ashaucha), and relative social status.

The underlying message here is that the preservation of life is more important than such rules, and that they can be broken to save a life—as in the case of escaping a fire or flood, in which the usual concerns about physical contact with lower-status people are suspended.

Apana

One of the five bodily “winds” considered to be responsible for basic bodily functions, the others being prana, vyana, udana, and samana. The apana wind is believed to exist in the region of the anus and is associated with discharging material out of the body: urine, feces, gas, semen, menstrual discharges, and the birth of children.

Apastamba

(4th c. B.C.E.?) Sage, writer, and commentator. Apastamba is known for his influential work with the Kalpa Sutra form, a type of text that consists of three essential elements: instructions for Vedic rituals (Shrauta Sutras), for domestic rites (Grhya Sutras), and for suitable human behavior (Dharma Sutras).

He is one of three authors, along with Baudhayana and Hiranyakeshin, who wrote complete Kalpa Sutras with all three parts. All three of these men belonged to the same school, the Taïttriya school of the Black Yajur Veda.

Apastamba’s Dharma Sutra is extremely significant, for it is considered one of the major sources for the law code attributed to Manu. This code was an important legal document even in the early twentieth century, since India’s British rulers considered it a source of “traditional” Hindu law.

Appar

(7th c. C.E.) One of the earliest of the Nayanars, a group of southern Indian poet-saints who were devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. The Nayanars helped to revitalize the Hindu religion through their passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language.

Historians believe that Appar was born into a Shaivite family but became a Jain ascetic in his youth. The turning point came when he suffered a serious illness. Discouraged when Jain medicines were unable to cure his illness, he prayed to Shiva for help and was cured.

Along with his younger contemporary Sambandar, Appar actively confronted and opposed the heterodox sects of the times, particularly the Jains, with open defiance, debates, and miracles. His greatest achievement is reported to have been the conversion of King Mahendravarman (r. 600–630 C.E.), one of the greatest kings.
in the Pallava dynasty, from Jainism to Shaivism.

The collected hymns of the three most important Nayanars—Appar, Sambandar, and Sundaramurti—comprise the Devaram, the most sacred of the Tamil Shaivite texts.

Appaya Dikshita
Sixteenth-century writer and commentator in the Bhamati branch of the Advaita Vedanta philosophical school.

Aprashasta
(“reprehensible”) Marriages
According to the texts on religious duty (dharma) known as the Dharma Shastras, these are the four forms of marriage subject to disapproval: the asura marriage, gandharva marriage, rakshasa marriage, and paishacha marriage. Although all of these are considered reprehensible, this disapproval comes in differing measures: the asura (paying money for a bride) and gandharva (betrothal by mutual consent) marriages are tolerated, while the rakshasa (forcible abduction) and paishacha (taking advantage of an insentient woman) forms are forbidden.

Despite such harsh condemnation, all of these marriages are held to be legally valid. It is generally agreed that this position was intended not to legitimize unconscionable actions but to give the woman the legal rights of a wife, whatever the circumstances of her marriage. The asura marriage is the only one of these forms still practiced in modern times, although it is done only by people who are either very poor or of very low social status.

Apsara
In Hindu mythology, a class of celestial nymphs renowned for their beauty, grace, and irresistible attractiveness. One of their main mythic functions is to seduce ascetics and sages when they become too powerful. Because ascetics practice celibacy, and it is assumed that celibacy builds spiritual power, successful ascetics can become rivals to the gods themselves. Sexual activity will quickly exhaust the ascetic’s power, although it can often bring other benefits to the world, including the birth of children, which always results from such intimate encounters.

The apsaras are sent on their missions by Indra, the king of heaven, since any ascetic who gains too much power will be able to claim Indra’s divine throne. One famous apsara is Menaka, whose seduction of the sage Vishvamitra results in the birth of Shakuntala. Another is Urvashi, who is renowned for her dalliance with King Pururavas.

Apurva
According to the Purva Mimamsa philosophical school, apurva is an unseen force created by action—particularly ritual action. This unseen force exists from the beginning of the action to the result of that action, and it invariably brings the intended result into being. This doctrine was developed to connect actions with their results, particularly when the result came some time after the initial action, and is especially relevant to karma.

The Mimamsas developed the concept of the apurva because they wanted to support information found in the Vedas, which in many cases specifies that certain actions will eventually produce specific results. For further information see Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Aranya Dashanami
One of the ten divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasis, ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva. The Dashanamis were supposedly established by the ninth-century philosopher Shankaracharya in an effort to create a corps of learned men who could help to revitalize Hindu life. Each of the divisions is designated by a different name—in this case, aranya (“forest”). Upon initiation, new members are given this name as a surname to their new ascetic names, thus allowing for immediate group identification.

Aside from their individual identity, these ten “named” divisions are divided into four larger organizational groups. Each group has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) also established by Shankaracharya. The Aranya Dashanamis belong to the Bhogawara group, which is affiliated with the Govardhan Math in the city of Puri, on the Bay of Bengal.

Aranyaka

(“Forest books”) General designation for a type of literature contained in the sacred texts known as the Vedas. The Aranyakas are transitional in nature; in their content they move away from the focus on ritual and sacrifice found in the Brahmana literature and foreshadow the later, more speculative texts known as the Upanishads.

Because of their name, the Aranyakas are widely believed to have been composed in the forests, perhaps by ascetics who had left formal society. The tone in these texts is questioning and speculative, and in stylistic terms there is no clear break between the Aranyakas and the Upanishads: one of the earliest upanishads is named Brhadaranyaka ("Great Forest-Book") Upanishad, which reinforces the connection.
Arati
The act of waving a lighted lamp before a deity. The deity may be present in many forms, such as a picture, statue, symbol (svayambhu image) such as the shalagram, or even a natural phenomenon such as a river, as in the case of the Ganges.

The arati lamp usually is a shallow vessel holding a cotton wick soaked in oil or clarified butter, with a ring-shaped handle to protect one's hands. This is one of the sixteen traditional offerings (upacharas) presented to a deity as part of worship. This particular act is the offering of light.

Arati is arguably the single most common act of Hindu worship, performed daily in Hindu homes and temples throughout the world. Because of this fact, the word arati is sometimes used to refer to any act of worship, even singing panegyric hymns during worship. Before electric lights were invented, when the temples were much darker, arati also served to give the devotees (bhakta) in the temples a better view of the deity, which was very important.

Aravalli Hills
A range of hills running diagonally from the southwestern to the northeastern corner of Rajasthan. They are important for their physical characteristics, which have a profound effect on the environment. On the northern side of the hills, the land slopes gently into the Thar desert and is arid and thinly settled. On the southern side, the hills provide more protection. As a result the land is greener and comparatively richer than on the northern side.

Sacred sites (tirthas) in the Aravalis include the town of Pushkar, with its holy lake, as well as the temple devoted to Balaji, which is located in the village of Mehndipur.

Archana
(“salutation”) Rites of welcome and reverence, usually performed during formal worship of a deity in a temple. In a larger sense, this word can also refer to those rites of reverence and salutation performed for one's elders, superiors, or any honored guest.

Architecture
Hindu temple architecture in India has developed over time into several distinct, mature styles. The earliest phases are based on early Buddhist architectural forms, such as the rock-cut cave temple (chaitya) or enclosed courtyard (vihara). Some of these early Hindu rock-cut temples include those at Ellora and Elephanta; others are free-standing but based on this form, as at Aihole.

Later Hindu architecture has three basic styles: Nagara, Dravida, and Veshara, of which the first two are the most important. Each of these styles is found in a certain area of India: the Nagara in the north and east, the Dravida in the south, and the Veshara in the west and in Deccan. The basic differences between them can be simplified to the different styles of the temple towers.

The Nagara style emphasizes verticality, with the whole temple building culminating in a single highest point. Different emphases in the ways of treating the tower led to different substyles: In the temples at Khajuraho, the entire structure gradually leads up to the central tower, whereas the Orissa style stresses a single enormous tower surrounded by much smaller subsidiary parts.

In the Dravida style, the towers tend to be composed of horizontal tiers, with the visual emphasis on horizontal rather than vertical. In the later Dravida temples, the tallest structures are the gopurams, the central gateways in the walls enclosing the temples. A Dravida-style temple may have a fairly modest tower over the central shrine, but the area covered by the temple is often enormous, and many of them are cities in their own right.

The Veshara style has a barrel roof over the sanctuary, an architectural feature with roots in the Buddhist chaityas (rock-cut cave temples). This architectural style is midway between the Nagarā towers and the Dravida tiers.

Ardha Kumbha Mela
A religious celebration secondary to the Kumbha Mela. The Kumbha Mela is a gigantic religious festival that entails bathing (snana) in sacred rivers. It is generally celebrated at Allahabad and Hardwar, marking the greater importance of these two sites. Although the full Kumbha Mela is deemed more auspicious and gets much larger attendance, the Ardha Kumbha Mela is still attended by millions of pilgrims.

Ardhamandapa
(“half pavilion”) In the later Nagarā style of temple architecture, the ardhamandapa was the entrance porch of the temple, which formed a transitional area between the outside world and the mandapa, or hall.

Ardhanarishvara
(“the deity who is half woman”) Particular form of the god Shiva, in which the left side of the image has female form, dress, and ornamentation, and the right side has male characteristics and dress.

The image has several possible interpretations. As a divinity one of Shiva’s attributes is his ability to transcend all duality, and this half-woman, half-man image symbolizes that power over even the most basic human difference, sexual identity. In the context of the esoteric ritual tradition known as tantra, which describes the universe as the product of the interaction between the divine principles of awareness (Shiva) and power (Shakti), this image symbolizes not only the radically different natures of these two principles, but also their inseparability in action.

The Ardhanarishvara is sometimes referred to as the androgyne; this term seems inappropriate, however, since the image does not show the loss of sexual characteristics associated with androgyny but rather the full development of each on their respective sides.
Arghya
The fourth of the sixteen traditional upacharas (“offerings”) given to a deity as a part of worship. The upacharas are based on the model of treating the deity as an honored guest. The word arghya literally means “to be respected”; in this offering the image is given a drink of water or some other beverage as a sign of respect.

The actual act of offering can be done in various ways and often depends on the worshiper’s preferences. In some cases the water vessel will simply be presented before the deity’s image, with the understanding that the deity has taken it, whereas in other cases the devotee (bhakta) will actually give some water to the image. In either case the underlying motive is to show love for the deity and to minister to its needs.

Arjuna
The third of the five Pandava brothers in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics. Arjuna is born when his mother, Kunti, uses a powerful mantra to have a son by Indra, the king of the gods.

Arjuna is the prototypical kshatriya warrior-king. He is described as peerless in battle, a hero ever ready to defend the truth, and a person always faithful to his word—but at times arrogant, egocentric, quick to anger, and inclined to use force to settle disputes.

Arjuna is most famous as an archer, as which he has no equal. When he and his brothers are studying archery with their teacher Drona, Arjuna outshines them all with his dedication and ability, but his spiteful side can be seen in the story of Ekalavya. Ekalavya is a tribal boy who wants to learn archery from Drona, the royal archery teacher, but is refused because of his low birth. Undaunted, Ekalavya makes a clay image of Drona, treats it as his teacher (guru), and through his assiduous practice and his devotion to his guru becomes the most skilled archer on earth. When Arjuna discovers this, he becomes jealous and complains to Drona, since the teacher has promised Arjuna that no one will surpass him as an archer. Drona asks Ekalavya how he has become so skillful, and when he learns that Ekalavya has worshiped Drona’s image as his guru, Drona notes that he is entitled to a preceptor’s fee (dakshina). As his fee he requests Ekalavya’s right thumb, a gift that will considerably diminish Ekalavya’s shooting abilities since its loss will impair his ability to draw a bow. Ekalavya fulfills Drona’s wish without hesitation but from that day on he is no longer better than Arjuna.

Another instance of Arjuna’s narrow-mindedness comes in his claim that another great rival, Karna, cannot compete in a royal shooting competition because Karna is a foundling, and his lineage is thus unknown. Karna is a close companion of Arjuna’s cousin Duryodhana, and because of this insult the relations begin to deteriorate between the Pandavas and the Kauravas, the two branches of this extended family. The final result is the fratricidal civil war that is the climax of the epic.

Throughout the Mahabharata, Arjuna is associated with numerous heroic exploits. To fulfill a promise given to his teacher Drona, Arjuna defeats King Drupada, who has earlier insulted Drona. Through a feat of archery, he wins the hand of Draupadi by drawing a bow that others cannot even lift and then hits a target suspended in the air. He aids the fire god, Agni, in the burning of the Khandava forest. He shields Agni from the rain by creating a tent of arrows that keeps the forest covered. During the year that the Pandavas spend incognito, after twelve years of exile in the forest, Arjuna takes the guise of the eunuch Brhannala and in this guise wins a great battle against the Kauravas.

His greatest exploits occur during the epic’s climactic eighteen-day war, in which he defeats the Kaurava armies, fights all their major figures, and finally kills his long-standing adversary Karna, who is actually his own half brother. After destroying the Kauravas in the Mahabharata war, Arjuna serves his elder brother, Yudhishthira, who becomes king; after the conflict, however, the need for such a warrior has passed.

Arjuna is also known as a listener. At the moment when the great war is about to begin, Arjuna has sudden doubts about the propriety of killing his friends and relatives, even during a just war. To allay his doubts and to help him regain his resolve, his charioteer Krishna recites the Bhagavad Gita, one of the single most influential Hindu religious texts. The Gita’s advice on the nature of Self, struggle, and the search for God has served to counsel those fighting literal and metaphorical battles, most notably Mohandas K. Gandhi during the struggle for Indian independence.

Arranged Marriage
A marriage that is arranged by the parents of the bride and groom, although it has become fairly common for the prospective couple to meet beforehand to assess whether or not they are compatible.

Although this practice seems strange by mainstream American standards, proponents of arranged marriages see them as better and longer lasting than love marriages. It is assumed that with arranged marriages parents will be able to take a more detached and rational perspective. They will usually choose spouses who come from similar social and economic backgrounds, in many cases from the same jati, or social sub-group. Parents may compare their children’s horoscopes for clues, and they may also try to match people with compatible personalities. Ideally, all of this is done with great care and with the understanding that their highest priority will be their children’s long-term welfare. Marriage is widely seen as the most important event in a person’s life since it is the basis of family life, and the family is the foundation of society. Part of the marriage negotiations between the two sides includes whether or not the bride will have a dowry, and if she will, what this will be.

One of the assumptions with arranged marriages is that men and women will play fairly traditional roles. This gives the couple some idea of what to expect and what is expected of them, but it can also be confining for people who do not wish to fulfill such roles. At least in northern India, the adjustments often fall much more heavily on the new bride, since she will become part of her husband’s family.

Arranged marriages are still extremely popular among modern Hindu families, and many young people would not dream of fixing their own marriages. A practical consideration supporting the popularity of arranged marriages is that it is often difficult for young people to meet and develop the friendships that could lead to love marriages. Indian society is still very sex segregated. Social interaction between unrelated single men and women is still uncommon in villages and smaller towns, although this pattern is breaking down in larger cities since more women are working outside the home.

In both contexts the biggest mixing place tends to be the college or university, but even there women and men tend to associate in groups rather than as individuals. In a society in which contact is limited, and formal dating even more unusual, an arranged marriage is often the best way to find a compatible spouse.

Arsha Marriage
One of the eight ways to perform a marriage recognized in the Dharma Shastra, the treatises on religious duty (dharma). In an arsha marriage, the bride’s father receives a pair of cattle from the bridegroom with the understanding that the cattle are to be used for sacrifice.
This was regarded as one of the four approved forms of marriage (prashasta marriages) but fell out of favor because of the stigma of accepting any sort of gift for the bride, even one explicitly designated for sacrifice. The form was named after the rishis (sages) because of the implicit sacrificial rites. See also marriage, eight classical forms.

Artha
In Indian philosophy this is one of the four purusharthas, or aims of life, with the others being kama (desire), dharma (religious duty), and moksha (final liberation of the soul). The word artha has different shades of meaning in various contexts, but all of these meanings center on the definitions “aim,” “goal,” or “end.” The word can thus refer to any goal of human life, but as one of these purusharthas, artha refers to riches, power, and worldly prosperity. These are the material things that allow one to fulfill one's temporal goals, and unless one gains them in some measure, any sort of worldly happiness becomes problematic.

Hindu culture has traditionally sanctioned wealth and power as a legitimate human goal, although this endeavor must be governed by a commitment to dharma. When controlled by an overall orientation to righteous action, the quest for wealth is part of an integrated life. Without this commitment the drive for wealth becomes an all-consuming desire that ultimately destroys a person.

Arthashastra
(“Treatise on Power”) Text on power and politics attributed to Kautilya, the Machiavellian prime minister said to have orchestrated the rise to power of Chandragupta Maurya (r. 321–297 B.C.E.), the founder of the Maurya dynasty. The Arthashastra was intended as a guidebook for the king, to help him control both the people in his kingdom and the surrounding states.

The Arthashastra’s fundamental assumption was that the king wanted to remain in power and should do whatever it took to retain it.

Within the kingdom, Kautilya advocated a strict and authoritarian government aided by an extensive network of spies to gather intelligence and assess the popular mood. These spies included men posing as wandering ascetics, who could move about without suspicion. The book also advised the king to assign special spies to his closest advisers to monitor their ambition, and to have these spies report only to the king himself.

In regard to neighboring countries, the Arthashastra assumed that each king wanted to increase his kingdom at (“presumption”) All Indian philosophical schools concern themselves with codifying the pramanas, that is, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge. Almost all schools consider perception (pratyaksha), inference (anumana), and authoritative testimony (shabda) as pramanas; the Purva Mimamsa school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy, posited two others: abhava (“knowledge from absence”) and arthapatti.

Arthapatti

Arthapatti is an inference from circumstance in which a judgment is made about one case based solely on similarities to related cases. An example would be when a traveler is presumed to have reached her destination, since the train's arrival time has passed. According to Indian philosophy, this is not a true inference since the judgment must always be confirmed by direct perception, in this case that the train had actually reached its destination. The Purva Mimamsas justified this new pramana by arguing that this knowledge could not be accounted for by any of the existing pramanas and thus required this new one to explain it. The other schools were not inclined to accept it, since its presumptive nature could often lead to error.
the expense of his neighbors. Weaker neighbors were to be conquered and assimilated, whereas stronger ones were to be pacified or stalled with the eventual hope that these stronger states could be countered by making other alliances.

Although the Arthashastra was never the “Bible” of any ruling Indian dynasty, it detailed political philosophy and practices that existed in ancient and medieval India and can even be discerned in contemporary parliamentary politics.

Arundhati
The wife of the sage Vasishtha. In Hindu mythology Arundhati is a model of devotion to her husband, and during contemporary marriage ceremonies, she is invoked by the groom as a model of wifely fidelity. Arundhati is also personified as the minor star Alcor in the constellation known as the Big Dipper (known in India as the Seven Sages because of its seven main stars); here she accompanies the star personifying her husband.

Aryabhatta
Ancient astronomer and mathematician, whose major work was composed in 499 C.E. Among Aryabhatta’s accomplishments were his theories that the earth was a sphere that rotated on its axis, and that eclipses were caused by the shadow of the moon. He also calculated the value of pi to four decimal places and the length of the year to seven decimal places. Both these feats show not only great facility with mathematics but also the use of the zero.

Although Aryabhatta is celebrated as a scientist, in the ancient world there was no differentiation between astronomer and astrologer. Given the assumption that the heavenly bodies influenced human affairs, his astronomical conclusions would have also been used in the field of astrology.

Aryan
This word is derived from the Sanskrit word arya (“noble”), which is used in the earliest Hindu sacred literature, the Vedas, to describe a certain group of people that believed the Vedas were sacred. In the beginning this word simply designated “our group” from “other people,” whom the Veda names Dasyus (“slaves”). These provide a description of the slaves as having flat noses and curly hair. Throughout history Hindu writers have often described themselves as “Arya,” although it is important to note that this need not be understood as a racial designation, since it could merely be intended to mean “noble.”

Who were these Aryans? Nineteenth-century European philological research discovered structural relationships between Sanskrit and classical European languages and speculated that all these languages came from a common parent. Based on further analysis, these researchers hypothesized that people speaking this parent language originated in Central Asia, somewhere near the Caspian Sea. From there, some went west to Europe, some went southwest to Turkey, and some went south toward Iran and later to India. The conclusion that these Indian pilgrims came from Iran is based on comparisons between the Avesta and the Veda, the Iranian and Indian religious texts. These texts show broad linguistic similarities and indicate that the people speaking the languages were closely related. This entire theory is thus based solely on the observed similarities between languages and on how they changed.

For the nineteenth-century philologists, “Aryan” was a linguistic category used to designate people speaking certain languages and involved no assumptions about the speakers’ racial identity. Despite this fact, the word quickly assumed a racial connotation in European discourse, with terrible consequences.
The Aryan movement was once described as an “invasion,” but in recent years it has become more common to describe it as a “migration.” According to the accounts in the Vedas, the Aryans were a pastoral people, and although some Vedic passages mention war chariots, the majority describe herds of cattle. Given this picture of nomads following their cattle to pasture, the image of an invading army seems improbable.

The Aryan migration theory accounts for the dissemination of various languages but is not universally accepted. Many modern Indians subscribe to the Indigenous Aryan (IA) theory, which maintains that the Aryans are the original inhabitants of India and as proof points to the artifacts found in the Indus Valley civilization. Some of the people that believe the IA theory may be reacting against the Aryan migration theory’s perceived colonialist bias, since the theory was developed by Europeans and assumes that the dominant groups in modern India must have come from outside. Other supporters are the proponents of Hindutva, who claim that all Indians are “really” Hindus and thus one social group, whatever their particular religious beliefs.

This assertion has profound political implications in modern India, where Christians and Muslims are not only religious communities but social and political ones as well. By connecting Hindu identity with good Indian citizenship, Hindutva proponents are marginalizing Christians and Muslims as outsiders.

Arya Samaj

Reformist Hindu organization formed in 1875 by Swami Dayanand Saraswati. The Arya Samaj was formed in an era of sweeping social, economic, and religious change—the last particularly caused by Christian missionary evangelism—and represented an authentic Hindu response to these changes.

For some time, more traditional Hindus perceived this organization as a genuine religious threat. Swami Dayanand’s fundamental assumption was that ultimate religious authority lay only in the ancient scriptures called the Vedas. This stance allowed him to attack many of the “social evils” plaguing nineteenth-century Hinduism, such as child marriages, sati, image worship, the caste system, and a ban on widow remarriage. He contended that these practices were corrupt and illegitimate since they could not be found in the Veda, and the Arya Samaj worked ceaselessly to get rid of such practices.

Unlike the Brahma Samaj, an earlier reformist organization, the ideas of the Arya Samaj showed no Christian influence. It certainly addressed many concerns raised by Christian reformers, but the Arya Samaj was militantly anti-Christian. It was equally opposed to the “corruption” of contemporary Hinduism.

Although the Aryas claimed that they were simply getting back to the Veda, the ultimate aim was not to reclaim that long-gone era but to develop a form of Hindu religious life more compatible with “modern” times. The Aryas replaced image worship with a fire sacrifice based on the rituals in the Veda. The Arya Samaj was also notable for promoting the ceremony of “purification” (shuddhi), through which Hindus who had become members of other religious communities were received back into the Hindu community.

Dayanand and his followers were quite militant in espousing such reforms and saw themselves as developing the leadership for the future of Hinduism. To accomplish this the Arya Samaj strongly emphasized education, and one of its most lasting achievements has been establishing schools and colleges to educate its women and men.

Although the Arya Samaj was highly controversial for its first sixty years, by the late 1930s its revolutionary spirit had somewhat cooled; at present the Aryas have become a sectarian group more or less assimilated into larger Hindu
In Hindu mythology, the son of the celebrated King Sagar and his wife Keshini. Keshini has received a boon that she will bear a single son through whom the royal lineage will continue, whereas her co-wife Sumati will bear sixty thousand sons who will all die before they are married. Asamanjasa is that single son, but his character is so bad that his lineage, the Solar Line, seems to be in grave danger.

In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics, the only mention of Asamanjasa describes how he throws children into the Sarayu River and then laughs as they drown. Fortunately for the Solar Line, which is one of the two great lineages, Asamanjasa’s son Anshuman is very virtuous, and the line continues both unbroken and uncorrupted.

Asana
(“bodily posture” In the ashtanga (“eight-part”) yoga first codified by Patanjali (1st c. C.E.), asana is the third of the eight elements of yoga practice and involves different body postures. In his text, Patanjali asserts that one’s physical position should be stable and comfortable, since the ultimate end of these postures is to enable one to concentrate without physical distractions. A series of positions for developing and training the body evolved from this text. The most familiar of these is the lotus posture (padmasana).

These physical exercises are the best-known feature of yoga and are often confused with the larger practice of yoga itself. Although these postures have definite physical benefits, such as increased bodily flexibility, their ultimate purpose is to enable one to sit for long periods in meditation without physical distractions. As such, they are a necessary element for progress on the spiritual path but should not be confused with the end goal.

In a more general context, the word asana can refer to various ways of sitting, and by extension to the thing upon which one sits. In general the object upon which one sits—particularly for meditation or any sort of religious practice—is believed to be charged with power because of its association with spirituality. Many of these objects, especially animal skins, are believed to confer certain powers and thus have symbolic meaning as well.

Asamanjasa

A man practices the fetus position. This asana, or bodily posture, is one of many that are used in yoga.
In the context of worship, asana is the second of the sixteen upacharas ("offerings") given to a deity as a way of treating the god as an honored guest. In this case asana refers to offering the deity a place to sit, one of the most basic acts of human hospitality.

Asat
This word denotes a general category in Indian speculative thought and is often translated as "nonbeing." It is the absolute opposite of sat and is formed by the addition of the negative prefix. If sat is "that which (really and truly) exists," then its opposite is "that which does not exist." Since the word sat also carries connotations of Truth—that things that exist are both "real" and "true"—asat carries connotations of falseness.

Asatkaryavada
One of the three basic causal models in classical Indian philosophy, along with satkaryavada and anekantavada. All three models seek to explain the workings of causality in the everyday world, particularly the relationship between causes and their effects, which has profound implications for religious life. All of the philosophical schools assume that if one understands the causal process correctly and can manipulate it through one's conscious actions, it is possible to gain final liberation of the soul (moksha). Thus disagreements over differing causal models are not merely academic disputes but are grounded in varying assumptions about the nature of things.

The asatkaryavada model assumes that effects do not preexist in their causes; that is, they are completely and utterly distinct from them. In the classic examples for this model, one can create a clay pot by putting together the two halves of the pot, or one can weave a cloth from many strands of thread. Each of these acts creates a new object that did not previously exist, which came into being through certain material and instrumental causes.

Since each act of creation brings a new thing into being, this causal model tends to multiply the number of objects in the universe. It also admits that human efforts and actions are part of the causes influencing these effects, making it theoretically possible to act in a way that brings final liberation to the soul.

The disadvantage of this model is that it can lead to philosophical skepticism. As the world gets fragmented into more and more causes—most of which one cannot control—one can easily believe that one's actions will have no discernible effect, even over time. To counter this danger of skepticism, asatkaryavada proponents stress the conditions that govern the causal process and gear people's efforts accordingly.

This model is espoused by the Nyaya Vaisheshikas and the Prabhakara school of Purva Mimamsa, as well as by the Buddhists. For further information see Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India's Philosophies, 1972.

Ascetic
In the most general sense, this word denotes a person who has renounced regular society and conventional social life in a quest to seek religious insight and to gain final liberation of the soul (moksha). Such spiritual seekers sometimes emphasize asceticism or physical discipline, but this is not a necessary element.

Ascetics can be organized into different subgroups based upon organizational affiliation or the particular Hindu deity that they worship. The Bairagis, Dashanami Sanyasis, and Nathpanthis are all well-defined ascetic organizations into which one must undertake formal initiation; the Bairagis are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and the other two are devotees of Shiva.
The sadhu (“straight”) is the other major type of ascetic and the most difficult to define. Most sadhus are unaffiliated with any religious organization, have undertaken no formal ascetic initiation, and fall outside the other groups’ sectarian boundaries. A sadhu is a solitary religious seeker, driven to attain religious goals by doing whatever seems best to him (or more rarely, to her).

Asceticism

In the most general sense, this word denotes physical discipline, most often the renunciation of regular society and conventional social life in a quest to seek religious insight and to gain final liberation of the soul (moksha).

Historically, ascetic practice has stressed several constant themes. One of the most common has been celibacy, for a variety of reasons. Not only does sexual enjoyment use the senses to trap a person, but the attachments caused by home and family are seen as a distraction to serious spiritual life. Yet the emphasis on celibacy is also motivated by the belief that semen is a man’s concentrated essence, and thus it is something to be carefully hoarded. Although semen must be expended for procreation, it should not be spilled casually since this drains away a man’s vitality. It is believed that energy gained from celibacy leads to greater spiritual accomplishment.

Another hallmark has been the practice of tapas, or physical asceticism, under the assumption that enduring physical hardship not only builds character but also generates spiritual power. At times tapas can assume grotesque forms of self-mutilation and mortification. At other times it may be a milder physical discipline, such as a form of hatha yoga, to train the body and mind for extended practice.

In general, ascetic spiritual development can proceed along a variety of different paths, which often reflect the abilities and inclinations of the ascetics following them. Some paths have stressed the importance of traditional learning, some have stressed worship and devotion, some have stressed physical asceticism, and some have stressed meditation and individual realization. In almost all cases, this spiritual training takes place under the direction of a religious preceptor (guru), who takes responsibility for the spiritual development of his disciples.

Asceticism in India has a long and venerable history, although there is considerable disagreement regarding how long and how venerable. The most ambitious claim is that the Indian ascetic tradition comes from the religion of the Indus Valley civilization. This claim is based on one of the Indus Valley seals, an ancient artifact that shows a figure sitting cross-legged as if in meditation.

Whether or not one accepts this claim, there is ample evidence of asceticism in the Vedas, the earliest Hindu scriptures. The Vedas mention renunciant figures, such as the vratya, yati, and muni, and also refer to ascetics living in the forest. Indeed, the very name of one stratum of the Veda, the Aranyakas or “Forest Books,” suggests that it was composed by such ascetics. Buddhist and Jain literature clearly shows that ascetic life was well established by the fifth century B.C.E., as do some of the later upanishads. All of these ascetics, whether Hindu, Buddhist, or Jain, were designated under the umbrella term shramana, a word whose basic meaning is “to strive.” It is generally accepted that there was religious tension between the two dominant religious paradigms, the Brahmana ideal connected with Vedic religion and the shramana ideal associated with asceticism. The Brahmana ideal was based on sacrifice, mastery of complex sacred texts, and hereditary priesthood; furthermore, it was so expensive that it virtually required royal patrons—all of these factors rendering it the “establishment religion.” These concepts clashed with the shramana ideal, which was renunciant, individualist, and stressed inner experience.

By the time of the Dharma Shastras (treatises on religious duty), this tension had been somewhat resolved; asceticism had been relegated to the last of the four ashramas (stages of life), that of the Sanyasi. Yet even here the tension remains, since according to these texts, a twice-born man cannot become a Sanyasi until he has seen his children’s children, which would make him well advanced in years. These texts restrict asceticism to twice-born men who have fulfilled their obligations as householders, but they deny it to women and low-caste men. Needless to say, the actual picture has never been quite as neat as the idealized society found in the Dharma Shastras.

Organizationally, initiated Hindu ascetics can be divided into several major groups. One division is based on the ascetics’ patron deity; the Shaiva are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva, and the Vaishnava worship Vishnu.

The Kapalikas, Kalamukhas, and Pashupatas are Shaiva ascetic groups that have disappeared; the two Shaiva groups that still survive are the Dashanamis and the Nathpanthis. The Dashanamis are the most prestigious of all ascetics. They were supposedly organized by the great philosopher Shankaracharya and have traditionally emphasized learning. The Nathpanthis trace their origin to Gorakhnath, a miracle-working yogi about whom little is definitely known. The Nathpanthis are known for their stress on the transformation of the physical body through yoga.

Vaishnava ascetics are more recently organized, and in northern India they are broken into four groups (chatuh-sampradayi Nagas), named after each group’s reported founder: Ramananda for the Ramanandis, Nimbarka for the Nimbarkis, Chaitanya for the Madhva Gaudiyas (Brahma Sampradaya), and Vishnuswami for the Vishnuswamis.

From at least the sixteenth century, and perhaps much earlier, both the Dashanamis and the Vaishnava ascetics organized bands of fighters known as Nagas (“naked”). These soldier-ascetics were commissioned to protect the other ascetics, but they also served as long-distance traders and mercenary soldiers. These Naga orders still exist today, although they are no longer prepared for battle. Another important sect is the Udasis, who worship the panchayatana (“five-fold”), a collection of five Hindu deities: Shiva, Vishnu, Durga, Ganesha, and Surya. Religiously speaking, the Udasis thus fall between the Shaivas and Vaishnavas.

Ashadh
According to the lunar calendar, by which most Hindu religious festivals are celebrated, Ashadh is the fourth month in the lunar year, usually falling within June and July. In northern India, this is usually the hottest month of the year.

The major holidays celebrated in Ashadh are Yogini Ekadashi, the Rath Yatra, Devshayani Ekadashi, and Guru Purnima. Devshayani Ekadashi also marks the beginning of the Chaturmas Vrat. This is a four-month (lunar) period generally coinciding with the rainy season. During this time the god Vishnu is believed to be “sleeping,” and because of this the period is considered inauspicious.
Ashaucha

(“impurity”) Name for the ritual impurity caused by contact with any source of pollution; these sources come in many different guises, both physical and social.

Purity and impurity are religious categories and thus fundamentally different from cleanliness and dirtiness, which are hygienic categories. For example, cow dung is considered a pure substance in traditional Hindu society and is smeared on patches of ground to purify it. It is also important to realize that impurity is a natural part of life—as just one example, everyone goes to the bathroom every day—and that becoming impure carries no sense of moral imperfection or lapse.

Most bodily fluids are considered polluting; one becomes impure through any activity involving them, such as urination, defecation, sexual activity, giving birth, or being born. One can become polluted through contact with people or things deemed impure, such as people of lower social status, animals, any sort of ordinary filth, or even the dust from the road. Impurity can also be caused by social connections. The impurity from childbirth (sutakashaucha) obviously affects the mother and child because of the bodily fluids involved, but it also affects all other members of the immediate family.

If a person has come into contact with something polluting, the solution is to remove the source of impurity. The most common means of purification is to bathe in running water, which removes less virulent impurities by carrying them away with the water’s flow. The purifying power of bathing (snana) makes it a prelude to many religious rituals, in which one of the general preconditions is scrupulous purity, both for the person performing the ritual and the place where it is performed.

The most polluting substance of all is a corpse, which is one reason why bodies are destroyed by cremation on the day of death. The impurity from death (maranashaucha) is the most violent impurity of all, and contact with a corpse affects the entire family for ten days after the death.

Ashirvad
(“benedictory formula”) General term used to denote words of blessing, whether formal or informal. One of the basic assumptions of Hindu religious life is that certain spiritually powerful people—in particular, ascetics and learned brahmins—can confer blessings and curses at will. Both the blessings and curses are believed to take effect immediately and without fail, which is why a prudent person will always treat ascetics and learned brahmins with the respect that they deserve.

Ashoka
(r. 269–232 B.C.E.) The greatest ruler in the Maurya dynasty, who reigned over a kingdom stretching from Afghanistan to southern India from his capital at Pataliputra. Ashoka’s father, Bindusara, and his grandfather, Chandragupta Maurya, had created a centralized empire. Aside from the far south, the only area outside its influence was the region known as Kalinga (modern state of Orissa).

Early in his reign, Ashoka’s armies conquered Kalinga in a bloody campaign, killing hundreds of thousands of people; the carnage had a profound effect on the young Ashoka. Several years later Ashoka formally adopted Buddhism and embraced the principle of nonviolence (ahimsa). As a result he formally renounced war as a means of conquest.

Early historians believed that Ashoka used his royal power to make Buddhism the state religion, but this position appears to misread the evidence. Ashoka did seem to be attracted to Buddhism, but his public pronouncements on “Dhamma,” earlier identified with Buddhist teaching, seem to have been aimed at creating a climate of social responsibility, tolerance, nonviolence, and harmony. These were qualities that most reasonable people would endorse, and some historians have suggested that such vague guidelines indicate an attempt to unify a religiously diverse empire.

Ashoka is by far the best-known figure of his era, largely because he set up public inscriptions all over his kingdom. Rock edicts tended to be carved on rock faces close to the empire’s borders, while pillar edicts were inscribed on pillars erected on the main roads.

The writing used for these inscriptions varied in different regions of the empire, although the language for all was a Prakrit, one of the grammatically simple vernacular languages that developed from Sanskrit. These inscriptions are the earliest written Indian documents of any historical significance; they reveal a great deal about Ashoka’s public persona, his exhortations to his subjects, and even something about the man himself.

In modern India, Ashoka is the model for the enlightened ruler, and the Ashokan pillar capped with four lions has been adopted as the emblem of the modern republic of India.

Ashoka Tree
(Jonesia ashoka) Flowering tree traditionally associated with love and fertility. When in bloom, the Ashoka tree is covered with red flowers—a color typically associated with passion—that contrast with its green foliage. According to tradition, the ashoka tree will not bloom until it has been kicked by a young woman’s foot, implying the transfer of her fertile energy to the tree.

The Ashoka tree is also famous in the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics. When Sita is kidnapped by Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka, she is imprisoned in a grove of Ashoka trees, where she pines away waiting to be rescued by her husband Rama.
Ashram

The abode of an ascetic or religious renunciant. The word is derived from a form of the verb “to strive” and has several different meanings: On one hand, an ashram is also a place where one gives up one’s conventional worldly striving; on the other hand, it is a place at which one can seriously strive for spiritual goals that are often less emphasized in the material world.

In modern Hinduism (both in India and abroad) the word can refer to a full spectrum of living arrangements, from a simple hut or cave inhabited by one person to magnificent building compounds that can house thousands of people at a time.

Ashrama

(“stages, abodes”) See stages of life.

Ashrama Dashanami

One of the ten divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva. The Dashanamis were supposedly established by the ninth-century philosopher Shankaracharya in an effort to create a corps of learned men who could help to revitalize Hindu life. Each of the divisions is designated by a different name—in this case, ashrama (“hermitage”). Upon initiation, new members are given this name as a surname to their new ascetic names, thus allowing for immediate group identification.

Aside from their individual identity, these ten “named” divisions are divided into four larger organizational groups. Each group has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by Shankaracharya, as well as other particular religious associations. The Ashrama Dashanamis belong to the Kitawara group, which is affiliated with the Sharada Math in the city of Dwaraka, located near the Arabian Sea.

The Ashrama division is considered an elite group because it is one of the few that will initiate only brahmins (the other such divisions are the Saraswati Dashanamis, Tirtha Dashanamis, and part of the Bharati Dashanamis.)

Ashtachap

(“eight seals”) A group of eight northern Indian bhakti (devotional) poets: Surdas, Krishnadas, Parmananddas, Kumbhadas, Nanndas, Chaturbhujdas, Chitswami, and Govindswami.

In the sectarian literature of the Pushti Marg, a Vaishnava community whose members are devotees (bhakta) of Krishna, all eight of these poets are named as members of the sect and associates of the Pushti Marg's early leaders. Surdas, Krishnadas, Parmananddas, and Kumbhadas are connected with the Pushti Marg's founder, Vallabhacharya (1479–1531); Nanndas, Chaturbhujdas, Chitswami, and Govindswami are associated with Vallabha's son and successor, Vitthalnath (r. 1566–1585). Evidence of their membership can be found in their poetry, which confirms this claim for many of the poets; for Surdas, however, this claim seems highly unlikely.

Ashtadhyayi

(“Eight Sections”) Text composed by the Sanskrit grammarian Panini (ca. 4th c. B.C.E.); the text's name stems from the eight sections it contains. Panini wrote the Ashtadhyayi as a descriptive account of contemporary Sanskrit, but in later generations the text was transformed into the prescriptive norm for the language. Each of the Ashtadhyayi’s eight sections is composed of a series of brief aphorisms (sutras), which are usually only a few words long, and refers to a specific facet of Sanskrit grammar. Each sutra in a given section builds upon all the preceding sutras, and in turn provides the foundation and background for understanding those coming after it. This sequential description means that Panini began with Sanskrit’s most general linguistic features and moved from there to more specific ones. This method allowed Panini to provide a complete account of the Sanskrit language as briefly as possible, and the text’s condensed form facilitated memorization. As with most sutra texts, the Ashtadhyayi’s terseness of expression presupposes a commentary, since the sutras themselves are so short and pithy that they are simply cryptic to the uninitiated. The Ashtadhyayi’s most famous commentary is the Mahabhashya, written by the grammarian Patanjali in the second century B.C.E.

Ashtalakshmi
Eight different forms of the goddess named Lakshmi, representing her different aspects as the source of wealth and prosperity. The eight are often portrayed as a set, although one may also encounter them separately: Vijaya (“victory”) Lakshmi, Jaya (“conquest”) Lakshmi, Dhana (“wealth”) Lakshmi, Dhanya (“grain”) Lakshmi, Gaja (“elephant”) Lakshmi, Aishvarya (“divine power”) Lakshmi, Vina (a musical instrument) Lakshmi, and Raja (“royal”) Lakshmi.

Ashtanga (“eight-limbed”) Yoga
System of yoga (religious discipline) traditionally ascribed to Patanjali (1st c. C.E.?). This author is believed to be different than the grammarian Patanjali, who wrote the Mahabhashya commentary on Panini’s Sanskrit grammar.

Patanjali’s Yoga Sutras are the basis for the Yoga school of Indian philosophy, one of the six schools. By the early centuries of the common era (approximately 100–300 C.E.), the Yoga school had become paired with the Samkhya school. In this pairing, Samkhya provided the theoretical and metaphysical explanations for the bondage and liberation of the soul, while Yoga laid out the concrete path for ending bondage and gaining liberation.

Ashtanga yoga is made up of eight parts, known as “limbs” (anga): restraints (yama), observances (niyama), bodily postures (asana), restraint of breath (pranayama), withdrawal of the senses (pratyahara), concentration (dharana), meditation (dhyana), and trance (samadhi).

Patanjali’s system is an eight-step program for self-transformation, which begins by cultivating certain wholesome behavioral patterns (yama and niyama). From there one progresses to development and control of the mind, which is considered a more subtle and internalized practice. It culminates in a mystic insight that brings liberation, which in its original articulation is described as yogic aloneness (kaivalya) because Samkhya is atheistic.

Patanjali’s path shows general similarities to another well-known program for self-transformation, the Buddha’s eightfold path. Although both Patanjali and the Buddha are credited with originating their particular paths, it is likely that they both drew from an existing yogic tradition and shaped it to fit their own assumptions.

Although Samkhya metaphysics have long been discredited, the techniques of the Yoga school are still vitally important in modern Hindu religious life. Many modern Hindu movements stress yoga practice as a means of spiritual discipline, purification, and self-awareness. For further information see Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles
A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Ashtavakra

("eight bends") In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Ashtavakra is a sage who is the son of Khagodara. According to tradition, Ashtavakra is an exceptionally precocious child, and this gets him into serious trouble. While he is still in his mother's womb, Ashtavakra corrects his father's pronunciation of a certain mantra. In response his father curses him to be bent, and when the child is born he has eight bends in his body.

Despite his unusual appearance, Ashtavakra becomes a learned sage and is widely believed to be the author of the Ashtavakragita ("Song of Ashtavakra"). This text describes the philosophical concept of monism, which is the belief that a single Supreme Reality (named Brahman) lies behind the entire universe, and that all things are merely differing manifestations of this reality.

Ashutosh

("quickly satisfied") Epithet of the god Shiva. This name reflects Shiva's relationship with his devotees (bhakta), as well as his ultimate nature. When his devotees approach him with sincerity, he demands neither expensive offerings nor prolonged worship, and he extends his favor immediately. See Shiva.

Ashvalayana

Sage and author of one of the Grhya Sutras, the manuals of domestic rites. Ashvalayana's work is one of the earliest to mention the various life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras) and is thus an important source on these rites.

Ashvamedha

("horse sacrifice") Vedic sacrifice performed to display and prove royal power. In this sacrifice a specially consecrated horse was released to roam as it wished, followed by an armed band of the king's servants. When the horse wandered into a neighboring ruler's territory, that king had two choices: He could either acknowledge subordinate status to the king who had released it, or he could attempt to steal the horse, and do battle with the king's servants.

After one year of wandering, the horse was brought back to the royal capital and killed by suffocation or strangulation, so that its blood would not be shed. After the horse had been killed, the chief queen would lie down next to it and simulate sexual intercourse. When the instructions for this ritual were first translated in the nineteenth century, this simulated intercourse generated considerable horrified interest among European scholars, even though it was clearly a subsidiary part of the ritual.

The rite's major emphasis was a celebration of royal power, since the king performing it was able to control the territory covered in a year by a free-roaming horse. The queen's role, in contrast, seems aimed at symbolically assuring the fertility of the land. Historical records indicate that the ashvamedha was performed until the tenth century C.E. As with all other cases of animal sacrifice, concerns about the karmic consequences of slaughtering a living being has been an important factor in its discontinuation. See also karma.

Ashvattha

The sacred fig tree, Ficus religiosa, which in modern times is more commonly known as the pipal. The ashvattha is especially noted for its aerial roots, which extend downward from some of the limbs until they touch the ground, at which point they take root themselves. Because their roots can become subsidiary trunks, ashvattha trees can grow to be enormous. They have traditionally been favored as places for ascetics to dwell, in part because of their sacred associations and in part because their dense foliage provides shelter from the elements.
Their unusual structure is noted in chapter fifteen of the Bhagavad Gita, in which the ashvattha is described as the tree of life. The ashvattha is also believed to be the type of tree under which the Buddha attained enlightenment.

Ashvatthama
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Ashvatthama is the son of Drona. When Drona becomes the archery teacher to the Pandavas and the Kauravas, the epic’s two central royal families, Ashvatthama also receives instruction along with the young princes. He absorbs his father’s teaching well and masters the use of terrifying magical weapons. During the Mahabharata’s climactic civil war, he fights on the side of the Kauravas and kills many of the Pandava allies; this includes Dhrshtadyumna, who has earlier killed his father, Drona. After the war is over, Ashvatthama retires to the forest with the sage Vyasa.

Ashvin
According to the lunar calendar, by which most Hindu religious festivals are determined, Ashvin is the seventh month in the lunar year, usually falling within September and October. In Ashvin the monsoon rains usually taper off, and the weather becomes a bit cooler.

The dark (waning) half of this month is the Pitrapaksha, one of the most inauspicious times of the year. The bright (waxing) half contains one of the most important festivals of the year, the fall Navaratri, culminating in Dussehra or Vijaya Dashami. Other festivals during this month are Indira Ekadashi, Papankusha Ekadashi, and Valmiki Jayanti.

Ashvins
Twin deities named Satya and Dasya, who are sons of the god Surya (the Sun) and the physicians to the gods. In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, the Ashvins are the divine fathers of the Pandava twins, Nakula and Sahadeva. Nakula and Sahadeva are born when their mother, Madri, uses a powerful mantra enabling a woman to have a child by any one of the gods; as the sons of the divine physicians, the epic portrays these twins as having their fathers’ ability to heal. In the Hindu lunar calendar, the month of Ashvin (October–November) is devoted to them.

Assam
Before Indian independence in 1947, this name designated the entire territory east of Bengal province in northeastern India; in the time since independence, it was divided into seven different administrative regions, one of which is the contemporary state of Assam.

Like all other states in the northeastern corner, much of modern Assam is culturally distinct from the rest of India. One marker of this cultural divide is language: whereas most Indians speak languages from the Indo-Aryan or Dravidian language families, many tribal people in Assam speak Tibeto-Burman languages. The bulk of modern Assam is in the Brahmaputra River valley, which is where most of the Hindus in the northeast reside.

Despite its remoteness from the rest of India, Assam does have one very important sacred place, the temple of the goddess Kamakhya just outside the capital of Gauhati. This is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites connected with the worship of the Mother Goddess that were established at places where it is believed that body parts of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth. Kamakhya is considered the most powerful of all the Shakti Pithas since it is believed to be where Sati’s vulva (a highly charged female body part) fell to earth.
Asthi-Sanchayana

Asthi-Visarjana
("scattering the bones") Name for a particular ceremony performed as one of the last rites (antyeshthi samskara) connected with death. In this ritual, bits of bone and ash collected from the cremation site in the rite of asthi-sanchayana are immersed in the waters of the Ganges or some other sacred river. This is the final ceremony for the dead, since in earlier times the collected remains might be kept for years before a family member was able to bring them to a pilgrimage place (tirtha) to perform this rite. Modern transportation has changed this pattern somewhat, making it more common for asthi-visarjana to be carried out immediately after death but before the sapindikarana ceremony on the twelfth day.

This rite is still widely performed in modern India and remains important for at least two reasons: On one hand, there is the symbolism of redemption for the dead through consigning their ashes to the sacred waters, and on the other, providing definitive ritual closure for the living.

Asura Marriage
One of the eight ways to perform a marriage recognized in the Dharma Shastras, the treatises on religious duty (dharma). It is named after the asuras, a class of powerful divine beings whose interests are often at odds with those of the gods (deva); thus, the name carries an unfavorable connotation.

An asura marriage takes place when a man gives money to the bride’s family and the bride herself. This is one of the four reprehensible (aprashasta) forms of marriage because of the connotation that the bride is being sold, yet like all the other reprehensible forms, it is deemed to create a valid marriage.

Despite this general disapproval, it is one of the two classical forms that is still practiced (the other being the Brahma marriage), although because of the stigma attached to the implication of selling one's child, it is only done by people who are either very poor or of very low social status. See also marriage, eight classical forms.

Atala Akhara
The name of a subgroup of the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, a particular type of renunciant ascetic. The Dashanami Nagas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, organized into different akharas, or regiments, based on the model of an army. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Nagas were known as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests; both of these occupations have largely disappeared in contemporary times. The Atala Akhara has traditionally been considered a subsidiary of the Mahanirvani akhara, at least for their marching order in the bathing (snana) processions for the Kumbha Mela. During the 1998 Haridwar Kumbha Mela, the Atala akhara demanded to be separated from the Mahanirvani and to be allowed to march in their own procession; when this request was turned down, the Atala akhara boycotted the bathing processions in protest. The Atala akhara is one of the seven main Dashanami Naga akharas, although it is now the smallest and least important. All of the akharas have particular features that define their organizational identity, especially specific guardian deities; the guardian deity of the Atala akhara is the god Ganesh.

Atharva Veda
The Atharva Veda is the last of the four Vedas, which are the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts. In many ways the Atharva Veda is the most unusual. Whereas the other three—Rg Veda, Sama Veda, and Yajur Veda—focus mainly on sacrificial rituals, the Atharva Veda is largely a collection of spells and incantations that can be used to counter or correct misfortune, and also to bring about one's desired result. Its unusual contents make it very different from the other three, and since some early sources mention only the first three Vedas, it apparently gained authority as a Veda sometime later.

Atikaya
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics, Atikaya is one the sons of the great demon Ravana by his wife Mandodari. Like his father, Atikaya is described as a great devotee (bhakta) of Shiva and, because of his constant devotion, he gains many wondrous weapons and powers. Atikaya fights bravely and valiantly in the war with Rama's army but is eventually killed by Rama's brother Lakshmana.

Atita
("gone beyond") In its most general usage, this term denotes an ascetic who has completely renounced all things and thus "gone beyond" all the social boundaries that enmesh normal people. It is also the name of a particular low-caste community, some of whom are ascetics and some of whom are householders.

Reflexive pronoun in Sanskrit grammar, that can be used for all three persons in the singular and that carries the sense of “self” or “oneself.” From the time of the mystical texts known as the Upanishads, the word atman has also been used to designate each human being's inner essence—which is eternal, unchanging, gives one... continuing identity in one's different incarnations, and is ultimately identical to Brahman, the single source of all things in the universe.

Atranji Khera
Architectural site near the city of Aligarh that is located in the modern state of Uttar Pradesh. Excavations at Atranji Khera have revealed an ancient urban center dating back to the second millennium B.C.E. The settlements here were not as developed as those in the Indus Valley civilization, although they are believed to be distinct from it and thus another potential source for ancient Indian culture.

Atri
In Hindu mythology, Atri is one of the six sons of Brahma, all of whom become great sages. All are “mind-born,” meaning that Brahma’s thoughts are enough to bring them into being. The others are Marichi, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, and Kratu.
Atri is also cited as one of the seven sages; the others are Kashyapa, Bhrigu, Vasishtha, Gautama, Bharadvaja, and Vishvamitra. All brahmins are believed to be descended from these seven sages, with each family taking the name of its progenitor as its gotra name.
In modern times, these gotra divisions are still important, since marriage within the gotra is forbidden. After her marriage the new bride adopts her husband’s gotra as part of her new identity. See also marriage prohibitions.

Aughar
Name given to a novice in the ascetic community known as the Naths, who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. An aughar has been initiated as a member of the Naths and has taken up their ascetic way of life, but he has not yet received his final initiation. In this final ritual, the cartilage in the novice’s ears is pierced in order to insert the large earrings that are one of the Nath community’s defining characteristics.

Aurangzeb
(r. 1658–1707) The last of the great emperors in the Moghul dynasty, after whose reign the empire, which at its zenith stretched over most of the Indian subcontinent, was fragmented into smaller kingdoms. Aurangzeb was a very strict and pious Muslim who is generally painted as an enemy of Hinduism. He is the “bad” Moghul emperor, as opposed to his great-grandfather Akbar, the “good” Moghul emperor. Aurangzeb unquestionably ordered several notable acts of iconoclasm, the most renowned being the destruction of the Vishvanath temple in the city of Benares; however, the records from his reign also include orders that the Hindus of that city should not be hindered from practicing their religion.
One possible theory that reconciles these contradictions is that the destruction of the Vishvanath temple and other acts of iconoclasm were done for political rather than religious reasons, to punish local populations for rebellion and noncooperation. One piece of evidence for this theory is that the year before the destruction of the Vishvanath temple, the Mahanirvani akhara in Benares took part in a battle with Aurangzeb’s soldiers.

Aurobindo Ghose
(1872–1950) Freedom fighter, philosopher, and ascetic yogi. He is perceived as a modern example of the concern for ultimate truth that always runs beneath the surface of Hindu life.
Until he was twenty, Aurobindo lived much of his life in England, to fulfill his father’s desire to see his son get a “proper” English education. Upon his return to India, Aurobindo was more interested in politics than in working, and after a few years quit his job to take part in the political struggle against the British government. His political career lasted only four years, but his intellect and energy soon made him a leader in the Bengali language and national politics.

His life was transformed again by a stay in prison, during which he remembered the advice of an ascetic who had told him to focus on his inner self. Aurobindo later had a vision of Swami Vivekananda, who guided his yoga practice, and after he was released from prison, Aurobindo withdrew from political life. In 1910 he moved to the French enclave of Pondicherry in southern India, where he lived until his death in 1950. Aurobindo spent these years developing his spiritual life, and in his later years he was known as Shri Aurobindo.

His teachings focus on the insights found in the Upanishads, and stress the development of true knowledge, which leads to self-realization.

Auspiciousness
This is the general term for events or conditions that cause or promote life, prosperity, and overall well-being. Along with purity and impurity (ashaucha), auspiciousness and inauspiciousness are fundamental concepts in Hindu life.

The life-giving qualities connected with auspiciousness make it a state that Hindus pursue—whether through performing rituals, scheduling important events such as marriage ceremonies for astrologically favorable times, or avoiding people and things deemed to be inauspicious. For extensive information of auspiciousness and its importance in Hindu life, see Frederique Apffel Marglin, Wives of the God-King, 1985.

Avadhuta
(“one who has cast away [all attachments]”) In its most general sense, an avadhuta is an ascetic who does not adhere to any social or religious rules but his (or far more rarely, her) own. Needless to say, their behavior is often unpredictable, seemingly capricious, and sometimes intentionally shocking.

As a more technical title, avadhuta is a term of respect for the senior members of the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva and who formerly made their living as traders and mercenary soldiers.

Avahana
(“summoning”) The first of the sixteen upacharas (“offerings”) given to a deity as part of worship, which is done to treat the deity as an honored guest. Although the literal translation of this word (“summoning”) seems inappropriate for interacting with a god, the true sense of the word is inviting the deity to become present for worship, just as one would invite a guest into one’s house for hospitality.

Avadhi
Avadhi is a language known in two different contexts. In a literary context, Avadhi is a dialect of medieval Hindi (and a sister language of Braj Bhasha) found in the eastern part of the state of Uttar Pradesh, in the region surrounding Ayodhya (Avadhi). It is recognized as the language in which the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?) wrote his vernacular retelling of the Ramayana, the Ramcharitmanas.

In a linguistic context, Avadhi is one of the dialects of modern standard Hindi spoken throughout the same region. Although it shows similarities to the language of Tulsidas, it has evolved from that version.

Avahana Akhara
The name of a particular group of the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, which is comprised of renunciant ascetics. The Dashanami Nagas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, organized into akharas, or regiments, on the model of an army. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Nagas’ primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests; both of these occupations have largely disappeared in contemporary times.

The Avahana akhara is one of the seven main Dashanami Naga akharas, but for organizational purposes it is considered a subsidiary of the Juna akhara. Its name, which means “summons,” supposedly comes from its status as the first organized ascetic group, formed in response to the call from the philosopher Shankaracharya to revitalize Hindu society.

Avalon, Arthur
Pen name of Sir John Woodroffe.

Avani
Fifth month of the Tamil solar year, which usually falls within August and September. This month corresponds to the northern Indian solar month of Simha (the zodiacal sign of Leo). The existence of several different calendars is one clear sign of the continuing importance of regional cultural patterns. One way that the Tamils retain their culture is by preserving their traditional calendar. Tamil is one of the few regional languages in India with an ancient, well-established literary tradition. See also Tamil months, Tamil Nadu, and Tamil language.

Avatar
(“descent”) In Hindu mythology, the descent (of a deity), but more colloquially the incarnation, of a deity on earth. The concept of avatars has been best developed by the devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, who perceive him as taking a specific form to help the world. Examples of avatars can be found for other divinities as well.

Hindus draw a distinction between full avatars, which have the complete power of the deity, and partial incarnations, or anshavatars. Vishnu has ten full avatars, each of whom has appeared to restore the cosmic balance when the... world has fallen out of equilibrium. The root cause of such disequilibrium is usually a demon (asura) who has grown too strong and uses that power to oppress others. This imbalance prompts Vishnu to take form as an avatar, destroy the evildoers, and definitively restore the cosmic balance.

Although there is some variation in the list of Vishnu’s avatars, the generally accepted list is as follows: Fish, Tortoise, Boar, Man-Lion, Vamana (dwarf), Parashuram, Rama, Krishna, Buddha, and Kalki. This list of avatars follows an “evolutionary” sequence—the first three are animals, the fourth a hybrid man-animal, and the ones after that mythic heroes and sages; the exception is the Buddha, a real person who has been incorporated into the Hindu pantheon. The tenth form, Kalki avatar, is yet to come, and his coming will herald the end of the age. Vishnu’s partial avatars—as sages, saints, and gods—are countless and potentially limitless, providing a ready-made way for new Hindu movements to ascribe divine authority to their founders.

Although the avatar concept is most commonly associated with Vishnu, it has been applied to other Hindu gods as well. One example of partial avatars can be seen in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, in which all five of the Pandava brothers are partial incarnations of various gods. In addition, devotees of the god Shiva have developed a list of his twenty-one avatars, who are saints, sages, and minor deities. This list was probably developed in response to the Vaishnava doctrine of avatars, but Shiva’s forms are far less important than Vishnu’s; Vishnu’s avatars include Rama and Krishna, who are major objects of worship in their own right.

For the Vaishnavas, the avatar doctrine is generally seen as a way to assimilate existing cults into the pantheon by claiming that various deities are merely different manifestations of Vishnu. The Shaiva avatars were developed much later, essentially so that Shiva would also have these forms. See also Jagannath and Balarama.

Avidya

("lack of [true] knowledge") Avidya is the absence of true understanding and is the fundamental problem in almost all Hindu philosophical and religious thought. The presence of avidya leads people to misperceive the true nature of reality and to act based on these misperceptions.

The most fundamental of these false perceptions is to identify the eternal Self (atman) with the body. As a result of this misidentification, egoism leads one to try to protect and advance the Self (in its particular embodied state) and incites feelings and actions of greed, lust, and hatred. These feelings create bondage for the soul and entrap it in samsara, the cycle of rebirth.

In most Hindu philosophical schools, the avidya tends to be conceived in epistemological rather than metaphysical terms—that is, it is not an actual thing in its own right but exists as a function of how one comes to know things, insofar as that knowledge is inaccurate or incomplete. Once one’s deficient awareness has been corrected, the cause of bondage is removed, resulting in the final liberation of the soul (moksha).

Avimukta

("unforsaken") The word Avimukta carries two shades of meaning: in a more general sense, it is a name for the city of Benares; in a more specific sense, it refers to the part of Benares considered to be the sacred heart of the city, in the region centered around the Vishvanath Temple.

Avimukta gets its name from the belief that Shiva never leaves this place, and because of this its proponents claim that it is the holiest spot on earth. See Benares.
Avvaiyar

Poet whose compositions appear in the Sangam literature, which are collections of Tamil poems written and compiled in the early centuries of the common era (approximately 100–300 C.E.). Avvaiyar is notable as a female poet, indicating that certain women at that time took an equal part in cultured and intellectual society. See also Tamil language.

Ayamatma Brahman

(“This Self is Brahman”) In the Hindu philosophical tradition, one of the “great utterances” (mahavakyas) expressing ultimate truth. The truth here is the identity of atman (the individual Self) and Brahman (Ultimate Reality); this identity is the heart of the mystical texts called the Upanishads.

Aside from their importance in a philosophical context as fundamental truths, four mahavakyas were also appropriated as symbols by the four divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasi ascetics. Each division had its own mahavakya, just as each had a different Veda, a different primary sacred center, and a different ascetic quality. Ayamatma Brahman is the mahavakya associated with the Anandawara division of the Dashanami Sanyasis.

Ayana

(“going”) In the estimation of the Hindu calendar, the word ayana refers to the movement of the sun during its yearly course, which is divided according to the direction of the sun’s movement. The six months that the sun moves in a northerly direction is called the uttarayana, and its southward movement in the following six months is the dakshinayana. The transition points at which the sun changes direction do not fall on the solstices, as figured in the Gregorian calendar, but about three weeks later on Makara Sankranti (around January 14) and Karka Sankranti (around July 14).

The sun’s northward journey is considered a more auspicious time than the southward journey, although many other factors can influence the judgment of a particular day.

Ayodhya

(“unassailable”) Sacred city (tirtha) on the Sarayu River, in the Faizabad district of the state of Uttar Pradesh, and one of India’s seven sacred cities. Ayodhya is famous as the setting for much of the Ramayana, the later of the two great Hindu epics, whose principal character is the god Rama. In the Ramayana, Ayodhya is the capital city of Rama’s father, King Dasharatha, the birthplace and childhood home of Rama and his brothers, and the city to which Rama returns in triumph after his exile is over.

Although historians have raised doubts about the Ramayana’s historical veracity and the reality of the events described there, Rama’s devotees (bhakta) entertain no such doubts. For them the cult of Rama is deeply entrenched in Ayodhya, and various places in the city are associated with events in the epic that are believed to have actually occurred.

In most cases this has had no ill effects, with the exception of the Ram Janam Bhumi, the site identified as Rama’s birthplace. Until 1992, this site was occupied by the Babri Masjid, a Muslim mosque supposedly built after the existing temple was demolished. On December 6 of that year, the mosque was destroyed by teams of activists from the Vishva Hindu Parishad, who tore it down in just over six hours. The destruction sparked Hindu-Muslim riots all over India, in which thousands of people were killed. For further information on Ayodhya, see Hans Bakker, Ayodhya, 1986; Peter van der Veer, Gods on Earth, 1988; Sarvepalli Gopal, Anatomy of a Confrontation, 1991; and Christophe Jaffrelot, The Hindu Nationalist Movement in India, 1996.
Ayudhapurusha

An ayudhapurusha is the personified form of a divine weapon or emblem, which is conceived as either masculine, feminine, or neuter according to the gender of the Sanskrit word. For example, the words shakti ("spear") and gada ("club") are portrayed as feminine, chakra ("discus") as neuter, and khadga ("sword") and trishul ("trident") as male.

Ayurveda

("knowledge of life") Ayurveda is the best known of the indigenous Indian medical systems and is primarily based on the two Sanskrit medical texts: the Charaka Samhita (1st c. C.E.) and the Sushruta Samhita (4th c. C.E.).

The underlying assumption in both of these texts and in ayurveda is the theory of the three bodily humors—vata (wind), pitta (bile), and kapha (phlegm). Each of these is composed of different elements, and although everyone has all three humors, their relative proportions are used to explain varying body types, metabolic dispositions, and personalities.

People in whom vata predominates are said to have quick minds, slender bodies, and to be full of energy, but they are also said to get run down more easily than others. Pitta-dominant people are said to be strong-willed and good leaders but also hot-tempered and bothered by heat. Kapha-dominant people are strong, healthy, and stable but also have tendencies toward lassitude and inertia.

Each of these humors can thus have both wholesome and unwholesome manifestations, but when the humors are in relative balance, the five bodily winds (prana) that are considered responsible for basic bodily functions will work effectively, and the person will be healthy.

According to ayurveda, disease is caused by an imbalance of these humors that usually has perceivable environmental roots. One possible cause is environmental circumstances, such as the stresses that the differing seasons (hot, cold, damp, etc.) put on varying constitutions. The other possible cause for an imbalance is the person's own behavior—improper diet, poor sleep habits, deficient or inappropriate bodily exertion, and other habitual stresses on the body.

In ayurveda, people are conceived as beings in interaction with their environment, and ayurveda's proponents recognize that many ailments may have multiple causes. The ultimate aim of any treatment, whether diet, exercise, or medicine, is to restore this lost equilibrium. The equilibrium being sought will be different for everyone, since it will necessarily reflect each person's individual make-up. For further information see Gopi Warrier, The Complete Illustrated Guide to Ayurveda, 1997; and Judith Morrison, The Book of Ayurveda, 1995.
Baba
In its literal meaning, an affectionate term of address meaning “father.” Although this can be used to address any older man, it is most commonly applied to ascetics, either in speaking of them as a class or as a respectful way to address a particular one.

Babar’s Mosque
See Babri Masjid.

Babri Masjid
(“Babar’s Mosque”) Mosque built in 1528 on the outskirts of the city of Ayodhya, which was constructed at the order of Mir Baqi, a general of the Moghul emperor Babar (1483–1530). The site has long been a source of controversy between the Hindu and Muslim communities, and British sources recorded conflicts there in 1855 and 1934. Local tradition holds that the mosque was built on the birthplace of the Hindu deity Rama, and that it was constructed only after demolishing the Hindu temple there, although there is little hard evidence for the latter claim. A few months after India gained independence in 1947, several local Hindus surreptitiously installed images of the child Rama, his wife Sita, and his brother Lakshmana; they spread the tale that the images had miraculously appeared in a ball of light. The government had only recently quieted the Hindu-Muslim massacres that accompanied the division of British India into India and Pakistan, and it was reluctant to re-inflame religious passions. Its solution was to padlock the compound’s gates and send the case to the courts for resolution, where it languished for almost forty years.

The early 1980s saw renewed controversy over the site, when the Hindu religious organization Vishva Hindu Parishad (VHP) first began calling for its “liberation” and proclaiming that the existing structure was an insult to all Hindus. This campaign portrayed the mosque as a symbol of Muslim iconoclasm. Moreover, it depicted government efforts to protect the mosque as an attempt to appease the Muslim community and retain their votes. In 1986 the VHP’s drive to liberate the site was aided by the national government headed by Rajiv Gandhi, which in a patent attempt to claim Hindu support, unlocked the compound’s gates so that Hindus could worship on the site.

The pressure intensified as the decade progressed, culminating in a series of campaigns to begin constructing a Hindu temple on the site. Many of these campaigns coincided with national elections, and the emotion they generated helped benefit the electoral fortunes of the Bharatiya Janata Party, a political party with close ties to the VHP. Eventually, on December 6, 1992, the mosque was demolished. The whole operation was carefully planned; the demolition teams were highly trained, and the first thing they did was to destroy all the television cameras there to prevent any media coverage by outsiders. It was carried out with the blessing of the state government, which made no attempt to protect the building. The demolition was followed by riots, particularly in the state of Maharashtra, in which over three thousand people were killed, most of them Muslims.

Even after the destruction of the Babri Masjid, the site remained a bone of contention. Immediately following the demolition, Prime Minister P. V. Narasimha Rao promised to rebuild the mosque on the same spot, but he did nothing to accomplish this during his time in office. Various Hindu groups, including traditional religious leaders such as the Shankaracharyas, have been calling for the construction of the Ram Janam Bhumi temple at the site. Anticipating nothing but trouble ahead, the government again has sent the matter to the courts for resolution, where it remains to this day and may remain for four more decades. For further information see Sarvepalli Gopal, Anatomy of a Confrontation, 1991; and Christophe Jaffrelot, The Hindu Nationalist Movement in India, 1996.

Badarayana

(ca. 400–200 B.C.E.) Philosopher traditionally cited as the author of the Vedanta Sutras. This collection of 555 brief sutras, or aphorisms, is the basis of the philosophical school known as Vedanta, so named because it claims to reveal the ultimate meaning of the religious scriptures known as the Vedas. The sutras attempt to summarize and systematize the philosophic and religious ideas in the Upanishads, the speculative texts that form the latest stratum in the Veda. Because the Vedanta Sutras are particularly concerned with the ideas about the Supreme Reality known as Brahman, they are also called the Brahma Sutras. The brevity of the individual sutras—many are only a few words—presupposes commentary, which was later provided by various writers. Badarayana himself considered the Upanishads the ultimate source for his teachings, although his text was judged equally authoritative by later Vedanta writers.

Badrinath

(“Lord of Badri”) Sacred site (tirtha) in the Himalayan area of Chamoli district in the state of Uttar Pradesh, near the headwaters of the Alakananda River, the largest tributary of the Ganges. Badrinath is high in the mountains at an altitude of over 10,000 feet. It is connected to Tibet by the Mana Pass, one of the traditional land routes by which Chinese goods have come into India. Badrinath’s high altitude also means that it is only accessible between late April and Temple to the god Vishnu in the Himalayan town of Badrinath. Parts of the temple's architecture suggest that it may have originally been a Buddhist temple.

October, after which it is closed for the winter months; this pattern is echoed at Yamunotri, Gangotri, and Kedarnath, the three major Himalayan pilgrimage sites. The town's name comes from its presiding deity, Vishnu, whose temple is the reason for the site's existence. The main image in the temple is claimed to have miraculously emerged full-formed from a shalagram, a particular type of black stone containing fossilized ammonite, which is itself considered a “self-manifested” form of Vishnu.

Badrinath has a long history as a venerable sacred site. Scholars believe that it was occupied by a Buddhist temple until several centuries into the present millennium, based on the architecture of some of the temple's older parts. Local tradition reports that until the middle of the twentieth century when the Chinese sealed the Tibetan border, Buddhists came from Tibet for the temple's closing rites in the fall, bringing a hand-woven blanket to drape around the image. In Hinduism, Badrinath is one of the four dhams (“divine abodes”) connected with the philosopher Shankaracharya. Shankaracharya reportedly chose one Hindu sacred center in each corner of the subcontinent to combat the spread of Buddhism and revitalize Hindu religion. At each center he established a Dashanami Sanyasi monastic center (math) to train learned monks. Badrinath is associated with the sacred center Jyotir Math in the Himalayan town of Joshimath, forty miles south. Each winter, the image at Badrinath is symbolically transported to the Narasimha temple in Joshimath.

According to Badrinath temple records, for several hundred years temple worship was performed by the Dandi Sanyasis; they were a group of ascetics devoted to the god Shiva who were also Nambudiri brahmins, the same caste into which Shankaracharya is supposed to have been born. When the last of these ascetics died without a successor in 1776, the local king who served as the protector of the shrine invited a non-ascetic Nambudiri brahmin to serve as the temple's priest. In deference to his ascetic predecessors, this priest was given the title rawal (“deputy”), and his extended family has run the shrine since then. The rawal is the only person allowed to touch the image, and as a consequence he is required to remain a bachelor, lest the ritual impurity (ashaucha) arising from the birth of a child (sutakashaucha) render him unable to attend to his duties. For a long time, the rawals had sole rights to the offerings given at the shrine, but since 1939 the temple has been managed by a committee, and the rawal has been restricted to ritual duties.

(“account book”) Name for the pilgrim registers maintained by hereditary pilgrimage priests (pandas). Each panda family in any sacred site (tirtha) has the right to serve pilgrims whose ancestral homes are in a particular place, whether or not the pilgrims still reside there. For example, a family from the Marwar region of the state of Rajasthan will always be served by the Marwari panda, even if the family has not lived in Marwar for generations. Pilgrims make an entry in their panda's pilgrim register during each visit, in which they write down the date, the names of those who visited, and the reason or reasons for which they have come. These details are noted on a thick sheet of paper about ten inches wide and three feet long, and there may be multiple entries on a page. One of the page's narrow sides has holes punched in it, and a string can be threaded through these holes to tie a number of such sheets together. This allows the panda to compile registers for a particular village or specific family, and when not in use these bahis are rolled into a circle and tied.

These registers provide not only a record of pilgrim visits, but are also the unassailable evidence of the hereditary connection between a panda and a pilgrim family. Most pilgrims will demand to see the entries for their ancestors as proof that a particular priest is their hereditary panda. This usually happens when many years have elapsed between visits, and the pilgrims may never have met their panda in person. A panda's bahis are thus the sole proof of his rights to a particular pilgrim group, which makes these registers extremely valuable documents. Most pandas zealously safeguard their bahis, since anyone with a copy can claim the pilgrims therein. The bahis' importance also gives them a high market value. They may be used as collateral to gain a loan and can even be sold outright. This latter course is extremely unusual, since for working pandas their bahis are not only the source of their livelihood, but also their family inheritance.

Bahina Bai
(1628–1700) Poet and saint in the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba at his temple at Pandharpur in the modern state of Maharashtra. Bahina Bai ran counter to contemporary assumptions not only because she was a female religious figure, but also because she was a brahmin disciple of the shudra poet-saint Tukaram, an association that inverted the usual patterns of social status. This is because a brahmin is someone of high social standing while a shudra is of the lowest and least influential class in Hindu society. According to tradition, Tukaram initiated Bahina as his disciple in a dream because Bahina's husband—a learned brahmin who was highly conscious of brahmin status—had forbidden her to meet with him. Aside from her devotional poetry, Bahina also wrote an autobiography, whose content was heavily influenced by her religious beliefs. Bahina is notable as one of the only women bhakti (devotional) figures who was able to reconcile the demands of her marriage with her commitment to God, although these issues were not resolved without considerable trouble and heartache. For further information see Justin E. Abbott (trans.), Bahina Bai, 1985; and Anne Feldhaus, “Bahina Bai: Wife and Saint,” in Journal of the American Academy of Religion, Vol. 50, 1982.

Bahiryaga
("external sacrifice") In Hindu worship, especially in esoteric ritual tradition known as tantra, bahiryaga refers to any type of religious practice involving actions, words, or the manipulation of concrete objects. This is the only kind of worship that most people perform. The ultimate goal in tantra, however, is to internalize these acts through repeated practice and to transform them into antaryaga ("internal sacrifice"), in which all external actions have been replaced by mental acts.

Bahudaka
("having much water") The name for one of four particular types of Hindu ascetics. Each of these four types reflects the ascetic's supposed means of livelihood, which in practice has been much less important for ascetic identity than organizational affiliation. The Bahudaka is an ascetic who begs for his food at sacred bathing places. The other three types are the Kutichaka, which has lower status than the Bahudaka, and the Hamsa and Paramahamsa, which have higher status.

Bahula Chauth
Religious festival celebrated on the fourth day (chauth) of the dark, or waning, half of the lunar month of Bhadrapada, the sixth month of the lunar year, which usually falls within August and September. On this day mothers perform duties for the welfare of their sons. They should refrain from all activity and from eating wheat or rice (the staple food grains). As a symbolic indication of allowing mothers to care for their children, on this day cows are not milked, and their calves are allowed to suckle as much as they want.
Such motherly concern for their sons reflects not only normal maternal instincts but the importance of male children in traditional Hindu life. According to the customary pattern, at least in northern India, daughters leave their natal homes to live with their husbands' families, whereas sons bring their brides into the family home. One's sons thus ensure the continuity of the family, in addition to taking care of the parents in their old age. Sons are also important because only they can perform the annual shraddhas, or memorial rites to the ancestors, although couples without any natural sons can satisfy this requirement through adoption.

Baiga
(probably a corruption of the word vaidaga, or "healer") A sorcerer, healer, and ritual technician connected with spirits at the lower levels of the pantheon; a baiga sometimes acts as a medium for village deities and at other times as an exorcist for witches, bhuts, and pretas. A baiga's power is based on his command of mantras, sacred sounds either acquired from a relative as his hereditary birthright or bought from a knowledgeable person. Baigas minister to people's immediate troubles, whether caused by illness, misfortune, accident, or alleged possession. This pervasive connection with people's everyday concerns makes them important figures in urban as well as rural India. The most successful baigas are those who radiate the greatest air of authority, and thus instill in their patients the confidence that the baiga can and will alleviate their distress. For a short account of the baiga's work, see Lawrence Babb, The Divine Hierarchy, 1975; for a more developed perspective on Indian healers and healing, see Sudhir Kakar, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1991.

Sacred site (tirtha) and archeological area in the Himalayan foothills of the state of Uttar Pradesh, about forty-five miles north and west of the town of Almora. Baijnath contains a temple complex believed to date from the thirteenth century C.E. Many of the temples are quite well-preserved, although only one is still used as a place of worship. Although the name of the site is a vernacular form of Vaidyanath, a form of the god Shiva, the presiding deity in the temple is Shiva’s wife Parvati. Her main image is over four feet tall and is a magnificent work of art, carved from a piece of rose-colored granite. Smaller figures carved into the image itself illustrate the mythic story of Shiva’s wife Sati, her rebirth as Parvati, and Parvati’s remarriage to Shiva. The statue is clearly the work of a master sculptor, and it far exceeds the quality of the artwork one normally finds in such isolated places. Another temple in a nearby village has a statue of Vishnu made from a similar type of stone and carved in a similar style. The simplest explanation for this correspondence is that a single sculptor was commissioned to create both images.

Bairagi
("dispassionate") This is the general name for any ascetic whose patron deity is Vishnu, but it is particularly applied to the fighting ascetics known as Nagas. See also Chatuh-Sampradayi Nagas.

Baisakhi
Annual festival taking place in the lunar month of Baisakh (April–May), for which it is named. Baisakhi marks the sun’s transition into Aries, which according to the Indian estimation occurs around April 14. This festival marks the beginning of the solar year on the traditional calendar. Baisakhi is celebrated mainly in the north, particularly in the state of Punjab and its surrounding regions. In the days when pilgrims still traveled through the Himalayas on foot, this festival marked the beginning of the Himalayan pilgrimage season; during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, Baisakhi was the occasion for a great trading festival in the town of Haridwar, the gateway to the Himalayan shrines. Although this fair has long been eclipsed, Baisakhi is still the climactic bathing (snana) day for the Haridwar Kumbha Mela and Ardha Kumbha Mela, each of which is a bathing festival that occurs about every twelve years when Jupiter is in the sign of Aquarius (for the Kumbha Mela) or Leo (for the Ardha Kumbha Mela).

Baithak
("seat") In the Vaishnava sect known as the Pushti Marg, a religious community whose members are devotees (bhakta) of the god Krishna, the baithaks are a group of 108 sacred sites (tirthas). Each site is somehow associated with the life and activities of the philosopher Vallabhaacharya, the Pushti Marg’s founder. Most of these baithaks are in well-established sacred areas that were considered holy long before Vallabhaacharya’s time, but the charter story for each baithak records some activity of the philosopher in that particular place, to further sanctify it for his followers. These baithaks create a sectarian network within the existing pilgrimage places and imbue each one with additional significance for the Pushti Marg.

Bajrang Dal
("Hanuman's Host") The Bajrang Dal is a modern Hindu organization that has strong connections with the Hindu nationalist Vishva Hindu Parishad (VHP), although both are nominally independent. The Bajrang Dal is sometimes characterized as the VHP's "youth wing," and its primary function is to aid the VHP in carrying out its religious, political, and social campaigns, particularly by supplying members to build a crowd. The god Hanuman is best noted for his prodigious strength, and it is this quality that the Bajrang Dal seems to have emphasized in choosing him as their symbol. Membership is open to young men from all social strata, but the organization reportedly draws much of its followers from lower-caste groups. Although local chapters of the Bajrang Dal often perform social services and philanthropic activities (as one might find with any organized group), as a whole the organization is widely seen as an instrument of the VHP, to be used when the situation calls for producing a crowd, intimidation, or violence.

Baka
In Hindu mythology, a demon killed by the god Krishna during Krishna's childhood in Braj. Baka is one of the demon assassins sent by Krishna's wicked uncle, Kamsa, to try to get rid of the god. He comes to Braj in the form of a giant crane (baka) and swallows Krishna and his companions, but he is killed when Krishna expands to such a giant size in Baka's stomach that the demon explodes.

Bakasur
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Bakasur is a ferocious man-eating demon. To preserve their lives, the local villagers send Bakasur a daily sacrificial victim who is chosen by lot, along with a wagonload of food that the demon also eats. One day the lot falls to the brahmin who is hosting the Pandavas, the five heroic brothers who are the epic's protagonists. When the brothers' common wife, Draupadi, discovers what has happened, she asks one of the brothers, Bhima, to deliver the food in the brahmin's place. Bhima drives the wagon to the cave, goads the demon into battle by eating the food in front of him, and then slays Bakasur with one mighty blow.

Baksheesh
(from the Persian word bakhshidan, meaning "to give") A gift, usually of money, given to facilitate service. This is usually paid in advance but can also be given after the fact. In some cases this is unabashed bribery, but most often it is simply a way to ensure continuing service and attention, or a gratuity for services already rendered.

Balabhadra
Epithet of the mythic hero Balarama, the god Krishna's older brother. Although he is a fairly minor mythic figure, he is important for his connection with the temple of Jagannath in the city of Puri. The temple's presiding deity is Jagannath ("Lord of the World"), a tribal god who has been assimilated into the Hindu pantheon as a form of Krishna. The image of Jagannath appears together with two other images, Balabhadra and their sister Subhadra, and the three deities invariably appear as a group.

The poet Jayadeva, in his list of the ten avatars ("divine incarnations") typically associated with the god Vishnu, named Balabhadra as the eighth avatar, the place normally occupied by Krishna. According to Jayadeva, Jagannath/Krishna is not a
Balaji
Popular epithet of the god Venkateshvara, the presiding deity of the temple of the same name at Tirupati in the state of Andhra Pradesh. See Venkateshvara.

Balaji
(2) Presiding deity of the Balaji temple in Mehdipur village, Rajasthan, who is considered a form of the monkey-god, Hanuman. As an infant, Hanuman is continually hungry, and one day he attempts to eat the sun. Indra, the king of the gods and ruler of heaven, is incensed at Hanuman's action and strikes him with a thunderbolt, breaking his jaw (hanu). The wind-god, who is Vayu, Hanuman's father, goes on strike to protest this punishment. Since in traditional Indian physiology, winds are considered responsible for all internal functions, including digestion, respiration, and elimination, Vayu's strike means that no one can live a normal life. After a short time, the gods realize their predicament and beg Vayu for forgiveness; the deity is placated when each of the gods promises to give Hanuman a divine gift. By virtue of these gifts, Hanuman gains great power; not only is he immensely strong, but he is an expert healer, through both his skill in using herbs and natural medicines and his magical abilities to protect people from malevolent supernatural beings.

These powers and healing qualities make Hanuman a strong protective deity, and he is often worshiped on days and at times deemed inauspicious or unfavorable. These protective attributes have made him enormously important in contemporary Hindu life despite his theoretically intermediate place in the divine pantheon, and these qualities are especially evident in his form as Balaji. His temple has gained regional prominence as a healing center for people possessed by malevolent spirits known as bhuts and prets. The exorcisms proceed in a quasi-judicial fashion, with the spirits being hauled into the divine court, tried, and banished from the sufferer with the underlying assumption that these rites succeed through Balaji's irresistible healing powers. As Sudhir Kakar has masterfully shown, the language associated with possession and exorcism, when understood in the context of traditional Hindu culture, can be seen as a way of describing what modern psychiatrists might call the diagnosis and treatment of mental illness. See Sudhir Kakar, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1991.

Balakrishna
Figure of Krishna in the form of a child (bala). Devotees (bhakta) who worship this form of Krishna are partaking in the devotional relationship known as vatsalya bhava, which parallels the connection between parent and child. The unusual twist is that the devotee takes the role of the parent, lavishing love and care on the deity in its child form in a warm, protective, and intimate relationship.

Balarama
Krishna's older brother. According to most estimations, Balarama is a partial avatar, or incarnation, of Shesha, a serpent upon whom the god Vishnu reclines as on a couch. Shesha takes human form as Balarama, and Vishnu takes human form as Krishna, to destroy the evil king Kamsa. Kamsa has imprisoned their parents, Vasudeva and Devaki, because on their wedding day a disembodied voice has foretold that Devaki's eighth child will kill Kamsa. Kamsa kills Devaki's first six children at birth by flinging them onto stones, but Balarama is saved when the embryo in Devaki's womb is magically transplanted into the womb of Vasudeva's second wife, Rohini. Because of the unusual circumstances surrounding his development in utero, Balarama is also known as Sankarshana ("dragging away"). Balarama is raised with Krishna in Nanda and Yashoda's household and takes part in many of Krishna's adventures, including the slaying of Kamsa. Balarama is usually portrayed as having a fair complexion, whereas Krishna is dark. According to one story, when the gods approach Vishnu to take form on earth, he plucks both a white hair and a black hair from his head. The former is born to Rohini as Balarama, the latter to Devaki as Krishna.

Jayadeva's Gitagovinda presents a different picture of Balarama. Jayadeva is closely linked to the Jagannath temple in Puri, whose presiding deity (Jagannath) has been assimilated into the pantheon as Krishna. For Jayadeva, Jagannath/Krishna is not a form of Vishnu but the Ultimate Reality from whom all the avatars spring. Jayadeva incorporates Balarama into the pantheon as the eighth avatar, to fill the place left by Krishna's promotion to supreme god.

Bali
In Hindu mythology Bali is a demon who is tricked by Vishnu into granting the god three paces of land of his own. Bali does this with little thought because Vishnu has come in the form of a dwarf (vamana), but when the gift has been given, Vishnu grows immensely large and claims the whole universe, relegating Bali to the Patala underworld. See also Vamana avatar.

Bali
(2) In Hindu mythology, a monkey-king in the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics. Bali and Sugriva are brothers who together rule the kingdom of Kishkindha, but enmity develops between them, and Bali drives away his brother and takes Sugriva's wife. After the abduction of the god Rama's wife Sita, Sugriva meets with Rama and the god’s brother Lakshmana, and they agree that Rama will help Sugriva regain his wife and kingdom if Sugriva and his monkey-subjects will help to search for Sita. Sugriva challenges Bali to battle but cannot compete with his superior strength. Although Rama has agreed to shoot Bali with an arrow, he is unable to tell which of the monkeys he is. In a second battle, when Sugriva is marked by a garland, Rama shoots Bali with an arrow from behind and kills him.

Bali
(3) Island in Indonesia that has the last surviving remnant of the Hindu-Buddhist culture that pervaded the region after the early centuries of the common era. Indian beliefs were first brought by traders and merchants, and inscriptions reveal that the Balinese kings patronized a variety of sects, both Hindu and Buddhist. In time, Indian sacred geography was transferred and transposed to Bali, native deities were gradually assimilated into the pantheon, and all the competing sects finally were fused into the new entity known as Balinese religion.

Bana

Bana Linga
An egg-shaped stone considered a svayambhu (“self-manifested”) form of the god Shiva. As with all svayambhu images, the bana linga is considered to be extraordinary, since in it the god has spontaneously revealed himself. Bana lingas are only found in certain places, particularly on the banks of the Chambal River in the state of Madhya Pradesh, where they can be found in large numbers. They come in a wide spectrum of colors and can be several feet in width, although most are smaller. The smaller ones are movable and may even be carried by wandering ascetics as portable objects of worship. The larger ones are usually found only in temples, not only because of the limits on motion imposed by their greater size, but also because they are believed to be so powerful that they should be kept in a carefully maintained place.

(variant of Baniya) In traditional northern Indian society, a merchant or shopkeeper often but not exclusively belonging to the vaishya varna, which is the third of four social classes in Hindu culture. Aside from their merchant activities, the more prosperous ones often engaged in moneylending, sometimes at prodigious rates of interest, as a way to further increase their capital. In traditional lore, banias are invariably painted as greedy and avaricious people who care about nothing but money. Although they were often stereotyped as parasites, banias were a necessary part of the traditional agricultural economy, because they gave farmers goods on credit to be repaid after the harvest. They also lent farmers money to get started again after a bad harvest. Both groups thus depended on one another—the farmers for capital, the banias for continuing consumption and patronage. For a masterful reconstruction of the ethos in the northern Indian merchant family, in which Hindu piety was an important element, see C. A. Bayly, Rulers, Townsmen and Bazaars, 1983.

Banjara

The model for traditional Indian society was a collection of endogamous subgroups known as jatis ("birth"). These jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group's hereditary occupation. In traditional northern Indian society, the Banjaras were a jati whose hereditary occupation was driving pack animals, either as peddlers selling retail goods to people in more remote places or as transporters conveying commodities from one seller to another. They appear in poems by some of the bhakti (devotional) poets, particularly by Ravidas, as a symbol of human heedlessness or as a person who never stops moving to reflect on where he has been.

Banking

In traditional Hindu culture, banking was often an extension of a merchant family's economic life, particularly in times and places in which centralized banking did not exist. In most cases these families transacted their business using letters of credit known as hundis, which enabled them to conduct business over large distances without the risk of transporting gold and silver bullion. By the early 1800s, these hundis functioned as virtual currency in much of India, since in some cases they were used in twenty or thirty transactions before eventually being returned to the issuing family for cashing. This system made a merchant family's creditworthiness its most valuable asset. Once this was lost, the family's hundis were no longer honored, and they were unable to conduct business. Since the evaluation of a family's credit was often tied to judgments about its character, merchant families strove to cultivate the image of seriousness, dependability, and thrift. In this ethos the only acceptable forum for lavish expenditures was for religious endowments, since these reinforced the family's pious image and thus enhanced their creditworthiness. With part of their surplus capital, these families would usually engage in moneylending as one way to increase their wealth; the largest families routinely lent money to royalty, which provided them with even greater status. For a masterful picture of the merchant family ethos in northern India, see C. A. Bayly, Rulers, Townsmen, and Bazaars, 1983.

Barahmasa

("twelve months") Poetic genre in which each of the poem's verses, or stanzas, is devoted to one month of the year, with the months treated in chronological order. This is a purely vernacular genre for which there are no known instances in Sanskrit. Barahmasa poems often reveal a great deal about everyday life and can be subdivided into several basic categories: an enumerative type, which describes appropriate activities for each month such as farming or religious practice; a narrative form, which recounts a woman's longing (viraha) for her absent lover; and a type describing a young wife's trial of chastity as she withstands various temptations during an extended separation from her husband. For further information see Charlotte Vaudeville, Barahmasa in Indian Literature, 1986.
Barat
One of the common elements in a modern northern Indian marriage ceremony, in which the groom is brought in a procession to the wedding site, escorted by his (mostly male) relatives and friends. The barat evokes the symbolism of a royal procession in which the groom is the king, at least for the day. The groom most commonly rides a gaily decorated white mare, although any means of transportation representing his importance is acceptable—from an elephant to a horse-drawn carriage to an automobile strung with garlands. In keeping with the royal imagery, the groom often wears a crown or ornaments made of tinsel. The entire procession is usually accompanied by a marching band, in the role of the heralds who march before the royal presence; the band will often stop along the way to play, at which time the participants will dance around them. Although the groom usually remains reserved throughout the barat—in keeping with the gravity of the occasion—for the rest of his companions, it is a time for joking, laughing, dancing, and celebration immediately before the wedding. The barat may also involve the consumption of liquor, although many more conservative Hindus frown upon this element.

Barsana
A village in the Braj region of the state of Uttar Pradesh, which is most famous as the birthplace of the god Krishna’s loving companion, Radha.

Baruthani Ekadashi
Festival falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the dark, or waning, half of the lunar month of Baisakh, which takes place within April and May. The festival is dedicated to the worship of Vishnu, especially in his Vamana avatar, which is his fifth incarnation. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, usually involving fasting (upavasa) and worship, and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. Those observing this ritual should abstain from anger and backbiting and eat food that is prepared without salt or oil. The name Baruthani means “armored” or “protected,” and faithfully observing this festival is believed to protect one from all evil and grant enormous good fortune. In the charter myth, an ascetic whose foot has been chewed off by a wild beast regains the limb by performing this ritual.

Basavanna
(1106–67/68) Poet-saint and religious leader in the Lingayat community, a bhakti (devotional) group that worships Shiva as the single supreme God and rejects all caste regulations. The Lingayats were formed in the southern Indian state of Karnataka where they still have a considerable presence, and the collections of poetry that form their most important religious texts are composed in the Kannada language. According to tradition, from his youth Basavanna was a great devotee (bhakta) of Shiva, whose piety was so intense that he rejected all notions of ritual and caste. After spending much of his youth as a religious seeker, Basavanna became minister to a king named Bijjala. Basavanna used his position’s wealth and influence to care for Shiva’s wandering devotees (jangama), and Bijjala’s court became a magnet for many important figures, including the poet and religious leader Allama Prabhu. Basavanna’s patronage was vital in forming the Lingayat community, and as a token of his importance, the suffix anna (“elder brother”) was attached to his name, Basava. As the Lingayat community grew stronger, their public opposition to ritual worship and caste distinctions generated intense hostility from more traditional groups. This conflict finally came to a violent head when the fledgling Lingayat community apparently arranged a marriage between an untouchable boy and a brahmin girl. Traditionalists became so enraged that they executed the bride and groom's fathers. The Lingayat community was dispersed, and Basavanna died soon afterward. For further information see A. K. Ramanujan (trans.), Speaking of Siva, 1973.

Basohli
A town west of Jammu in the state of Jammu and Kashmir, close to the border of Himachal Pradesh. Although it is an insignificant place in modern times, in the seventeenth century, Basohli was the capital of a small kingdom in the Shiwalik Hills. It was in Basohli that the Pahari style of miniature painting first appeared. The Basohli version of that style is characterized by highly defined profiles, sharply flattened perspective, and broad bands of a single intense color for backgrounds. It serves as a transitional style between the so-called Rajasthani and the more developed techniques of the Pahari schools.

Bath, Mohenjo-Daro
One of the most striking structures excavated at Mohenjo-Daro, the first city of the Indus Valley civilization to be discovered. This bath is an oblong pool, thirty-nine by twenty-three feet in area and eight feet deep. It is built of brick and sealed with pitch. The tank could be drained through an opening in one corner, and it was surrounded on all four sides by small rooms reminiscent of changing rooms. The Indus Valley cities gave great attention to plumbing, sanitation, and sewers, suggesting that bathing (snana) may have been connected with ritual purity as in modern Hindu life. With this in mind, the bath was probably not a swimming pool but rather had some deeper connection with religious life. For further information see Walter Ashlin Fairservis, The Roots of Ancient India, 1975.

Begampura
Fictional city named in one of the poems written by the poet-saint Ravidas (ca. 1500). The word begam can mean either “queen” or “without pain.” The poem clearly shows the city as an idealized place far from the tribulations of ordinary human life, such as pain, sorrow, taxes, wrongdoing, and to a lesser extent, class distinctions. Although Ravidas was born a tanner (chamar), an occupation that was looked down upon, this is one of his only poems that speaks about social issues, however indirectly.

Begging
One of the recognized means of livelihood in traditional Hindu society that is a sign of either very low or very high status, depending on the circumstances. Some beggars are simply people who are desperately poor, disabled, or unable to provide for themselves and their families and who must depend upon gifts (dana) to survive. Such beggars have extremely low social status, although they may make a fairly decent living, particularly if they live in a favorable environment such as a pilgrimage place (tirtha), where giving gifts is a common religious act. Aside from all of the obvious disadvantages—low social status, an uncertain income, and having to endure scorn and verbal abuse—these beggars also suffer the stigma of living on charity, rather than earning an income. This is karmically undesirable since giving gifts is one of the methods by which people get rid of inauspiciousness, which is transferred to the receiver along with the gift. In many cases such a beggar is considered nothing more than an instrument to be used, and the most common word for such a person is patra (“vessel”).

Some ascetics also make their living by begging but fall into a completely different category. In the ideal case, these are people who have given up all visible means of support as part of an effort to renounce the world; this differentiates them from the poor, who are part of ordinary society, albeit at the lowest level. There is general social approval for supporting ascetics, at least the ones who are considered genuine spiritual seekers, and doing so is widely seen as a source of religious merit. Although it is sometimes difficult to distinguish poorer ascetics from ordinary beggars, in the case of the most respected ascetics the distinction is very clear. Such respected ascetics confer status on people by accepting their gifts, and consequently they tend to screen the donors and their motives very carefully to protect their reputations. See also karma.

Begram

Architectural site west of the city of Kabul in modern Afghanistan. Excavations there have revealed artifacts from Kushana culture, primarily relief carvings on ivory plaques.
Bel
Another name for the bilva tree. See bilva.

Belagave
Village in the Shimoga district of the state of Karnataka. Belagave was the most important center for the Kalamukhas, which was an ascetic sect of devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. The Kalamukhas had an important historical role in southern India between the tenth and thirteenth centuries, but they disappeared some time after that. Their ritual center in Belagave was the temple of Kedareshvara, which was Shiva in his form as the lord of Kedara. Although the Kalamukhas have disappeared, their presence and prominence in the region are confirmed by the inscriptions at this and numerous other temples.

Belur
Town in the state of Karnataka, about sixty miles northwest of the modern city of Mysore. As at its sister site, Halebid, Belur is known for a magnificent collection of temples built by the Hoysala dynasty, which ruled western Karnataka from the eleventh to thirteenth centuries C.E. At both sites the temples were built from a particular type of stone—variously described as chlorite schist, steatite, or soapstone—that was quite soft when newly quarried but gradually hardened with exposure to the air. This initial malleability made the stone easy to carve and facilitated the lush detail characteristic of Hoysala temples. Architecturally speaking, these temples have certain unique features: a central hall connecting three star-shaped sanctuaries, and temple towers (shikharas) composed of well-defined horizontal tiers rather than the continuous upward sweep characteristic of the northern Indian Nagar architectural style.

Belur Math
World headquarters of the Ramakrishna Mission, a modern religious organization. The Ramakrishna Mission was founded in 1897 by Swami Vivekananda, the most famous disciple of the nineteenth-century Bengali mystic Ramakrishna. The Mission is equally dedicated to both social service and spiritual uplift, based on Vivekananda's realization that India needed concrete development as much as religious teaching. Belur Math was constructed in 1899, two years after the Ramakrishna Mission was founded. It is located just north of Calcutta on the west side of the Hugli River, quite close to the Dakshineshwar temple where Ramakrishna lived for most of his adult life.

Benares
City and sacred center (tirtha) on the banks of the Ganges in the state of Uttar Pradesh. Benares is an anglicized form of Varanasi, one of the traditional Hindu names for the city, as well as Kashi and Avimukta. All three of these names are used to designate the entire city, but in a more specific context, they denote concentric sacred zones surrounding the Vishvanath temple; Avimukta is the smallest, then Varanasi, and finally Kashi. As with all other pilgrimage places on the Ganges, Benares is considered sacred because of its proximity to the river, particularly because at Benares the Ganges flows in a northerly direction, which is considered auspicious. The Ganges is an integral part of the identity of Benares, and much of the city's religious life centers around it.

The most important sacred presence in the city, however, is the god Shiva. Benares is the city of Shiva, his dwelling place on earth, and the site he never leaves, hence the name Avimukta ("never forsaken"). Temples to Shiva are scattered throughout the city—some old, some new, some nearly forgotten—but the most important is the Vishvanath ("Lord of the Universe") temple. Vishvanath is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a group of sites deemed particularly sacred to Shiva. The original Vishvanath temple was destroyed by the Moghul emperor Aurangzeb, who built a mosque on the site; the present Vishvanath temple was rebuilt next to the original location. Shiva's eternal presence makes Benares one of the seven sacred cities, in which death brings liberation of the soul (moksha). At the moment of death, Shiva is believed to come to the dying person and impart his salvific wisdom. Shiva's presence is also evident at the cremation ground at the sacred site Manikarnika Ghat, which is in the very heart of the city rather than at the margin as in most other places. Here too Shiva teaches human beings a lesson; specifically, Shiva reminds them of their imminent death. This is not to distress or depress them, but to spur them on to serious religious life.

The presence of the Ganges and Shiva make Benares an ideal place to die, or to immerse oneself in spiritual life; what is often overlooked is that Benares is also an unusually vibrant place to live. It has a long history as a trading center and market town, and it remains so today even though the creaking wooden boats traversing the Ganges have been supplemented by other means of transport. Benares is famous for its artisans, particularly weavers and metalworkers, many of whom are Muslim. It has also been renowned as a cultural center for at least a thousand years. Benares is still one of the most important centers in India for all branches of traditional Sanskritic learning, from grammar to astrology to medicine. It is likewise a center for music, dance, and all of the arts and has been home to a galaxy of Indian religious figures, including the poet-saints Tulsidas, Ravidas, and Kabir. For a detailed exposition of the city and its life, see Diana Eck, Banaras, 1999.

Benares Hindu University

Indian educational institution founded in 1916 by the nationalist figure Madan Mohan Malviya (1861–1946). The World War I era marked a more activist orientation to the Indian independence movement. One of the ways this activism manifested itself was in founding educational institutions, which gave Indians greater control over the universities' mission, tone, and curriculum. Benares Hindu University was founded to uphold Hindu cultural and philosophical traditions, but also to educate its students in the sciences and thus prepare them for the modern world. This mission reflected the modernist thinking of its founders as well as their passionate commitment to traditional Hindu culture. It is still one of the finest universities in India, particularly for the study of classical Indian culture.

Bengali

Modern Indian language in the Indo-European language family, spoken in the region of modern Bengal, for which it is named. Like many of India's regional tongues, Bengali has a long history as a literary language in its own right. In the nineteenth century, Calcutta was the most important cultural center in India as well as a hotbed of resistance to British rule. As the vernacular tongue, Bengali was used in that era's revolutionary politics, particularly by Bankim Chandra Chatterjee and Aurobindo Ghose; it was also the language used by religious figures such as Ramprasad and Ramakrishna.

Betel

Common name for the small, hard nut from the areca palm tree, which is consumed by mixing slices of the nut with lime, tobacco, and spices and wrapping the whole thing up in a betel leaf. This is not eaten but lodged against the cheek and slowly chewed, to let the juices flow. This method of gradually absorbing the juice may be the reason for its most...
The nut turns the saliva a bright red color, which is the reason for the distinctive crimson smears adorning many Indian buildings. Chewing betel is widely believed to be good for the digestive tract, a genuine concern in a country where intestinal upsets are still quite common. Chewing betel is such a deeply embedded part of sophisticated Indian cultural life that it even has its own aesthetic, and folding betel is one of the sixty-four arts mentioned in the Kama Sutra.

Bhadra (from bhadra, meaning “blessed” in Sanskrit) In Hindu mythology, the epithet of a powerful and terrifying form of the Goddess. According to one version of the story, Bhadrakali’s birth is associated with the death of Shiva’s first wife, Sati. Sati goes to a great sacrifice sponsored by her father, Daksha. When Daksha intentionally and publicly insults her husband Shiva, in her anger and shame, Sati immolates herself in the sacrificial fire. When Shiva learns of Sati’s death, he is so enraged that he plucks two matted locks (jata) from his head and dashes them to the ground. The first takes form as Virabhadra, a wrathful and terrifying form of Shiva, and the second takes form as Bhadrakali. Just as Virabhadra represents Shiva’s destructive aspect, Bhadrakali symbolizes the ferocious and dangerous side of the Goddess, in contrast with the gentle and loyal Sati. Shiva orders the two to destroy Daksha’s sacrifice, which they do with great abandon.

Bhadra also appears in the stories connected with the birth of the god Krishna. While Krishna is developing in his mother, Devaki’s, womb, Bhadrakali enters the womb of Krishna’s foster mother, Yashoda. The two children are born on the same night, and under cover of darkness they are switched with one another. The next morning the baby girl is snatched from Devaki by her stepbrother, Kamsa, the wicked king of Mathura, who dashes out the child’s brains on a rock; this is just as he has done with Devaki’s six other children because it has been foretold that one of them will kill him. From the infant’s corpse arises an eight-armed figure of the Goddess, who taunts Kamsa that his destroyer has already escaped and then disappears.
Bhadrapada
According to the lunar calendar, by which most Hindu religious festivals are determined, Bhadrapada is the sixth month of the lunar year, usually falling within August and September. This is one of the months associated with the monsoon rains. The major festivals in Bhadrapada are Kajari Teej (Teej), Bahula Chauth, Janmashtami, Radhashtami, Aja Ekadashi, Hartalika Teej (Teej), Ganesh Chaturthi, Rishi Panchami, Parivartini Ekadashi, Anant Chaturdashi, and in southern India, Onam.

Bhadrasana
(“decent posture”) In yoga practice this is one of the sitting postures (asana) described in commentaries to the Yoga Sutras. In this position the legs are crossed with the feet tucked under the thighs so that the crossed heels form a cavity around the scrotum. This is called the “decent posture” because the cupped hands are placed over the cavity made by the heels, covering the private parts. In Hindu iconography this is one of the common postures in which images of the deities are portrayed.

Bhagabhadra
Monarch in the Sunga dynasty, which was centered in the Malwa region in the western part of the state of Madhya Pradesh, in the centuries following the decline of the Maurya dynasty just before the turn of the common era. Despite the fragmentation of the Maurya state, rulers seem to have maintained contact with the Greek-speaking kingdoms to the west, since a pillar inscription records that Bhagabhadra received an ambassador named Heliodorus from the king of Takhasila, in modern Pakistan.

Bhagavad Gita
One of the best-known Hindu scriptures, which is itself a section in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics. The parts of the epic before the Bhagavad Gita chronicle the growing strife between the Pandavas and the Kauravas, the two branches of a royal family who are the epic’s main characters. The parts following the Bhagavad Gita detail the battle that ultimately destroys the entire family. The Bhagavad Gita itself is set in that moment of calm just before the battle begins, and it is written as a dialogue between the Pandava prince Arjuna and the supreme divinity Krishna, here disguised as Arjuna’s charioteer. Arjuna is the world’s greatest archer and can decimate his enemies with ease. But as he looks at the faces of the enemy, he realizes that the people he is about to fight and kill are his relatives, teachers, and friends. Not surprisingly, the prospect leaves him cold, and it is up to Krishna to give him divine guidance.

The Gita’s second chapter opens with Krishna trying to shame Arjuna into fighting (in essence, saying “everyone will think you were afraid and make fun of you”), but when this tactic fails, Krishna has to give more substantive advice, which makes up the rest of the text. Different parts of the Bhagavad Gita invoke all three of the generally accepted paths to liberation of the soul (moksha): the path of wisdom (jnanamarga), the path of action (karmamarga), and the path of devotion (bhaktimarga).

The path of wisdom is rooted in the teachings of the speculative texts known as the Upanishads. This path stresses the realization of one’s essential nature as the eternal Self (atman). The atman is identical with the universal reality known as Brahman; once one has accepted this, all dualistic ideas and false knowledge disappear. The path of action stresses acting without selfish desire—performing one’s duty as duty, but without attachment to the ultimate outcome. This path thus upholds and reinforces the rigid social structure propounded in the dharma literature. As a warrior in that social system, Arjuna’s job is to kill people. At the same time, the path of action provides a way to transform socially sanctioned duty into religious practice. The path of devotion entails surrendering all one's actions to God and performing one's role as an instrument of divine will.

The Bhagavad Gita shows no clear preference for any of these paths, which implies that different writers reworked the text over time. Professor Arthur Llewellyn Basham has speculated that the “original” Bhagavad Gita ended with verse 2.38, after a section establishing the morality of fighting in a just war, thus giving Arjuna his rationale to fight. It is believed that this “original” text was then reworked by a philosopher of the upanishadic type, who conceived of the Ultimate Reality as the impersonal Brahman and of liberation in terms of mystical realization. The final sections were most likely added by a passionate devotee (bhakta) of Vishnu, particularly in his form as Krishna. According to Basham, this last author not only inserted verses in some of the earlier books but also added some completely new ones. One of these, Arjuna’s vision of Krishna’s cosmic form in the Gita’s eleventh chapter, is considered among the most brilliant religious texts ever written. Although some scholars might take issue with specific points, Professor Basham’s theory seems the most convincing explanation for a highly varied text.

In the roughly two thousand years since the Bhagavad Gita was compiled, different commentators have interpreted its message according to their own proclivities. The ninth-century philosopher Shankaracharya saw it as sanctioning the path of wisdom, while the eleventh-century philosopher Ramanuja was convinced that it stressed devotion. The most recent pivotal interpreter, Mohandas Gandhi, understood the text as commanding action. He saw in Arjuna’s struggle a blueprint for his own time and work, urging him to labor for Indian independence but to do so without attachment or hope for personal gain. The text has become even more important as a “scripture” during the past two centuries, largely because of pressure from Christian missionaries. One sign of this is that in modern Indian courtrooms, the Gita is the text upon which Hindus take the oath of truthfulness when being called to take the stand. For an accessible translation of the text itself, see Barbara Stoller Miller (trans.), The Bhagavad-Gita, 1991; for Dr. Basham’s analysis of the text, see Arthur Llewellyn Basham, The Origins and Development of Classical Hinduism, 1991.

Bhagavan
(“Blessed One”) Name denoting both respect and reverence. In different contexts this name can be used as an epithet of either the god Krishna (as in the Bhagavad Gita) or the god Shiva. In modern usage, at least in northern India, it is also the word that comes closest to expressing the notion of abstract divinity, much like the word “God” in English. It is often used to denote God by Hindus who are religious but who do not worship particular deities.

Bhagavata
(“devotees of the Blessed One”) General name for the earliest devotees (bhakta) of Vishnu, particularly the devotees of Krishna-Gopala, a deified cowherd hero who later became identified with Vishnu. Until the development of sectarian Vaishnavism in around the eleventh century C.E., the word bhagavata was a blanket term for all Vaishnavas except the Pancharaattrikas, who were followers of the secret ritual tradition known as Pancharatra.

Bhagavata Purana
Sectarian religious text that is by far the most important text for the worship of the god Krishna as the single Supreme Being. Internal evidence hints that it was written in southern India in the ninth or tenth century, making it much later than many of the other puranas. The bulk of the text focuses on Krishna's early life in the village of Brindavan—infancy, childhood, and adolescence—but gives little attention to his later exploits as a king and hero. This purana's best-known section is the tenth book, which describes Krishna's amorous exploits with the local herd girls (gopis) as they pass the nights in a circle dance (ras lila) on the shores of the Yamuna River. The image of Krishna throughout the text is that of a god in constant play with the world. For Krishna's devotees (bhakta), the supreme felicity comes with the opportunity to take part in that divine play (lila).

Bhagirath
In Hindu mythology, the single person most responsible for bringing the celestial Ganges down to earth. The river Ganges and the goddess Ganges are the same, hence the river is considered holy. Bhagirath is the great-great-grandson of King Sagar, whose 60,000 sons have been burned to ash by the sage Kapila's magic power when they erroneously accuse Kapila of being a thief. The sage later tells Anshuman, King Sagar's grandson and sole surviving descendant, that the only way to bring peace to their souls is to bring the Ganges from heaven down to earth. Anshuman strives to do this for the rest of his life, as does his son Dilip after him, but both are unsuccessful. Dilip's son Bhagirath takes their efforts to heart and retires to the Himalayas, where he performs asceticism until the gods finally agree to send the Ganges down to earth. Yet Bhagirath's efforts are not over. He next has to appease the god Shiva so that the deity will agree to take the shock of the falling river on his head, since its force will otherwise destroy the earth. When all is finally in place, the Ganges falls to earth onto the head of Shiva. From there Bhagirath leads the river out of the mountains to the sea, where she touches his ancestors' ashes, after which they find peace at last.

Bhagirathi
Epithet for the Ganges as both river and goddess. The word Bhagirathi is derived from the name Bhagirath, the single person most responsible for bringing the Ganges to earth. Bhagirathi is also the name for a Himalayan tributary of the river; the Ganges itself is formed when the Bhagirathi unites with the Alakananda River at Devprayag. Although the Alakananda is longer and wider, the Bhagirathi flows through Gangotri, the sacred site (tirtha) celebrated as the source of the Ganges. As with all the Himalayan tributaries of the Ganges, the Bhagirathi is considered sacred. Important pilgrimage places along this tributary include Gangotri near its headwaters, Uttarkashi, and Devaprayag.

Bhairava
(“terrible”) A wrathful and powerful divine attendant of the god Shiva who is often identified as a form of Shiva himself. According to the Shiva Purana, a sectarian scripture, Bhairava is produced when the god Brahma insults Shiva, and Shiva's rage takes concrete form as Bhairava. After his birth, Bhairava's first act is to cut off one of Brahma's heads—the one whose mouth has uttered the insult—thus leaving the god with four remaining heads. Since Brahma is considered a brahmin priest, this act makes Bhairava guilty of brahmin murder, the most serious of the four great crimes (mahapataka). As a sign of the enormity of his act, Brahma’s severed head sticks to Bhairava’s hand; as penance (prayashchitta) Bhairava has to wander the countryside as a beggar, displaying Brahma’s severed head as a continual advertisement of his crime. In his travels Bhairava visits many pilgrimage places (tirtha), but none of them have the power to cleanse him from the sin of brahmin murder. He finally obtains a pardon in the city of Benares, at a site named Kapalamochana (“releasing the skull”). As soon as Bhairava bathes there, Brahma's head falls from his hand into the Ganges—a sign that his crime had been expiated.

Although often seen as Shiva’s attendant, Bhairava is important in several different contexts. He is often portrayed as the consort of powerful, independent goddesses such as Durga and Kali, although he is subordinate to them, befitting their status as supreme deities. Bhairava's associations with wrath and power have made him popular with practitioners of the secret ritual tradition known as tantra, who may invoke him for magic powers or other favors. Bhairava is also popular with the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, ascetic devotees (bhakta) of Shiva who formerly made their living as traders and mercenary soldiers; this group sees him as a divine image of themselves. Some of the ambivalence associated with Bhairava is symbolized by his animal vehicle, the dog, which in Hindu culture is almost invariably a scavenger and considered highly impure.

Bhairava Akhara
Another name for the Juna akhara, a particular subgroup of the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. See Juna akhara.

Bhairava Jayanti
Annual festival on the eighth day of the dark, or waning, half of the lunar month of Margashirsha (November–December), which is celebrated as the birthday of Bhairava. Bhairava is a wrathful and powerful form of the god Shiva and is actually the god’s anger personified. He emerges from Shiva’s forehead after Shiva has been insulted by the god Brahma, and Bhairava's first act is to cut off the head of Brahma that has uttered the insult, leaving the god with four heads. Bhairava’s wrath gives him an aura of danger but also the power to help his devotees (bhakta), who worship him to attain success, remove obstacles, and recover from disease. On this festival people worship Bhairava, Shiva, and Shiva's wife, Parvati, as well as Bhairava's animal vehicle, the dog. People are encouraged to worship through the night and to pass this time by telling mythic stories of Bhairava, Shiva, and Parvati.

Bhairavaprapaksha
(“brilliance of Bhairava”) Name given to the spear that is the symbolic weapon of the Mahanirvani akhara, a particular group of the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis. The Dashanami Nagas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva and are organized into different akharas, or regiments, much like an army. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Nagas' primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests; both of these have occupations largely disappeared in contemporary times. All of the akharas have particular features, including this spear, which signify their organizational identity.

Bhairavi
Feminine form of Bhairava and an epithet of the Goddess. Bhairavi is one of the ten Mahavidyas, a group of goddesses who are both extremely powerful and potentially dangerous.

Bhaiya Duj
Annual festival falling on the second day (duj) of the bright, or waxing, half of the lunar month of Kartik (October–November). This festival is celebrated to emphasize the bond between a brother (bhaiya) and sister. During Bhaiya Duj, married women invite their brothers into their homes, apply tika marks on their brothers' foreheads as a sign of respect, and feed them sweets and a hearty meal. Sisters also tie a string around their brothers' right wrists to symbolize the emotional bond between them and the brother's obligation to protect his sister throughout her lifetime. Unmarried women host their brothers in the same way in their natal homes. In either case, on this day women should pray that their brothers have long lives and that they themselves be happily married. The brothers, in turn, give presents to their sisters.

Aside from reaffirming the normal family love between brother and sister, this festival also emphasizes the protective role that brothers play in their sisters' lives, particularly after women are married. The traditional pattern in northern India is for married women to live with their husbands' families. Since women generally outlive their fathers, for most of her life a woman's primary protectors will be her brothers. A woman without brothers is in a position of relative weakness. If nothing else, these yearly visits give brothers the chance to assess their sister's happiness and the state of affairs in her married home. Such visits also notify the husband's family that they are still concerned with her welfare.

Bhajan
("sharing") General name for a religious or devotional hymn, which is almost always sung in a vernacular language. As an expression of personal devotion, bhajans have no prescribed forms and in contemporary times are often set to the melodies of film songs. As a genre, bhajans can have any or all of the following themes: detailing the deeds of a particular deity, praising the deity, addressing the god in a tone of complaint or humble supplication (vinaya), reminding the deity of the speaker's difficulties from internal or external sources, or warning the listeners to examine and reform their lives. Singing and listening to such hymns was, and remains, a major form of religious activity in the bhakti (devotional) movement. During these sessions, devotees (bhakta) "share" their songs and experiences with one another. Although one can find bhajans dedicated to all the gods in the pantheon, from a historical perspective this singing tradition has been strongest among the devotees of Vishnu.

Vaishnava devotional literature is full of tales of Vishnu coming in disguise to take part in bhajan sessions, since the company of his devotees is said to be heaven on earth.

Bhakta
("sharer") In Hinduism, this word denotes a devotee of any particular deity. The word's literal meaning, "sharer," has a twofold sense. On one hand, the devotee shares in the deity's grace by virtue of his or her piety. On the other hand, since most Hindu devotionalism involves a community of worshipers, the devotee also gets to share in the company and community of like-minded people.

Bhaktamal
(“Garland of Devotees”) Text written by Nabhadas (ca. 1600) in which he gives short (six-line) biographical accounts of over two hundred bhakti (devotional) figures. Although Nabhadas himself was a Ramanandi, and thus a devotee (bhakta) of the god Rama, his work not only includes devotees of all sectarian persuasions but is generally considered unbiased. The text is notably free of astonishing and miraculous events. Instead, the main emphasis is on the devotee’s personal qualities, which serve as a model for others. In many cases the Bhaktamal gives the earliest reliable account of these figures, which makes it an extremely important source for northern Indian literary and religious history. It is all the more interesting that the text cannot be definitively dated, although internal evidence suggests that it was completed early in the seventeenth century.

Bhaktavijaya
(“Triumph of [God’s] Devotees”) Text written by Mahipati, an eighteenth-century writer and hagiographer of the devotional (bhakti) poet-saints. The stories in the Bhaktavijaya focus mainly on the saints connected with the Varkari Panth, a religious group centered around the worship of the god Vithoba at his temple at Pandharpur. This focus is understandable since Mahipati himself was a Varkari. In keeping with the trend toward unification often promoted by the devotional movement, he also included tales of other great devotees (bhakta), most notably Kabir, Namdev, Jnaneshvar, and Narasi Mehta. The stories in the Bhaktavijaya present each of these saints as a paradigm of devotion and stress the power of piety to overcome all obstacles. This theme also marks Mahipati’s other major work, the Bhaktitilamrta. The Bhaktavijaya has been translated by Justin E. Abbott and Narhar R. Godbole as Stories of Indian Saints, 1988.

Bhakti
(“sharing”) The most common word denoting devotion to God. This is one of the three traditional paths to gain final liberation of the soul (moksha), and it has been the most widespread type of religious practice for well over a thousand years. The word’s literal meaning conveys the sense of relationship. On one hand, it refers to an intense and passionate love between devotee (bhakta) and deity, and on the other, it refers to separate communities of people bound together by their common love of God. Although references to bhakti can be found in such early texts as the Shvetashvatara Upanishad and the Bhagavad Gita, the bhakti propounded here is radically different from later usages. In both these texts, bhakti is presented as a form of yoga in which one contemplates God as part of a controlled and disciplined practice. This is a far cry from the abandonment and passionate involvement in later times.

The beginnings of this latter sort of bhakti arose in the Tamil country of deep southern India between the sixth and ninth centuries B.C.E. It had an intensity that was radically different from earlier notions, a devotional "heat" as opposed to the "coolness" of yoga. Tamil bhakti expressed, and continues to express, its devotion through songs sung in vernacular languages, conveying an intimate relationship with a personal god.

These characteristics basically held throughout history. The use of vernacular speech was especially significant, for this was the language of ordinary life and marked the egalitarianism that was one of the hallmarks of bhakti devotion. Bhakti devotees were men and women from all strata of society, from the highest to the lowest; here was an opportunity for religious life based solely on the depth and sincerity of one's devotion rather than on one's birth. Despite this religious egalitarianism, devotees rarely tried to restructure their hierarchical societies. The idea was that religious equality was supposed to transcend rather than reform human society.

Aside from egalitarianism and personal experience, bhakti worship also stressed community, based on the interconnections between devotees. Though each devotee was an individual (and indeed, bhakti poets had real personalities, as the many hagiographies bear witness), they also fell into "families," all of which were connected with each other. Many of the bhakti saints fell into recognizable groups: Some were centered around a particular sacred place, such as the temple at Pandharpur in the state of Maharashtra; some were connected as teachers and students, such as Nammalvar and his disciple Nathamuni; and some had long-term associations, as with the Lingayat community. In all cases these devotees were keenly aware of those who had preceded them and their connections with one another. Such communities were both formed and reinforced through satsang, the "company of good people" whose influence over time was believed to have the power to transform. This was a type of "sharing" that bound devotees to each other and to their teacher, and through these two vehicles carried them to God.

These are general characteristics, and bhakti's regional manifestations often take on a distinct flavor marked by, if nothing else, the differing languages. The Padma Purana speaks of bhakti (a feminine noun) as a maiden who was born in southern India, attained maturity in the state of Maharashtra, and was rejuvenated in northern India. Although this is a metaphor, it accurately charts the historical diffusion of bhakti devotion, as well as its changes as it moved north. All forms of bhakti are shaped by specific times, places, and circumstances.

Bhaktiilamrta

("Nectar of the Play of Devotion") Text written by Mahipati, an eighteenth-century writer and hagiographer of the devotional (bhakti) poet-saints. Mahipati belonged to the Varkari Panth, a religious group centered around the worship of the god Vithoba at his temple at Pandharpur. The Bhaktiilamrta gives extended accounts of Varkari saints, such as Eknath, Tukaram, Ramdas, and Bhanudas. The text presents each of these saints as a paradigm of devotion and stresses the power of worship to overcome all obstacles. This theme also marks his other major work, the Bhaktavijaya. Parts of the Bhaktiilamrta have been translated by Justin E. Abbott as The Life of Eknath, 1981; and The Life of Tukaram, 1980.
Bhaktimarga
("path of devotion") Along with the path of action (karmamarga) and the path of wisdom (jnanamarga), this is one of Hinduism’s three generally accepted ways to gain final liberation of the soul (moksha). The bhaktimarga seeks release of the soul through bhakti, or passionate devotion to God.

Bhaktirasabodhini
("Awakening the Delight in Devotion") Name of a commentary on the Bhaktamal of Nabhadas; this commentary was written by Priyadas in 1712. In the Bhaktamal, Nabhadas had given brief six-line biographies of over two hundred contemporary bhakti (devotional) figures. These biographies are notably free of astonishing and miraculous events and usually stress the devotee’s personal qualities, to serve as a model for others. In the Bhaktirasabodhini, Priyadas gave greatly expanded accounts for each devotee mentioned by Nabhadas, often narrating amazing stories to which Nabhadas made no reference. In his biography of the poet-saint Ravidas, Nabhadas drew from the texts written by the biographer Anantadas, but in other cases his sources are not clear. The accounts in the Bhaktirasabodhini are suspect as genuine biographies of these saints, given Priyadas’s penchant for miraculous events and his chronological distance from his subjects. Still, the text is extremely valuable as a mirror of his time, and careful analysis can reveal much about contemporary religious tensions and issues.

Bhamati Advaita
A later branch of the Advaita Vedanta philosophical school. The Advaita school upholds a position known as monism, which is the belief that a single Ultimate Reality lies behind all things and that everything is merely a differing form of that reality. Advaita proponents believe that reality is nondual (advaita), that is, that all things are nothing but the formless, unqualified Brahman despite the appearance of diversity. For the Advaitins, this assumption of diversity is a fundamental misunderstanding of the ultimate nature of things, or avidya. Although often translated as “ignorance,” avidya is better understood as a lack of genuine understanding, which ultimately causes human beings to be trapped in karmic bondage, incarnation (samsara), and suffering.

Bhamati Advaita is based on the ideas of Mandana Mishra, although the school takes its name from a commentary written by Mandana’s disciple Vachaspati Mishra. Mandana was a contemporary of the philosopher Shankaracharya, Advaita Vedanta’s greatest exponent, and took definitive stands on several philosophical points on which Shankaracharya had remained silent. One such point was the location of avidya, which Mandana claimed must be each individual Self because it was absurd to conceive of Brahman as subject to ignorance. For Mandana there were clearly multiple, separate selves, since one person’s liberation did not bring liberation for all.

Mandana’s comments presupposed the existence of a common, if illusory, world, which his followers explained as the activity of one primal ignorance; however, they also had to explain how a single primal ignorance could simultaneously affect multiple souls. This was done using philosophical models known as limitationism and reflectionism, although it is the former that has been more commonly associated with the Bhamati school. Limitationism assumes that there are some things (i.e., the color red) that we do not conceive of as divided, even when different red colors appear in different places. In the same way, the Bhamati school argued, avidya can be found in multiple souls at the same time but is complete and undivided in each of them. Reflectionism is based on the idea of a mirror’s image, which is different from the original but made from it. Therefore the avidya found in any particular soul is a “reflection” of the original avidya. For further information see Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India’s Philosophies, 1972.

(“storehouse”) A banquet given for large numbers of people—either by special invitation, restricted to certain classes of people (such as ascetics), or open to the general public. Sponsoring such a banquet is believed to generate considerable religious merit, but this is also a conspicuous opportunity for both the donor and attendees to enhance their status. Issues of status are also marked among the attendees. The most honored guests confer status on the donor simply by deigning to come, and accordingly such guests will be treated differently from the common lot. The rest of the guests generally get no such special treatment. They give status to the host by eating the food he (or she) has had prepared, but they get little in return other than the meal itself, which is usually of poor quality since the food is prepared in large quantities.

Based on these considerations, ascetics with sufficient resources of their own will usually avoid such banquets because of both the quality of the food and the concerns over status. To eat at a bhandara is not only to confer prestige on the donor, but to lower one’s own status by appearing as though one needs to do this to survive. The main exception is when one has been invited as an honored guest, but even in these cases it is not unusual for such guests to eat little or nothing, thereby giving status by their presence but losing none through consumption.

Bhandarkar, R. G.

(1837–1925) Sanskrit scholar and intellectual who was the first Indian to serve as professor of Sanskrit at Deccan College, in Poona. Bhandarkar was one of the first Indian academics to combine the traditional mastery of Sanskrit texts with critical and objective research, a project that until then had been confined to European scholars. Bhandarkar is emblematic of Indian intellectuals in the late nineteenth century, who began by learning from the Europeans but were then able to work with the best of them. Bhandarkar authored two Sanskrit workbooks and numerous scholarly texts, but his most significant legacy is the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute; it was founded in 1917 by his students, friends, and admirers and is still a highly respected research institution.

Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute

(BORI) Research institute founded in 1917 and named after the great scholar R. G. Bhandarkar (1837–1925). The Institute is devoted to the study and preservation of traditional Indian culture, and it is respected in scholarly circles throughout the world. Its two most important publications have been P. V. Kane’s History of Dharmasastra and a multivolume critical edition of the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics. Aside from its publications, the Institute is also noted for its vast collection of Sanskrit manuscripts, which makes it one of the finest research establishments in all of India.

Paste or dough made from crushed marijuana (Cannabis sativa), which is often mixed with spices or other flavorings before being formed into a ball. It is taken as an intoxicant, either eaten, or mixed into a “cooling” milk-based drink called thandai. In general, eating bhang is disapproved of by respectable people, although it is fairly common in certain circles, particularly among ascetics. Despite this basic disapproval, bhang is widely consumed as part of the festival celebrations for Shivaratri and Holi, even by people who avoid it the rest of the year. The former festival is dedicated to Shiva, who is famous for his love of the drug, whereas Holi is associated with overturning social boundaries, giving greater license to do things normally proscribed. Aside from being consumed during certain celebrations, it can also be taken in special places, particularly when on a pilgrimage. Several of the most famous Hindu sacred sites (tirthas)—among them Benares, Puri, and Haridwar—have government-run bhang stands where pilgrims can fulfill their needs.

Bhanita
In poetry, particularly the vernacular form of the bhakti poets, a signature line in which the author is identified by name. This line has two major functions: to identify the poet and to provide a summation of the poem’s message. The word bhanita comes from a verb meaning “to speak,” and by adding a signature line the poet is stamping his or her authorship on the poem. Of course, there is nothing to prevent others from doing this as well. In a performance context, the poet’s name comes at the beginning of the final line and alerts the audience to pay special attention to that line, which often sums up the entire poem’s message.

Bharadvaja
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics, Bharadvaja is an important ascetic and sage. His ashram, or abode, is at Chitrakut; this is now a town in the southeastern area of the state of Uttar Pradesh, but the epic describes the place as a forest hermitage. When Rama, his wife Sita, and his brother Lakshmana are beginning their fourteen years of exile, they come to Bharadvaja to seek his blessings (ashirvad). In a broader mythological context, Bharadvaja is one of the seven sages whose names mark exogamous gotra (“lineages”); the others are Kashyapa, Bhrigu, Vasishtha, Gautama, Atri, and Vishvamitra. All brahmins are believed to be descended from these seven sages, with each family taking the name of its progenitor as its gotra name. In modern times, these gotra divisions are still important, since marriage within the lineage is forbidden. After her marriage the bride adopts her husband’s gotra as part of her new identity. See also marriage prohibitions.

Bharata
In Hindu mythology, the son of King Dushyanta and the maiden Shakuntala; Bharata is considered a partial incarnation of the god Vishnu. Dushyanta and Shakuntala are married in secret in a gandharva marriage executed by their mutual consent. Dushyanta must return to his capital and leaves Shakuntala at her home. While he is gone, she is cursed by the sage Durvasas that her lover will forget her. In time, Bharata is born and Shakuntala goes off to search for her beloved. She has to endure many trials before the curse is broken. Since Shakuntala and Dushyanta have been married in secret, it takes some time before Bharata is accepted as Dushyanta’s legitimate son, and thus heir to the throne. When Bharata finally ascends the throne, he reigns for a long time. After his reign the land of India becomes traditionally known as Bharata.
Bharata

In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics, Bharata is the son of King Dasharatha by his wife Kaikeyi and the righteous younger brother of the god Rama, the epic’s protagonist. Bharata’s loyalty to his family has to endure several tests. The strictest one comes early in the epic when, through Kaikeyi’s treachery, Rama is sent into exile in the forest for fourteen years, and Bharata is named king in his place. Despite the obvious temptations of wealth and power, Bharata refuses to assume the throne in place of his brother, curses his mother for her deceit, and sets off to live in exile with Rama. Rama commands Bharata to return to Ayodhya and rule during his exile, on the premise that the people will suffer without a king. Bharata reluctantly agrees to act as a temporary king, but with two symbolic adjustments: He moves the court from the capital city of Ayodhya to the village of Nandigrama as a symbol of Rama’s exile, and throughout his rule sits at the foot of the royal throne; a pair of Rama’s sandals are placed upon the throne as a symbol of the rightful king.

Many characters in the Ramayana are paradigms for Indian cultural values, and Bharata stands for the ideal younger brother. In the traditional joint household the brothers are the heart of the family, since it is they who remain at home their entire lives, whereas their sisters live with their husbands’ families after they are married. The eldest brother in every generation eventually becomes the head of the joint family after the older members have passed away. He carries primary authority and responsibility for the family as a whole but cannot succeed without the cooperation of his younger brothers, who must acknowledge and support his authority. By refusing to usurp his elder brother’s rightful leadership, Bharata is a paradigm for the ideal younger brother, who puts aside his own desires and opportunities to uphold and promote the welfare of the family as a whole.

Bharatanatyam

One of the classical dance forms of India; some of the others are Kathak, Orissi, Kuchipudi, Kathakali, Chau, and Manipuri. Bharatanatyam has its home in the temple towns of the state of Tamil Nadu, particularly Tanjore city’s Brhadeshvar temple. This temple is dedicated to the god Shiva, whose most famous form is Nataraja, the “Lord of the Dance.” According to tradition the name bharata comes not from the sage Bharata, the reputed author of the text on dance called the Natyashastra, but from an acronym of the dance’s three most important elements: “bha” from bhava (“feeling”), “ra” from raga (“melodic mood”), and “ta” from tala (“rhythm”). The second word in the name, natyam, simply means “dance.”

Bharatanatyam’s historical roots are uncertain. The existence of dance can be dated to the early centuries C.E. since it is mentioned in the two Tamil epic poems, Shilappadigaram and Manimegalai. Carvings at the Shiva temple in Kanchipuram suggest that this dance was well developed in the Pallava dynasty (6th–9th c. C.E.), but hard evidence for structured temple dance, including the hereditary dancers known as devadasis, did not appear until the Chola dynasty (9th–14th c. C.E.). Although royal patronage was an important factor in its survival, Bharatanatyam was performed primarily in the temples until the twentieth century, when the dance began to be performed on stage.

As an artistic form, the dance’s present technique was codified in the early nineteenth century by four brothers in the service of Raja Serfoji II of Tanjore. Stylistically, Bharatanatyam presents a sharply geometric line. The most characteristic posture has a stiff upper torso, with the knees flexed outward in line with the rest of the body, and the feet spread gently outward. This posture is a recurring motif in any performance. As in all the Indian dances, Bharatanatyam has a well-developed vocabulary of gesture and expression, which makes it possible for the dancer to tell complex stories. Like most other Indian dance forms, Bharatanatyam has been influenced by the shift from temple to stage as its primary theater. Although its roots lie in worship and devotion, the move to the stage has inevitably disrupted some of these religious connections. For further information see Mohan Khokar, Traditions of Indian Classical Dance, 1984.

Bharati Dashanami

One of the ten divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva. The Dashanamis were supposedly established by the ninth-century philosopher Shankaracharya in an effort to create a corps of learned men who could help to revitalize Hindu life. Each of the divisions is designated by a different name—in this case, bharati ("Indian"). Upon initiation, new members are given this name as a surname to their new ascetic names, thus allowing for immediate group identification. Aside from their individual identity, these ten divisions are divided into four larger organizational groups. Each group has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by Shankaracharya, as well as other particular religious associations. The Bharati Dashanamis belong to the Bhuriwara group, which is affiliated with the Shringeri Math in the southern Indian town of Shringeri. The Bharati division is elite because it is one of the few that will initiate only brahmins. Other such divisions are the Saraswati Dashanamis, Tirtha Dashanamis, and Ashrama Dashanamis. The Bharatis are unusual, however, since only part of the division is restricted to brahmins.

Bharatiya Janata Party

(BJP) Modern Indian political party with a strong Hindu nationalist (Hindutva) orientation. The party was formed as the political wing of the Hindu nationalist organization known as Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), and many of the BJP’s leaders have been RSS members for decades. The BJP was formed in 1980 after the dissolution of its predecessor organization, the Jana Sangh. The latter was an RSS affiliate as well, several of the whose leaders, notably Lal Krishna Advani and Atal Behari Vajpayee, have also led the BJP. At first the BJP took a moderate political stance and fared quite poorly, winning only two seats in the 1984 elections. In the later 1980s it took a far more militant tone, stressing as its focal issue the campaign to build the Ram Janam Bhumi temple in Ayodhya. As the Indian electorate grew more religiously polarized, the BJP climbed to eighty-six seats in 1989 and 120 seats in 1991. In the 1996 elections it won 160 seats, becoming the largest single party in India’s 535-seat Parliament.
The president of India invited the BJP to form a government, but this failed when it was unable to gain enough support from other parties to muster a majority of votes in Parliament.

The BJP’s traditional constituency has been Brahmins and members of the trading communities, both of whom tend to be religiously conservative and supportive of the Hindutva message. In the mid-1990s the BJP muted its Hindu nationalist rhetoric in an attempt to reach beyond these traditional constituencies and to gain more widespread support by moving closer to the political center. Despite these changes, many of the established secular parties still view the BJP with suspicion and have refused to ally themselves with the organization. The BJP’s inability to mobilize such support among the larger body politic was a major factor behind the collapse of its short-lived government in 1996. The country was then run by a coalition of thirteen secular political parties, whose single binding commitment is their opposition to the BJP. However, since 1998 the BJP has succeeded in building coalitions to form a government. For further information see Walter K. Andersen and Shridhar D. Damle, The Brotherhood in Saffron, 1987; and Christophe Jaffrelot, The Hindu Nationalist Movement in India, 1996.

Bharat Mata

(“Mother India”) Modern Hindu “deity” whose primary image is a map of the subcontinent, often prominently marked with the network of India’s sacred sites (tirthas). The presupposition behind most of these particular sacred sites is that the land itself is holy, but the idea of Bharat Mata takes this idea to a more abstract level, sanctifying the whole subcontinent. Although this map and its image of Mother India are usually not actual objects of worship, they carry important symbolic messages. In an abstract way, the holiness of Mother India unites all Hindus regardless of their sectarian affiliation. Moreover, it suggests that India is one unified culture despite its striking regional diversity. These ideas can be found in specific areas, particularly in the networks of tirthas knitting the country together, yet in contemporary times this image’s underlying purpose is often political rather than religious. At times it simply represents national pride, but at other times it has a more sinister hidden agenda. This identification of Indian culture with the motherland can be used as a way to marginalize religious minorities—primarily Muslims and Christians, whose holy places lie in other countries—as “foreigners,” and people whose patriotism and connection to the Indian nation are potentially suspect.

Bharatmilap

(“Meeting Bharata”) A particular scene in the dramas known as the Ram Lila, which are reenactments of the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics. This scene records the meeting between the god Rama and his brother Bharata, which takes place after Rama has been in exile for fourteen years, during which Bharata has faithfully served as ruler in his brother’s place. According to connoisseurs of the Ram Lila, this brief scene is filled with some of the most rapturous emotion in the play. Certainly there is the exaltation that the time of separation has ended, but the scene’s popularity also comes from the way it reflects certain basic cultural values. The brothers are considered the heart of the traditional Indian joint family since they remain at home their entire lives, whereas their sisters become part of their marital families. The eldest brother in every generation eventually becomes the head of the joint household, but he cannot succeed without the support and cooperation of his younger brothers. Rama and Bharata are thus models for the brothers in a traditional joint family: Rama for treating his younger brother with love and care, and Bharata for obediently carrying out his older brother’s wishes for the good of the family as a whole.

Bharavi
(6th c. C.E.) Sanskrit dramatist who is best known as the author of the drama Kiratarjuniya. This play describes the meeting between the god Shiva, disguised as the tribal hunter Kirata, and the warrior-hero Arjuna. Arjuna is one of the five Pandava brothers, who are the heroes of the epic Mahabharata. In Hindu mythology, Arjuna is the world’s greatest warrior, but he is also afflicted with pride. The play describes how the arrogant Arjuna becomes humbled at the hands of this tribal hunter, who in contemporary terms would be of very low social status. In the end, however, Shiva reveals his true form to Arjuna and blesses him for his valor.

Bhartrhari
(5th c. C.E.) Sanskrit poet-philosopher who authored the Shatakatrayam (“Three Hundred”), a three-part collection of poems on political life, love, and renunciation. According to legend, Bhartrhari was born the son of the brahmin Vidyasagara and his shudra wife, Mandakini. Vidyasagara was the adviser to the king of Kalinga and was given the kingdom upon the ruler’s death; after Vidyasagara’s death Bhartrhari’s brothers designated him as king. Bhartrhari was very happy until he realized that his wife was being unfaithful to him. When her secret was discovered she tried to poison him. Completely disillusioned, Bhartrhari renounced the world to live as an ascetic, during which time he reputedly composed his poetry.

Although this is a good story, since many of these poems stress the degradation inherent in courtly life, Bhartrhari was most likely a courtier. His poetry treats all of the conventional purposes of life. The first two sections are about power (artha), sensual desire (kama), and righteous action (dharma), whereas the final section is concerned with the ultimate end, or liberation of the soul (moksha). For further information see Barbara Stoller Miller (trans.), The Hermit and the Love-Thief, 1978.

Bhatprapancha
(7th c. C.E.) In Indian philosophy, the first exponent of the Bhedabhada (“identity-in-difference”) philosophical school. The period during which Bhatprapancha flourished is uncertain, but he precedes the eighth-century Bhedabhada commentator Bhaskara. The Bhedabhada position identified three levels of being: the Ultimate Reality known as Brahman, the “witness” consciousness (sakshin) in the human being, and the world. This school paradoxically asserted that these three levels were identical, yet different. Thus the world is identical to Brahman but subject to change and decay, unlike Brahman. In the same way, while each human soul is identical to Brahman, it is also subject to bondage and reincarnation (samsara), unlike Brahman. The bondage of the soul was caused by the primal ignorance known as avidya, but it could be erased by a combination of action and awareness (jnanakar-masamucchaya). The basic philosophical problem for Bhartrprapancha and his followers came from their belief that Brahman was actually transformed into both the world and the Self, a philosophical outlook known as parinamavada. Since they believed that Brahman underwent real changes, it was subject to bondage and ignorance. This position was untenable and unacceptable from a religious perspective because Brahman was deemed to be perfect and unchanging. This difficulty may account for the school’s relatively short life.

Bharud
The name for a specific genre of bhakti (devotional) poetry, found particularly among the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba at his temple at Pandharpur, in the modern state of Maharashtra. The bharud is essentially a dramatic poem in which the speaker takes on one or more roles to convey the message of devotion to God. It was especially favored by the poet-saint Eknath, who used the genre to adopt the personae of women, untouchables, Muslims, and other marginal people. In modern times these bharuds have become the basis for popular dramas, usually performed during the biannual Varkari pilgrimage to Pandharpur. While singing the songs of the earlier saints during a pilgrimage is an important religious act, these modern renditions are mainly for entertainment. The actors playing the roles in these bharuds frequently add in their own words and actions, which are often quite bawdy.

Bhashya
(“commentary”) Any commentary, whether on a text or an oral teaching.

Bhaskara
In Indian philosophy, an eighth-century proponent of the Bhedabhada (“identity-in-difference”) school. The Bhedabhada position identified three levels of being: the Ultimate Reality known as Brahman, the “witness” consciousness (sakshin) in the human being, and the world. They paradoxically asserted that these three levels were identical, yet different. Thus the world is identical to Brahman but subject to change and decay, unlike Brahman. In the same way, while each human soul is identical to Brahman, it is also subject to bondage and reincarnation (samsara), unlike Brahman. The bondage of the soul was caused by the primal ignorance known as avidya, but it could be erased by a combination of action and awareness (jnanakar-masamucchaya). The basic philosophical problem for the Bhedabhada school was that because they believed that Brahman was actually transformed into the world and the Self (parinamavada), it followed that Brahman was subject to bondage and ignorance. This idea was difficult to defend, since the transcendence of Brahman was well established by

The need for commentary was presupposed in most texts on Hindu philosophy as well as in the secret ritual tradition known as tantra. Philosophical works were often nothing more than collections of brief aphorisms, which were intentionally kept short to facilitate memorization but which clearly needed further explanation. In the case of tantra, commentary was essential because the texts were written using coded language to conceal their contents from the uninitiated. This may have been in the form known as sandhabhasha, which often uses erotic language to indicate religious practice, or it may simply have been a technical language in which everyday words had contextual meanings.
sacred texts such as the Upanishads, and this problem may account for the school’s relatively short life.

Bhasmasur

In Hindu mythology, a demon with great power but limited intelligence. According to tradition, the god Shiva has given Bhasmasur the power to change anyone to ash (bhasma) simply by placing his hand on that person’s head. Bhasmasur falls in love with Shiva’s wife Parvati and attempts to place his hand on Shiva’s head, and the god has to flee. Bhasmasur is destroyed when the god Vishnu tricks him into putting his hand on top of his own head, which instantly transforms him into ash. In metaphorical usage, the term Bhasmasur denotes any problem that has grown out of hand through lack of foresight.

Bhava

(“being”) Epithet of the god Shiva. See Shiva.

Bhavabhuti

(early 8th c. C.E.) Sanskrit dramatist and playwright noted for his ability to express and transmit emotions through language. His best-known play, the romance Malatimadhava, is famous not only in its own right, but because the primary villain is an evil ascetic believed to be a member of the defunct ascetic group known as Kapalikas. The Kapalikas were devotees (bhakta) of Shiva, and their reputed practices emulated Shiva in his wrathful form as Bhairava. They wore their hair long and matted, smeared their bodies with ash (preferably from the cremation ground), and carried a club and a skull bowl (kapala). According to some sources, they also indulged in forbidden behavior—drinking wine, eating meat, using cannabis and other drugs, performing human sacrifice, and orgiastic sexuality—which caused them to be avoided and feared. Bhavabhuti’s description of this evil ascetic and his disciples is one of the earliest datable references to the Shaiva form of asceticism, and therefore important from a historical perspective.

Bhavani

(feminine form of Bhava) Epithet of the god Shiva’s wife, Parvati. See Parvati.

Bhavas

(“states”) In Indian aesthetics the bhavas are a set of nine states considered the most basic unadulterated emotions: sexual excitement, laughter, grief, anger, energy, fear, loathing, wonder, and peace. To these nine bhavas correspond the nine rasas (“tastes”), or moods transmitted by various types of artistic expression: the erotic, comic, compassionate, cruel, heroic, terrifying, loathsome, marvelous, and peaceful. Although these bhavas and rasas clearly correspond to one another, there is an important difference between them. A person’s emotive states come and go in response to circumstances that are often beyond one’s control. Because such naturally occurring emotions usually cannot be sustained, they are generally not objects of aesthetic satisfaction. This is not true in the case of rasa, since mood can be artificially generated by an artistic endeavor. Any particular rasa can thus be sustained and satisfying. The single most dominant aim in all the Indian arts, therefore, is to create such a mood or moods for the audience.

Bhave, Vinobha

(1895–1982) Social and religious reformer whose basic principles reflected his long association with Mohandas K. Gandhi, to whom Bhave came as a disciple in 1916. Bhave was one of Gandhi’s close associates in the struggle for independence and was particularly absorbed with Gandhi’s idea of village self-sufficiency. In the years after independence, he traveled around India on foot to meet the people. It was on one such tour that he started the Bhoodan ("land gift") movement, the purpose of which was to obtain donations of land for the poor. Much of Bhave’s life after independence was devoted to village development, in particular through a movement called Sarvodaya ("welfare of all"), which sought to solve problems through collective involvement and service to one another.

Bhedabhada

(“identity-in-difference”) Philosophical school whose best-known figures were Bhartrprapancha and Bhaskara. The Bhedabhada position identified three levels of being: the Ultimate Reality known as Brahman, the “witness” consciousness (sakshin) in the human being, and the world. The school paradoxically asserted that these three levels are identical, yet different. Thus the world is identical to Brahman but is subject to change and decay, unlike Brahman. In the same way, while each human soul is identical to Brahman, it is also subject to bondage and reincarnation (samsara), unlike Brahman. The bondage of the soul was caused by the primal ignorance known as avidya, but it could be erased by a combination of action and awareness (jnanakar-masamucchaya). The basic philosophical problem for Bhartrprapancha and his followers was that because they believed that Brahman was actually transformed into the world and the Self (parinamavada), it followed that Brahman was subject to bondage and ignorance. Thus, if one must destroy avidya to gain liberation, one must also destroy part of Brahman. These were difficult ideas to defend since the transcendence of Brahman was well established by sacred texts such as the Upanishads, and this problem may account for the school’s relatively short life.

Bhil

The name of a tribal (adivasi) group found in greatest numbers in the Vindhya Mountains, in the eastern part of the state of Madhya Pradesh. They are historically associated with the forest, particularly with hunting and gathering honey. As with many tribal groups, their homeland is often in marginal lands, and most of them are quite poor.

Bhima

The third of the five Pandava brothers who are the heroes in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics. Bhima is born when his mother, Kunti, uses a powerful mantra (sacred sound) to have a son by the wind-god, Vayu. Of all the Pandavas, Bhima is the largest and strongest, and his favorite weapon is the club, which requires great physical strength. This strength is one of the sources of enmity between the Pandavas and the Kauravas (cousins of the Pandavas), since during their adolescent training, Bhima can always draw on his superior power to outdo his cousins. His earthy and untamed nature is evident through his consumption of strange foods as well as from his liaison with the rakshasi (female demon) Hidambi, by whom he has a son, Ghatotkacha. Bhima’s notable deeds tend to be feats of strength. In many cases this involves killing demons, such as Bakasur or Hidamba in hand-to-hand combat; but Bhima is also a major figure in the Mahabharata war, in which he uses his club to kill great masses of the Kaurava army.

Besides his strength and unusual appetites, which make him a figure subject to caricature, Bhima is also absolutely devoted to his brothers and to their common wife, Draupadi. Whenever her honor is at stake, Bhima is the person to whom she turns. When Draupadi is molested by Kichaka during the year that the Pandavas spend incognito at the court of King Virata, Bhima disguises himself as Draupadi, goes to meet Kichaka, and kills him. It is also Bhima who vows to kill the two Kaurava brothers, Duhshasana and Duryodhana, because of their behavior toward Draupadi after Bhima’s brother Yudhishthira loses an important game of dice. Duhshasana drags Draupadi into the hall by her hair, her garments stained with menstrual blood, and Duryodhana bares his thigh (a euphemism for the genitals) toward Draupadi and directs her to sit on his lap. Bhima vows that to avenge these insults he will rip open Duhshasana’s chest so that Draupadi can wash her hair in his blood, and smash Duryodhana’s thigh with his club. Although it takes thirteen years before he carries out these promises, in the end he avenges Draupadi’s honor. After the Mahabharata war, Bhima aids his brother Yudhishthira in reigning as king. After Yudhishthira abdicates the throne, Bhima travels with him and their other brothers on a great journey to the Himalayas, where Bhima eventually dies of exposure.

Bhima River
A central Indian tributary of the Krishna River, rising in the state of Maharashtra, on the inland side of the western ghats and meeting with the Krishna in the state of Karnataka. At the Bhima’s headwaters can be found Bhimashankar, which is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a group of sacred sites (tirthas) deemed especially holy to the god Shiva. Aside from Bhimashankar, another important religious site on the Bhima is the temple of Vithoba at Pandharpur.

Bhimashankar (“Bhima’s Shiva”) One of the twelve jyotirlingas, a group of sacred sites (tirthas) deemed especially holy to the god Shiva. Bhimashankar is the name of both the place and the presiding deity. It is located in Maharashtra’s Pune district at the source of the Bhima River, hence its name. Unlike many of the other jyotirlingas, Bhimashankar is visited little during the year since it is far from urban centers and relatively inaccessible. The major pilgrim traffic comes on the festival of Shivaratri, which usually falls within February and March.

Bhishma
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Bhishma is the son of King Shantanu and an uncle and counselor to both warring factions, the Pandavas and the Kauravas. His name as a child is Devavrata; he receives the name Bhishma (“terrible”) as an acknowledgment of his extremely difficult vow. King Shantanu has fallen in love with the maiden Satyavati, who agrees to marry him on the condition that her sons will rule instead of Devavrata, who has already been anointed the heir apparent. Bhishma not only agrees to give up the throne but takes the solemn vow that he will never marry, so that there will be no claimants from his lineage to compete for the throne. When Bhishma takes his dreadful vow, he is also given the option of choosing the time of his death.

Bhishma faithfully keeps this vow, and his adherence to it eventually costs him his life. It is Bhishma who abducts Amba, Ambika, and Ambalika, the daughters of the king of Kashi, to be married to his stepbrother Vichitravirya. Ambika and Ambalika happily marry Vichitravirya, but when Amba confides that she has already given her heart to King Salva, Bhishma releases her to go to him. Salva rejects Amba on the grounds that her virginity is suspect, since she has been abducted by another man. Amba returns to Bhishma and demands that he marry her since he is responsible for her plight, and when Bhishma refuses to break his vow, Amba is determined to get revenge. She is reborn as the man-woman Shikhandi, behind whom the Pandava prince Arjuna hides to shoot the arrows that eventually kill Bhishma.

Bhishma is a great man who is respected by all. His skill with arms makes him one of the finest warriors of his time, but he is most famous as a wise and generous counselor to both the Pandavas and the Kauravas. Although he ultimately sides with the Kaurava prince Duryodhana in the war between the two groups, before its outbreak Bhishma repeatedly advises Duryodhana to make peace with the Pandavas and share the kingdom with them. He fights valiantly in the Mahabharata war and destroys a large part of the Pandava armies, but finally he is hit by so many of Arjuna’s arrows that he lays upon them like a bed. Although Bhishma is mortally wounded by Arjuna, he delays his death until the sun has resumed its northward course (uttarayana). On this day parents give offerings of food and water in Bhishma’s name in the hope that their sons may have his good qualities.

Bhogamandapa
(“food pavilion”) The outermost entrance hall in the style of architecture found in the largest temples in Orissa. At the temple of Jagannath in Puri, the term bhogamandapa specifically refers to the area where the food offered to Jagannath as prasad (“favor”) is cooked. Jagannath’s temple is unusual in that the normal restrictions regarding commensality are suspended. Everyone eats together rather than being segregated by caste, signifying Jagannath’s ultimate lordship over all beings. The prominence of this particular rite makes the bhogamandapa all the more important.

Bhogawara
One of the four major organizational groups of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva; the other three groups are Kitawara, Bhuriwara, and Anandawara. Each of these divisions has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by the philosopher Shankaracharya. Each group also has certain religious associations: with one of the four Vedas, with a particular quarter of the Indian subcontinent, with one of the “great utterances” (mahavakyas) expressing ultimate truth, with a specific ascetic quality, and with several of the ten Dashanami divisions. The Bhogawara group is affiliated with the Govardhan Math in the city of Puri on the Bay of Bengal, and it is therefore connected with the eastern quarter of India. Their Veda is the Rg Veda, their mahavakya is Prajnanam Brahman (“Knowledge is Brahman”), and their ascetic quality is to remain indifferent to worldly pleasures. The particular divisions associated with this group are the Aranya Dashanamis and Vana Dashanamis.

Bhoja
(r. 918–955 C.E.) Medieval Hindu king in the Malwa region of the modern state of Uttar Pradesh. Bhoja was famous both as a scholar and as a dam builder who created lakes for irrigation.

Bholanath
(“simple lord”) Common epithet of the god Shiva. In ordinary usage the word bhola carries a negative connotation: “simple,” “guileless,” and even “foolish.” Yet in using this word to designate Shiva, his devotees (bhakta) are not intentionally insulting him but celebrating his boundless generosity to those with whom he is pleased. Shiva’s devotees can give the simplest offerings (such as leaves, fruit, and water) and in turn ask for wealth, success, and power. Shiva’s nature is considered “simple” because he willingly participates in such unequal exchanges, providing sharp contrast to the world economy, which demands equal value.

Bhramargit
(“songs to the bee”) Poetic genre in the devotional poetry of the god Krishna, which is set in the time after Krishna has gone to claim his kingdom in Mathura, never to return. The story tells how Krishna sends his companion Uddhava back to Braj with a message for the gopis, the cowherd women who are Krishna’s dear companions, and who are virtually insane with longing because of his absence. Uddhava tries to reassure the gopis by telling them not to dwell on Krishna’s physical absence. Uddhava further reminds them that since Krishna is the all-pervading divinity, he will always be with them even though he might not be visible. In the bhramargit poems, the gopis scornfully reject Uddhava’s notions, asserting that this view of Krishna is abstract, lifeless, and suitable only for those who have never known Krishna in his embodied form. The genre’s name comes from this story’s earliest appearance, in the Bhagavata Purana. Here the gopis address their complaints about Krishna’s absence to a large black bee, which in their passion and loneliness they mistake for Krishna.

Bhramari
(“circling”) Powerful form of the Goddess. Bhramari takes form to oppose the demon Aruna, who in his hubris is trying to compromise the chastity of the gods’ wives. They implore the Goddess to help them, and in her form as Bhramari, she kills the demon and removes the threat. Bhramari is worshiped on the eighth night of Navaratri, a nine-day festival in which one goddess is appeased every night.

Bhrigu
In Hindu mythology, one of the sons of Brahma and one of the seven sages whose names mark exogamous clan “lineages” (gotra); the others are Kashyapa, Bharadvaja, Vasishtha, Gautama, Atri, and Vishvamitra. All brahmins are believed to be descended from these seven sages, with each family taking the name of its progenitor as its gotra name. In modern times these divisions are still important since... marriage within the gotra is forbidden. After her marriage the bride adopts her husband's gotra as part of her new identity.

Bhrigu is most famous for testing the three major Hindu gods, which results in Vishnu being declared the greatest of the three. Bhrigu first goes to Brahma's house where the god does not pay Bhrigu appropriate respect, and in revenge Bhrigu curses Brahma to receive no worship. Next he goes to see Shiva, who refuses to meet with him because he is making love to his wife Parvati at the time. In turn, Bhrigu curses Shiva to be worshiped as the linga, the pillar-shaped symbol that has undeniable phallic associations. Lastly he visits Vishnu and, finding him asleep, gives him a sound kick in the chest. Vishnu wakes up, but shows no anger at this disrespect. Instead he massages Bhrigu's foot, gently inquires whether it has been hurt, and promises to retain its mark on his chest forever, where it appears as the shrivatsa. Vishnu's magnanimous behavior leads Bhrigu to proclaim him the best of all the gods. Not surprisingly, this version of the tale appears only in Vaishnava sectarian literature. See also marriage prohibitions.

Bhubaneshvar
Capital city of the modern Indian state of Orissa. Bhubaneshvar reportedly has over 500 temples, of which the most prominent is the Lingaraja Temple. It is dedicated to Shiva in his form as Tribhuvaneshvar (“Lord of the Triple World”), from which the city also gets its name.

Bhudevi
See earth.

Bhujangavalaya
(“snake bracelet”) In Hindu iconography, the name of a particular ornament worn by the god Shiva. The bhujangavalaya is a bracelet shaped in the form of a snake. In Hindu mythology Shiva is famous for wearing serpents, especially cobras, as ornaments around his arms and torso. This is just one of the attributes that marks him as different, powerful, and potentially dangerous. The prescriptive canons for the creation of Hindu images have followed up on this tradition, and Shiva is invariably shown wearing these bracelets.

Bhuriwara
One of the four major organizational groups of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva; the other three groups are Kitawara, Bhogawara, and Anandawara. Each of these groups has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by the philosopher Shankaracharya. Each division also has certain religious associations: with one of the four Vedas, with a particular quarter of the Indian subcontinent, with one of the “great utterances” (mahavakyas) expressing ultimate truth, with a particular ascetic quality, and with several of the ten Dashanami divisions. The Bhuriwara group is affiliated with the Shringeri Math in the southern Indian town of Shringeri and is thus connected with the southern quarter of India. Their Veda is the Yajur Veda, their mahavakya is Aham Brahmasmi (“I am Brahman”), and their ascetic quality is to renounce all wealth and to live on food growing wild in the jungles. The specific divisions associated with this group are Saraswati Dashanami, Bharati Dashanami, and Puri Dashanami.

Bhushundi
A character in the Ramcharitmanas, the version of the Ramayana written by the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?). Bhushundi is a crow who symbolizes the power of devotion to God to redeem even the lowest of creatures. One of the most pronounced differences between the original Valmiki Ramayana and the Tulsidas Ramayana is that Tulsidas puts far greater stress on devotion to Rama, of which Bhushundi is a perfect example. In Indian culture, crows are considered unclean birds since they are scavengers who will eat anything. Yet in one of the narrative levels of the Ramcharitmanas, it is the “unclean” crow Bhushundi who narrates the story to the “sacred” eagle Garuda—the vehicle of the god Vishnu. As part of his account in the Ramayana, Bhushundi relates the terrifying experience of being given an unmediated vision of Rama in all his majesty, and how he (as did the sage Markandeya) went into Rama’s mouth and perceived the entire universe inside.

Bhut

(“[someone who] was”) The spirit of a person who has recently died, which is still inappropriately connected to the world of the living. This is often a troubling or malevolent presence, either to the departed’s family or the general population. Bhuts and other malignant spirits, such as pret or churails, have generally either suffered an untimely or violent death or died with certain unfulfilled desires, particularly relating to marriage and family life. In cases where both these factors are present, the likelihood of the departed becoming a bhut is deemed much greater. Bhuts make themselves known to the living through either dreams or possession. In some cases they have specific requests and can be placated by worship and offerings. In such cases the dreams and possession are methods of communicating with the living, who can perform the necessary actions. Some bhuts resort to possession as an attempt to realize their unfulfilled desires by directly using a living person’s body. These spirits are far more malevolent, and the only way to remove them is through exorcism. For further information on the care of restless family spirits, see Ann Grodzins Gold, Fruitful Journeys, 1988; for a masterful psychological interpretation of spirits, possession, and healing, see Sudhir Kakar, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1991.
Bhuta
Epithet of the god Shiva. See Shiva.

Bhutalingas
("elemental lingas") A network of five southern Indian sacred sites (tirthas), four in the state of Tamil Nadu and one in Andhra Pradesh, all dedicated to the god Shiva. In each of these centers, the most sacred object is the linga, a pillar-shaped form representing Shiva. What makes these sites unique is that the linga is supposedly composed of one of the five primordial elements. Thus the linga in Tiruvannamalai is formed from fire; the linga in Jambukeshvar is formed from water; the one in Kanchipuram is made from earth; that in Kalahasti, the sacred site in Andhra Pradesh, is formed from air; and the linga in Chidambaram is made from space. Between them, these five sites comprise a symbolic cosmology that encompasses all created things.

Bhutam
(7th c. C.E.) With Pey and Poygai, one of the first three Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All of the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. Their stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. According to tradition, the three men were caught in a torrential storm, and one by one they took shelter in a small dry spot, with each making room for the next. As they stood together they felt a fourth presence, which was Vishnu. The Alvars were such great devotees that their combined energy was sufficient to provoke Vishnu's manifestation. Overwhelmed with ecstasy, the three burst into song, which formed the first of their compositions. For further information see Kamil Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975.

Bhutayajna
("sacrifice to creatures") One of the five great sacrifices (panchamahayajna) that is prescribed in the texts on religious duty (Dharma Shastras). These five great sacrifices are daily religious observances for a "twice-born" householder, that is, a householder born into one of the three "twice-born" groups in Indian society—brahmin, kshatriya, and vaishya—who is eligible to receive the adolescent religious initiation known as the "second birth." Each sacrifice (yajna) is directed toward a different class of beings, from the Ultimate Reality down to animals, and is satisfied by specific actions. The bhutayajna is directed toward animals and outcasts (and in some understandings, ghosts), and it is satisfied by putting out food for them to eat. In the time since the Dharma Shastras were composed, Hindu life has undergone significant changes, and this particular sacrifice is rarely performed today.

Bidhai Samaroh
("farewell celebration") In northern India, the formal departure of a new bride for her marital home. This is a momentous event for several different reasons. A marriage is the start of a family, and through her marriage a young woman gets the opportunity to become a wife and mother; these roles are still seen as a woman's highest fulfillment and happiness. Yet according to the traditional model of the Indian joint family, after marriage a woman goes to live with and becomes part of her husband's family. Thus the act of seeing off a new bride carries bittersweet feelings—happiness for her marriage and hopes for her good fortune, but also the sense that things have irreversibly changed.

Bihar
One of the states in modern northern India, sandwiched between Uttar Pradesh and West Bengal, with Nepal on its northern border. Bihar has an incredibly rich history; it was the ancestral homeland of the Maurya dynasty, which ruled over much of the Indian subcontinent between the fourth and third centuries before the common era. The capital city was at Pataliputra, identified with modern Patna. Bihar also contains the town of Bodh Gaya, where the Buddha attained enlightenment, in addition to many other places associated with events in his life.

Despite this lush past, modern Bihar is an extremely difficult place to live; illiteracy and infant mortality rates are very high, life expectancy is fairly low, and social conditions can best be described as feudal. Most of its citizens can barely make a living and do so through agriculture, while a small percentage are fabulously wealthy. Bihar is also a textbook example of what modern Indians call the “criminalization of politics,” in which known criminals are either agents for politicians or are themselves holding political office. Although Bihar has abundant mineral resources, its pervasive corruption virtually ensures that their benefits will reach only a few. Despite all of these disadvantages, Bihar does have well-known sacred sites (tirthas). One of these is the town of Gaya, famous as a place to perform funerary rites (antyeshthi samskara). Another sacred place is the temple at Vaidyanath, which is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a group of sites especially sacred to the god Shiva. For general information about Bihar and all the regions of India, an accessible reference is Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.

Bijak

(“inventory”) One of the three main collections of verse ascribed to the poet-saint Kabir (mid-15th c.); the other two are found in the Adigranth and the manuscripts of the religious organization Dadupanth. Kabir is the best known of the sants, an umbrella term for a group of central and northern Indian poet-saints who share several concepts: stress on individualized, interior religion leading to a personal experience of the divine; disdain for external ritual, particularly image worship; faith in the power of the divine Name; and a tendency to ignore conventional caste distinctions. Of all the sants, Kabir is the most iconoclastic with regard to established religious practices and authorities. He invariably emphasizes the need for individual searching and realization.

Given the content of Kabir’s message, it is notable that the Bijak is the scripture of the Kabirpanth, a religious community claiming to be his followers. Certainly Kabir himself would have condemned the notion of making him the founder of anything, or of his verses gaining the authority of a scripture. In content, the Bijak contains verses of varying types: short epigrams that have become proverbial wisdom, longer stanzas in the chaupai form, and shorter two-line verse (doha). Linguistic features identify the Bijak as belonging to the eastern part of the Hindi language region, hence its common name as the "eastern" recension. For translations of the text itself, see Linda Hess and Shukdev Singh (trans.), The Bijak of Kabir, 1983.

Bijakshara

("seed syllable") In the esoteric ritual tradition known as tantra, a bijakshara is a particular set of syllabic utterances that is believed to have an intimate connection with a deity—either as a way of gaining access to the god’s power or as the subtlest form of the deity itself. These syllables are usually meaningless sounds (for example, aum, hrim, klim), although at times they may contain actual words. Bijaksharas are important not for their meaning but for the power inherent in the sounds themselves. The transmission of such seed syllables and the entitlement (adhikara) to use them is an important feature of tantric initiation (diksha). For further information see Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1977; and Douglas

Bilva
The wood-apple tree (Aegle marmelos). Although this tree is known for its delicious fruit, its primary religious importance is its leaves. These are used in the worship of Shiva and are usually placed as an offering on the god’s image or linga (pillar-shaped symbol). These leaves are believed to be dearer to him than any other offering. In everyday language this tree is also commonly known as the bel.

Bimbisara
(d. 494 B.C.E.) King of Magadha, the region corresponding to modern Bihar, whose reign ended shortly before the traditionally accepted date for the death of the Buddha. Bimbisara was an energetic administrator who had designs on ruling a much larger empire. To this end, he tried to conquer and control large parts of the Ganges basin. Bimbisara is believed to have been the first king to conceive of ruling a large empire, although he was deposed and murdered by his son Ajatashatru before he saw it become a reality.

Bindu
(“drop”) In the Shrvidya school, a particular branch of the esoteric ritual tradition known as tantra, the bindu is the name for the dot in the very center of the shrichakra, which is a Shrvidya symbolic diagram (yantra) used in worship. The shrichakra is composed of nine interlocking triangles—four pointing up and five pointing down—surrounded by a double series of lotus petals and exterior circular and angular walls. The bindu symbolizes the ultimate unity of the divine principles, Shiva and Shakti, and by extension the unity of all reality. For further information see Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Bindusara
(3rd c. B.C.E.) Son of Chandragupta Maurya, the founder of the Mauryan empire, and father of Ashoka, the empire’s greatest figure. At Bindusara’s accession the Mauryans controlled the Indus and Ganges river basins. Bindusara not only consolidated his father’s gains, but also expanded Mauryan control into the Deccan region as far south as Mysore. He was reportedly a man of universal tastes, since tradition holds that he asked Antiochus I, the Seleucid ruler of Syria, for sweet wine, dried figs, and a sophist. Antiochus apparently sent the first two items but declared that Greek philosophers were not for export. See also Maurya dynasty.

Birla, Ghanshyamdas
(1894–1983) Patriarch of the Birla industrial family. The Birlas made a fortune in opium in the early decades of the twentieth century and then diversified into a variety of other industrial ventures. Ghanshyamdas was a close friend of Mohandas K. Gandhi and the major financial supporter for Gandhi’s political organization, the Indian National Congress, to which Birla had given an estimated 100 million rupees by the time of independence. In his later years, he devoted considerable money and attention to building temples, sponsoring religious and charitable trusts, and performing other honorable deeds.

Birth
At its most basic level, birth is a biological event, but it becomes a cultural event by virtue of the rites performed for and significance given to it. Different Hindu communities show considerable regional and sectarian variation in the ways that they mark a birth, but several themes remain fairly constant. Although the birth of a child is a highly auspicious occasion, it is also considered impure because of the various bodily tissues and fluids coming with it (blood, etc.).
membranes, amniotic fluid, placenta, etc.). Thus, birth rituals usually include rites of purification for both mother and child, to remove this birth impurity (sutakashaucha). For the mother this is fairly simple: a bath after the birth followed by baths during a period of seclusion (7–10 days). The final rite for the child, the head shaving known as the chudakarana samskara, may not come for years after the birth.

Aside from impurity (ashaucha), another constant theme is the threat of potential danger. Immediately after birth, both mother and child are seen as highly vulnerable, not only from environmental stresses such as cold, fatigue, or infection, but from ills brought on by witchcraft or the evil eye (nazar). Given this concern, it is not surprising that the placenta and all other childbirth byproducts are carefully collected and disposed of, lest they be used for spells. The period of seclusion after the birth is intended both to prevent contact with such malevolent forces and to ward them off through rites of protection. The mother is usually given massages and fed strengthening foods to bolster her resistance. The use of charms, or amulets, is also quite common. For further information see Lawrence Babb, The Divine Hierarchy, 1975; and Doranne Jacobsen, “Golden Handprints and Redpainted Feet: Hindu Childbirth Rituals in Central India,” in Nancy Falk and Rita M. Gross (eds.), Unspoken Worlds: Women’s Religious Lives in Non-Western Cultures, 2000.

Black Yajur Veda

Along with the White Yajur Veda, one of the two major forms of the Yajur Veda, one of the oldest Hindu religious texts. The major difference between these two forms is in the placement of explanatory notes on the Vedic mantras (sacred sounds) and their significance. The four recensions of the Black Yajur Veda include these notes in the text itself. In contrast, the one recension of the White Yajur Veda gathers these notes into an appendix known as a Brahmana, which gives its name to the second major stratum of Vedic texts.

Blessing

See ashirvad.

Blood

As with all bodily fluids, blood is considered ritually impure and a source of pollution upon contact. Blood is also deemed a “hot” and powerful substance, not only by virtue of its impurity (ashaucha), but also because of its connection with life. Witches are popularly seen as deriving their nourishment from human blood. This highlights both their malevolent character, since they can only live by destroying others, and also their marginal, antisocial quality, since they feed on a substance considered violently impure. In another context, blood from animal sacrifice is often offered to village deities or to certain powerful and terrifying forms of the Goddess. Any deities taking blood sacrifice are considered “hot,” meaning that they are powerful enough to grant favors to devotees but also marginal, potentially dangerous, and requiring continual infusions of life-sustaining blood to maintain their powers. See also witchcraft.

Boar Avatar

The third avatar, or “incarnation,” of the god Vishnu. Vishnu takes this form at the beginning of one of the cosmic ages, when the process of creation has been interrupted by the disappearance of the Earth. The source of this problem is the demon-king Hiranyaksha, who has kidnapped the Earth and hidden her in the depths of the cosmic ocean. Taking the form of a giant boar, Vishnu dives to the bottom of the ocean, where he slays Hiranyaksha, places the Earth on the tip of his tusk, and lifts her from the waters. With the reappearance of the Earth, the process of creation resumes.

It is generally accepted that the avatar doctrine provided a way to assimilate smaller regional deities into the larger pantheon by designating them as forms of Vishnu. This inference is supported by the Boar avatar, which seems to have absorbed an ancient cult in central India by making the boar an incarnation of Vishnu. In modern times the Boar avatar is worshiped little, although it had a significant following in the past, particularly in central India. This is partly supported by the sculptural record; the caves at Ellora and Udayagiri have particularly fine sculptural renditions of this avatar. For further information see Arthur Llewellyn Basham, The Wonder That Was India, 1968.

Bose, Subhash Chandra

(1896–1945) Bengali politician and freedom fighter. Before World War II, Bose had unsuccessfully contested with Mohandas K. Gandhi for the leadership of the Congress Party. Bose was more impatient than Gandhi for the British to leave, and he was more willing to expel them by force. During World War II, Bose used Japanese patronage to form the Indian National Army (INA), whose objective was to expel the British from India by armed force. Starting in Singapore the INA marched 5,000 miles through Southeast Asia, but they were ultimately defeated by the British army at the city of Kohima in eastern India. Although there is eyewitness testimony that Bose died from burns stemming from a plane crash in the final days of the Pacific war, even today many Bengalis believe that he is still alive and living incognito.

Brahma

Brahma is the first member of the Trimurti, the “three forms” of divinity made up of the dominant male deities in the Hindu pantheon: Brahma as the creator of the universe, Vishnu as the preserver or sustainer, and Shiva as the destroyer. Brahma is usually portrayed with four heads (the fifth having been cut off by Bhairava, a wrathful form of Shiva), and his animal vehicle is the hamsa, or Indian goose.

According to one widely held myth, during the time of cosmic dissolution between world cycles, Vishnu floats in the middle of the cosmic ocean, lying on the giant serpent Shesha. When the time for creation comes, a lotus sprouts from Vishnu’s navel and opens to reveal Brahma inside. Brahma takes up the work of creation, and at the end of the world cycle, Brahma returns to the lotus, which is reabsorbed into Vishnu. Because of his spontaneous appearance at the beginning of every cosmic age, one of the names for Brahma is Svayambhu (“self-born”). Unlike the Judeo-Christian belief, the world is not created from nothing. Brahma merely arranges the existing elements of the universe into a coherent and ordered cosmos.

Brahma is a major figure in the pantheon and is prominent in many episodes in Hindu mythology. His mythic presence often obscures the fact that he is never worshiped as a primary deity. In fact, he has only one temple devoted to him in all of India, in Pushkar. Some Hindus have attributed this lack of worship to his status as the creator. After all, since creation has been completed, why should one bother with Brahma, whose work is done? In the puranas, texts on Hindu mythology, this lack of worship is usually ascribed to a curse—sometimes by the god Shiva but in other stories by the sage Bhrgu.

Brahmacharin

(“seeker of Brahman”) A term with several possible meanings depending on the context. In the dharma literature, which gives instruction on religious duties, a brahmacharin is a person in a period of religious study. This period is the first of the four ashramas (“stages of life”) of a twice-born man, that is, a man born into one of three groups in Indian society: brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya. Such men are eligible to receive the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” According to the ideal, after his initiation and adornment with the sacred thread—the most visible sign of a twice-born man—the brahmacharin shall live in his guru’s household and study the Veda, the oldest Hindu religious text, in addition to performing other religious acts. Since brahmacharins are focused on gaining religious knowledge, this is supposed to be a very austere time of life marked by strict celibacy, hard work, service to the teacher, meticulous observance of all religious rites, and avoidance of luxuries such as beds, cosmetics, and bodily ornaments. Once this period of study is over, the student will marry and enter the second ashrama, that of the household. The system described in the dharma literature is an idealized model, and one cannot be sure that it was ever strictly followed. Although many contemporary brahmin boys still undergo the “second birth,” other elements—such as the ascetic lifestyle and emphasis on the study of the Veda—are largely ignored in contemporary times.

Brahmacharin can also be defined as a novice or junior monk, whose duty is to serve and learn from the senior monks, or as the name of two particular ascetic groups. One of these groups is the prestigious Swaminarayan sect, whose members are recruited solely from the caste of brahmins. The other is an organization called the Brahmachari Sanyasis, devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva who are distinct from the Dashanami Sanyasis. The Brahmachari Sanyasis have an ashram on Mount Girnar and in the bathing (snana) festival known as the Kumbha Mela, the Brahmachari Naga (fighting) Sanyasis have a recognized place among the other Naga groups. For further information see G. S. Ghurye, Indian Sadhus, 1964.

Brahmacharya

(“going after Brahman”) In its most traditional sense, this word refers to the lifestyle of a young man belonging to a particular class during his life as a student (brahmacharin). This period is the first of the four ashramas (“stages of life”) of a twice-born man, that is, a man born into one of three groups in Indian society: brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya. Such men are eligible to receive the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” His life as a student will then commence, and he will move into his guru’s household and study the sacred texts, the Vedas. This is conceived as a period of intense study, religious practice, and an austere lifestyle marked by the restraint of desires, for which the hallmark is celibacy. Although the model of the four ashramas is largely archaic in modern times, the word brahmacharya still connotes this sort of austere religious lifestyle, and it is often used as a synonym for celibacy.

four great crimes that makes one an outcast from society. This crime’s seriousness stems from notions of brahmin sanctity and status; with the exception of self-defense, the deliberate murder of a brahmin holds serious repercussions. Even the gods are subject to this act’s negative karmic consequences. Hindu mythology records that the god Bhairava wanders the earth for years after cutting off one of the heads of the god Brahma. The skull sticks to his hand as a visible sign of his crime until it finally falls off at Kapalamochana. In the more lenient prescriptions in the dharma literature, the punishment for a brahmin murderer is parallel to that of Bhairava. The murderer has to carry the skull of the dead man for twelve years, wearing only a rough garment to cover his loins, and during that period he has to live on alms, begging at no more than seven houses per day. After twelve years he is deemed pure, unless the murder was intentional, in which case the term of punishment is doubled. According to several commentators, however, when a brahmin is intentionally murdered by a kshatriya, vaishya, or shudra, the only possible expiation (prayashchitta) is death.

Brahma Kumaris
Modern Hindu religious organization founded in the 1930s by a Sindhi jeweler named Dada Lekhraj. In 1947, after the partition of British India into India and Pakistan, the organization relocated its headquarters from Sindh (in modern Pakistan) to Mount Abu in the Indian state of Rajasthan. Although the sect has only about 100,000 members—minuscule by Hindu standards—it is noteworthy for several reasons. Unlike most Hindus, the Brahma Kumaris aggressively seeks out and converts new members, and thus it has a much higher profile than other religious sects. The organization preaches a doctrine foretelling the imminent end of the world, which must be prepared for by radical asceticism. It is also noteworthy that since its beginning, the majority of its adherents have been women.

The movement began following a series of apocalyptic visions by Dada Lekhraj. These visions not only convinced him of the coming tribulation but also reinforced his conviction that a human being’s real identity lay not in the body but in the soul. This latter realization resulted in the organization’s adoption of complete celibacy. When this ideal was adopted by some of his young women followers, it initially led to a tremendous uproar, because they renounced their primary traditional roles as wives and mothers. The movement persisted despite these troubles, which bound the followers together even more tightly. By the time Dada Lekhraj died in 1969, the movement had developed a strong missionary bent. All of these factors make it unusual and, in the eyes of many ordinary Hindus, marginal and suspicious. For further information see Lawrence Babb, Redemptive Encounters, 1987.

Brahma Marriage
One of the eight ways to perform a marriage according to the Dharma Shastras, the treatises on religious duty (dharma). In a Brahma marriage the bride’s father gives away his daughter, along with any ornaments he can afford, to a learned man of good character. This man is respectfully invited to accept her with absolutely no conditions or fees. This form is considered the most suitable for Brahmans because it is free from lust or any sort of financial inducements, hence the name Brahma marriage. For these reasons it is also deemed the best of the four approved (prashasta) forms of marriage.

The Brahma marriage is one of the two forms practiced in modern India. It is by far the more socially respectable, since the asura marriage—in which the groom gives money to the bride and her family—carries the connotation of selling the bride. Yet even with the Brahma marriage, there has been significant divergence from the classically mandated form. In many modern Indian weddings, it has become common for the bride’s family to give the groom’s family a dowry as a condition for the marriage, which can easily be interpreted as selling the groom. See also marriage, eight classical forms, and prashasta marriages.

Brahma Muhurta
(“time of Brahma”) The forty-eight-minute period (muhurta) immediately before sunrise, which is thought to be the most auspicious time of the day. This auspiciousness makes it the best time for worship, meditation, or any type of religious practice; serious spiritual aspirants rise before it begins so that they may take full advantage of the time.

Brahman
In its first appearances in the Rg Veda, the earliest text in the sacred literature known as the Vedas, the term Brahman both denotes the power inherent in, and gives potency to, the sacred word. In the Brahmana literature, one of the later strands in the Vedas, brahman was the name for one of the four types of priests who officiated at a sacrifice (the others being hotr, udgatr, and adhvaryum). In the Upanishads and afterward, Brahman is the generally accepted term for the highest reality in the universe, which is both the material cause and the final cause of all that exists. In the worldview of the Upanishads, the speculative and most recent texts in the Vedas, Brahman is the single binding unity behind the world’s apparent diversity. These texts also affirm Brahman’s identity with atman, the individual soul, and thus the identity of the essence of macrocosm and microcosm. As described in many of the Upanishads and later systematized by the philosopher Shankaracharya (9th c.), the ultimate form of Brahman is without qualities (nirguna), formless, nameless, indefinable, and grammatically a neuter

After death, a liberated person’s soul is believed to escape through an opening in the skull called the brahmarandhra. This is thought to correspond to the fontanel, an opening in an infant’s skull (right) that closes in adulthood (left).
noun. In contrast, particular deities are seen as lower, provisional, qualified (saguna) forms of Brahman. This understanding was modified by the influence of later devotional trends, in which ideas of the highest Brahman became identified with a particular deity, who was seen as the ultimate source of all things.

Brahmana
General name for the second literary stratum in the Vedas, the earliest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts. Although the composition of these differing parts of the Veda is not completely linear, the Brahmanas generally come after the hymns of praise to the gods known as samhitas and precede the speculative texts known as the Aranyakas and the Upanishads. In theory, each Veda has a Brahmana as an appendix, which is intended to give further explanation of the Vedic rituals. Although the Yajur Veda is the only one for which this is actually true, this understanding gives the Brahmanas the authority of revealed scripture (shruti) and thus makes them unquestionable. There are several different Brahmanas, of which the most important are the Aiteraya Brahmana and the Shatapatha Brahmana; the latter’s tone and contents (including the Isha Upanishad) clearly mark it as the most recent of the Brahmanas.

The Brahmanas are primarily ritual manuals, and they give exacting, painstaking instructions for performing these Vedic rituals. These texts indicate a fundamental shift in religious practice, from the earlier emphasis on sacrifice as a means of invoking and pleasing the Vedic gods to an importance on the power of ritual itself. This new emphasis makes the sacrificial priests the most powerful people of all, since even the gods themselves are subject to the rituals. The power of correctly performed ritual paves the way for the Aranyakas and the Upanishads, which asks more speculative questions about the rituals themselves. At times these differing religious genres are juxtaposed—as in the Shatapatha Brahmana, in which the Isha Upanishad is embedded. Such juxtapositions indicate that although the stress varied in differing types of texts, there was some overlap during the time they were composed.

Brahmarandhra
("aperture of Brahman") In traditional mystical physiology, an opening in the crown of the head—perhaps corresponding to the fontanel in young children. Although this hole usually closes up, it is widely believed that if at the time of death the departing soul can be channeled through this aperture, it will bring final liberation of the soul (moksha). The earliest mention of this idea can be found in Katha Upanishad 6.16, and exercises to facilitate this practice are stressed in certain varieties of yoga. The desire to open this aperture is the reason behind one of the actions sometimes performed during cremation. In many cases the pyre’s heat will itself split the skull, but when it does not, a long pole is used to break it open in an effort to release the soul.

Brahma Sampraday
One of the four branches of the Bairagi Naga class of ascetics. The Bairagi Nagas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, organized in military fashion into different anis, or “armies.” Until the beginning of the nineteenth century, their primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests; both of these occupations have largely disappeared in contemporary times. The Brahma Sampraday traces its immediate spiritual lineage through the Gaudiya Vaishnava sect, founded by the Bengali devotee Chaitanya, but claims ultimate descent from the southern Indian philosopher Madhva. This latter claim seems highly suspect, in part because the guardian deities of the two sects are different; Chaitanya and his followers worship the gods Krishna and Radha, whereas Madhva and his followers worship Lakshmi-Narayan. There are also differences in their observances. Although the Madhva ascetics have a long history in southern India, they have virtually no presence in the north, where the Chaitanyite ascetics are well represented. Ghurye speculates that this claim is based on the desire of the Gaudiya Vaishnavas to establish ties to an ancient lineage; this would give them an unassailable identity and thus a place in the bathing (snana) procession at religious festival Kumbha Mela. See G. S. Ghurye, Indian Sadhus, 1964.

Brahmasutra Bhashya

A commentary (bhashya) written by the philosopher Shankaracharya on Badarayana’s Brahma Sutras, a collection of 555 brief aphorisms (sutras) that form the basis for the philosophical school known as Vedanta. This commentary is the defining text for the Advaita Vedanta school of Indian philosophy. Shankaracharya begins his investigation by establishing the Self as the basis of all knowledge, since the one thing that can never be doubted is the reality of the one who knows. He identifies this knowing consciousness as the eternal Self, or atman, which never changes over time despite the vicissitudes of the physical bodies it inhabits. According to Shankaracharya, the perceivable world is clearly subject to change and thus is not the Absolute Reality, which the philosopher identifies as the unqualified, unchanging Brahman. Following the Upanishads, Shankaracharya identifies atman as identical to Brahman. He states that for human beings the reason for both unhappiness and the bondage of the soul is the ignorance of this relationship, which causes one to mistake this perceivable reality for the Ultimate Reality. With the destruction of this mistaken understanding, all bonds are broken, and the person attains final liberation.

Brahma Sutras

Variant name for Badarayana’s Vedanta Sutras, which date from the third to the fifth century B.C.E. This collection of 555 brief aphorisms (sutras) is the basis for the philosophical school known as Vedanta, so named because it claims to reveal the ultimate meaning of the religious scriptures known as the Vedas. They are given the name Brahma Sutras because they attempt to summarize and systematize the philosophic and religious ideas in the speculative texts known as the Upanishads, particularly the ideas about the Ultimate Reality known as Brahman. The sutras are so brief that they presuppose commentary, of which the most famous is the Brahmasutra Bhashya, written by the philosopher Shankaracharya.

Brahmayajna

(“sacrifice to Brahman”) One of the five great sacrifices (panchamahayajna) prescribed in the texts on religious duty (Dharma Shastras). These five great sacrifices are prescribed daily religious observances for a “twice-born” householder, that is, a householder who has been born into one of three groups in Indian society—brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya. Such men are eligible for the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” Each of the five sacrifices (yajna) is directed toward a different class of beings, from the Ultimate Reality down to animals, and is satisfied by different actions. The brahmayajna is directed toward the Ultimate Reality (Brahman) and is satisfied by teaching and studying the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. In the time since the Dharma Shastras were composed, Hindu life has undergone significant change, but many brahmins still study the Veda—if not daily, at some point in their youth.
Brahmi
The most commonly used script in the inscriptions of the emperor Ashoka (r. 269–232 B.C.E.), the greatest figure in the Maurya dynasty. Ashoka’s empire encompassed all of the subcontinent except the deepest parts of southern India and went west into modern Afghanistan. Brahmi script was used in all regions of the Mauryan empire except in the northwest, where the Kharoshthi script was used. Ashoka’s rock edicts and pillar edicts are the earliest significant Indian written documents and give invaluable information about contemporary social, political, and religious life. Brahmi is the ancestor of the modern Indian scripts, including Devanagari. It is also the ultimate source for all indigenous southeast Asian alphabets, which developed from trade with southern India in the early medieval period. Over the course of time, Brahmi was replaced by later scripts, was forgotten, and became unreadable. Although Ashoka’s inscriptions ensured that Europeans were aware of Brahmi, their content was a mystery until 1837, when James Prinsep deciphered the Brahmi alphabet by working backward from later, known scripts.

Brahmin
In the traditional Hindu theory of the four major social groups (varnas), the brahmans are the group with the highest status, based on the belief that they are purer than all others. This belief is based on the creation story known as the Purusha Sukta, in which the brahmans are created from the Primeval Man’s mouth. The mouth is part of the head and thus the highest part of the body, and it is also associated with speech, one of the definitively human faculties. From the earliest Hindu recorded history, brahmans have been associated with speech and the sacred word; they were the scholars, priests, ritual technicians, and protectors of sacred learning. This is still true in modern times, although there are also many brahmans who have other occupations, such as trade, business, and government service.

Aside from their traditional association with sacred learning, their other source of social status is their ritual purity, which is believed to be greater than that of all other human beings. This ritual purity is inherent, conferred by birth. According to tradition, even an uneducated brahmin should be considered a “god on earth,” whereas a learned brahmin is more sacred still. This ritual purity makes brahmans preferable for service to many of the gods of the Hindu pantheon, since they are considered the best intermediaries to “insulate” the deities from ordinary people. Although brahmans as a whole have the highest status, within the brahmin community there are highly defined subgroups (jatis), which are often defined by region of origin.

Brahmo Samaj
The earliest of the Hindu reform groups, founded in Calcutta in the early nineteenth century by Ram Mohan Roy (1774–1833). His purpose was to purge contemporary Hinduism of its “corrupt” practices, such as sati (widow burning), the ban on widow remarriage, image worship, and caste. In his effort to find a traditional authority for such reforms, he chose the Upanishads as his key religious texts. After his death the movement was eventually headed by Debendranath Tagore (father of the Nobel laureate Rabindranath Tagore) and later by Keshub Chander Sen; disagreements over ritual matters split the movement under both leaders. By the late 1800s the Samaj’s influence had largely passed, although in an interesting twist, it became the vehicle through which the mystic Ramakrishna met many of his disciples.

The Brahmo Samaj’s social program reflected and responded to contemporary European critiques of popular Hinduism, some levied by Christian missionaries and others based on the rationalist emphasis of the Enlightenment. The Brahmo Samaj’s openness put it at the forefront of legal reform—in particular, influencing the 1829 law banning sati. But at the same time, its members were mostly Westernized urban intellectuals, far removed from the life and religious concerns of Hindus. For further information see Spencer Lavan, “The Brahmo Samaj: India’s First Movement for Religious Reform,” in Robert D. Baird (ed.), Religion in Modern India, 1998.

Braj
Northern Indian region on the Yamuna River, south of the modern city of Delhi. According to Hindu tradition, Braj is the land where the god Krishna lived during his time on earth. The Braj region does not have clearly defined boundaries, and the name has never referred to an official administrative area. Instead it has been defined by popular piety. Krishna’s devotees (bhakta) place great emphasis on visualizing his exploits as a way to attain communion with him, and thus places throughout the Braj region are associated with very specific incidents in Krishna’s life. As it now stands, the southern and eastern borders of the region are just over five miles southeast of the city of Mathura, and its northern and western boundaries are nearly five times that distance. For extensive information on Braj and its culture, see A. W. Entwistle, Braj, 1987.

Braj Bhasha
The “language of Braj”; a dialect of medieval Hindi primarily spoken in the Braj region, south of the modern city of Delhi. Braj is the land associated with the god Krishna, and the devotion that flourished there between the fifteenth and eighteenth centuries made Braj Bhasha a major literary language. Aside from being the language of Krishna worshipers, it also functioned as a lingua franca—a common language used by diverse peoples—for religious devotees (bhakta) in a much larger area of northern India, although it varied at the borders.

Brhadaranyaka (“Great Forest Book”) Upanishad
By general consensus, the oldest of the Upanishads, the speculative religious texts that form the most recent stratum of the Vedas. The Brhadaranyaka Upanishad’s chronological priority is supported by at least four pieces of evidence: its length, its lack of organization, its archaic language, and its relationship to earlier Vedic texts. The opening passage gives an extended comparison between the world and the sacrificial horse, showing clear parallels with the earlier Brahmana literature. Moreover, by its very name (“great forest book”), the Brhadaranyaka Upanishad clearly points to a transition from the Aranyaka (“forest books”) literature, which followed Brahmana literature. This upanishad first addresses many of the questions raised in later texts and is therefore an important source for the development of the tradition. Unlike most of the later Upanishads, it is written in prose rather than poetry, with the instruction often in the form of dialogue between various speakers.

Brhadeshvar
Temple built in the southern Indian city of Tanjore around the year 1000 B.C.E. by the Chola king Raja Raja (r. 985–1014). The temple is dedicated to the god Shiva in his form as Brhadeshvar (the “great lord”). It was built in the Dravida style characteristic of southern Indian temples, in which the buildings are of modest height but cover an immense area and are surrounded by a boundary wall with massive towers (gopurams) over each wall’s central gateway. The Brhadeshvar temple is famous as a center for traditional arts and culture, particularly as a home for the dance style known as Bharatanatyam. It also contains some exceptional murals, an extremely unusual feature in Indian temples. See also Chola dynasty.

Brhannala

This was the identity assumed by Arjuna, one of the five Pandava princes, during the year they lived incognito after twelve years of forest exile. The Pandavas are the heroes of the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, which details the struggle for power between the Pandavas and their cousins the Kauravas. At one point in their struggle, Arjuna’s older brother, Yudhishthira, has lost all the brothers’ freedom and possessions to the Kauravas in a game of dice. As a penalty for this loss, the Pandavas have to go into exile for twelve years and spend the thirteenth year back in society, unrecognized. It is understood that if the brothers are discovered during that year, they will be banished again. Arjuna, the epic’s most heroic warrior, disguises himself as a eunuch named Brhannala, knowing that no one will suspect him in such guise. He spends the year living in the women’s quarters of the palace, singing and dancing as a eunuch. At the end of the year, still in his eunuch’s garb, Arjuna takes part in a great battle in which he defeats the troops of the Kauravas.

Brhaspati

In Hindu mythology, Brhaspati is a sage chosen by the deities (devas) as their guru, or spiritual teacher. Brhaspati is also one of the names used to designate the planet Jupiter, since in Hindu astrology this planet is the most significant, and thus the symbolic “guru” among the planets.

Brideprice

The money the groom’s family gives to the bride’s family as a condition for marriage. This exchange of money for the bride is the defining feature of the asura marriage, one of eight recognized forms of marriage in the Dharma Shastras, the treatises on religious duty (dharma). This form of marriage is considered aprashasta ("reprehensible") because of the implication of selling one’s children. Even though it does take place in modern India, communities practicing this form have very low social status. In modern times, giving brideprice is an admission that the bride’s family deserves compensation for the loss of a wage earner, implying that her labor is necessary for the family. In contrast, the higher-status type of marriage, the Brahma marriage, transfers both the bride and wealth (in the form of a dowry) to the groom’s family with the understanding that both families have enough money that her paid labor is unnecessary.

Brindavan

(“tulsi forest”) Small town in the Mathura district of the state of Uttar Pradesh, which is the town in which the god Krishna is supposed to have lived during his childhood. Although every place in Brindavan is associated with the life of Krishna and is full of temples dedicated to him, one particularly important place is the Chir Ghat, at which Krishna stole the gopis’ clothes as they were bathing (snana) in the Yamuna River. (The gopis were female cowherds who were companions to Krishna during his youth.) An interesting architectural site is the Gobind Deo Mandir, built in 1590, which has a vaulted ceiling. This latter temple is also notable for its lack of exterior ornamentation, perhaps to avoid antagonizing the nearby Moghuls. For a description of the sacred life in Brindavan, see John Stratton Hawley, At Play with Krishna, 1981. See also Moghul dynasty.

Bronzes

For most of Indian history, stone has been the preferred medium for creating images of the Hindu deities for worship. One of the significant exceptions to this trend can be found in southern India, primarily under the Chola dynasty.
Buddha Avatar

(9th–14th c.), in which another important medium was bronze. The images were made using lost wax casting, which allows for great detail. They were cast in bronze with a high copper content, which tended to give them a greenish tinge as the metal oxidized. Some of the images are only a few inches high, albeit with exquisite detail, whereas the largest are over four feet tall and even today are the primary images worshiped in temples. These images were subject to the same established rules of construction (shilpa shastra) as stone sculptures. Despite this strict form, many of the bronzes are masterful works of art with a presence rarely found in the stone sculptures. Although images were made of all of the deities in the pantheon, among the best known bronzes are figures of the god Shiva as Nataraja, “the Lord of the Dance.”

Buddha Purnima

The full moon in the lunar month of Baisakh (April–May). Buddhists throughout the world celebrate this full moon as the anniversary of the Buddha's birth, enlightenment, and death. Although many Hindus respect the Buddha as a sage and religious teacher, he is not central to Hindu religion. Therefore, this is not a major festival, although this particular full moon is still named for him. More recently, the day of this full moon has been described as the best day of the year for bathing (snana) in sacred rivers, a practice that the Buddha would certainly have denounced. Given the auspiciousness connected with every full moon, this may be an effort to “take back” the day as a Hindu holiday by emphasizing a distinctively Hindu practice.

Buddhi

This word refers to the mental faculty often translated as “intellect,” but it carries connotations beyond mere knowledge. The buddhi is the intellectual capability for awareness, mental perception, and decision-making, and as such it is the basis for all cognitive thought. In the account of evolution found in the Samkhya philosophical school, buddhi is one stage in the evolution of the human personality and the external world. In the Samkhya account, buddhi is the first faculty to emerge from prakrti, or “primal matter,” and is also known by the name mahat (the “great one”). The mental processes facilitated by buddhi spur the development of the next stage of evolution, ahimkar, or “subjective consciousness.” In more colloquial language, buddhi describes the overall quality of a person's mind, whether it is wholesome or unwholesome, sound or unsound.

Bull
Although the cow is the Hindu symbol for motherhood, with all of the emotional baggage that accompanies it, the associations connected with bulls are not nearly so important. In a religious context, the bull is associated with the god Shiva because his animal vehicle is the bull Nandi, who can invariably be found guarding the door at Shiva's temples. In pre-modern times, of course, adult bulls were a relatively small percentage of the total cattle population, since most young bulls were routinely castrated to become the oxen that were essential agricultural work animals.

Bundi
City and district in the southeastern part of the state Rajasthan, about 100 miles south of the state capital, Jaipur. Before 1947, when India gained independence, Bundi was a small kingdom. In the late seventeenth century, Bundi became a center for the Rajasthani style of miniature painting, perhaps by attracting artists from the Moghul court who were seeking outside patronage. Aside from the portraits and court groups characterizing this genre under the Moghuls, Rajasthani miniature painters portrayed Hindu religious themes, particularly incidents in the life of the god Krishna. Whereas some styles have flat, monochromatic backgrounds, the Bundi style shows an intense focus on nature, such as detailed depiction of the trees (usually banana trees) surrounding the subjects, in addition to flowers, birds, and lotus-filled ponds. For further information see W. G. Archer, Indian Painting, 1957; or his Indian Painting in Bundi and Kotah, 1959. See also Moghul dynasty.

Burial
Although cremation is the most common means by which Hindus dispose of corpses, occasionally bodies are buried. One such case is with the bodies of very young children, as if it is recognized that they never developed into real individuals. The only other people usually buried are ascetics, for which there are varying interpretations. One idea is that they are not actually dead but in a state of deep meditation (samadhi). In such cases the ascetic is often buried in a sitting posture because he is considered still present. Another reason for burying ascetics may reflect the general assumption that renouncing the world had made them “dead” to it, making further ceremonies unnecessary. Indeed, one part of some ascetic initiations is to perform one's own funeral rites. Burial is often reserved for ascetics with disciples who will keep their graves as shrines. Those who are not buried are usually weighted down with rocks and thrown into bodies of water.

("settlement") In its literal meaning, anywhere people live—a settlement, village, or community. In modern usage it has come to denote an illegal settlement, such as one built by squatters who have put up dwellings on vacant land using whatever materials are available, from brick to cardboard to plastic. At first, such settlements have no civic amenities such as water, power, roads, or sewers, and in most cases the living conditions are abysmal. In many cases such “slums” become people's hereditary homes, particularly in Bombay, where real estate is exorbitantly expensive. These residents have usually gained access to electricity and water, typically via illegal hookups. In rarer cases squatters have gained title to the land through exerting political pressure, after which conditions have generally improved.
One of the most fundamental Hindu religious beliefs is that different times carry different qualities. Whereas some times are considered more auspicious and propitious, others are more inauspicious and dangerous. These judgments may either describe the general qualities of specific times or determine the proper time for carrying out particular activities. Thus Hindus have given considerable attention to organizing time and predicting auspicious moments. Many modern Hindus simultaneously use several different calendars, although they may use them for different purposes. To begin with, everyday timekeeping is done with the Gregorian calendar of the common era, which may reflect the influence of the British empire or, more simply, the influence of modern commerce and communications. It is notable that the only holidays celebrated according to this calendar are national holidays such as Independence Day, Gandhi Jayanti, and Republic Day—all of which are fixed on particular days. Beyond this there are many other methods of measuring time, some of which overlap with each other and some of which are found only in certain regions of the country.

Several of these systems are based on the movement of the sun. The most basic unit, of course, is the solar day, which traditionally begins and ends not by the clock but by the rising of the sun. The week contains seven solar days. The movement of the sun divides the year into halves, with the uttarayana period occurring when the sun is moving northward and the dakshinayana period taking place when the sun is moving southward. There are also two separate versions of the solar year, each of which has twelve solar months. In northern India these months correspond to the twelve signs of the zodiac and mark the sun's passage through them. In southern India one finds an identical calendar, the Tamil solar year, in which the names of the months are drawn from the names of certain nakshatras, or signs of the lunar zodiac.

Whereas the solar calendar is usually used for astrological purposes, the lunar calendar is important for religious life. The lunar calendar is used to measure the two eras still used for dating history: the Vikram era (fifty-six or fifty-seven years later than the common era) and the Shaka era (seventy-eight years earlier than the common era). The lunar year is made up of twelve lunar months, each of which has thirty lunar days. Since the cycle of the moon is only about twenty-eight solar days, a lunar day is slightly shorter than a solar day. The lunar month is divided into two halves of fifteen days each: the “dark” (krishna paska) half, when the moon is waning and ends with the new moon; and the “light” (shukla paska) half when the moon is waxing and that culminates in the full moon. In northern India the lunar month begins with the moon's dark half, and ends on the full moon, whereas in the south the reverse is often true. Since the solar year has about 365 days and the lunar year about 354, if left uncorrected each lunar year would begin eleven solar days earlier than the previous one. To correct this discrepancy, an intercalary month is added about every two and a half years. This helps to keep the lunar months falling at around the same time every year, although the celebration of a particular festival can vary by several weeks from one year to the next.

Almost all Hindu festivals are celebrated according to the lunar calendar. Some festivals’ celebrations are associated with certain lunar days and thus occur twenty-four times in a twelve-month lunar year: The eleventh day (ekadashi) of each half of the lunar month is sacred to the god Vishnu; the eighth day (ashtami) is devoted to the Goddess, particularly in her form as Durga; the evening of the thirteenth day (trayodashi) and the fourteenth day (chaturdashi) are sacred to the god Shiva; and the fourth day (chaturthi) is dedicated to the god Ganesh. The time for celebrating annual religious festivals is set according to the lunar month, the half of the moon, and the particular lunar day. For example, the god Krishna's birthday is celebrated on Bhadrapada Krishna eight, the eighth day of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Bhadrapada. The birthdays of many important historical religious figures such as Guru Nanak, the founder of the Sikh community; the Buddha, and the devotional poet-saints are also celebrated according to the lunar calendar.

These overlapping calendars mean that any particular day can be designated by several different markers: the day of the week and the day in the common era (as in many societies), the day according to the traditional solar calendar, and the day according to the lunar calendar. Depending on the context—business, astrological, or festival—any one of these may be given preference. See also auspiciousness, inauspiciousness, and Tamil months.

Caste
The best-known term to denote the traditional Hindu social structure in which groups are arranged in a hierarchy of status, usually based on the perceived purity of each group’s traditional occupation. The word “caste” is actually derived from the Portuguese word for “chaste.” The Portuguese observed that different groups in Indian society kept themselves separate from each other, particularly when eating and in marriage. They used the term “caste” to describe this social phenomenon.

Among Hindus themselves the most important concept for social ordering is known as the jati (“birth”). One becomes a member of a jati by being born into it. The jatis were usually divided according to traditional occupation, which (in theory) would be performed by that jati alone. A jati’s social status generally stemmed from the status of its occupation, and jatis such as latrine cleaners and tanners were thought to be defiled by their trade. Society as a whole was conceived on the model of the body, with the different jatis comparable to different body parts. While each part had a differing status and role, every one was necessary for the whole to function smoothly. These differences in status were marked and reinforced by strict rules to keep each group distinct from the others. The strictest regulations were in regard to marriage, and in earlier times members of a jati would marry only within that group. It was almost as if the jatis were seen as separate “species” of human beings that had to be kept apart. Marrying within one’s jati is still the ideal, although there is now considerably more intermarriage than in the past.

The best-known model for ordering Indian society is that of the four major social groups (varna) described in the dharma literature: brahmin (priest), kshatriya (warrior-king), vaishya (merchant), and shudra (servant). However, the number of different jati groups makes the social hierarchy far more complex. A small village might have dozens of jatis, all performing certain tasks, whereas a city might have hundreds of jatis, some highly specialized. Even within the brahmin varna, there are different brahmin jatis (for example, Saraswat, Chitpavan, Kanyakubja, and Kanaujia). For other varnas the picture is even more complex. For instance, some jati groups fall between the vaishya and shudra varnas, and jati groups of humble status who have achieved political success may claim... kshatriya lineage. The same jati’s social position can vary from region to region, depending on if they comprise a majority or a minority of the population or have status as a land-holding community. As in most of Hindu life, a group’s status is usually influenced by local factors; in the past fifty years, such status determinations have also been affected by changes in Indian society, which have tended to relax social distinctions. For further information see McKim Marriot, “Hindu Transactions: Diversity Without Dualism,” in Bruce Kapferer (ed.), Transaction and Meaning, 1976.

Castration
Castration of human beings has been almost completely absent in Indian history, with the notable exception of the hijras. Hijras are male cross-dressers who dress and behave as women and have usually undergone self-castration as a ritual renunciation of their sexuality. Hijras are often homosexual prostitutes, and they are an established part of the decadent underside of most Indian cities. Their most important ritual function is to sing and dance at the houses in which a male child has been born, but they may also be called to perform on other auspicious occasions. Despite the hijras’ associations with certain auspicious occasions, they are marginal to society and have very low social status. For a reliable study of the hijras, see Serena Nanda, Neither Man Nor Woman, 1999. See also auspiciousness.

Causal Chains
The underlying ultimate concern in all Indian philosophical schools is to uncover and understand the causal forces that keep human beings enmeshed in samsara, the continual cycle of reincarnation. One of the ways that Indian philosophers attempted to do this was to formulate various chains of cause and effect detailing the process through which human beings become subject to the bondage of karma. By understanding this process, they hope to be able to manipulate it, ultimately leading to the final liberation of the soul (moksha). The oldest causal chains were formulated by the Buddha and the Jains. In each of these theories, avidya, or lack of genuine understanding, starts the causal chain. In the Buddhist and Jain traditions, these causal chains can be broken by a religious discipline that begins with moral action and at more advanced levels involves meditation and wisdom.

Causal chains in Hindu philosophy have much in common with these beliefs, particularly the notion that avidya is the basic problem. In the Nyaya Sutras, the Nyaya philosopher Gautama propounded a five-fold causal chain: pain, birth, activity, defect, and wrong notion. Each of these elements is caused by the one succeeding it and is eliminated with the destruction of its cause. The Vaisheshika school, which was traditionally paired with the Nyayas, also used this model. The causal chain in the Samkhya philosophical school, as described by its founder, Ishvarakrishna, ascribes bondage to the process of evolution, stemming from the confusion between purusha (conscious spirit) and prakrti (primal matter). According to Samkhya, these two first principles are always separate from one another, but humans can confuse them. The Yoga school, traditionally paired with the Samkhya, used this model as well. The philosopher Ramanuja, founder of the Vishishthadvaita Vedanta school, proposes an evolutionary scheme similar to the Samkhya model, although instead of Samkhya’s dualism, all things evolve from a single source, Brahman.

The only major Hindu philosophical school without a causal chain is Advaita Vedanta. All of the other schools explain the relationship between the Ultimate Reality (in most cases, Brahman) and the perceivable world with the doctrine of parinamavada. This philosophical perspective accepts the reality of the world as it is perceived and also assumes that the changes in the material world involve the genuine transformation (parinama) of one thing into another, which can be explained by cause and effect. The Advaita school upholds a philosophical position known as monism, which is the belief that a single Ultimate Reality lies behind all things, which are merely differing forms of that reality. For the Advaitins, this single reality is the formless, unqualified Brahman. Advaitins explain the appearance of difference and diversity in the everyday world as an illusory rather than a genuine transformation of Brahman, a philosophical outlook known as vivartavada. This illusory transformation is caused by a quality of the human mind, which leads to the mental superimposition (adhyasa) of a mistaken understanding in place of the real one. For the Advaitins, as for all of the other schools, the ultimate problem is still avidya, or mistaken understanding, which must be replaced by correct understanding. Whereas all of the other schools give some importance to actions, the Advaitins believe that avidya is the sole cause and its removal the sole solution. For further information see Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India's Philosophies, 1972.

Causal Models
In Indian philosophy, there are three different models describing the relationships between cause and effect: satkaryavada, asatkaryavada, and anekantavada. The first model, satkaryavada, assumes that effects preexist in their causes. Effects are thus transformations (real or apparent) of these causes. The classic example is the transformation of milk to curds, butter, and clarified butter. According to satkaryavada's proponents, each of these effects was already present in the cause and emerges from it through a natural transformation of that cause.

The second model, asatkaryavada, assumes that effects do not preexist in their causes—they are completely distinct. In the classic examples for this model, one creates a clay pot by putting together the two halves of the pot, or one weaves a cloth from strands of thread. According to asatkaryavada's proponents, with each of these acts, certain material and instrumental causes create an entirely new object.

The third model, anekantavada ("the view that things are not single"), seeks to occupy the middle ground between the other two models. Anekantavada stresses the importance of one's perspective and the way it can color a judgment. In viewing the transformation of milk to curds, butter, and clarified butter, an anekantavada proponent would claim that these substances were contained in the causes (supporting the satkaryavada notion) but that the qualities of these substances were newly created each time (supporting the asatkaryavada notion). Thus causes and effects are simultaneously both the same and different, depending on the way one looks at them.

All of these philosophical schools believe that if one understands the causal process correctly and can manipulate it through one's conscious actions, it is possible to gain final liberation of the soul (moksha). Each of these causal models thus has profound implications on religious life. Satkaryavada believes that causal relations are strong, but they may be so strong that humans cannot affect the causal chain; the asatkaryavada believes that causal relations are weak, with the danger that human action is too unreliable to bring about a desired effect; anekantavada purports to find a middle ground but can be construed as inconsistent or self-contradictory. Cauvery Southern Indian river rising at the base of the western ghats in the state of Karnataka, then flowing east through the state of Tamil Nadu before entering the Bay of Bengal. It is traditionally considered one of India's seven sacred rivers along with the Ganges, Godavari, Indus, Narmada, Saraswati, and Yamuna. Important sacred sites (tirthas) on the Cauvery include Shrirangapatnam and Tiruchirappalli as well as the Cauvery Delta in Tamil Nadu's Tanjore district, which is filled with temple towns. Since 1947, when India gained independence, the rights to the Cauvery's water have become a major dispute between Tamil Nadu and Karnataka. Farmers in Tamil Nadu have been demanding a more significant share of the waters impounded in reservoirs in Karnataka.

Caves, Artificial

This was a common architectural form in the western part of the state of Maharashtra, particularly in the early centuries of the common era. The earliest form was the chaitya or rock-cut cave temple, which is specifically associated with Buddhist architectural sites. A chaitya typically had a large chamber sculpted into the side of a hill, usually with a Buddha image at the far end and a window above the entrance to admit more light. These caves were excavated and sculpted from the top down so that no scaffolding was necessary. The sides and central pillars were carved to mimic wooden construction. Early Hindu architecture adapted the chaitya form but eventually moved beyond it to construct free-standing temples. The most impressive Hindu rock-cut temples are the caves at Ellora, particularly the Kailasanatha temple (late 8th c.), dedicated to the god Shiva in his form as the Lord of Mount Kailas. The Kailasanatha temple was sculpted out of solid rock but carved to look as if it were built of masonry. This temple marked the height of the artificial cave as an architectural type, although the temples at Elephanta were done later. After this period, the emphasis tended to be on free-standing temples.

Čekkilar

(12th c. C.E.) Author of the Periya Puranam, a hagiographical account of the sixty-three Nayanars. The Nayanars were a group of sixty-three Shaiva poets-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and ninth centuries. Along with their Vaishnava counterparts, the Alvars, the Nayanars spearheaded the revitalization of Hindu religion in opposition to the Buddhists and the Jains. Both the Nayanars and the Alvars stressed passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god—Shiva for the Nayanars, Vishnu for the Alvars—and conveyed this devotion through hymns sung in the Tamil language.
According to tradition, Cekkilar was a minister at the court of the Chola dynasty’s king Kullottunga II (r. 1130–1150 C.E.). Cekkilar was distressed by the king’s admiration for a Jain epic poem and composed his own text to distract the king. His text portrays the Nayanars as models of devotion to Shiva, although they are sometimes extreme in their actions. Yet in every case, the love between devotee (bhakta) and deity manifests itself in the circumstances of everyday life, leading the saints to final liberation.

Celibacy
In traditional Indian culture, celibacy was widely seen not only as a sign of sanctity but also as a source of power.
On one hand, since sexual desire is often the symbol for all types of desire, renunciation of sexual activity is thus a sign for the renunciation of the world in general.
On a more literal level, retention of semen through celibacy is believed to prevent the loss of a man’s vital energy.
In traditional Indian physiology, semen is believed to be distilled from blood and is therefore the concentrated essence of a man’s vitality. Although slen can and must be expended for procreation, all other losses should be carefully weighed. Thus there are strong tabooes on masturbation. This vital energy, stored and conserved through celibacy, can then be used for spiritual advancement. The paradigm for the celibate ascetic is the god Shiva, one of whose symbols is the linga, a pillar-shaped image with clear phallic associations.
Shiva is the model husband and the consummate ascetic. The linga represents his stored celibate energy, as the product of his tapas (ascetic practices).
In the same way, celibacy is a way for human men to conserve their vital energies, whether one is a lifetime celibate (naisthika), a student (brahmacharin), or—as in many cases—a married man who has already had children.

Chaitanya
(1486–1533 C.E.) Bengali saint, devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna, and the founder of the Gaudiya Vaishnava religious community. Chaitanya was such a pivotal figure that there are many traditional sources for his life, although their hagiographic character makes them historically unreliable. According to one of these traditions, Chaitanya embodied Krishna himself. Krishna became Chaitanya to experience the longing of Radha, his beloved consort whom Chaitanya imagined himself to be. Thus, for his followers Chaitanya was conceived as Krishna and Radha in the same body.
Chaitanya was born in the town of Navadhvip in the state of West Bengal and given the name Vishvambar.
Traditional sources portray the young man as a gifted teacher but with no inclination toward Krishna. In 1508 he went to Gaya, a sacred site (tirtha) associated with rites for the dead, to perform rites for his dead father. In Gaya,
Vishvambar met his teacher, Ishvara
Puri, and something profound happened there, for he returned to Navadhvip a passionate devotee of Krishna. On his return, Vishvambar began to hold the public kirtan (devotional chanting) that has become the hallmark of the Gaudiya Vaishnava school. Devotees sang and danced in the streets and wept uncontrollably.
Through this ecstatic emotional worship, they sought to regain the devotional atmosphere associated with the gopis, Krishna’s cowherd women, and thus share in the gopis’ intimate relationship with Krishna.

In 1510 Vishvambar formally became an ascetic, taking the name Krishna Chaitanya, and for the rest of his life propagated the worship of Krishna. For much of that time, he resided in the sacred city of Puri. This was reportedly in deference to his mother, since she felt that Krishna’s childhood home, Brindavan, was too far away. Despite his mother’s wishes, Chaitanya did take several lengthy trips: a two-year tour of the holy places in southern India between 1510 and 1512, and in 1514, a trip to Brindavan, in which Chaitanya had frequent mystical experiences. After his return to Puri, he met the brothers Rupa and Sanatana Goswami. Chaitanya directed them to settle in Brindavan and re-establish the holy sites associated with Krishna’s life. Driven by Chaitanya’s charisma and ecstatic devotion, Rupa, Sanatana, and their nephew Jiva Goswami became pivotal figures in the development of the Gaudiya Vaishnava school. While Chaitanya was absorbed in his devotion to Krishna until his death, Rupa, Santana, and Jiva Goswami gave this devotion a systematic organization. For further information see Sushil Kumar De, Early History of the Vaishnava Faith and Movement in Bengal, 1961; and Janardana Chakravarti, Bengal Vaishnavism and Sri Chaitanya, 1975.

Chaitanya-Charitramrta
(“nectar of Chaitanya’s deeds”) A name shared by at least three separate texts, all devoted to recounting the life of the Bengali saint Chaitanya (1486–1533). The earliest was written by Murari Gupta, an associate of Chaitanya. Most of this text focuses on Chaitanya’s early life up to his southern Indian pilgrimage ending in 1513, but it also briefly mentions his pilgrimage to the town of Brindavan in 1514 and his final return to the sacred city of Puri, in which he lived until his death. The second account was written nine years after Chaitanya’s death by Kavikarnapura, who freely acknowledged his debt to Murari Gupta. The final account was written by Krishnadas Kaviraj about ninety years after Chaitanya’s death. Kaviraj’s account focuses mainly on Chaitanya’s later life, particularly his time in Brindavan. This last version is marked by the philosophical influence of Chaitanya’s most important disciples, the Goswamis (Rupa Goswami, Sanatana Goswami, and Jiva Goswami), whose ideas were a major influence in shaping the Gaudiya Vaishnava religious community. None of these texts gives an “objective” biography; the works are hagiographies written by passionate devotees (bhakta). See also philosophy.

Chaitra
According to the lunar calendar, by which most Hindu religious festivals are determined, Chaitra is the month in which the lunar year both begins (during the two weeks of the bright or waxing, half of the moon) and ends (during the two weeks of the dark, or waning, half of the moon, which precedes the bright half). Thus, the waning half of Chaitra ends one lunar year, while the waxing half that follows it begins the next lunar year. This month usually falls within March and April. This is one of the months of spring, and in northern India the weather is warm and pleasant at this time. The major festivals in Chaitra are Papamochani Ekadashi, the spring Navaratri, Ram Navami, Kamada Ekadashi, Hanuman Jayanti, and in Tamil Nadu, the Chittirai festival.

Chaitya
(“place of worship”) A rock-cut cave temple. This architectural form is closely associated with Indian Buddhism but was also used in early Hindu temple architecture. The earliest chaityas were simple caves, but these grew more elaborate as the form developed. In its later stages, the builders would not only cut out the side of the hill to make a cave; they would also sculpt pillars and other architectural details that mimicked free-standing construction. Another characteristic architectural feature was a ceiling carved into the shape of an arch. The true arch, built from the bottom up and used in Roman architecture, was not used in ancient India. A third common feature was a large window opening over the doorway to let in additional light. During the construction, the builders began removing stone at the top of the structure and worked their way down; this eliminated the need for any scaffolding during the building process, but it also meant that the builders had to work carefully to avoid mistakes. This construction method creates structures considered gigantic sculptures rather than buildings. The earliest examples are Buddhist caves carved into the side of the western ghats in Maharashtra. The form was later used to create Hindu temples, specifically at Ellora (in which the oldest caves are Buddhist) and on the island of Elephanta.

Chakora
The red partridge (Perdix rufa). According to popular belief, the chakora bird eats nothing but moonbeams. It is thus happy and content during the night but tormented by hunger during the day. In court poetry the chakora bird often symbolized a cultured and discriminating person who appreciates the finer things in life. In bhakti (devotional) poetry the chakora is often a symbol for a devotee (bhakta), since the chakora bird is said to be in love with the moon. Thus it is joyful when the moon is out but pines for it during the day, just as a devotee is blissful in the deity’s presence and in its absence is consumed with longing.

Chakra
(“wheel”) In Hindu iconography the chakra is the discus-weapon carried by several of the Hindu deities. It is often associated with the god Vishnu and is one of the four objects he invariably carries, along with the club (gada), lotus (padma), and conch shell (shankha). The discus was an actual weapon in the Indian military arsenal, and its sharp edges made it fearsome in close combat. Vishnu’s discus (named Sudarshana) is even more fearsome in its power. According to tradition it was fashioned by the divine craftsman, Vishvakarma, from pieces trimmed off of the sun; thus it carries the power of the sun’s blazing energy. The discus is also carried by certain powerful forms of the Goddess. In her charter myth, she was formed from the collected radiance of all the gods and received duplicates of all their weapons.

In the esoteric ritual tradition known as tantra, a chakra is a psychic center in the subtle body. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system that corresponds to the material body but is believed to reside on a different plane of existence. The subtle body is visualized as a set of chakras, or psychic centers, that are arranged in a column from the base of the spine to the top of the head and connected by three vertical channels. Each chakra is pictured as a multi-petaled lotus flower. All tantric traditions speak of six chakras: muladhara, svadhishthana, manipura, anahata, vishuddha, and ajna; some traditions name additional ones. Each of these chakras has important symbolic associations—with a different human physiological capacity, subtle element (tanmatra), and with differing seed syllables (bijakshara) formed from the letters of the Sanskrit alphabet, together encompassing all sacred sounds. For further information see Philip S. Rawson, The Art of Tantra, 1973.
Chakravyuha

("circular phalanx") A circular military formation described in the Mahabharata, one of the two great Hindu epics (along with the Ramayana). The Chakravyuha was widely believed to be unconquerable because each person in the formation was protected by those behind him. During a battle in the Mahabharata war, Abhimanyu becomes trapped in the chakravyuha by his enemy. Because his father, Arjuna, is the only person who knows how to get out, Abhimanyu is killed.

Chalukya Dynasty

(7th–8th c. C.E.) Central Indian dynasty whose capital was at Badami, in the Deccan plateau in modern Karnataka. The greatest Chalukya ruler was Pulakeshin II, who defeated the northern Indian emperor Harsha, stopping his southern advance. He also killed the Pallava dynasty ruler Mahendravarman, setting off a series of wars between the Chalukyas and the Pallavas in which each dynasty was able to defeat the other in battle, but neither was strong enough to retain control of the other’s empire. Aside from the Chalukya dynasty based at Badami, there were two other smaller dynasties by the same name, both of which flourished between the tenth and thirteenth centuries. One of these later dynasties was in the Gujarat region, and the other was in the Karnataka region.

Chamar

In traditional northern Indian society, the chamars were a jati (“birth”) whose hereditary occupation was tanning leather and making shoes. The jatis were subgroups of traditional Indian society whose social status was determined by their hereditary occupation. The chamars were traditionally considered among the lowest of the untouchables since their work brought them in continual contact with dead animals and their skins, which are considered extremely impure. The most famous chamar is the poet-saint Ravidas, whose poetry focuses on the difference between worldly status and devotion.

Champaran

Region in the northern part of the state of Bihar, between the Gandaki River and the Ganges. and the border of Nepal. Now it is composed of two provinces, eastern Champaran and western Champaran. The Champaran region is famous as the place where Mohandas K. Gandhi engineered the first successful satyagraha (nonviolent resistance campaign) against British rule. At the time, the province was largely agricultural, as it remains today, and most of the inhabitants were very poor. The farmers had traditionally designated a portion of their land for growing indigo to give to the landlords as rent. This arrangement was disrupted by the invention of a much cheaper synthetic indigo. The landlords responded by ordering the tenants to stop growing indigo but proceeded to raise the rent on their land, based on the traditional agreement that allowed them to do so if a tenant grew no indigo. The trouble began in 1912, but Gandhi did not arrive until 1917. After a campaign lasting nearly a year, the tenants won concessions from the landlords guaranteeing no further rent increases and a 25 percent rebate on the previous increases. For further information see Mohandas K. Gandhi, An Autobiography, 1993; a more readable, though highly partial, account can be found in Louis Fischer, Gandhi, 1954.

Chamunda
Presiding deity of the Chamunda Devi shrine on the banks of the Bana Ganga in the state of Himachal Pradesh, and one of the nine goddesses whose shrines are scattered through the Shiwalik Hills. Although each of these goddesses has a separate identity, they are all ultimately seen as differing manifestations of a single Goddess. Chamunda's charter myth is drawn from events in the Devimahatmya, a Sanskrit text that describes the Goddess's several different forms and is the earliest and most important mythic source for the cult of the Goddess. The Devimahatmya's seventh book tells how the goddess Ambika's anger takes material form as the terrifying goddess Kali, who advances into battle against the demon generals Chanda and Munda, whom she eventually beheads. Since the shrine on the Bana Ganga marks the place where both Chanda and Munda were destroyed, the goddess is worshiped here as Chamunda.

The name Chamunda designates a fierce and dangerous goddess who has often been identified with the goddess Kali. In the poet Bhavabhuti's eighth-century drama Malatimadhava, the heroine, Malati, is kidnapped by devotees (bhakta) of the goddess Chamunda to be offered as a human sacrifice to her. The events in the drama reflect the ambivalence with which such powerful goddesses—and their devotees—have been seen. For further information see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986; and Kathleen Erndl, Victory to the Mother, 1993.

Chanakya
According to tradition, the chief minister of the founder of the Maurya dynasty, Chandragupta Maurya (r. 321–297 B.C.E.). As the king's counsel, Chanakya became famous for his skill in statecraft, and is believed to have been instrumental in establishing the dynasty. Under the name Kautilya, Chanakya is also celebrated as the author of the Arthashastra, the classic Indian treatise on the strategies and mechanics of ruthlessly efficient central government.

Chanda
A demon general killed by the Goddess in the Devimahatmya, the Sanskrit text that is the earliest and most important mythic source for the cult of the Goddess. This text describes the Goddess in several different manifestations. The seventh book tells how the goddess Ambika's anger takes form as the terrifying goddess Kali. Kali attacks the demon armies commanded by Chanda and his companion Munda, and after destroying the armies she beheads the two generals. As a memorial of this mythic deed, one of the names under which the Goddess is worshiped is Chamunda, as the slayer of Chanda and Munda.

Chandas
One of the six Vedangas. These were the auxiliary branches of knowledge intended to facilitate the use of the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. Chandas was concerned with the study of metrical forms and verse, which were central to the composition of the Vedas. One indication of the importance of meter is that in many sources (such as in Panini's grammar, the Ashtadhyayi) the word chandas is used to designate the Vedas themselves. Aside from chandas, the other Vedangas are shiksha (correct pronunciation), vyakarana (Sanskrit grammar), kalpa (ritual instructions), nirukta (etymology), and jyotisha (auspicious times for sacrifices).

Chandella Dynasty
(10th–14th c. C.E.) Northern Indian dynasty that in its heyday controlled much of the Ganges River valley and northern Madhya Pradesh. The Chandellas are famous for the magnificent temples that they built in the village of Khajuraho, largely between the eleventh and twelfth centuries. These temples have survived to the present, perhaps due to their remote and inaccessible location. They are excellent examples of the developed form of the Nagara architectural style and are world-famous for their astounding display of erotic sculptures.

Chandika
A variant of the name Chandi, which designates a powerful and terrifying form of the Goddess. Chandika is one of the Navadurgas, the “nine [forms of the goddess] Durga” worshiped during the nine nights of the Navaratri festival. Chandika is the goddess worshiped on the festival’s ninth and final night and is thus the most powerful of these divine forms.

Chandidas
(15th c. C.E.) Bengali poet and devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna. In his poems Chandidas uses the conventions of Sanskrit love poetry to express devotion to Krishna, most often through the figure of Radha as Krishna’s favored devotee and lover. His poems are still recited in Bengal and according to tradition were admired by Chaitanya, the Bengali devotee who was the founder of the Gaudiyā Vaishnava religious community. Despite his poetry’s continuing acclaim, little is known about the life of Chandidas himself. This same name was used by a Bengali poet of the Sahajiya sect, who wrote several centuries later than the original Chandidas and whose poetry is clearly distinguished by doctrinal differences. For selections from the poetry of Chandidas, see Edward C. Dimock Jr. and Denise Levertov (trans.), In Praise of Krishna, 1981.

Chandiprakasha
(“effulgence of Chandi”) Name given to the spear that is the symbolic weapon of the Atala akhara, a particular group within the Naga class of Dashanami Sanyasis. The Dashanami Nagas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, organized into different akharas, or regiments, on the model of an army. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Nagas’ primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests. These functions have largely disappeared in contemporary times. All of the akharas have certain symbols that signify their organizational identity, and the Atala akhara is represented by this particular spear.

Chandogya Upanishad
Along with the Brhadaranyaka Upanishad, one of the two earliest upanishads, the religious texts that form the most recent stratum of the Vedas. Internal textual factors indicate that the Brhadaranyaka Upanishad is the older of the two, and since large sections of both texts are the same, the Chandogya Upanishad is thought to be dependent on the Brhadaranyaka. Both texts are also much larger than the other upaniṣads and much less organized, rambling from topic to topic without an apparent focus. Both are written in prose rather than poetry, with the text itself often presented as a dialogue between various speakers. Their profoundly speculative discussions about the nature of the universe became important sources for the later upanishads.

Chandra Gupta I
(r. 320–35 C.E.) Founder of the Gupta dynasty, which like the Maurya dynasty had its capital in Pataliputra, identified with the modern city of Patna in the state of Bihar. The Gupta capital was later moved to Allahabad. At the height of the dynasty, under Chandra Gupta II (r. 376–415), the Guptas controlled all of northern India and modern Pakistan, as well as the Coromandel Coast all the way to modern Madras. The Gupta dynasty flourished between about 350 and 550 C.E., and its reign is associated with the development of Indian culture and a revival of Hinduism in northern India. Both were accomplished through the patronage of the Gupta kings, who are remembered both as patrons of high culture and ardent devotees (bhakta) of Shiva.

Chandra Gupta II
(r. 376–415 C.E.) Third in the line of great monarchs in the Gupta dynasty, after his father, Samudra Gupta, and his grandfather, Chandra Gupta I. The Gupta dynasty reached its territorial peak under Chandra Gupta II. During his reign the Shaka kingdom of the Malwa region was finally conquered, after which the Guptas controlled by conquest or tribute all of northern India and modern Pakistan, as well as the Coromandel Coast all the way to modern Madras. The Gupta dynasty flourished between about 350 and 550 C.E., and its reign is associated with the development of Indian culture and a revival of Hinduism in northern India. Both were accomplished through the patronage of the Gupta kings, who are remembered both as patrons of high culture and ardent devotees (bhakta) of Shiva. This is especially true of Chandra Gupta II, since one of the major figures associated with his court is Kalidasa, considered the greatest of the Sanskrit poets. See also Shaka era.

Chandragupta Maurya
(r. 321–297 B.C.E.) The founder of the Maurya dynasty. The young Chandragupta began his empire by overthrowing the last member of the Nanda dynasty and occupying the capital in Pataliputra, identified with the modern city of Patna in the state of Bihar. From there he took control of the Ganges River basin, moved south into the region of the Narmada River, and then turned his attention to northwestern India, taking advantage of the power vacuum left by the recent incursion of Alexander the Great. In 303 B.C.E. he defeated Alexander's general Seleucus Nicator in battle, then agreed to a treaty in which he received large parts of modern Afghanistan. Despite the battle, relations seem to have been friendly between the two, for Seleucus Nicator sent an ambassador to Pataliputra, Megasthenes, who lived there for many years. Chandragupta was reportedly advised by a brilliant brahmin minister, variously called Kautilya or Chanakya, who is considered the author of the Arthashastra. According to legend, Chandragupta renounced his throne to become a Jain monk and eventually died through ritual starvation.

Chandramati
In Hindu mythology, the long-suffering wife of King Harishchandra. Harishchandra is famous for his truthfulness and integrity; in modern Hindu culture he is also the paradigm for a person who patiently endures undeserved suffering. Harishchandra's suffering grows out of the competition between the sages Vasishtha and Vishvamitra. As his family priest, Vasishtha praises Harishchandra's virtue. Vishvamitra is determined to prove Vasishtha wrong and subjects Harishchandra to a series of trials in which he loses his kingdom, his possessions, and has to sell himself and his family into slavery. Through all of the trials he and Chandramati have to suffer, Harishchandra retains his integrity. After enduring many hardships, including the death of their only son, they are eventually restored to their original happy state, including the resuscitation of their son.

Chandrayana
(“moon's path”) Penitential rite (prayashchitta) lasting for one lunar month in which the penitent's food consumption mirrors the monthly course of the moon. A person observing this rite begins by eating fourteen mouthfuls of food on the first day of the waning moon, then one less mouthful on each successive day until the new moon day, when a complete fast (upavasa) is observed. On each successive day during the waxing moon, the penitent eats one more mouthful, finishing at fifteen on the day of the full moon. This is a fairly severe penance, given the scant amount of food allowed in the middle of the month. In the dharma literature, this penance was prescribed as an atonement for certain sorts of sexual misconduct: sexual intercourse with a woman belonging to the same gotra (mythic lineage), marrying a woman belonging to one's maternal grandfather's gotra, or marrying the daughter of one's maternal uncle or paternal aunt.

Charaka
(1st–2nd c. C.E.) The attributed author of the Charaka Samhita, which along with the slightly later Sushruta Samhita, is one of the two major sources for ayurveda, a traditional school of Indian medicine. According to tradition, Charaka was the physician at the royal court in the city of Takshashila, in modern Pakistan.

Charaka Samhita
Along with the later Sushruta Samhita, one of the two major sources for the traditional Indian medical school known as ayurveda. Although its authorship is attributed to Charaka, it is more likely a compendium from earlier sources, given its reference to several different medical systems and approaches. The underlying medical framework of ayurveda is the theory of the three bodily humors—vata (wind), pitta (bile), and kapha (phlegm). Although everyone has all three humors, each of these is composed of different elements whose varying proportions are used to explain individual body types, metabolic dispositions, and personalities. Diseases result from an imbalance of these humors—caused by one’s environment or personal habits—whereas equilibrium is the state of health. The Charaka Samhita has been edited and translated into various languages and has served as a source for secondary studies, such as Debiprasad Chattopadhyaya, Science and Society in Ancient India, 1977.

Charanadas
(“slave of [God’s] feet”; 1733–1782 C.E.) Founder of the Charanadasis, an ascetic religious community. Charanadas was born in the town of Dehra in the princely state of Alwar (in the modern state of Rajasthan). The Charanadasis are also known as the Shuka Sampradaya because, according to tradition, Charanadas received initiation from the puranic sage Shuka. Charanadas formed his community in protest against the corruption and worldliness of the Pushti Marg, the religious community founded by Vallabhacharya (1479–1531 C.E.), whose members are devotees (bhakta) of the god Krishna. Like the Pushti Marg, the Charanadasis are Vaishnavas, but their patron deity is not Krishna alone, but also his consort, Radha. The Charanadasis have stressed both learning and an upright way of life. Their main center is in Delhi, as is the samadhi shrine of Charanadas, their founder.

Charanamrta
(“foot nectar”) Literally, the water (or other liquid) in which the feet of one’s guru or images of a deity are bathed. The disciple or devotee (bhakta) consumes it as a sign of subordinate status and as a way to receive grace and blessings. By extension, the word can refer to any liquid for devotees to consume as a symbol of the deity’s grace, whether or not it has been used for bathing (snana).

Charas
Name for hashish. This is usually mixed with tobacco and smoked in a straight pipe called a chillum. Smoking hashish is typical in certain segments of the ascetic community. For many ascetics, smoking is a social activity and a rite of hospitality as well as a religious act that emulates the god Shiva, whose love for the drug is well known. In their travels many ascetics process the marijuana that grows wild throughout the Himalayas into hashish to use and sell. Drug use is forbidden for most people, but among ascetics—who are deliberately marginal members of society—it is a fairly common and tolerated behavior.

Charanadasi
Vaishnava ascetic sect founded by the reformer-saint Charanadas (1733–1782 C.E.). Charanadas formed his own community as a protest against the corruption of the Pushti Marg, the religious community founded by Vallabhacharya (1479–1531 C.E.) whose members are devotees (bhakta) of the god Krishna. Like the Pushti Marg, the Charanadasis are Vaishnavas, but their patron deity is not Krishna alone, but also his consort, Radha. The Charanadasis have stressed both learning and an upright way of life. Their main center is in Delhi, as is the samadhi shrine of Charanadas, their founder.

Charvaka
One of the traditional names given to the materialist philosophical school. Its primary assertion was that a person is identical to his or her physical body and is destroyed with the body’s demise. See materialist.
Chataka
In Sanskrit poetry and literature, the name for the cuckoo bird, usually invoked as a symbol of longing.

Chatterjee, Bankim Chandra
(1838–1894) Bengali writer and Indian nationalist who was one of the major figures in the nineteenth-century revival of Bengali literature and in making the area a hotbed of opposition to British rule. As a young man, Chatterjee perceived how the influence of English language and culture was superseding that of Indian culture among educated Indians. He sought to reverse this through his writing and political activism by encouraging Indian intellectuals to rediscover their classical culture. He became a seminal figure in both literature and politics, paving the way for the poet Rabindranath Tagore and political activists Aurobindo Ghose and Subhash Chandra Bose. Chatterjee's most famous novel, Anandamath, focused on the late eighteenth-century Sanyasi Rebellion, in which bands of militant ascetics, both Hindu and Muslim, fought with the British East India Company for control of Bengal. Although historical inquiry attributes this conflict to social and economic tensions in contemporary Bengal, Chatterjee portrays it allegorically as a struggle by Mother India's loyal children to expel the British invaders. Chatterjee also wrote the words to "Vande Mataram" ("Homage to Mother [India]"), a patriotic song often described as the unofficial Indian national anthem.

Chatti
A pilgrim shelter, particularly in the Himalayas. The word chatti is a variant form of the word for "umbrella" and was used because these shelters were often simply roofs supported by pillars, to keep the pilgrims dry in case of rain. Up until the middle of the twentieth century, many Himalayan pilgrims still traveled on foot and used a network of chattis along the pilgrimage routes. These chattis were eight to twelve miles... apart, an easy day’s walk for younger pilgrims, yet manageable for the elderly. Each chatti was maintained by a nearby family, which would sell the pilgrims wood and food grains and provide them with cooking utensils. This arrangement brought income to mountain families during the pilgrimage season and freed pilgrims to carry only their personal belongings. The advent of paved roads and bus transportation has largely rendered this network obsolete, although it survives in certain place names, such as Janaki Chatti and Hanuman Chatti.

Chatuh-Sampradaya Nagas
Collective name for four groups (sampradaya) of militant (Naga) ascetics who are all devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. They all trace their spiritual lineage to a different Vaishnava religious community, each of which is connected with a major Vaishnava figure. By far the most populous and powerful of these groups is the Shri sampradaya of the Ramanandi ascetics, which traces its descent through the poet-saint Ramananda to the southern Indian philosopher Ramanuja, whom they claim as Ramananda’s guru. The Sanaka sampradaya of the Nimbarki ascetics traces its spiritual lineage to the philosopher Nimbarka. The Rudra sampradaya of the Vishnuswami ascetics traces its lineage through the philosopher Vallabhacharya to an earlier figure, Vishnuswami. Finally, the Brahma sampradaya of the Gaudiya Vaishnava ascetics traces its spiritual line through the Bengali saint Chaitanya to the southern Indian philosopher Madhva. Each of these sampradayas is differentiated not only by its founder but also by its patron deity or deities. The Ramanandis worship the god Rama, whereas the others worship the god Krishna and, to different extents, his consort, Radha.

Scholars doubt that these groups were ever actually connected to the people whom they claim as their founders. The distinctions among the sampradayas appear to be largely academic. Given that the overwhelming majority of these ascetics are Ramanandis, the others seem important only for representing the other great Vaishnava religious figures. The distinctions between groups are only significant during the bathing (snana) festival known as the Kumbha Mela, at which they determine the order of certain groups in the bathing processions. For more information see Peter van der Veer, Gods on Earth, 1988.

Chaturbhujadas
(late 16th c.) One of the ashtachap, a group of eight northern Indian bhakti (devotional) poets. The compositions of these eight poets were used for liturgical purposes by the Pushti Marg, a religious community whose members are devotees (bhakta) of Krishna. In the Pushti Marg’s sectarian literature, all eight are named as members of the community and as associates of either its founder, Vallabhacharya, or his successor, Vitthalnath. Chaturbhujadas is claimed as an associate of Vitthalnath—an idea supported by references in his poetry—and is also said to be the son of Kumbhadas, one of the earlier ashtachap poets. In his poetry Chaturbhujadas presents himself as a companion to Krishna and his consort, Radha, giving latter-day devotees a picture of their daily routine.

Chaturmas Vrat
A period of time spanning four lunar months, beginning on the festival of Devshayani Ekadashi (June–July) and ending on the festival of Devotthayan Ekadashi (October–November). The four months in between these festivals are considered ritually inauspicious, since during that time the god Vishnu is considered to be sleeping, and the protective power in the universe is less attentive. Thus people generally do not perform auspicious life cycle rites such as weddings during this period. This time also coincides with the coming of the monsoon, which is essential for helping crops to grow but also brings danger from waterborne infections and venomous snakes. Chaturmas Vrat’s inauspicious qualities and the difficulty of travel caused by the monsoon make this a time when wandering ascetics should stay in one place. Religious worship during this period tends to stress rites of protection, to shield one from these ritual and physical dangers. See also inauspiciousness.

Chau
One of the classical dance forms of India; some of the others are Bharatanatyam, Kathak, Orissi, Kuchipudi, Kathakali, and Manipuri. Different forms of Chau are found in the border areas shared by the states of Orissa, Bihar, and West Bengal. In all three regions, the dancers wear masks (chau), making this type different from other classical dance forms. The expressions on the masks set a mood and conceal the dancers’ faces. Consequently, Chau performers use their bodies and gestures to develop the moods established by their masks. The prevailing themes in Chau dance are drawn from the mythical adventures of gods and heroes, particularly the mythology of the god Shiva. For further information see Mohan Khokar, Traditions of Indian Classical Dance, 1984.

Chaupai
(“four-footed”) Poetic form in northern Indian poetry. As its name suggests, the chaupai is made up of four lines. The rhyme scheme is aabb, which has led some to consider it a compound of two two-line segments. Based on the distinction between “heavy” and “light” syllables, each line contains sixteen metric beats arranged in a pattern of 6 + 4 + 4 + 2. A heavy syllable contains a long vowel or a consonant cluster and is counted as two metric beats; all other syllables are light and count as one beat. The chaupai is one of the most important meters in medieval Hindi literature, particularly for longer narrative works, and it is a significant meter in bhakti (devotional) poetry. Its most famous use appears in the Ramcharitmanas, the Ramayana retold by the poet-saint Tulsidas.

Chaurasi Vaishnavan Ki Varta (“account of eighty-four Vaishnavas”) Sectarian hagiography supposedly composed by Gokulnath, the third guru of the Pushti Marg, a religious community of Krishna devotees (bhakta) founded by the philosopher Vallabhacharya (1479–1531). It is more likely that the text was written by Gokulnath’s disciple Hariray, who also wrote a commentary on the work. The text describes the lives of eighty-four paradigmatic Vaishnavas, all of whom were allegedly associated with the sect’s first two gurus, Vallabhacharya and Vitthalnath. The text’s primary purpose is to illustrate the importance of the Pushti Marg, particularly the importance of the Pushti Marg’s leaders on these eighty-four religious figures. This makes it an interesting sectarian work, but it is not historically reliable.

Chauri
A small whisk used to brush off flies and insects. The name is derived from the word for the long tail hairs of a yak (chamara), from which it was originally made. In ancient India the chauri was an emblem of royalty, and thus it is also often seen in statues of religious figures such as the Didarganj Yakshi.

Chayagrahi
(“shadow grabber”) A demoness in the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics. Chayagrahi lives in the ocean and catches birds flying overhead by grasping their shadows in the water and pulling the helpless creatures down to her waiting jaws. This method brings her a steady food supply, but her big mistake is trying to capture the monkey-god, Hanuman, in this way. Hanuman tries to leap over the ocean to Lanka, the capital of the demon-king Ravana, to search for his abducted mistress, Sita. Chayagrihi grabs him and drags him down, but he quickly kills her and continues on his way.

Chera Dynasty
Hindu dynasty that ruled much of the modern state of Kerala from the second century B.C.E. to the eighth century C.E. The Cheras were in continual conflict with the Pandyas and the Cholas, the two other dynasties in the deep south, and were eventually absorbed when the Cholas gained control in the ninth century C.E. See also Chola dynasty.

Chidambaram
("clothed in thought") Temple town in the South Arcot district of the state of Tamil Nadu, about 125 miles south of Madras. The town of Chidambaram is famous for the temple of the same name, dedicated to the god Shiva in his form as Nataraja, the lord of the dance. This temple is also renowned as containing the subtlest of the five elemental lingas (bhutalingas), the linga made from space. The temple is built in the classical Dravida style, with temple towers (gopurams) rising in each of the cardinal directions, and the walls enclosing the temple between them. The present temple was erected in the tenth century C.E., when Chidambaram was the capital of the Chola dynasty, and is reputed to be one of the oldest temples in southern India. As lord of the dance, Nataraja symbolizes the connection between religion and the arts. Nataraja is the primal dancer whose dance encompasses creation, destruction, and all things in between. Human dancers imitate him literally, by performing the dance positions he codified, and figuratively, by participating in a creative activity. The temple's eastern wall has relief carvings of the 108 basic dance positions (karanas) that are still central to classical Indian dance, particularly to the Bharatanatyam school, which is the major dance form in Tamil Nadu. Nataraja also has a group of hereditary servants, the Dikshitars. According to their tradition, the Dikshitars were members of Shiva's heavenly host (gana) and accompanied him down from heaven when he took up residence in Chidambaram.

Chidvilasananda
(b. Malti Shetty, 1955) Modern Hindu teacher and successor to Swami Muktananda. Muktananda taught a type of spiritual discipline called siddha yoga, the "discipline of the adepts," which stresses chanting, meditation, learning, and above all, devotion to one's spiritual master. Chidvilasananda is the current leader and preceptor of SYDA (Siddha Yoga Dham America), the organization founded by her teacher. During her childhood, her parents and other members of her family were Muktananda's disciples, and she spent much of her life in his service, eventually serving as his translator during his visits to America. She and her brother, Subhash (who later took the name Nityananda), were both designated by Muktananda as his successors, but her brother left the organization a few years after Muktananda's death. Chidvilasananda continues to travel between an ashram in Ganeshpuri, near Bombay, and ashrams and centers around the world.

Childhood Rites
A collective name for the samskaras of early childhood, as specified in the Dharma Shastras, or treatises on religious duty (dharma). These rites include the jatakarma (birth ceremonies), namakarana (naming), nishkramana (first outing), annaprashana (first feeding), chudakarana (tonsure), and karnavedha (piercing the ears). Virtually all Hindu communities have ceremonies for ritually marking births and childhood, but few people perform the rites prescribed by the Dharma Shastras other than brahmins. For further information see Pandurang Vaman Kane (trans.), A History of Dharmaśastra, 1968; and Raj Bali Pandey, Hindu Sanskaras, 1969. The former is encyclopedic and the latter more accessible; despite their age they remain the best sources for traditional Hindu rites.

Child Marriages

Until well into the twentieth century, in many families it was traditional to marry off their children before the onset of puberty. An early marriage was deemed particularly important for women, lest they come of age before they were married. Some apologists claim that this practice evolved as a way to preserve the honor of Hindu girls against the depredations of Muslim raiders. Though this may have been partially true, such depredations were not widespread enough to evolve such a well-accepted social practice. Traditional Indian culture ascribes a much stronger sex drive to women than to men, and an early marriage would ensure that they did not disgrace the family under the influence of their irresistible urges. These marriages were possible because arranged marriages were the norm, as they remain to this day.

Many of the Hindu reformist movements that began in the late nineteenth century considered child marriages one of the “corruptions” of contemporary Hindu life and lobbied vigorously to forbid it. Modern Indian law sets the minimum age for marriage at sixteen for women and eighteen for men. These guidelines are often flouted, particularly in rural areas, where one still hears of marriages between infants. Although child marriages still occur, it is a very low-status practice in modern Indian society, associated with poverty, backwardness, and a lack of education. In contrast, men and women from the upper classes often do not marry until their late twenties, after pursuing advanced degrees. See also marriage ceremonies.

Child Widows

This term refers to girls who had been married as children and whose husbands (whether older men or boys their own age) died before the girls reached puberty and the marriage had been consummated. Although the lives of such child widows varied according to the status of their families, their lives were often quite grim, given the traditional prohibitions on widow remarriage and the strict behavioral codes mandated for widows. Reformers in the nineteenth century, such as Ram Mohan Roy, championed the drive to promote societal acceptance of second marriages for child widows. Due to the sharp decline in the frequency of child marriages, child widows are extremely uncommon in modern times. See also marriage prohibitions.

Chillum

Implement used for smoking. The chillum is a graduated cylinder of baked clay that is usually about six inches long, which is about an inch in diameter at the top and half that at the bottom. A pyramid-shaped piece of clay is wedged point-down in the cylinder to cut down on the airflow. The top part of the cylinder is filled with tobacco, cannabis, or a mixture of tobacco and hashish (charas). Smoking is a communal activity in which the chillum is passed from one person to another. The bottom of the chillum is covered with a cloth called a safai, which is sometimes changed from person to person and is often dipped in water to mellow the smoke. Chillum etiquette holds that one should not place one’s mouth directly on the bottom of the implement, which would render it impure. Because of this, the chillum is generally held between one’s fingers, often in highly elaborate and symbolic ways. Among many ascetics, smoking the chillum is a part of daily life, a congregational exercise, and also the act of emulating the god Shiva, the paradigmatic ascetic, whose love for drugs is well known.

Chinmayanand, Swami
(b. Balakrishna Menon, 1915–1993) Modern Hindu ascetic and teacher. Chinmayanand became an ascetic under the influence of Swami Shivananda, whose articles Chinmayanand had first read while serving a prison sentence for his involvement in the independence movement. For several years he devoted himself to the study of ancient texts and became one of the leading authorities of the Vedas. Part of his legacy is the Chinmayanand Mission, which carried the abstract, intellectual, and peaceful message of the Vedanta philosophical school to the world. Another part of his legacy is the Vishva Hindu Parishad, a modern militant Hindu organization. He was one of its founding members in 1964, and for some years he was the only ascetic on its governing council.

Chinmoy, Shri
(b. 1931) Modern Hindu teacher and missionary, who since 1964 has spent much of his life addressing Western audiences. His teachings are largely drawn from classical ideas on yoga and stress the importance of vegetarianism, discipline, and service to one’s guru. His own lifestyle is austere and largely unostentatious, as an example to his followers. On one hand he is notable for his attention to the arts—painting, poetry, and music, particularly the bamboo flute—and on the other for performing prodigious feats of strength to demonstrate the power of mind over matter. He is based in New York City, although like many modern Hindu teachers, he travels throughout the world.

Chin (“consciousness”) Mudra
In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, a particular symbolic hand gesture (mudra) in which the tips of the thumb and index finger are touching, with the rest of the fingers extended and the palm facing the viewer. This is the hand gesture used to signify explanation or exposition. For this reason it is also known as the vyakhyana (“teaching”) mudra and the sandarshana (“expository”) mudra.

Chinnamasta
(“She whose head [masta] has been cut off [chinna]”) Particular manifestation of the Goddess, one of the Mahavidyas (a group of ten powerful goddesses), and an important deity in the esoteric ritual tradition known as tantra. The image of Chinnamasta is one of the most striking in Hindu iconography: a naked headless woman often seated on a copulating couple, holding her head on a platter and gushing three streams of blood from her neck—two into the mouths of Chinnamasta’s attendant deities and one into the lips of her own severed head. The story behind this figure is that Chinnamasta severs her own head to satisfy the demands of her attendants because they have not drunk their fill of blood in battle. This image graphically portrays the interconnections between nourishment, sex, and death and the power of the Goddess over all of these things. Although Chinnamasta is powerful, she does not have many temples dedicated to her. One of the most important is the temple of the goddess Chintapurni, identified as a form of Chinnamasta in the Shiwalik Hills. For further information see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986; and Kathleen Erndl, Victory to the Mother, 1993.

Chintapurni
(“She who fulfills one’s wishes”) Presiding goddess of a temple in a village by the same name in the state of Himachal Pradesh. Chintapurni is one of the Shiwalik goddesses, a group of local deities in the Shiwalik Hills who are all considered to be manifestations of a single feminine divine energy. Chintapurni is considered to be a form of the goddess Chinnamasta, and this temple is one of the few dedicated exclusively to her.

Chir Ghat
("Clothing Ghat") A bathing (snana) place on the Yamuna River in the town of Brindavan, which is identified as the site for one of the most famous stories about Krishna. The story tells how the gopis, Krishna's female companions, have taken a religious vow to bathe each morning in the Yamuna during the cold months and dedicate the religious merit from this vow toward gaining Krishna as their beloved. Although their austerity is laudable, they are also bathing naked, which is taboo in Hindu culture. Krishna spies them in the water and climbs up in a tree with their clothes. He then refuses to return the clothes until the mortified women come out of the water to ask for them, symbolically demonstrating the nakedness of the soul before God and humans’ inability to control the divine. A gigantic tree still stands by the Chir Ghat, which is believed to be the same tree from which Krishna humbled the gopis. As pilgrims recall the story, they tie strips of cloth to the tree to relieve the gopis’ embarrassment and share in their feeling of communion.

Chitpavan
A brahmin jati that is a subset of the Maharashtri brahmins, who were themselves one of the five southern brahmin communities (Pancha Dravida). Jatis were endogamous subgroups of traditional Indian society whose status was determined by the group’s hereditary occupation. This sort of differentiation applied even to brahmins, whose role has been to serve as priests, scholars, and teachers. The core region for the Chitpavan brahmins is in western Maharashtra, particularly the coastline and the region around Poona. Although never very numerous, they were historically significant both as the chief ministers (peshwas) to the Maratha kings and also for producing some of the great figures in the struggle for independence: M. G. Ranade, G. K. Gokhale, B. G. Tilak, and V. D. Savarkar. Because this group of brahmins was largely located on the Konkan coastline, they are also known as Konkanastha.

Chitrakut
City in the Banda district of Uttar Pradesh, about sixty miles south and west of the city of Allahabad. In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics, Chitrakut is the place in which Rama, the epic’s hero, his wife Sita, and his brother Lakshmana live during the early part of their exile. It is here as well that Rama instructs another brother, Bharata, to rule as regent until the fourteen years of Rama’s exile have ended.

Chitswami
(late 16th c. C.E.) One of the ashtachap, a group of eight northern Indian bhakti (devotional) poets. The compositions of these eight poets were used for liturgical purposes by the Pushti Marg, a religious community whose members are devotees (bhakta) of Krishna. In the Pushti Marg’s sectarian literature, all eight are also named as members of the community and as associates of either the community’s founder, Vallabhacharya, or his successor, Vitthalnath. Chitswami is traditionally associated with Vitthalnath, a link confirmed by his poems written in praise of this guru. Aside from such explicitly sectarian compositions, Chitswami also wrote poetry in praise of Krishna, which tends to be more elaborate and uses more Sanskrit than his contemporaries. To date, his works have not been translated, perhaps because interest in them is limited to a small sect.

Chittirai
(2) Ten-day festival celebrated in the southern Indian city of Madurai during the Tamil month of Chittirai (March–April). Madurai is famous for its gigantic temple dedicated to the goddess Minakshi, and the Chittirai festival celebrates Minakshi’s marriage to the god Shiva in his form as Sundareshvara. According to mythology, Minakshi is a fierce goddess who vows that she will marry only a man who bests her in battle. She fights and conquers all of the kings of the earth, but when she approaches Shiva, she is suddenly and spontaneously stricken with modesty. The powerful warrior is transformed into a shy and bashful girl, and she becomes his wife.

Although the wedding of a goddess normally marks her domestication and subordination to her spouse, in this case Minakshi remains the more powerful deity. She is the patron of Madurai, with a temple dedicated to her, whereas Shiva is merely her consort. The wedding is celebrated with great festivity throughout the city, and one of the high points is the public procession of the deities around the city in the temple chariots. For further information see Dean David Shulman, Tamil Temple Myths, 1980; the festival is also the subject of a film, The Wedding of the Goddess, produced by the South Asia Center of the University of Wisconsin at Madison.

Chokamela
(d. 1338 C.E.) Poet and saint in the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba at his temple at Pandharpur in the modern state of Maharashtra. Chokamela was born an untouchable Mahar, and he is the only untouchable among the Varkari saints. Despite Chokamela’s deep devotion to Vithoba, his low social status prohibited him from ever entering the god’s temple, since his very presence would have rendered it impure. The hagiographical literature tells many tales where Vithoba comes outside to meet him. Chokamela's memorial shrine is at the steps of the temple, the same steps that marked his boundary during his life. It seems that Chokamela accepted the restrictions that came with his social status, but some of his poetry expresses social protest. For further information see G. A. Deleury, The Cult of Vithoba, 1960; and Eleanor Zelliot, “Chokamela and Eknath: Two Bhakti Modes of Legitimacy for Modern Change,” in Journal of Asian and African Studies, Vol. 15, Nos. 1–2, 1980.

Chola Dynasty
(9th–13th c. C.E.) Southern Indian dynasty whose ancestral homeland was the Tanjore district of Tamil Nadu. The earliest Chola capital was in the city of Tanjore itself, but was later moved to Gangaikondacholapuram under Rajendra I (r. 1014–1042 C.E.). The Tanjore district is in the Cauvery River delta and is extremely fertile rice-growing land. The Chola monarchs used this agricultural strength as the foundation for their empire. The Cholas were originally vassals of the Pallava dynasty but became independent late in the ninth century. In the tenth and eleventh centuries, the Cholas were the dominant power in southern India, controlling much of peninsular India and Sri Lanka and sending naval expeditions as far as Malaysia. The Cholas were noted for their public works, particularly the construction of massive temples in the Tanjore district and other parts of Tamil Nadu; one of the most impressive was the Brihadeshvar temple built by Raja Raja (r. 985–1014 C.E.). On a smaller scale, the Chola dynasty also patronized exquisite sculptures, especially bronzes. This dynasty’s rapid rise was marked by an equally swift demise. By the middle of the thirteenth century, they had been attacked several times by the Pandya dynasty and were finally conquered in 1279.

Chudakarana
(“tonsure”) Samskara
The eighth of the traditional life cycle ceremonies (samskaras). In the chudakarana samskara, the hair is shaved off of the child’s head, although frequently a tuft of hair (chuda) is left. This is the last of the childhood samskaras, marking the ritual end of infancy, and it is still often performed in modern India, particularly by brahmin families. The timing for this rite is usually determined by family custom (kulachara), although in many cases it is performed when the child’s age is an odd number (most commonly at one, three, or five years old). Since most Indian babies are born with hair, and hair is commonly believed to trap impurities, the chudakarana is seen as a rite of purification where the last of the residual impurities from childbirth are removed. As in many other cultures, this cut-off hair is believed to retain a powerful connection with the child. Traditional belief holds that in the wrong hands, this hair could be used to work black magic against the child. Given this concern, the hair is usually carefully gathered and disposed of, most often by putting it into running water.

Chunar
Sandstone quarry about twenty-five miles south of modern Benares. This quarry is notable as the source of the stone for the pillars erected by the Mauryan king Ashoka. The pillars were set up on the major trade routes within his empire and were inscribed with royal proclamations known as the pillar edicts. See also Maurya dynasty.

Churail
(perhaps from the Sanskrit word cur, meaning “to steal”) Feminine malignant spirit believed to be the ghost of a woman who dies childless, in childbirth, or with her desires somehow unsatisfied. These frustrated desires lead such spirits to seek revenge by harming others, particularly children, to destroy the happiness they were denied. For further information about churails and other unquiet spirits of the dead, see Lawrence Babb, The Divine Hierarchy, 1975; Ann Grodzins Gold, Fruitful Journeys, 1988; and Sudhir Kakar, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1991.

Cinnabar
Common name for mercuric sulfide, which takes the form of red crystals or clumps. Cinnabar is important in Indian alchemy, particularly that of the mercuリアル (dhatuvada) school because it is a chemical union of the two elements representing the god Shiva (mercury) and his consort, Shakti (sulfur). According to Hindu alchemy, the world is a series of bipolar opposites in tension with one another. By unifying these opposing forces, one may achieve spiritual progress and the end of reincarnation (samsara). In Hindu alchemy this is done by physically consuming various substances. In this case, mercury is said to be Shiva's semen and sulfur Shakti's uterine blood; their combination and consumption is believed to spur the aspirant's progress.

Collyrium
A salve for the eyes, traditionally made from soot, camphor, beeswax, and various fragrances. Part of its function is cosmetic—it is used to outline and define the eyes. It is also widely believed to have medicinal qualities that improve one's vision and heal various minor eye ailments.

Commensality
This word refers to patterns of social exchange, particularly those associated with eating. In traditional Hindu society, the hierarchical status distinctions between different social groups were both marked and maintained by strict rules on exchanges and sharing. Traditional marriage customs illustrate the role of social groups, in which people married those who belonged to their own particular jati ("birth"), or social subgroup. Another arena in which these concerns were quite visible was that of food. Cooked food is believed to be extremely susceptible to ritual impurity (ashaucha) and can transmit impurities to the person eating it. To shield themselves from this source of impurity, groups with higher social status would not accept cooked foods from groups with lower social status. In contrast, lower-status groups would accept cooked foods from groups with higher status.

These concerns over maintaining social status set up certain eating patterns whose influence is still evident. Higher-status groups, particularly brahmans, would generally eat with members of their own community and only when a brahmin had cooked the food. For groups highly concerned with ritual purity, the best meal is one cooked at home by a family member, because this ensures the food's purity. Even in modern times, the most orthodox brahmans will eat food cooked outside the home only when it cannot be avoided. It is always considered preferable to eat food brought from home, whether one is on a long journey or merely at lunch in the office. Although in earlier times, the groups with the highest status would generally not eat with others, this custom has changed. Thus brahmin office workers may eat lunch with colleagues from many different communities, but they would never think of inviting them for a meal at their homes. For further information on the way that exchanges reveal status differences, see McKim Marriot, "Hindu Transactions: Diversity Without Dualism," in Bruce Kapferer (ed.), Transaction and Meaning, 1976.

Conch Shell
With the end of its spiral removed, this was used as both a musical instrument and a weapon of war, since the sound of certain conch shells was believed to strike terror into people's hearts. This is Coomaraswamy was largely responsible for publicizing Hindu miniature painting as a genre distinct from the contemporary Muslim court painting. Due to the strength of this and other interpretive scholarly works, he became curator of Indian and Muslim art at the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston. He held this post from 1917 to 1931, and his catalog of the museum’s collection shows painstaking and objective scholarship. In his later years, he began to publish works on aesthetics, myth, religion, and culture, focusing not only on India but also on traditional Europe.

Corbelling

In the realm of architecture this term refers to the creation of a dome or arch through overlapping masonry courses. This technique was widely used in Indian temples, particularly those constructed in the Nagara style of architecture in Orissa and the rest of northern India. Corbelling was the prevailing method of creating the shape of an arch, since the true arch—in which each part is supported in tension with the others—was unknown in classical Hindu architecture.

Coromandel

Traditional name for the southern Indian coastal region bordering the Bay of Bengal, in the modern states of Tamil Nadu and Andhra Pradesh.

Corpse

In the Hindu worldview, a corpse is the source of the most virulent possible ritual impurity (ashaucha). Although Hindus accept death as an inevitable part of life, the dangers caused by a corpse cannot be ignored. The dead body must be appropriately handled, both to protect the living from danger and to help the deceased make a smooth transition to the next life. For this reason the last rites (antyeshthi samskara) are begun on the day of death itself. Among the earliest of these... rites is the cremation of the dead body, since the impurity will continue to affect those around the body until it has been consumed by fire. A second reason for immediate cremation is to get rid of a potential host for wandering spirits, who according to popular fears, can reanimate a corpse.

Coryat, Thomas (1577–1617) English traveler in India popularly known as the English faqir. Coryat came to India from Persia and spent several years traveling around the Moghul empire in northern India as well as residing in the Moghul court at Agra. Although at times his need for patronage made him play the role of a buffoon and flatterer, Coryat was a careful observer who was full of curiosity. He is believed to have been the first European traveler to visit the pilgrimage city of Haridwar, and he was impressed with the rites performed there. He is also believed to have gone into the Shiwalik Hills all the way to the temple at Jwalamukhi. Unfortunately, Coryat died of dysentery before he could record these observations, and the only available references to these later journeys come from his companion, the Reverend Edward Terry. Cosmic Egg (brahmmanda) One of the traditional cosmological metaphors, which first appears in the Markandeya Purana. This text describes a single swollen egg floating on the waters of the sea of pralaya, or cosmic dissolution. When this egg is broken open by Brahma, its constituent parts (yolk, white, shell, and various membranes) form both the material universe and all the creatures in it. Although this account is clearly symbolic, it vividly expresses the Hindu conviction that all things have come from a single source, and thus the entire cosmos is an organic whole. For further elaboration see Cornelia Dimmitt and J. A. B. van Buitenen (eds. and trans.), Classical Hindu Mythology, 1978.

Cosmic Time

In traditional Indian cosmology, time has neither beginning nor end. Instead it proceeds in unceasing cyclic alternations between creation and activity, followed by cessation and quietude. The universe thus has neither an ultimate beginning nor an ultimate end—creation will always be followed by destruction and then destruction by a new creation. Within the confines of this assumption, there are several different and sometimes competing systems for measuring cosmic time.

The largest generally accepted measure of time, spanning 4.32 billion years, is the kalpa, or day of Brahma. This is the ultimate limit for the existence of the created world, although within this period the universe undergoes periodic renewals. At the conclusion of the day of Brahma comes the universal dissolution (pralaya), in which the universe is completely destroyed and reabsorbed into the god Vishnu. The day of Brahma is followed by a night of equal length, during which the only living thing is Vishnu; the god sleeps on the back of his serpent couch, Shesha, which floats on the surface of the cosmic ocean. When the night of Brahma is ended, a lotus sprouts from Vishnu’s navel. This lotus opens to reveal the god Brahma, who takes up the work of creation, and the cycle of activity begins anew. Because of his spontaneous appearance at the beginning of every cosmic age, one of the names for Brahma is Svayambhu (“self-born”). Unlike the Judeo-Christian concept of creation, Brahma does not create the world from nothing but merely arranges and fashions existing elements into a coherent and ordered cosmos.

The day of Brahma is broken up into smaller units according to various systems. By far the most common system is that of the four yugas, or cosmic ages. According to this idea, the day of Brahma is made up of one thousand mahayugas ("great cosmic ages"), each of which lasts for 43.2 million years. Each mahayuga is composed of four constituent yugas, named the Kṛta yuga, Treta yuga, Dvapara yuga, and Kali yuga. Each of these is shorter than its predecessor and ushers in an era more degenerate and depraved. The passage of the four yugas begins with a time of sudden and dramatic renewal at the onset of the kṛta yuga, followed by a steady and persistent decline. Although the kali yuga is the shortest of the four ages, it is also the time of the greatest wickedness and depravity, in which any evil is possible. It is also, not surprisingly, considered to be the period in which we are now living. By the end of the kali yuga, things have gotten so bad that the only solution is the destruction and recreation of the earth, at which time the next kṛta era begins. Even though the kali yuga is the shortest age, it still lasts for 432,000 years, and the preceding yugas are two, three, and four times the length of the kali age. The increasing degeneracy of each of the four yugas is symbolized by the metals associated with them: gold (kṛta), silver (dvapara), bronze (treta) and iron (kali). Another indication is the status of human beings, who are said to become shorter, more wicked, and shorter-lived in each succeeding age. The paradigm of the four yugas leaves little room in traditional Hinduism for the notion of progress, since according to this system, things will never be better than they have already been. It idealizes a lost and unattainable past rather than a utopian future.

An alternate system of measuring cosmic time connects the human and the divine calendars, with one human year equal to a single day for the gods. The six months when the sun travels toward the north (uttarayana) is the divine day, whereas the six months when it travels south (dakshinayana) is the divine night. Since an Indian solar year is 360 solar days, a divine year would thus last for 360 human years. The life span of Brahma is one hundred divine years and thus 36,000 human years, after which the world is destroyed and created anew.

A third system is that of the Manvantaras, or ages of Manu. This system divides the day of Brahma into fourteen equal ages, with each one lasting a little less than 309,000 years. Each age is identified by the particular divine sovereign (manu) who rules during that age. None of these three systems correspond to one another, and there is no real effort to reconcile them. This lack of correspondence indicates that their function was primarily mythic, to establish a coherent cosmic chronology and pattern rather than to describe actual events.

Hindu culture has no single cosmology but rather several different systems, each of which is well established in its own right. The oldest model appears in the Rg Veda (10.90), the oldest Hindu religious text, and is known as the Purusha Sukta ("Hymn to the Primeval Man"). This hymn describes the creation of the world and all living beings as the result of the sacrifice of the primeval man (purusha). Different parts of his body become different parts of the physical universe and the traditional social groups. Another Vedic metaphor is that of the Golden Embryo, which is the only existing thing until it develops into Prajapati, the creator of the universe. A third version, that of the Cosmic Egg, is found in the later religious texts known as the puranas, which are compilations of mythology and lore. According to this image, the entire universe is originally contained in the Cosmic Egg. Once it is broken, the egg's constituent parts (shell, white, yolk, and membranes) become all of the things of the earth. The final cosmological image from the puranas, and perhaps the most common, begins with the god Vishnu floating in the sea of cosmic dissolution (pralaya), lying on the back of his serpent couch, Shesha. When the time for creation comes, a lotus sprouts from Vishnu's navel and opens to reveal the god Brahma, who begins the process of creation. This process reverses at the onset of the cosmic dissolution, with Brahma being reabsorbed into Vishnu's body. Despite their differing symbols, all of these models share the conviction that the universe has come from a single source and thus that the entire cosmos is an organic whole.

Although there are many models for the origin of the cosmos, there is wider agreement about its geography. The universe is generally considered to have three tiers, and each of these tiers can have multiple levels. The visible world is considered the middle tier, sandwiched between the heavens of the upper world (often numbered as seven) and the realms of the underworld. Some of the latter are hells, whereas some of these lower worlds are simply considered to be alternate realms of existence. The visible world is often described as a series of concentric landmasses (dvipas) separated from each other by seven oceans (the saptasindhu), each composed of a different substance. The innermost of these landmasses is Jambudvipa, whose center is the mythical Mount Meru, often identified with Mount Kailas in the Himalayas. In traditional cosmology, Mount Meru stands at the center of the universe and is compared to the central calyx of a lotus. Mount Meru is surrounded by mountain ranges, with a different region in each of the cardinal directions. The region south of Mount Meru is the land known as Bharata, the traditional name for the Indian subcontinent. Bharata is said to be superior to the other three regions of Jambudvipa because only in Bharata are religious rituals correctly performed. In its mythic geography, therefore, India is considered the center of the universe and the best possible place to live to pursue religious life. For further information see Cornelia Dimmitt and J. A. B. van Buitenen, Classical Hindu Mythology, 1978. See also cosmic time.

Cow

Animal revered by almost all modern Hindus, although there is one small Hindu community in the state of Kerala that eats beef. Aside from this anomaly, reverence for the cow is one of the few unifying beliefs for almost all Hindu communities. Demands for a complete ban on cow slaughter have become a time-honored way for political groups to generate support from the orthodox Hindu community, although these demands carry far more weight in northern India, where a significant Muslim minority has few scruples about slaughtering and eating beef. Organized calls for such a ban began as early as the 1880s with the growth of tension between the Hindu and Muslim communities. This sentiment, generally called the Cow Protection Movement, has continued to the present day. Demands for a complete ban on cow slaughter have regularly surfaced since 1947, when India gained independence, and this is one of the loaded causes of Indian political life. Reverence for the cow goes to such lengths that one of the charitable acts performed by pious Hindus is to contribute to goshalas, institutions for old and infirm cows.

There is considerable speculation and some disagreement about the source of these feelings about the cow. Some arguments have stressed the cow's value in an agricultural society, as a source of both draft animals and reproducible wealth. Other arguments have stressed the cow's ability to transform agricultural waste into milk products and dung, a common fuel in much of northern India. Still others have noted the way that feelings about the cow are imbued with the symbolism of motherhood, since both are said to provide milk for a child's nourishment. This last point is probably the most important, since it is very clear that conservative Hindu feelings for the cow are based primarily on high emotional content rather than on rational considerations of costs and benefits.
Cow Dung
This is considered both ritually pure and purifying, perhaps because of its origin in the sacred cow. A piece of ground can be purified (as when preparing a site for a ritual) by smearing it with cow dung. Cow dung is one of the ingredients in the “five products of the cow” (pancha-gavya), which is drunk as a means of purification from sin. In addition to its spiritual significance, cattle dung is very important for daily life in the villages of India. When mixed with clay it forms a hard, dustless, and easily cleaned surface that is preferable to an earthen floor. It is also a reliable source of fuel available to even the poorest people.

Cow Protection Movement
General term for a grassroots conservative Hindu effort to ban the slaughter of cattle, particularly the cow. The traditional Hindu devotion to the cow has been articulated in calls for a ban on cow slaughter for more than a century. The call was first raised in 1875 by Swami Dayanand Saraswati, the founder of the reformist Arya Samaj. It continued to be a basic demand of later conservative Hindu-oriented groups, including the Hindu Mahasabha, the Ram Rajya Parishad, and the Vishva Hindu Parishad. The call for this ban occasionally surfaces even in contemporary times, since it carries strong support from many religiously conservative Hindus.

The cow protection demand continues to have profound political implications. Swami Dayanand Saraswati’s work in the late nineteenth century coincided with the awakening of Indian political consciousness and the beginnings of the struggle to regain power from British imperial rule. Under British power, overt political dissent was subject to heavy government restrictions, and outright rebellion was impossible. Since the British did not generally interfere with “religious” issues, the demand for a ban on cow slaughter was a way for Hindus to assert and define their identity and by implication affirm that India was a Hindu land.

The Cow Protection Movement also caused friction between the Hindu and Muslim communities, since Hindus...
worship cows, whereas Muslims eat them. Hindus saw Muslim beef consumption as a flagrant violation of their religious sensibilities, and Muslims saw the demand for a ban on cow slaughter as a thinly veiled attempt to reinforce Muslim status as second-class citizens. Communal relations were often particularly volatile around the annual Muslim festival of Id, at which it is traditional for each family to sacrifice an animal and in which many of the more affluent Muslim families would sacrifice cattle. As the relationship between these two communities deteriorated in the 1930s, cow slaughter (or rumor thereof) was often cited as the spark for communal riots in which hundreds of people were killed.

This tension persists in modern India, although it has rarely erupted into violence since the partition of the subcontinent in 1947. Modern India was founded as a secular state where the government does not favor any particular religious community. This founding ethos has made the Indian government reluctant to pass legislation banning cattle slaughter, despite continued calls from traditional Hindus. The Indian Muslim community, facing the reality of its minority status in a Hindu majority state, has had to be far more discreet about when and how such cow slaughter takes place.

Cow Slaughter
A complete ban on cow slaughter has been one of the more durable issues taken up by Hindu interest groups, from before India gained independence in 1947 all the way up to the present day. Although debate on this issue has continuously emerged and faded, it remains a reliable hot button for stirring Hindu passions. This issue has predictably carried far more weight in northern India, where there is a significant Muslim minority with no religious objection to slaughtering and eating beef. The first widespread demand for such a ban came during the Cow Protection Movement in the 1930s. This movement aggravated tense communal relations between the Hindu and Muslim communities, resulting in significant bloodshed. Since independence it has been a perennial demand by religious leaders and ascetics, and it has been an issue in the platform of Hindu political organizations such as the Jana Sangh, Shiv Sena, Vishva Hindu Parishad (VHP), and Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP). In the past, such demands had little effect since the proponents did not have the power to implement them. As the BJP and the Shiv Sena have gained control of state and local governments, they have tried to implement this policy. In late 1995 the VHP initiated a national drive to ban cow slaughter completely. Like many of the VHP’s campaigns, this was undertaken just before upcoming elections, in this case at the national level. This campaign was seen as an attempt to polarize the Hindu electorate in an effort to influence the national election.

Creation
See cosmology and cosmic time.

Creation Hymn
Popular name for a hymn in the Rg Veda (10.129), which is one of the most unusual hymns in the Vedas. The four Vedas are the oldest Hindu religious texts, and based on its style and content, the Rg Veda is the oldest of these. Most of the hymns in the Rg Veda are invocations addressed to various divinities. These hymns are sung to invoke and propitiate these divinities so that human beings may enjoy the good things in life. In marked contrast to the confidence and optimism found in the earlier hymns, the Creation Hymn takes a far more speculative tone. In the Creation Hymn, the poet begins by imagining a time before the existence of Being and Nonbeing, and he speculates on the origin of the world. In the end the poet ascribes all creation to a single impersonal agent, “That One” (Tad Ekam). However, the poem concludes with the thought that even That One may not know the secrets of the cosmos. In its speculative tone and its admission that the ultimate answer may be unknown, it foreshadows the final stratum of the Vedic literature, the Upanishads.

Cremation

For most Hindus cremation is the approved method for disposing of a dead body, although one finds burials in certain circumstances and subcommunities. The body is usually cremated on the day of death, often only a few hours after the person has expired. Although one could see this as a hygienic measure in a hot climate, for many Hindus the religious reasons are even more compelling. First, a corpse is considered to be a source of violent impurity (ashaucha) that is removed by destroying the body by fire. A second reason for immediate cremation is to get rid of a potential vehicle for wandering spirits, who according to popular fears, can reanimate a corpse.

The rites leading to cremation begin immediately after death. As for all Hindu rituals, there is great variation in different regions and communities, but the following description gives a general picture of these rites, at least in northern India: The body is bathed, laid on a bier (often made from bamboo, which is cheap, strong, and readily available), and covered with a cloth (white for a man or a widow, a colored sari for a married woman). In many cases the big toes are tied together with a thread, due to the belief that this prevents an alien spirit from reanimating the body. The mourners carry the bier to the cremation ground, chanting the traditional dirge Ram Nam Satya Hai, Satya Boli Gati Hai (“God’s name is Truth, Truth spoken is Passage”). On the way, the mourners will often halt several times, not only to rest but also on the chance that the deceased was merely unconscious. When they arrive at the cremation ground (which is often by a river or source of water), the corpse is bathed again and set on a pyre. The chief mourner (traditionally the eldest son) circles the pyre, pouring water from a clay pot, which is then broken. Since poetic images often compare the ephemeral quality of human bodies to that of clay pots, this action clearly signifies the final destruction of the body. The chief mourner then ignites the pyre and remains there while the body burns. If the skull does not crack from the heat of the fire, he is given a long bamboo stick to pierce the skull. This is believed to release the vital winds (prana) of the deceased, which have collected in the head. The chief mourner's final duty is to collect bones and ash from the pyre (asti-sanchayana), often on the following day, and to immerse these remains in the Ganges or some other sacred river (asti-visarjana).

The wooden pyre is the traditional means for cremation and remains the preferred method, despite the development of more efficient and cheaper electric crematoria. This has led to an unusual ecological problem in modern India, particularly in the big cities. Many poor people cannot afford to buy enough wood to cremate the body with a pyre but, because of tradition, are unwilling to use electric crematoria. They will perform incomplete cremations in which part of the body is left unburned. This is a bad state of affairs, both from a religious and a public health perspective, because the bodies are a source of religious impurity and contribute to the contamination of the rivers. For further information see Pandurang Vaman Kane (trans.), A History of Dharmasastra, 1968; and Raj Bali Pandey, Hindu Samskaras, 1969. For accounts of modern practice, see Lawrence Babb, The Divine Hierarchy, 1975; and Ann Grodzins Gold, Fruitful Journeys, 1988.

Cremation Ground

Literally a place where bodies are cremated, but in Hindu culture it also has a significant symbolic meaning. The cremation ground is pervaded by associations with death and impurity (ashaucha), making it an intensely inauspicious place that is often believed to be inhabited by malevolent wandering spirits. The cremation ground is usually located at the boundary of a community, both to remove any contact with this source of inauspiciousness from everyday life and perhaps to symbolically deny the reality of death by relegating the cremation ground to the margins of the “settled” world.

One well-known exception to this rule occurs in Benares, where the cremation ground at Manikarnika Ghat is in the middle of the city. This prominence symbolically forces the inhabitants to confront the reality of death, but since Benares is also the home of the god Shiva, it also raises the hope that death will bring final liberation of the soul (moksha). Similarly, although most people avoid the cremation ground as inauspicious, certain religious adepts voluntarily choose it as their place of residence and religious practice. This may include certain types of ascetics who are simply emulating terrifying forms of Shiva who are said to reside in cremation grounds. Practitioners of the esoteric ritual tradition known as tantra may live in a cremation ground to assert the radical unity of all reality and transcend the concepts of purity and impurity, which they consider artificial. See also cremation.

Cuckoo

(Cuculus melanoleucus or jacobinu) Indian songbird intimately connected with both love and the monsoon rains. The cuckoo's mating season comes during the monsoon, when its piercing calls are fancifully interpreted as piu, piu (“beloved, beloved”). These cries are said to excite the hearts of human lovers—either to passion if they are together or to bitter pain if the monsoon is keeping them apart. The cuckoo's behavior in the rainy season is supposed to reflect its love for the monsoon. According to popular belief, the cuckoo drinks only raindrops, which means that for much of the year, it is tormented by thirst. In devotional (bhakti) poetry, the cuckoo is often used as a symbol for the devotee (bhakta), who is tormented by the deity's absence but who waits patiently for the divine presence. In Sanskrit poetry this bird is called the chataka; in modern dialects it is known as the kokila or koil.

Cunningham, Sir Alexander
(1814–1893) First director of the Archeological Survey of India and the father of modern Indian archeology. Cunningham first came to India in 1831 as an officer in the Royal Engineers, but his hobby was the study of ancient India’s material artifacts. This passion eventually resulted in the formation of the A.S.I., which Cunningham headed until his retirement in 1885. By surveying sites, cataloging their contents, and translating inscriptions, his work was fundamental to preserving India’s heritage.

Cuntarar
Tamil form of the name for the poet-saint Sundaramurtti.

Curses
In Hindu mythology, one of the standard devices either to advance the story’s plot or to account for some inexorable event. Such curses are often the work of sages and other spiritual adepts, but they can also be levied by any person who has perfectly fulfilled his or her social role, such as a faithful wife, loving son, or devoted parent. Making a curse expends the spiritual powers that a person has accumulated. At least in mythical tales, such curses invariably come true no matter what a person might do to try to prevent them. For example, in a mythic story, King Parikshit secludes himself on a high pillar to escape death by snakebite but is killed when a divine serpent conceals itself as a worm in a piece of fruit. Once pronounced, a curse cannot be simply nullified, although it can be modified to blunt its overall effect. For a consideration of the function of curses in Indian mythology, see Robert Goldman, “Karma, Guilt, and Buried Memories: Public Fantasy and Private Memory in Traditional India,” in the Journal of the American Oriental Society, Vol. 105, No. 3, 1985.
Dabistan-I-Mazahib
(“School of Manners”) An outside source for the religious life of the times, and gives the earliest detailed description of the Sikhs, as well as many other contemporary religious communities. The text traditionally is ascribed to Muhsin Fani. Fani was a Persian who traveled through much of northern India, apparently motivated only by his intense curiosity to encounter the country’s different forms of religious life. The text is also notable for the seeming absence of authorial bias—Fani reports that he had simply translated what his friends and informants had told him, and the Dabistan’s tone seems to maintain this claim. The text has been translated by David Shea and Anthony Troyer as The Dabistan, or School of Manners, 1843.

Dadhichi
A sage in Hindu mythology who is a paradigm for self-sacrifice. The gods (devas) and the demons (supernatural beings) are engaged in a long-running war, in which neither side can prevail. Indra, the king of the gods, finally decides to seek advice from the god Brahma. Brahma advises Indra that if he obtains a bone from Dadhichi’s body, it can be made into a weapon that will defeat the demons. Indra is understandably uncertain that his request will be granted, but when he appears before Dadhichi, he not only gives his consent, but immediately abandons his body through yogic powers. Indra takes Dadhichi’s bones, fashions a weapon from them, and successfully defeats the demons.

Dadhikra
A divine war horse described in a few of the hymns in the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. The Vedas were the religious hymns of a group known as the Aryans, and hymns throughout the Vedas clearly show the importance of horse-drawn chariots as weapons of war. Given this importance, it is not surprising that one finds a divinized horse in these hymns, even if it is only a minor figure.

Dadu
(1554–1603) Sant poet-saint and founder of the religious organization known as the Dadupanth. The sants were a group of central and northern Indian poet-saints who share several general tendencies: a stress on individualized, interior religion leading to a personal experience of the divine; disdain for external ritual, particularly image worship; faith in the power of the divine Name; and a tendency to ignore conventional caste (social order) distinctions. According to tradition, Dadu was born into a family of cotton-carders, a fairly low-status occupation. He is also reported to have been born a Muslim, although based on his poetry he seems to have been relatively unaffected by Islam. His songs highlight many of the aforementioned sant themes. His poems also stress nonviolence (ahimsa), and as a practical application of that principle, vegetarianism. Another prominent theme is the religious value of work, since despite his fame he is said to have carded cotton until his death.

Some of Dadu’s poems give lists and categories, as if systematizing his ideas for instruction. This suggests that he envisioned an established community of disciples. According to legend, Dadu met with the Moghul emperor Akbar, who was so impressed by Dadu’s charisma that he ceased his harming of living beings. The tale is probably fictitious, since there are similar stories for many of the sant poets, which all illustrate the well-established theme of the temporal ruler bowing to the spiritual adept. For further information on traditional sources, see Winand Callewaert (trans.), The Hindi Biography of Dadu Dayal, 1988. See also Moghul dynasty.

Dadupanth

Religious organization founded by the sant poet-saint Dadu (1554–1603). The Dadupanth is strongest in Rajasthan, the desert state in which Dadu is believed to have lived. The Dadupanth stresses religious themes common to the sant poet-saints: the rejection of ritual and image worship in favor of an internal search for a formless deity, stress on the power of the divine Name, and a belief in the relative unimportance of conventional caste distinctions. It also emphasizes certain points that were particularly important to Dadu himself, among them nonviolence (ahimsa), vegetarianism, and the religious value of work. The Dadupanth has always been a numerically small organization, but they are historically important because of their manuscript collections. These collections are known as the “five voices” (panchvani), because they contain the works of five different devotional (bhakti) poets: Dadu, Kabir, Namdev, Ravidas, and Hardas. Rajasthan’s desert climate has helped to preserve these manuscripts, some of which date from the early seventeenth century. The Panchvani manuscripts are among the earliest sources for all of these poets, which makes them an important resource for the historical study of northern Indian devotional poetry. For further information on the literary resources of the Dadupanth, see Winand Callewaert (trans.), The Sarvangi of the Dadupanthi Rajab, 1978; and The Sarvangi of Gopaldas, 1993.

Dadupanthi Nagas

Particular group of Naga (fighting) ascetics associated with the religious community (panth) established by the western Indian poet-saint Dadu. The Nagas are renunciant ascetics organized into different akharas, or regiments based on the model of an army. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century the Nagas’ primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests; both of these have largely disappeared in contemporary times. In the bathing (snana) processions at the Kumbha Mela festivals (“Festivals of the Pot”), the Dadupanthi Nagas march with the chatuh-sampradayi Nagas, who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, but are considered independent of them. According to tradition, the Naga section of the Dadupanth was established by Sundardasa, one of Dadu’s direct disciples.

Daita

Tribal (adivasi) community in the modern state of Orissa. The Daitas are hereditary temple servants at the temple of the god Jagannath in the city of Puri. Jagannath has been brought into the larger Hindu pantheon by identifying him as a form of the god Krishna, but he is originally believed to have been a local, tribal deity. This history is partly inferred from Jagannath’s relationships with the Daitas themselves, who are considered Jagannath’s relatives, even though their social status is very low. This relational connection gives the Daitas several unique roles. During the annual Rath Yatra, a ceremonial procession in which Jagannath, his brother Balabhadra, and their sister Subhadra are processed around the city in giant wooden chariots, the Daitas convey the deities’ giant wooden images from the temples to the chariots and pull the ropes that draw the carts. An even more important role comes when new images of the deities are constructed, usually every twelve or nineteen years. The Daitas carve the new images, each from a single massive log. When the new image has been completed, the oldest Daita removes a wooden plug in the old image that seals an interior cavity. He then transfers a mysterious substance called the "life substance" to a corresponding cavity in the new image, which is sealed with another wooden plug. The Daita chosen to make this transfer is blindfolded and has his hands wrapped in layers of cloth, so he is unable to tell exactly what is transferred, and this "life substance" is considered so sacred that the person who makes this transfer reportedly dies soon afterward. After the "life substance" has been removed, the old image is considered a "corpse." The Daitas bury it, observe a ten-day period of ritual death impurity (maranashaucha), and the heirs of the deceased claim his "belongings"—primarily clothes and resin, which they sell to pilgrims. Jagannath's continuing relations with the Daitas point to his origins as a local, tribal god, and this relationship gives the Daitas continuing special privileges.

Daiva Marriage
One of the eight ways to perform a marriage recognized in the dharma literature, the treatises on religious duty (dharma). In a Daiva marriage the father of the bride gives away his daughter with her ornaments to a brahmin (priest). The priest then officiates at a sacrifice sponsored by the father. According to some interpretations, the girl is given as the dakshina, or fee for these sacrificial services. This form of marriage was named after the gods (devas), and was one of the four approved (prashasta) forms of marriage. Even though a daiva marriage was considered an approved form, it fell out of favor because of the hint that the bride had been given as a payment for services, rather than without any conditions whatsoever. See also Marriage, eight classical forms.

Daksha
In Hindu mythology, one of the sons of the god Brahma, and the father of the goddess Sati. Sati has been given in marriage to the god Shiva, and Daksha's most famous mythic story has to do with this divine pair. According to legend, when Daksha feels that Shiva has not shown him proper respect, he wants to put Shiva in his place—even though in this mythic story Shiva is clearly identified as the supreme deity. Inflated with pride, Daksha plans a great sacrifice to which he invites all the other gods, but as an insult purposely excludes Shiva. When Sati learns about the sacrifice, she insists on going to it, despite Shiva's warning that it is unwise to go without an invitation. When she arrives at the sacrificial ground, and asks why her husband has been excluded, Daksha responds with a stream of abuse denouncing Shiva as worthless and despicable. Humiliated by these public insults, Sati commits suicide—in some versions, by leaping into the sacrificial fire, in others by withdrawing into a yogic trance and giving up her life. Shiva becomes furious when he hears of Sati's death, and in his rage creates the fierce deities Virabhadra and Bhadrakali. He comes storming with his minions (gana) to the sacrificial ground, destroys the sacrifice, and cuts off Daksha’s head. Daksha is eventually restored to life, but with the head of a goat rather than a human being. He repents of his arrogance and worships Shiva as the highest god. In this story, Daksha is a symbol for the foolish pride that eventually causes one’s destruction.

In another mythic story, Daksha is portrayed in a more sympathetic light. Chandra (the moon) has married Daksha’s twenty-seven daughters, but was paying attention to only one of the daughters, named Rohini. Daksha remonstrates with Chandra to give each of his wives equal time, and when Chandra ignores this advice, Daksha curses him to lose his luster. As Chandra begins to wane, the other gods intercede with Daksha, and implore him to modify the curse. At their urgent prompting, Daksha decrees that Chandra will only wane for half the month and then wax for the other half. He then directs Chandra to take a bath at the Somnath temple in Gujarat state, which will heal him from the original curse. Here Daksha is still powerful and imperious, but his actions are rooted in his concern for his daughters.

Dakshina
("preceptor’s fee") Gifts or fees given to one’s teacher in return for the services rendered. The paradigm for this goes back to the dharma literature, or the texts on religious duty (dharma), which propose an idealized doctrine for the four stages (ashramas) of a man’s life. The first of these stages is as a celibate student (brahmacharin), in which the young man will live in his teacher’s household and commence studying the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. At the conclusion of his studies, the student will give his teacher dakshina as a sign of appreciation. In modern times this pattern has been extended to other contexts, particularly the arts, and it has become customary for students to give gifts to their teachers on various occasions, particularly on the full moon known as Guru Purnima, which usually falls in June or July. Dakshina is always given in exchange for services, and is thus essentially payment that is “owed” for these services. In this aspect it is a very different mode of exchange from dana (charitable giving). Dana generates religious merit, but the donor receives nothing tangible in return.

Dakshinachara
("right-hand practice") In the secret ritual tradition known as tantra, this is the term for a type of tantric practice that does not avail itself of any forbidden substances or promote any behavior that the orthodox would consider scandalous or objectionable. It stands in opposition to the vamachara, or “left-hand practice,” which uses such forbidden substances in its ritual, and shows no such regard for conventional sensibilities. The most common forbidden substances are the Five Forbidden Things (panchamakara), so called because they all begin with the letter “m” (in the sacred language of Sanskrit, makara) madya (wine), matsya (fish), mamsa (meat), mudra (fermented or parched grain), and maithuna (copulation). In left-hand tantra these forbidden things are used in their actual forms, whereas right-hand practitioners substitute other more socially acceptable things for them. This is one more instance of the pervasive Hindu polarity between right and left, which carries inherent value judgments. In this case, the left-hand practitioners are seen as impure and dangerous, because they intentionally violate social boundaries, whereas the right-hand are socially respectable. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1977; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.
Dakshinayana

The six months of the solar year in which the sun is reckoned as moving southward. In the Gregorian calendar, this is the period between the summer solstice and the winter solstice (roughly December 20 to June 20) and is based on the actual motion of the sun with respect to the earth. The Indian reckoning is based on the motion of the sun through the zodiac, which is calculated differently than in western astrology. The Dakshinayana begins on Karka Sankranti (the day the sun is thought to enter Cancer, usually July 14), and ends the day before Makara Sankranti (the day the sun enters Capricorn, usually January 14). The Dakshinayana is considered less auspicious than the Uttarayana, the six months in which the sun travels north, because the southern direction is associated with the Yama, the god associated with death, judgment, and punishment for evildoers.

Dakshineswar

Temple site about four miles north of modern Calcutta, on the eastern bank of the Hugli River. Dakshineswar's primary deity is the powerful and dangerous goddess Kali, although like most Hindu temples it also has images of most of the deities in the pantheon. Dakshineshwar's importance comes not from its age—the primary image was consecrated in 1855, and it is thus a relatively recent site—but through its association with the Bengali saint Ramakrishna, who lived there for most of his life.

Dalit
("oppressed") Modern name for the social groups that have the lowest social status, groups that in earlier times would have been called Harijan or untouchable. This term is significant because it is the name used by low-status groups to designate themselves as members of a disadvantaged group. Adoption and popularization of this term reflects their growing awareness of the situation, and their greater assertiveness in demanding their legal and constitutional rights. In certain parts of the country, particularly in the state of Maharashtra, the Dalits have formed a militant organization called the Dalit Panthers, modeled after the Black Panthers in America.

Damaru
Hourglass-shaped hand drum, which has membranes stretched over the top and bottom of the hourglass, and at the middle, two strings with a bead at the end. The drum is played by holding it by its narrow middle and rotating the hand back and forth so that the beads strike the drumheads. The pace of the rhythm (tala) is determined by the speed of hand movement. In Hindu iconography, this drum is almost invariably associated with the god Shiva. In his form as Nataraja, the Lord of the Dance, the drum signifies the rhythm by which Shiva undertakes the creation of the universe. Another iconic motif is to show the damaru hanging from Shiva's trident. In modern times this drum is often carried by ascetics, either because of its association with Shiva, its portability, or both. See also iconic image.

Damayanti
In Hindu mythology, the daughter of the king of Vidarbha and the wife of King Nala. The story of Nala and Damayanti appears as a story within the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics. It is recounted to the five Pandava brothers, the epic's protagonists, during a twelve-year exile in the forest as a way to keep up their spirits by telling how others had transcended misfortune.

In the story, when Damayanti comes of marriageable age, her father sends invitations to the kings of the earth, announcing her svayamvara, a rite in which Damayanti will choose her own husband. The kings of the earth come to the svayamvara to seek her hand, as do the gods (devas) themselves. Yet Damayanti has already decided, with the help of a swan who has praised King Nala to her, to choose Nala. The gods try to foil this by taking on physical bodies identical to Nala, so that Damayanti will not be able to tell the difference between them. As a last resort, Damayanti makes an act of truth, a ritual action whose efficacy is based on the power of truth itself. In her act of truth, Damayanti declares that she has never loved anyone but Nala, and directs the gods to resume their true forms to prove that this statement is true. The gods immediately do as she commands, compelled by the power of truth. Nala and Damayanti are married, and as a reward for her fidelity the gods give Nala various divine gifts. Hearing of the marriage, two of the rejected suitors curse Nala to lose his kingdom, and like all curses in Indian mythology, this eventually comes to pass. Because of the curse, Nala and Damayanti are separated and suffer long tribulations, including Nala having his body magically changed so that no one would be able to recognize him. In the end Damayanti recognizes him by his divine gifts, which could not be hidden, and the lovers are happily reunited.

Damodara

(dama “rope” + udara “waist”) Epithet of the god Krishna, given in memory of a particular incident in his childhood. In an effort to curb Krishna’s mischief by restricting his movements, Krishna’s foster mother, Yashoda, uses a rope to tie her toddling boy to the heavy stone mortar used in grinding grain. The mortar’s weight is more than sufficient to restrain any normal child, but for Krishna it proves no hindrance, and he proceeds to crawl about, dragging the mortar after him. At one point the mortar becomes wedged between two trees growing closely together, and Krishna pulls so hard that the trees are uprooted. After the trees fall to the ground, they immediately disappear, and in their place stand two young men. These are sons of the god Kubera who have been cursed to take the form of a tree until Krishna comes to save them.

Dampati

(husband and wife) In Indian art and architecture, the figure of a married couple. These are usually portrayed as standing next to one another and are usually devoid of any sexual connotation. This is unlike the more famous mithuna figures, which are engaged in sexual activity.

Dana

(giving) Charitable giving. This is a common religious practice, for it is believed to be a pious act that generates religious merit. Dana is especially prevalent at pilgrimage places and other sacred sites (tirthas), since the sacredness of these places is believed to magnify the consequences of any act, whether good or bad. Dana is one of the traditional paradigms for exchange, the other being dakshina (preceptor’s fee). The difference between them is that dakshina is a fee for services, whereas dana is given freely and brings one no tangible benefits. Aside from the intangible religious merit generated by dana, it is also a common way to get rid of any inauspiciousness or ill fortune, which is transferred to the receiver along with the gift. This assumption makes receiving dana karmically risky, whereas there are no such stigmas associated with dakshina. People who live solely by receiving gifts, such as beggars at pilgrimage sites, are thus in an unenviable position, since they are commonly described as “vessels” (patras) for the depositing of ill fortune. Yet this transfer of inauspiciousness is a pervasive pattern in regular society, and even within the family there are means to transfer inauspiciousness through well-established gift-giving patterns, particularly the kanyadan, or gift of a bride in marriage. For further information on dana and gift-giving patterns, see Gloria Goodwin Raheja, The Poison in the Gift, 1988.

Danava

(descendants of Danu) In Hindu mythology, the sons of Danu with her husband, the divine sage Kashyapa. Kashyapa is the chief of the Prajapatis, a class of semi-divine beings, and Danu herself is the daughter of the demigod Daksha, so their children have divine blood from both sides of their lineage. The name Danava is a general term for all the families of demons (supernatural beings), or more properly, asuras. The asuras are powerful divine beings, who have legitimate interests of their own, but whose interests often run counter to those of human beings as well as those of the gods (devas). Asuras are thus usually opposed to the gods—a sense of opposition carried by the English word “demon”—but they are not perceived as inherently evil.

Dance

In traditional Hindu culture, all of the performing arts had intimate connections with religious life, and dance was no exception to this pattern. In their art, dancers merely follow the divine model, since in Indian mythology Shiva is the preeminent dancer; indeed, in his dancing he first creates the universe and later destroys it. Several classical dance forms can be directly tied to specific Hindu temples. The Bharatanatyam form developed in the temples of Tamil Nadu beginning at the Brhadeshvar temple in Tanjore, and is immortalized in the sculptures of the Shiva temple at Chidambaram. The Orissi style came from the temple of Jagannath in the city of Puri, on the Bay of Bengal. Some of the other classical styles were traditionally performed only in temples, or had their beginnings in religious festivals: the Kathakali form in the state of Kerala, the Kuchipudi form in Andhra Pradesh, the Chau form in eastern India, and the Manipuri form in Manipur. The only exception is the northern Indian Kathak form, whose birth and performance lay in a court rather than a temple setting, but which in its subject matter often treated religious themes, particularly ones drawn from devotion to the god Krishna.

All of these styles share a highly articulated language of gesture (mudra) and expression, through which the dancer can tell a story to the audience. As in all the classical arts, the dancer's aim is not only to entertain, but to create and convey a particular aesthetic mood (rasa), which will evoke a corresponding emotion (bhava) from the audience. Beyond these general similarities, each form has a certain characteristic and stylistic quality. Bharatanatyam, Kuchipudi, and Orissi are the most clearly related forms, but where Bharatanatyam presents a sharply geometric line, with a stiff upper body, the lines presented by Kuchipudi and Orissi are progressively softer, rounder, and more fluid. Kathakali is characterized by elaborate costumes and stage makeup, and also by its particular stress on developing and controlling facial mobility. These things facilitate ease and power of expression. Manipuri and Chau are both highly athletic forms, clearly showing the influence of folk dance, and Chau is unusual in that the dancers always wear masks, which sets a prevailing mood. Kathak is the only dance form in which the legs are kept straight; this form stresses intricate footwork in which the bells on the dancer's ankles serve as a complement and counterpoint to the drum, combined with dramatic turns and spins.

As mentioned above, all the dance forms except for Kathak developed in some sort of religious context. In many of these latter cases, dance was an offering presented to the deity, and was primarily performed for the deity's entertainment, although the other spectators could enjoy it, as well. Although different schools have different typologies, the most pervasive distinction is between "pure" dance (nrtya), conveying nothing beyond the dancer's skill in movement, and "acting" dance (natya or abhinaya), in which the dancer tells some sort of story. Until the twentieth century, the dancers were usually temple servants known as devadasis. The devadasis were officially married to the temple's deity and performed various ritual services in the temples as his "wives," but they could have liaisons with other men as they wished. Any children from these liaisons would also be in the service of the temple—their sons as musicians, and their daughters as dancers. At times this arrangement degenerated into common prostitution, but in many cases it was recognizably different. These women had status and property of their own, even though their status was unusual, and thus marginal. In the twentieth century the dance performance site has moved from the temple to the stage, which has had a number of effects on transforming it from a form of worship to a performing art. For further information on the history of the dance and its particular manifestations, see Mohan Khokar, Traditions of Indian Classical Dance, 1984. For a masterful analysis of the devadasis, see Frederique Apffel Marglin, Wives of the God-King, 1985.

Danda

("stick") A symbol of authority in traditional Hindu culture. On one hand, this stick referred to royal authority and was visibly evident as a scepter or mace, but was considered emblematic of the king's obligation to maintain social order by inflicting punishment on evildoers. This rule through punishment (dandaniti) was the king's role and duty in traditional Indian ideas of kingship, for without such rule normal social life would be impossible. In a different context, the staff can be a symbol of ascetic authority. Among the Dashanami Sanyasis, a group of ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, the ascetics with the highest status carry a staff as a sign of their authority, and are known as Dandi Sanyasis.

Danda Hasta

In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, a particular hand gesture (hasta), in which the arm and hand are extended straight forward, like a stick (danda).

Dandakaranya

A particular forest (aranya) in the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics. This is where the god Rama, the epic's protagonist; his wife Sita; and his brother Lakshmana live during the latter part of their fourteen years in exile, in their ashram (abode) in the village of Panchavati. Many of the epic's pivotal events take place in this forest: Rama and Lakshmana's humiliation and mutilation of the demoness Shurpanakha, their destruction of the demon army led by her brothers Khara and Dushana, and Sita's abduction by Shurpanakha's third brother Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka. The Dandaka forest's actual location is uncertain, since many of the events in the Ramayana cannot be set in any particular place. One traditional location for Panchavati, however, is just outside of the city of Nasik in the state of Maharashtra.

Dandaniti

("rule through the stick") In the dharma literature, or the texts on religious duty (dharma), dandaniti is the preservation of social order by inflicting punishment on evildoers. This rule through punishment was the king's role and duty in traditional Indian ideas of kingship, for without such rule it was believed that normal social life would be impossible.
Dandasana
("staff-posture") One of the sitting postures (asana) described in commentaries to the Yoga Sutras (aphorisms on yoga). In this position, the upper body is erect, the arms are straight with the hands flat on the ground and pointing forward, and the legs are outstretched with the big toes, ankles, and knees touching one another.

Dandavat ("stick-like") Pranam
Type of reverential salutation in which the person lies prostrate on the ground with the arms extended (hence the comparison between the body and a stick). This shows the highest reverence of all greetings, since one's entire body is in contact with the ground.

Dandi Sanyasi
Among the Dashanami Sanyasis, or the ascetic devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, the Dandi Sanyasis are the most prestigious of the three general ascetic types; the others being the Paramahamsa and the Naga Sanyasis. Dandi Sanyasis take their name from the staff (danda) that they are given at their ascetic initiation and that they carry for the rest of their lives as a sign of ascetic restraint. The danda is always kept off the ground to maintain its purity. The Dandi Sanyasis tend to put the highest stress on the importance of Sanskrit (sacred language) learning and uphold the traditional social and cultural values it propounds. Of the ten Dashanami divisions, Dandis tend to belong to those divisions that will only initiate brahmans—that is, the Saraswati, Ashrama, and Tirtha divisions, and also some sections of the Bharati division. In many cases, Dandi Sanyasis are initiated as ascetics only after having completed the other three stages of life (ashramas), fulfilling the idealized pattern in the dharma literature, the texts on religious duty. Thus, their ascetic status does not come only from the strictness of their ascetic observance, for which they are rightly famous. It also reflects the continuing influence of their former "worldly" status, which was supposedly left behind upon ascetic initiation, and their adherence to traditional idealized cultural patterns. The philosopher Shankaracharya, traditionally named as the Dashanami order's founder, was himself believed to be a Dandi Sanyasi. This pattern of leadership still continues, since even now Dandi Sanyasis are invariably chosen for the Shankaracharyas, the religious leaders who preside over the four monastic centers (maths). These centers supposedly were established by the philosopher Shankaracharya, and in many cases these present leaders have been lifelong ascetics, as Shankaracharya is believed to have been. For further information see Dana Sawyer, “Monastic Structure of Banarsi Dandi Sadhus,” in Bradley R. Hertel and Cynthia Ann Humes (eds.), Living Banaras, 1993.

Dan Lila
One of the types of divine play (lila) between the god Krishna and his devotees (bhakta). In this lila, the adolescent Krishna intercepts the gopis, his cow-herding female friends, who are on their way to the city of Mathura to sell their butter and curds. Krishna refuses to let them pass until they give him some as a gift (dana). The story of this lila is often presented in religiously oriented theatrical presentations, which are themselves known as lilas ("plays"), since their function is to reveal the work of the divine. This lila is but one instance in a long history of butter thievery. For further information see John Stratton Hawley, Krishna: The Butter Thief, 1983.

Dantavakra
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Dantavakra is an asura or demon king who is the rebirth of Vijaya, one of the gatekeepers of the god Vishnu. Vijaya has been cursed to be reborn three times as an asura and to be killed each time by Vishnu. In his previous incarnations Vijaya is born as Hiranyakashipu, who is killed by the Man-Lion avatar (one incarnation of the god Vishnu) and as Kumbhakarna, who is killed by Vishnu’s Rama avatar. When Dantavakra is killed by Krishna, the curse is broken, and Vijaya returns to his rightful place.

Darshan

("seeing") By far the most common religious act in popular modern Hinduism, darshan designates direct eye contact between the devotee (bhakta) and the image of a deity, which is considered to be a conscious, perceiving being. Such intimate interaction is a way to communicate with the deity on a personal basis, which is similar to the stress on the individual found in bhakti (devotional) religiosity. For further information see Diana Eck, Darsan, 1985.

Darshan (2)

("perspective") In the context of Indian philosophy, this is the word most often used to designate a philosophical “school.” The word itself comes from the verb “to see,” and thus can be loosely translated as a “point of view,” “perspective,” or “[way of] seeing.” In a diverse and competitive philosophical culture, this is a neutral way to describe a philosophical position, whether or not one agrees with it.

Dasa (“servant”) Bhava

The second of the five modes of devotion (system of devotion to a deity) to God that were most prominently articulated by Rupa Goswami, a devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna and a follower of the Bengali saint Chaitanya. Rupa used differing types of human relationships as models for differing conceptions of the link between deity and devotee. These five modes showed growing emotional intensity, from the peaceful (shanta) sense that comes from realizing one’s complete identity with Brahman, or Ultimate Reality, to conceiving of God as one’s master, friend, child, or lover. The Dasa Bhava is the second of these, in which devotees considered themselves as servants and the deity as their master. This second mode of devotion should be understood in light of the relationship between masters and servants in Indian society, which goes far beyond that of employer and employee in modern American society. A family’s servants will often stay with a family for many years and in some cases, such service becomes hereditary. Longtime servants become virtual members of the family; they are respected, trusted, and sometimes regarded as advisers.

Dashanamukha

("ten-faced") In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, this was one of the epithets of Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka. This name is descriptive, since Ravana has ten heads.

Dashanami

("ten names”) Collective name for the ten divisions among the Sanyasis, an ascetic order supposedly founded by the great philosopher Shankaracharya, whose members are devotees of the god Shiva. These ten divisions are each distinguished by a different name, which is taken as a surname by an ascetic after his initiation in the division. These ten names are Giri (“mountain”), Parvata (“mountain”), Sagara (“ocean”), Saraswati (the goddess of learning), Bharati (“India”), Puri (“city”), Aranya (“forest”), Vana (“forest”), Tirtha (“crossing-place”), and Ashrama (“hermitage”).

Although all of the ten divisions are Dashanami Sanyasis, there are internal status differences based on the distinction between three ascetic classes: Dandi, Paramahamsa, and Naga. The Dandi Sanyasis, named for the staff (danda) that they must always carry, have the strongest connection with classical Sanskrit (sacred language) learning, are the strictest in their ascetic practices, and tend to be the most conservative in their social views. Dandi Sanyasis often follow ascetic initiation only after having completed the other three stages of life (ashramas), and thus fulfill the idealized pattern in the dharma literature, the texts on religious duty. Dandi Sanyasis were virtually always brahmins (priests) before becoming ascetics, and almost all Dandis belong to the Dashanami divisions that will only initiate brahmins—that is, the Saraswati, Ashrama, Tirtha, and some sections of the Bharati divisions. The remaining Dashanami divisions will admit members from all four of the traditional social classes: brahmins, kshatriyas, vaishyas, and shudras. Members from the first three groups, known as “twice-born” because they are eligible for the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth,” are initiated as Paramahamsa Sanyasis, whereas shudras are initiated as Naga, or militant ascetics. Thus, despite the supposed loss of identity among ascetics after formally “renouncing” the world, one can see the continuing influence of a person’s former worldly status.

These ten divisions are collected into four larger organizational groups: Anandawara, Bhogawara, Bhuriwara, and Kitawara. Each of these groups has two or three of the ten Dashanami orders, and each is centered in one of the four sacred centers (maths) supposedly established by Shankaracharya. Each of these four groups is also associated with one of the four Vedas—the oldest Hindu sacred texts, a different geographical quarter of India, a different “great utterance” (mahavakya), and a different ascetic quality.

Dasharatha

In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Dasharatha is a king of the Ikshvaku dynasty and the father of Rama, the epic’s protagonist. Dasharatha is generally portrayed as a good king, but like many characters in Indian mythology, his ultimate destiny is governed by the result of a curse, whose effects he is unable to avoid. As a young man, Dasharatha is very fond of hunting. On one occasion, he blindly sends an arrow to the spot where he hears the sound of an animal drinking at a stream. When he investigates, he is horrified to discover a young man struck by his arrow, with the water pot he had been filling by his side. With his dying breaths the young man informs Dasharatha that he is the sole source of support for his blind parents and commands Dasharatha to inform them of his death. Dasharatha is a man of honor and fulfills the boy’s last request. When the boy’s father hears the story, he angrily curses Dasharatha to die in similar grief, bereft of his sons.

For many years it seemed as if this curse would not come true, since Dasharatha had no sons, even though he had three wives: Kausalya, Kaikeyi, and Sumitra. Dasharatha sponsors various religious rites for the birth of sons, and finally commissions the sage Rishyashringa to perform a great sacrifice. At the rite’s conclusion, a shining figure emerges from the sacrificial fire, places a pot of milk-rice before Dasharatha, and directs him to feed it to his wives. Dasharatha divides the contents of the pot between Kausalya and Kaikeyi, each of whom give some to Sumitra. In due time Kausalya bears Rama, Kaikeyi gives birth to Bharata, and Sumitra (by virtue of receiving a share from each of her co-wives) bears the twins Lakshmana and Shatrughna.

As his sons grow into manhood Dasharatha is blissfully happy, and the memory of the curse fades from his mind. As a young man, Rama shows his prowess and goodness, and Dasharatha decides to anoint him as the heir-apparent. Yet the night before this ceremony, the curse finally comes to fruition. During the preparations preceding Rama’s investiture, the mind of his stepmother Kaikeyi has been slowly poisoned by the whisperings of her maid Manthara. Manthara convinces Kaikeyi that she and her son Bharata will be mere slaves after Rama is crowned the heir-apparent. This prompts Kaikeyi to take drastic action. Many years before, Dasharatha promised Kaikeyi two blessings as reward for her help in winning a great battle. She has never asked for these, but she now requests that Rama spend fourteen years in forest exile, and that her own son, Bharata, shall rule in his place. Dasharatha pleads with Kaikeyi to change her mind, but she is adamant that her wishes have to be granted if Dasharatha will retain the unbroken family honor. Dasharatha later pleads with Rama to disobey him and take over the kingdom by force, but Rama refuses this as it is an unrighteous action. Rama leaves for the forest, thus upholding the family honor, but in his sorrow at being separated from Rama, Dasharatha dies of a broken heart.

Dashavatara

("ten descents") Collective name for the ten avatars (incarnations on earth) of the god Vishnu. In each case, Vishnu takes form to restore the cosmic equilibrium when it has been thrown out of balance by the action of a particular demon. See also avatar.

Dashavatara Stotra

("Hymn to the Ten Avatars") The opening canto of the Gitagovinda, a twelfth-century lyric poem written by the poet Jayadeva. The Gitagovinda is an allegory of the union of the human soul with the divine, described through the story of the god Krishna and his human lover Radha. At the narrative level, this tale describes the couple's initial passionate lovemaking, followed by jealousy, anger, and estrangement. It concludes with their reconciliation and an even more passionate reunion.

Although it is preceded by a short introduction, the Dashavatara Stotra is the text's true beginning. The Dashavatara Stotra is a hymn paying homage to the ten avatars or earthly incarnations of the god Krishna, each of whom has been responsible for preserving the cosmos in a time of crisis. Jayadeva uses this opening hymn to remind his readers that the Krishna of his story is no mere mortal lover—even though the story employs the language and images commonly found in Sanskrit love poetry—but rather the lord and master of the universe, who has saved it from destruction again and again. The context supplied by the images in this opening hymn alert the reader that this text is not merely a love story.

Jayadeva is unusual in describing the god Krishna as the source of the ten avatars, since Krishna is more commonly considered an avatar of the god Vishnu. This theological difference stems from Jayadeva's connection with the Jagannath temple in the city of Puri. Jagannath is said to be a form of Krishna, but it is generally accepted that Jagannath was originally an autochthonous (“of the land”) deity who happened to be Puri’s local deity. Identifying him with Krishna was a way to assimilate Jagannath into the Hindu pantheon. For Jayadeva, Jagannath-Krishna is thus the supreme deity, not an avatar, and the place usually occupied by Krishna in Jayadeva’s enumeration of the avatars is taken by Krishna’s brother, Balarama.

For the text of the Dashavatara Stotra and the Gitagovinda, see Barbara Stoller Miller (ed. and trans.), The Love Song of the Dark Lord, 1977.

Dasyu

(“slave”) The name used for non-Aryan peoples in the Vedas, the earliest Hindu sacred texts. The words Aryan and Dasyu are an “us” and “them” opposition—in essence, the people who composed the Vedas called themselves Aryans, and referred to the “outsiders” as Dasyus. Although one cannot be certain whether these names refer to a particular group of people, or any group of all, one theory is that the Aryans were a people who had migrated from outside of India, and the Dasyus were the indigenous people in northern India. The Vedas describe the Dasyus as living in fortified cities, some of which were destroyed by the god Indra. Some readers have interpreted this image as the Aryans’ destruction of the Indus Valley cities, but there is little historical record for such spectacular conquests.

Other hymns in the Vedas describe the Dasyus as dark-skinned and noseless, which is generally taken to mean flat-nosed. This has led some to identify the Dasyus with the Dravidian language speakers who now live in southern India, since some of them share these characteristics. According to this belief, the Dravidian language speakers would have been gradually displaced toward the south as the Indo-Aryan language speakers—in short, the Aryans—came into India from the north. One piece of linguistic evidence for this comes from modern Pakistan, in which a small group of people speak Brahui, which is a member of the Dravidian language family. This Brahui-speaking community is entirely surrounded by people speaking Indo-Aryan languages, and the simplest theory for this anomaly is that these Brahui speakers are an isolated linguistic fragment of that earlier time. These theories are intriguing, but it is naïve to read the Vedas as an objective historical account, or even to assume that any of its references correspond to events outside the sacred world to which they were the key.

Dattatreya

In the religious texts known as the puranas, Dattatreya is a famous ascetic and is considered to be a partial avatar (incarnation) of the god Vishnu. Many modern ascetics consider him a paradigm for asceticism, and Dattatreya has actually been installed as a deity in certain places associated with ascetics, such as Mount Girnar. Dattatreya’s mother is Anasuya, and he is born after she has done a great favor to the gods. According to the story, a faithful wife named Silavati curses the sun not to rise, and in consequence the creatures of the earth are greatly troubled. Anasuya succeeds in persuading Silavati to recall her curse, and in their gratitude, the gods Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva inform her that she may ask for whatever she wants. Anasuya requests that each be born as one of her sons, and this is granted: Vishnu is born as Dattatreya, Shiva as Durvasas, and Brahma as Chandra.

Datura

(from Sanskrit word dhattura) Name for a genus of plants known as the thorn-apple, which is a distant relative of the potato. The datura plant contains poisonous alkaloids, which when consumed in small quantities produce intoxication, and in larger quantities, sickness and death. Devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva eat the datura plant’s swollen...
Daughters

The status of female children varies widely in Hindu society, based on regional customs, the position of the social subgroup (jati/ caste) to which a family belongs, and the particular circumstances of individual families. In general, although the birth of a daughter is a welcome event, it brings greater responsibility than the birth of a son. Parents have a religious duty to arrange a daughter’s marriage, and this is still taken very seriously, since her marriage is seen as the key to her continued material prosperity, as well as her fulfillment as a human being. The gift of a daughter (kanyadan) in marriage brings the parents immense religious merit, but also an onerous economic obligation. Arranging a marriage in modern India usually involves considerable time, anxiety, and expense. The last comes not only from the expenses of the wedding ceremonies, but also from the practice of giving a dowry (gift to the groom’s family) with the bride, which is still quite common. In many poor families, the birth of multiple daughters is often seen as a disaster, since their families will be unable to marry them properly.

Aside from the expense and trouble, in many parts of India daughters are often seen as “temporary” members of their natal families. After their marriages they will live in their marital homes and become part of their marital families, whereas their brothers will bring their brides into their natal home and will live there for the rest of their lives. It is upon these sons and their wives that the parents will depend for support in their old age, as well as for the performance of ancestral rites after their deaths. This is the traditional pattern throughout much of India; although as the forces of modernity have changed the joint family, it has become more common for husbands and wives to live separately from their parents. This pattern also shows considerable local variation. For example, because the brahmin community in southern India is so small, cross-cousin marriage is fairly common there, and in this circumstance a woman is actually moving from one branch of her family to another.

These economic and social factors have sometimes led to unfortunate consequences. Consciously or unconsciously, one often finds that sons are favored over daughters in many significant ways: in their access to education; in their opportunities, which are deemed more important for men because of their need to support a family; in Hindu inheritance laws (in which sons get a much larger share, under the presumption that they will be supporting a family); and in poorer families, in which sons are favored for even more basic needs such as food and access to medical care. Despite these general patterns, it must be emphasized that many families treat all their children with equal love and care. This is particularly true in contemporary times, and given the trend toward smaller families, the birth of a daughter is cause for just as much rejoicing as the birth of a son. See also arranged marriage.

Day, Structure of

In some sense, most divisions of time are arbitrary, which is a feature that appears in several different dimensions of the traditional Indian divisions of the day. The twenty-four hours of the solar day can be divided using several different measures of time, some of which do not exactly correspond with one another, and these differing times can also be subject to judgments about their symbolic values. In one system, the day is divided into eight equal periods (prahars) of three hours each. These eight periods mark the general progress during the day and night, with the first of these prahars ending at sunrise. Shorter units of time are reckoned in periods of about twenty-four minutes called ghatikas, of which there are sixty in every twenty-four hours. The ghatika supposedly takes its name from the clay pots (ghata) that were used to make water-clocks; these pots measured time by the amount of water that dripped through a small hole. Two ghatikas make a muhurta, of which there are thirty during each twenty-four hours. The reckonings of the day in prahars and ghatikas thus do not exactly correspond to one another, since each prahr has 7.5 ghatikas. Based on this, it would seem that the former marks the more general divisions of each day and the latter more specific time periods.

The other way in which the times of day can be viewed is with regard to their symbolic value. The most auspicious time of day is the “Time of Brahma” (Brahma muhurta), the period immediately before sunrise. This is reckoned the best time of the entire day for worship, meditation, or any type of religious practice. Although this is named a muhurta, and thus should be limited to forty-eight minutes, the Brahma muhurta is often thought to encompass the entire three hours in the day’s first prahar. Hence, it is not unusual for devout religious people to arise around 3 A.M., to take advantage of this period. In contrast, the immediately preceding prahr (roughly midnight to 3 A.M.) is the most inauspicious in the day, a time when spirits and demons are loose. Sleep is the most appropriate activity for this time; other activities are appropriate only when absolutely necessary. The only time religious practices are done during this time is when they are part of an all-night ceremony (jagaran), or a continuous reading (akhand path) of a religious text. In following the most inauspicious and chaotic period with the most auspicious, the cycle of the day (as well as the year) mirrors that of the cosmos, whose gradual and continuing degeneration are suddenly replaced with complete renewal and regeneration. Dayabhaga (“division of inheritance”) Pivotal legal text, written by the Bengali scholar Jimutavahana (early twelfth century). As its name would indicate, the Dayabhaga was concerned with matters of inheritance, partition, and the division of property, and it eventually became the primary legal code for the entire Bengal cultural region. The inheritance pattern in the Dayabhaga stresses succession, which is very different from the predominant Hindu pattern of survivorship. Survivorship vests all surviving males in the male line with equal shares of the family property, but gives no inheritance to women. Under this arrangement, the death of a male heir automatically increases the share of all the other surviving males, whereas their share decreases when another male is born. Under the succession model in the Dayabhaga, sons do not become shareholders of the family property at birth, but upon the death of their father. If a son happens to die before his father, the son’s heirs (including his wife and daughters) become inheritors, not in their own right, but as representatives of the deceased heir. Under the Dayabhaga, widows and daughters can thus have a share in family property, and they are allowed to act as agents in their own right. In theory this arrangement seems far more advantageous to women, but in fact it had some gruesome consequences. When the British first settled in Bengal in the late eighteenth century, they were horrified by the prevalence of sati, the rite in which a widow would be burned on her husband’s funeral pyre. It seems that sati was not nearly so common in many other parts of India, and one theory is that this rite was the family’s way to ensure that their daughter-in-law—who was an outsider to the family—would not be able to gain control over any of their ancestral property.

Dayanand Saraswati

(1824–1883) Nineteenth-century reformist ascetic and founder of the Arya Samaj, a reformist Hindu organization. The late nineteenth century was an era of sweeping social, economic, and religious change in northern India, and the Arya Samaj was an authentically Hindu response to these forces. Dayanand’s mission for the Arya Samaj was to reform and revitalize Hinduism by purging it of the “false practices” that had gradually crept in. Swami Dayanand’s fundamental assumption was that ultimate religious authority lay only in the ancient scriptures called the Vedas, and that any contemporary religious practices not found in the Vedas were mistaken, odious, and deserved to be abandoned. This stance allowed him to attack many of the “social evils” plaguing nineteenth-century Hinduism, such as child marriages, sati (the rite in which a widow would be burned on her husband’s funeral pyre), “idolatrous” image worship, untouchability, a ban on widow remarriage, and the unequal status of women. In claiming that such practices were “corrupt,” Dayanand had found not only a viable strategy for reform, but a way to undercut the claims of Christian missionaries, who pointed to such evils as evidence that Hindu religion was inferior to Christianity.

Unlike its predecessor, the Brahmo Samaj, which was heavily influenced by Christianity, the Arya Samaj was a Hindu response drawing from purely Hindu sources. Dayanand belonged to the first generation of Hindus aiming to reassert the greatness of Hinduism as opposed to the Christian missionary challenge, and much of his writing is militantly anti-Christian. One sign of his crusading spirit is his support for the ceremony of purification (shuddhi), through which Hindus who had become members of other religious communities were received back into the Hindu community. Although the Arya Samaj claimed that they were simply getting back to the Veda, the ultimate aim was not to reclaim that long-gone era, but to develop a form of Hindu religious life more compatible with “modern” times. Thus, even though Dayanand was “traditionalist” in his emphasis on the Vedas, he was radical in insisting that the Vedas should be accessible to all people, including groups such as women and the shudras, or the lowest social group, both of whom had traditionally been forbidden to read or even hear it. During his ministry Dayanand spoke throughout India, attacking any and all religions not rooted in the Vedas, including contemporary Hinduism. His eloquence, charisma, and commitment brought him considerable success, but also many enemies, and he was eventually assassinated by poisoning. For further information see Dayanand Saraswati, Autobiography of Swami Dayananda Saraswati, K. C. Yadav (ed.), 1978; Ganga Prasad Upadhyaya (trans.), Light of Truth, 1960; and Arvind Sharma, “Swami Dayananda Sarasvati,” in Robert D. Baird (ed.), Religion in Modern India, 1998.
Day of Brahma
The Day of Brahma, or kalpa, is the largest generally accepted measure of time in Indian cosmology, and spans 432 million years. This time period is the ultimate limit for the existence of the created world, although within it the universe undergoes periodic renewals. At the conclusion of the Day of Brahma comes the universal dissolution (pralaya), in which the created universe is completely destroyed and reabsorbed into Vishnu. The Day of Brahma is followed by a night of equal length, during which the only living thing is the god Vishnu, who sleeps on the back of his serpent couch, Shesha, and floats on the surface of the cosmic ocean. When the Night of Brahma is ended, a lotus sprouts forth from Vishnu’s navel, which opens to reveal the god Brahma, and with the new Day of Brahma the universe begins anew.

The Day of Brahma can be divided into smaller units based on two different methods. One of these divides the Day of Brahma into fourteen equal ages, in which each age is identified by the particular divine sovereign (Manu) who rules during that age. Another divides the Day of Brahma into one thousand mahayugas, each of which has four constituent yugas (units of cosmic time), each shorter than the last. See also Cosmic Time.

Deathbed Rites
General term for the rites done for a dying person. These rites have a twofold purpose: to purify the person’s body, and, more importantly, to calm the mind. The first is generally done by applying holy substances, such as Ganges water or a Tulsi leaf. In some cases, the dying person will also hold the tail of a cow, since according to popular mythology this will enable the person to cross the Vaitarani River, the river leading to the afterlife. The emphasis on calming the dying person’s mind comes from the belief that one’s dying thoughts have enormous karmic ramifications for future lives. Ideally, the dying person should be calm and composed, since any sort of fear or agitation is believed to have negative consequences. One method to help promote such calmness is to read passages from religious texts, whether to remind the hearer of the body’s impermanence, or to have the last thing one hears be the name of God. At the moment of death the dying person is often placed on the earth—perhaps so that the earth can absorb the impurity (ashaucha) of the corpse, or perhaps as a symbol that whatever a person’s status in life, all human beings eventually share the same fate. After death the rites associated with cremation begin, which are the next set of rites in the series known as the antyeshthi samskara (“last rites”).

Deccan
A region of the Indian subcontinent. In its broadest usage, this word can refer to all of India south of the Vindhya Mountains, the range that divides northern and southern India. More specifically, this term denotes the dry and hilly plateau in the northern and eastern parts of the region south of the Vindhyas, bounded on the east and west by the highlands known as the Eastern and Western Ghats. In Hindu cultural terms, the Deccan is a transitional cultural area between the northern Indian plain and the deep south.

Deer
In Hindu iconography, an animal strongly associated with the god Shiva, particularly in his form as Pashupati, the “Lord of Beasts.” In many of the four-armed images of Shiva, one of the upper arms will have the figure of the deer emerging from it, symbolizing his control over all life. In Hindu bhakti (devotional) poetry, the musk deer is often used as a symbol for an ignorant, unenlightened person. According to this image, just as the deer does not recognize that the heady scent of musk comes from its own body, but rushes all over the forest in search of it, so are human beings ignorant of God inside and ever close to them, but looking outside themselves in search of the divine.

Dehu
Town in the Pune district of Maharashtra state, sixty-five miles east and south of Bombay. It is most famous as the home of the poet-saint Tukaram, one of most important figures in the Varkari Panth. The Varkaris are a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba, at his temple at Pandharpur in modern Maharashtra. Varkari religious practice centers primarily around two annual pilgrimages in which all the participants arrive in Pandharpur on the same day. Tukaram still symbolically travels to Pandharpur twice each year; a palanquin (palkhi) bearing his sandals is at the head of the procession bearing his name.

Deities
This is a word with various possible meanings in different contexts. On one hand, it can refer to the gods (devas). These are beings who live in one of the heavenly realms, by virtue of their past good karma (actions), but who are still subject to the law of karma and who therefore must someday be reborn in a lower state. This word can also refer to the Supreme Reality, which can best be designated as “God,” although the Hindu imagination has given it various names: Brahma, the Goddess, Vishnu, Shiva, Ganesh, and a host of other deities in the pantheon, including village deities.

Demons
The Hindu mythic universe has various classes of supernatural beings, some of which are perpetually at odds with one another. The most prominent conflict is between the suras (“gods”) and another class of divine beings called asuras (“not-gods”). Aside from the asuras, there are other powerful beings such as rakshasas, pisacas, and vetalas, which have greater or lesser malevolence toward the gods and human beings. The English word most often used to denote all these divine adversaries is the word “demon.” Although this is a convenient label and avoids the need for unfamiliar Sanskrit terminology, it also carries inappropriate and misleading associations. The word “demon” carries connotations of absolute and radical evil, as well as willful opposition to a single supreme divinity. Neither assumption is appropriate in the Hindu mythic universe, which is polytheistic, or believing in more than one god. This polytheistic universe has a host of divine beings, whose individual interests may well conflict with those of the gods, and whose mutual opposition may spill over into open war. This does not make such opponents, or “demons,” inherently evil, but rather the opponents of the Hindu gods, from whose perspective Hindu mythology is clearly recounted. These “demons” may also be ill-disposed toward humans, but they are not necessarily or inherently so. Perhaps the clearest recognition of their status is that despite their occasional opposition to the gods, they are never completely destroyed, but simply demoted to a more appropriate status. For example, when the “demon” Hiranyakashipu is destroyed by Vishnu’s Man-Lion avatar, he is succeeded by his son Prahlada. In the same way, after the god Rama kills Ravana, the “demon” king of Lanka, Rama appoints as successor Ravana’s brother Vibhishana. Asuras and other supernormal beings thus have a legitimate place in the Hindu mythic world, and as long as they do not overreach themselves and throw the world into imbalance, they are allowed to remain.
Deogarh
Small town in the extreme southern part of the state of Uttar Pradesh, seventy miles south of the city Jhansi, in a part of Uttar Pradesh almost completely enclosed by the state of Madhya Pradesh. It is famous as the site for one of the few surviving temples from the Gupta dynasty, a fifth-century temple dedicated to Vishnu as the Dashavatar ("Ten Incarnations"). The temple itself is a masonry cube about twenty feet on each side, topped by a ruined tower that would have originally been about forty feet high. In its modest size and square construction, this temple shows little resemblance to the Hindu temples of a later age. However, it prefigures later architecture in its magnificent carvings: in the images carved in panels on the side walls, around the temple's single door, and on friezes at the top of the walls. The portrayal of the divine figures in these carvings is identical to that done centuries later, which indicates that the images used to represent these deities were already fixed at the time the temple was built.

Deogar
(“God’s home”) Sacred site (tirtha) in the southeastern corner of the modern state of Bihar, about 130 miles southeast of the city of Patna. Deogar is famous throughout India as the site for a temple to the god Shiva, in his form as Vaidyanath, the “Lord of Physicians.” Vaidyanath is one of the twelve jyoti-lingas, a group of sacred sites deemed especially holy to Shiva, and at which Shiva is believed to be uniquely present. Deogar hosts an enormous religious gathering on the festival of Shivaratri (February—March) and during the lunar month of Shravan (July—August), both of which are times deemed particularly sacred to Shiva. On both occasions, pilgrims draw water from the Ganges at Sultanganj, more than sixty miles from Deogar, and then walk to Deogar to present the water as an offering to Shiva. This particular observance combines devotion to God with the willingness to suffer hardship; it is often performed to fulfill a vow made when asking for some divine favor. As in many Hindu holy places, pilgrim traffic peaks at Deogar at certain festival times and at other times of the year drops off to almost nothing.

Deoras, Balasaheb
(1915–1996) Third sarsanghchalak (“Supreme Leader”) of the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (rss), a conservative Hindu organization whose express purpose is to provide the leadership cadre for a revitalized Hindu India. The rss is a highly autocratic organization that lays great stress on obedience to authority, thus the sarsanghchalak wields virtually complete power over it. During Deoras’s tenure from 1973 to 1994, he took a much more activist stance than his predecessor, M.S. Golwalkar, particularly in promoting the growth of the rss’s affiliate organizations, in giving the rss an orientation to social service, and in actively seeking to recruit members and establish shakhas (branches) in all parts of the country. For further information see Walter K. Andersen and Shridhar D. Damle, The Brotherhood in Saffron, 1987; Tapan Basu et al., Khaki Shorts and Saffron Flags, 1993; and Christophe Jaffrelot, The Hindu Nationalist Movement in India, 1996.

Deshasta
The model for traditional Indian society was as a collection of endogamous subgroups known as jatis ("birth"). These jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group's hereditary occupation, over which each group had a monopoly. This sort of differentiation applied even to brahmins, whose role has been to serve as priests, scholars, and teachers. The Deshasta brahmin jati is a subset of the Maharashtri brahmins, who were themselves one of the five southern brahmin communities (Pancha Dravida). The core region for the Deshastha brahmans is in the Deccan region in Maharashtra, whereas the other major subcommunity, the Chitpavan or Konkanastha, is found on the coast.

Deshnok
Small village in the Bikaner district in the state of Rajasthan, roughly twenty miles south of the city of Bikaner. Deshnok is famous for the temple to the goddess Karni Mata, in which thousands of rats have been given sacred status and are treated as deities, in the belief that they are Karni Mata's sons.

Deul
(probably a form of deva, "deity") In the temple architecture of the state of Orissa, this is the name for the beehive-shaped tower under which the image of the temple's primary deity resides. Unlike the architecture in other parts of northern India, in which a series of towers (shikharas) gradually led up to the tallest tower, Orissan temples tend to have a fairly long and low entrance porch (jagamohans) and an extremely high deul, with this difference in visual forms accentuating the contrast between the two.

Deva
The word deva literally means "shining one," although the most common (and often most appropriate) translation is "god." This word is an epithet for any superhuman being, although it can also be used figuratively for any person of high status, such as a king or a brahmin (priest). The notion of "gods" in Hinduism must be understood in light of the generally assumed context of reincarnation (samsara), which assumes that a person can be reborn in many different realms of reality. Some of these are realms of punishment where people are subjected to the vicissitudes of reincarnation—every Indra, the ruler of heaven. Birth in heaven is based on one's good karma, which is inevitably diminished by enjoying the rewards of life in heaven, just as a savings account is depleted by continuing withdrawals. When their good karma has been exhausted, even the gods are subject to rebirth in other realms. So even though these gods are superhuman, they are still subject to the law of reincarnation. There is thus a qualitative difference between these gods (the devas) and the so-called Great gods, such as Vishnu, Shiva, and the Goddess. These latter deities are seen by their devotees (bhakta) as totally outside the realm of space, time, and the causes and effects of karma, and thus correspond more directly to the Judeo-Christian notion of “God,” as the ultimate power in the universe.

Devadasi
("[female] servant of the lord") Name for a class of women kept in temples as singers and dancers in the service of the temple's presiding deity, to whom they were usually considered to be "married." Their special status prevented them from marrying human husbands, although in many cases they would form long-term liaisons with prominent local men. Any daughters born from such liaisons would in turn be dedicated to the temple, while sons would be trained as musicians. In many cases, devadasis had unusual legal rights, such as the ability to own, manage, and transfer property, which for most women were vested only in their husbands. At best, these devadasis were literate and cultured women, whose talents brought them considerable status, while at worst (as was often the case in the nineteenth century) they were prostitutes whose services enriched the temple. The latter situation prompted the British to formally ban this practice, despite their general reluctance to interfere in Hindu religious affairs.

Devaki
In Hindu mythology, the god Krishna's mother. Krishna is considered the eighth avatar (incarnation) of the god Vishnu, and like all of the avatars, he comes down to earth to restore the cosmic balance by destroying the forces of evil that are upsetting it. Devaki is the niece of King Kamsa, the evil king of Mathura, and on the day she is married a heavenly voice proclaims that her eighth child will kill Kamsa. Kamsa seeks to destroy this prophecy by imprisoning Devaki and her husband, Vasudeva, killing each of their children as they are born. Devaki's seventh child is magically transferred to the womb of her co-wife, Rohini, and is born as Balarama. At the birth of the eighth child, Krishna, the locked gates magically open, and a deep sleep falls over all the guards, allowing Vasudeva to spirit the infant child to his foster parents, Nanda and Yashoda.

Devapratishtha
(“establishing the deity”) Rite by which the image of a deity is established in a temple and consecrated for worship. The image itself must be constructed according to carefully defined sculptural and artistic canons that date back to the early centuries of the common era, as the sculptures at the Deogarh temple clearly show. The image, temple site, and the performers must be purified before the rite begins, and this purity must be maintained throughout the entire rite—which can last for days—to ensure that the image remains pure. All parts in the transmission and physical installation of the image are carefully done, but the climactic rite is the pranapratishtha, in which the image is infused with the breath of life and becomes the seat for the deity. After this point, the image is considered to be ritually “alive,” and must receive regular worship and ministrations.

Devaprayag
(“divine confluence”) Sacred town (tirtha) in the northern part of the state of Uttar Pradesh, in the Himalaya Mountains about sixty miles up the Ganges from the city of Haridwar. Devaprayag is sacred because it is at the confluence of the Bhagirathi and Alakananda rivers, the largest Himalayan tributaries of the Ganges. Devaprayag is the final such river confluence in the Himalayas, and it is at this confluence that the Ganges is definitively formed as one indivisible sacred stream.

Devar
In the northern Indian joint family, the term designating a husband's younger brother. The traditional Indian joint family is headed by a husband and wife. The couple's sons, the sons' wives, and unmarried daughters live with them. The married daughters live with their husbands' joint families. The joint family is not just a group of people living together. The good of the family is given higher value than any individual's desires. Traditional Indian society was highly status-conscious, a trait reflected not only in the traditional hierarchical conception of society, but also in similar conceptions within the family. Based on these assumptions, there are different words for all sorts of relationships in the Indian family. These words are based partly on a person's age in relation to the speaker, whether he is related by blood or by marriage, and whether blood relatives come from the mother's or the father's side of the family. Since a woman's devar is younger than her husband, he is considered a person of less exalted status, and thus someone with whom she may have a more familiar "joking relationship."

Devara Dasimayya
Tenth-century devotee (bhakta) of Shiva, who was much admired by Basavanna and the other Lingayat leaders. According to tradition Dasimayya earned his living as a weaver, but spent most of his energies propagating the worship of Shiva. He encountered particular opposition from the Jains and the Vaishnavas, about which there are many miraculous tales, but he also served as a missionary to jungle tribes. For further information see A. K. Ramanujan (trans.), Speaking of Siva, 1973.

Devaram
Name for the collected hymns of the poet-saints Appar, Sambandar, and Sundaramurtti. These were the most important of the Nayanars, a group of sixty-three Shaiva poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and ninth centuries. Along with their Vaishnava counterparts, the Alvars, the Nayanars spearheaded the revitalization of Hindu religion versus the Buddhists and the Jains. Both the Nayanars and the Alvars stressed passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god—Shiva for the Nayanars, Vishnu for the Alvars—and conveyed this devotion through hymns sung in the Tamil language. Appar and Sambandar were the first of the Nayanars, and Sundaramurtti was the last. Although the hymns in the Devaram are devotional, they form the basis for the philosophical school known as Shaiva Siddhanta, and are thus considered the holiest of the Tamil Shaivite texts. The hymns are also marked by opposition and hostility to non-Hindu traditions, particularly the Jains, with whom the Nayanars were apparently contesting for influence and patronage.

Devasena
In southern Indian mythological tradition, Devasena is the wife of the god Skanda, in his southern Indian form as Murugan. Following the pan-Indian custom of arranged marriage, Devasena is given in marriage to Skanda by Indra (king of the gods) and the other Hindu gods. After his marriage, Skanda contracts a “love-marriage” with the tribal girl Valli. Skanda’s two wives thus symbolize both sides of his identity—Valli bears witness to his connection with the land, and his ultimate roots as a tribal deity, while Devasena shows his assimilation into the larger Hindu pantheon.

Devayajna
(“sacrifice to the gods”) One of the Five Great Sacrifices (panchamahayajna) that is prescribed in the texts on religious duty (dharma literature). These Five Great Sacrifices are prescribed daily religious observances for a “twice-born” householder, that is, a householder who has been born into one of the three twice-born groups in Indian society—brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya—and who has received the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” Each of the five sacrifices (yajna) is directed toward a different class of beings—from the Absolute Reality down to animals—and is satisfied by different actions. The devayajna is directed toward the gods and is satisfied by homa, the offerings of clarified butter into the sacred fire. In the time since these texts were composed, Hindu life has undergone significant changes, and since most Hindu homes no longer maintain a sacred fire, this particular rite has been largely omitted.

Devimahatmya
(“Greatness of the Goddess”) The earliest and most important mythic source for the cult of the Goddess as the supreme divine power. The Devimahatmya is itself a section of a larger Sanskrit (sacred language) text, the Markandeya Purana, and is generally accepted to have been composed in the fifth or sixth century. The Devimahatmya is most notable for its assertion that God is female. This notion has no clear source in the earlier Hindu tradition, in which female deities exist but are insignificant. This conviction must have existed at some level, because it emerges fully developed in the Devimahatmya, and the idea must have spent some time developing before its full fruition in this text.

The Devimahatmya itself is a text of 700 verses, hence its other common name, the Durgasaptashati (“700 verses to Durga”). The text begins with a frame story, in which a king and a merchant, each beset by worldly trials, seek refuge in the peace of the forest. There they meet a sage, who listens to each of their stories, and explains that all of their troubles are due to Mahamaya (an epithet of the Goddess). This is an epithet for the Goddess as the wielder of illusion, who is the sole power behind the universe. When pressed for further details, the sage tells three mythic stories, each describing the salvific activity of the Goddess. These three tales form the bulk of the text and the basis for the worship of the Goddess.

The first story retells the myth of the demons Madhu and Kaitabha, who are born from the god Vishnu’s earwax during the period of cosmic dissolution (pralaya). As the creation of the world begins anew, a lotus sprouts from Vishnu’s navel. It opens to reveal the creator-god Brahma, who is immediately menaced by Madhu and Kaitabha. The story of these two demons also appears in the mythology connected with Vishnu, but there are significant differences in this version. In all versions of the myth, Brahma appeals for help, and Vishnu eventually slays the demons.

powerful that none of the gods can conquer him. One day, when the gods are recounting their defeats at the demon's hands, each of the gods begin to give off a great radiance. This radiance collects into a single glowing mass, and from it the figure of the Goddess emerges. This myth portrays the Goddess as the concentrated essence of all the gods, and thus superior to any one of them. This motif is accentuated by each of the gods giving her a copy of their weapons, so that symbolically she wields all of their divine powers. The Goddess takes up arms against Mahishasura and his army, and after a terrifying battle, slays him.

The third story also portrays the Goddess as a warrior-queen. In this episode, she fights and destroys the demon armies of Shumbha and Nishumbha, along with their minions Chanda, Munda, and Raktabija. This story is notable for the first appearance of the fierce goddess Kali, who springs forth from the forehead of the Goddess as her anger personified. Kali helps the Goddess to defeat the demon armies by Stuffing them into her mouth and consuming them. Kali is also instrumental in destroying the demon Raktabija, who has been granted the wish that whenever a drop of his blood falls to the ground, it will be transformed into another full-sized copy of himself. This makes him impossible to kill by conventional means. Kali is able to thwart this special power by drinking Raktabija's blood before it reaches the ground.

All of these stories describe the Goddess as the supreme divine power, far superior to the male gods in the pantheon. The frame story ends with an extended hymn of praise to the Goddess, and descriptions of the benefits gained from her worship. Both the king and the merchant begin to worship her, and after three years both are granted their desires. The king asks for a larger and unconquerable kingdom, alluding to the Goddess's power to bestow worldly wishes. The merchant, however, requests final liberation, showing his awareness of her power over illusion, and the ultimate spiritual goal. For further information see Thomas B. Coburn, Devi Mahatmya, 1984.

Devotthayan Ekadashi
Festival falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Kartik (October–November). This is celebrated as the day on which the god Vishnu awakens from his four-month slumber, having fallen asleep on Devshayani Ekadashi ("eleventh day festival") in Ashadh (June–July). When Vishnu has arisen from sleep, the ritually dangerous chaturmas ("four-month") period is over, and auspicious life-cycle rites such as weddings and the sacred thread ceremony ("adolescent initiation") may be performed again.

Devshayani Ekadashi
Festival falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Ashadh (June–July). This is celebrated as the day on which the god Vishnu falls asleep on his serpent couch Shesha, and remains sleeping for four lunar months, waking up on Devotthayan Ekadashi. This four-month period (chaturmas) is considered unlucky and ritually dangerous, since it is a period when the god is considered to be insensible. Weddings are generally not performed during this period, nor is any other life-cycle rite that can be postponed. This festival coincides with the advent of the rainy season, and the ambivalence connected with the rains can be seen here. On one hand, the rains are essential to the crops, and thus foster life and fertility. On the other hand, the rains also bring all too real dangers from snakes, scorpions, and gastrointestinal infections.
Dhanga
(d. 1003) A monarch in the Chandella dynasty, most famous for committing religious suicide by drowning himself at Allahabad, at the confluence of the Ganges and Yamuna rivers. The inscription that records this event mentions that Dhanga did this at the end of his life—when he had lived more than one hundred years—while meditating on the god Rudra, a form of Shiva, and further notes that by committing suicide Dhanga gained final liberation of the soul (moksha). This description clearly shows that religious suicide was a highly structured religious act, the object of which was to help the performer die in a calm and composed state of mind, ideally with one's last thoughts focused on a deity. A crucial element in this ritual was the statement of purpose (samkalpa), in which the performer would state the benefit desired from his performance. Dhanga's statement of purpose is almost certainly the basis for his assertion that he attained final liberation, since this claim is not verifiable in any other way.

Dhangar
The model for traditional Indian society was a collection of endogamous subgroups known as jatis (“birth”). These jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group's hereditary occupation, over which each group had a monopoly. In traditional central Indian society, the Dhangars were a Hindu jati whose hereditary occupation was herding sheep and goats. They are particularly associated with the state of Maharashtra.

Dhanus
(“bow”) In Hindu iconography, the bow is a weapon associated with several Hindu deities. It has strong mythic associations with the god Shiva, who in one of his mythic exploits destroys the Three Cities (tripura) with a single arrow. It is also commonly associated with the god Rama, whose unfailing arrows slay Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka. Aside from these, it is also one of the weapons commonly carried by powerful forms of the Goddess, such as Durga. The reason for this can be found in her charter myth in the Devimahatmya, in which the Goddess is formed from the collected radiance of all the gods and receives duplicates of all their weapons.

Dhanvantari
In Hindu mythology, Dhanvantari is the physician of the gods and is credited as the founder of ayurveda, a traditional system of Indian medicine. Dhanvantari is born when the gods and demons (supernatural beings) churn the Ocean of Milk to produce the nectar of immortality. In the course of their churning, many precious things are produced, including the goddess Lakshmi, the wishing-cow Kamadhenu, and the Kaustubha jewel. As the churning reaches its climax, Dhanvantari himself emerges from the ocean bearing the pot of amrta, the nectar of immortality that has been the ultimate product of the whole endeavor. See also Tortoise avatar.

Dharamshala
(“abode of dharma”) A no-frills rest house for pilgrims. Dharamshalas were often built by pious donors (this was endowed as a religious act), to provide pilgrims not only with a basic place to stay during their pilgrimage, but also a place with a wholesome religious atmosphere. The facilities at a dharamshala are generally quite basic, and well below the standard set by a hotel—in many cases it is a nearly bare room in which the pilgrims cook, eat, and sleep, often on their own bedding. Until well into the twentieth century, pilgrims were under no obligation to pay anything for staying, although on departing they were expected to leave a donation according to their means and inclination. In most cases dharamshalas now have set rates for lodging, but they are always cheaper than hotels since the amenities tend to be less. There is also a marked difference in their general atmosphere and clientele. Most dharamshalas still strive to promote and maintain a wholesome religious atmosphere: by having a temple in the building; by holding worship in the morning, evening, and on special occasions; and by sponsoring scriptural readings, lectures, and other religious activities. These activities help to create a religious community, and those who are seeking this during their journey will strive to stay in such places.

Dharana
("concentration") In the ashtanga yoga (system of religious discipline) first codified by the philosopher Patanjali, dharana is the sixth of the eight elements of yoga practice. Along with dhyana and samadhi, dharana is one of the three parts known as the “inner discipline” (samyama), the culmination of yogic training. Dharana is described as steadfastness of mind. It is the ability to focus on any object, whether a part of the body or an external object, and to keep the mind steadily focused there. This is training for one’s mind and one’s awareness and is an essential prerequisite for focused meditation.

Dharma
One of the four purusharthas, or aims of life, the others being artha (wealth, power, and prosperity), kama (desire), and moksha (liberation). The concept of dharma is so fundamental to Hindu culture that it cannot be adequately translated by any single English word—possible translations are “religious law,” “religious duty,” “duty,” “religion,” “law,” or “social order.” The root meaning for the word dharma comes from a verb meaning “to support” or “to uphold.” Dharma is thus that which supports or upholds society, which shows why all the aforementioned translations could make sense in context. Dharma provides the overall regulatory framework for life in the world and gives a sense of ultimate purpose to keep one’s life in balance. Although Hindu culture sanctions the pursuit of both power (artha) and pleasure (kama), it is always assumed that both of these will be regulated by an underlying commitment to dharma, to keep one’s life integrated and balanced.

The dharma literature, primarily the Dharma Sutras (aphorisms on religious duty) and Dharma Shastras (treatises on religious duty), was largely concerned with laying down guidelines for an organized and orderly society, and these guidelines take into account many possible factors. Although these texts spoke of an eternal (sanatana) dharma, and of certain common duties (sadharaṇa dharma) incumbent on all human beings, the most important thing for any person was one’s personal dharma (svadharma). One’s svadharma provided a well-defined social status and role, based on one’s social status (varna), stage of life (ashrama), and gender (the particular dharma for women was stridharma). These texts were almost certainly composed by brahmin (priests) men, and reveal everything about how these men thought things should be, but are far less reliable with regard to actual social practices. The men who composed this literature presupposed an unequal society, in which birth into high or low status groups was determined by the nature of one's karma (actions), whether good, bad, or mixed. Although various groups had unequal status, they were all necessary for society to function harmoniously, and true virtue lay in meticulously fulfilling one's prescribed social role. Doing so faithfully was not only a source of religious merit, but if one did one's obligations dispassionately from a sense of duty, it was also described as one of the three paths for liberation of the soul, the path of Action (karmamarga). For further information see Pandurang Vaman Kane (trans.), A History of Dharmasastra, 1968; and K. S. Mathur, “Hindu Values of Life: Karma and Dharma,” in T. N. Madan (ed.), Religion in India, 1991.

Dharma

(2) A deity, seen as the personification of dharma as religious duty. In the Mahabharata, the latter of the two great Hindu epics, the five Pandava brothers, who are the epic's protagonists, all have divine fathers, and the eldest brother Yudhishthira is the son of Dharma. Yudhishthira and his brothers belong to a kingly (kshatriya) family, but Yudhishthira himself shows great concern for truth, righteousness, and compassion. None of these are proverbial kshatriya qualities, which tend to stress courage and martial valor, and Yudhishthira's qualities are usually explained by invoking the influence of his divine father. A different sort of Dharma cult arose in medieval Bengal, from the commingling of Buddhist, Muslim, and Hindu ideas. In this cult Dharma was worshiped as the formless single supreme Lord (probably reflecting the influence of Islam), but the worship of Dharma contained many similarities with Bengali Hindu rituals. For further information see Shashibhusan B. Dasgupta, Obscure Religious Cults, 1962.

Dharma Literature

Many texts are explicitly or implicitly concerned with the question of dharma, or religious duty. These begin with the Vedas, the oldest Hindu sacred texts, which are believed to articulate the eternal (sanatana) dharma. The first major texts explicitly devoted to dharma are the Dharma Sutras, texts written in an aphoristic (sutra) style between the seventh and second centuries B.C.E. At least in theory, the Dharma Sutras were all connected with particular schools of the Veda, and were thus primarily intended as a manual for behavior for members of that school alone. The Dharma Sutras were followed by the Dharma Shastras, in which the material in the Dharma Sutras was expanded and put into verse; these latter texts included instructions for all members of society and were thus intended to be “legal” in their import. Among the earliest was the Manava Dharma Shastra (Manu Smrti), which was composed around the turn of the common era. The process of rethinking and expanding this legal tradition through commentary has continued until present times, although the most significant works were completed by the sixteenth century.

Dharmaputra

(“son of Dharma”) One of the epithets of Yudhishthira, the eldest of the five Pandava brothers. The Pandavas are the protagonists in the Mahabharata, the latter of the two great Hindu epics. In the epic, Yudhishthira and his brothers are the sons of various deities, magically born when their mothers use the power of a mantra (sacred sound). Yudhishthira's father is the god Dharma, the guardian of righteousness. His paternity is used to explain Yudhishthira’s concern with truth and righteousness, which are defining qualities in his character. These are not usually considered to be kingly (\textit{kshatriya}) values, which stress courage and martial valor.

(“King of Righteousness”) Colloquial name for \textit{Yama}, god of death and presiding deity of the underworld. Yama is responsible for judging and punishing the dead, and this threat of punishment, at least in popular belief, makes people avoid committing evil. This name is also one of the epithets of \textit{Yudhishthira}, the eldest of the five \textit{Pandava} brothers, since his father is the god \textit{Dharma}, the guardian of righteousness.

A general term to denote the study of \textit{dharma} (religious duty), whether referring specifically to the actual texts (\textit{Dharma Shastras}), or the treatises on religious duty or more generally to the extensive commentary-like literature on these texts. Although the Dharma Shastras are generally believed to have been written between the second century B.C.E. and the early centuries of the common era, this literature continued to be written until modern times. The literature detailed views on legal matters, such as crime and punishment, civil law, contracts, and rules of evidence. It also concerned matters of social order. The most extensive catalog of all these sources is a five-volume set by Pandurang Vaman Kane (trans.), \textit{A History of Dharmasastra}, 1968.

(“Treatises on \textit{Dharma}”) In its most particular sense, this word refers to a particular set of \textit{Sanskrit} texts. These texts were explicitly written to give guidelines for the organization of society, and for correct human behavior in that society. The Dharma Shastras were written soon after the \textit{Dharma Sutras} (aphorisms on religious duty) and are clearly modeled on them, but have several important differences. With regard to form, the Dharma Sutras are written in prose, whereas the Dharma Shastras are written in simple verse. The language of the Dharma Shastras is close to classical Sanskrit, and the writers were trying to make their texts clear and easy to understand. In their content, the Dharma Shastras treat the same general subjects as the Dharma Sutras, but they place far more emphasis on working out the practical details of a social life, particularly the duties and functions of the king.

The final difference is their connection with the earlier Vedic literature. The Dharma Sutras were conceived as the final element of a \textit{Kalpa Sutra} (complete handbook of religious practice), along with the \textit{Shrauta Sutras} (prescriptions for Vedic rituals) and the \textit{Grihya Sutras} (prescriptions for domestic rites). Each Kalpa Sutra was associated with one of the \textit{Vedas} (the oldest sacred Hindu texts), and thus the “family property” of the particular brahmins (priests) connected with that Veda. A particular Dharma Sutra was thus associated with a particular group of brahmins, and was primarily intended as a manual for their behavior. In contrast, the Dharma Shastras purported to lay down rules for all members of society. They show little concern for ritual matters, and no connection with any particular Vedic school, but rather profess to lay down universal truths. In keeping with this emphasis, the surviving Dharma Shastras are all attributed to mythical sages—\textit{Manu}, \textit{Yajnavalkya}, and \textit{Narada}—whereas the Dharma Sutras are given human authorship. The Dharma Shastras thus mark the study of dharma (\textit{dharmashastra}) as a discipline distinct from the earlier Vedic literature, and applied to society as a whole.

rules of conduct for various social groups, moral duties, rights, and obligations. These were composed as collections of aphorisms, some so brief that they virtually presuppose commentary, and were written between the seventh and second century B.C.E. According to theory, the Dharma Sutras were the third and final part of a Kalpa Sutra (complete handbook of religious practice), which would also contain prescriptions for Vedic rituals (Shrauta Sutras) and domestic rites (Grhya Sutras). Each Kalpa Sutra was theoretically connected with one of the four Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts, and was thus the “family property” of the brahmins (priests) connected with that Veda. A particular Dharma Sutra was associated with a particular group of brahmins and was primarily intended as a manual for their behavior.

The real picture is far more complex, since more than twenty collections of Dharma Sutras have been identified, although the most important are attributed to sages and writers Apastamba, Gautama, Vasishtha, Baudhayana, and the god Vishnu. These Dharma Sutras were an attempt to provide an ordered way of life by delineating each person’s rights and duties depending on his or her social status (varna) and stage of life (ashrama). These texts were the basis for the later Dharma Shastras (treatises on religious duty), which expanded the sutras, put them into verse, and were intended to serve as an actual code of law for the members of the community.

Dharna

Name for a rite intended to compel another party to address one’s grievances; the rite is usually adopted when all other options have failed. The word dharna comes from the Sanskrit (sacred language) verb that means “to hold” or “to maintain.” One element in the dharna rite is just that—the persistent public presence of the supplicant in proximity to the people to whom he or she is appealing. Thus, an aggrieved civil servant in modern India may hold a dharna near the Parliament building in Delhi, and in some cases people have camped there for months in an effort to publicize their plight and mobilize public opinion. In the same way, people may hold a dharna at the temple of a deity to seek guidance or help; the most prominent example of this is at the Tarakeshvar temple in the state of West Bengal.

Aside from persistent presence, dharna’s other common characteristic is self-inflicted suffering, usually done through fasting (upavasa) or other forms of ascetic self-denial. Pilgrims to Tarakeshvar refrain from eating or drinking until the god Shiva grants them a vision, although in practice the temple priests often limit such exertions to three days. On the political level, Mohandas K. Gandhi perfected the “fast unto death” as a tool to help attain his political ends. One of the cultural assumptions that helps make such self-inflicted suffering persuasive is the ancient Hindu belief that by voluntarily enduring physical suffering (tapas) one can generate spiritual and magical power. The other working assumption that makes the dharna effective comes from the declaration at the rite’s beginning. On the human level, dharnas are usually undertaken to address very specific perceived injustices, which are made public at the start. It is generally believed that should the person performing dharna die, then the person against whom the dharna had been held will be assessed the karmic demerit for causing that person’s death. Such dharnas are generally only undertaken when one has no other alternative. Because of this assumption, they remain a powerful resource, even in contemporary times.

Hindu branch of the Indian tradition of alchemy, which seeks to transform, transmute, and perfect the body through the use of various chemicals with the ultimate goal of rendering the body immortal. Just as both Hindus and Buddhists appropriated the idea of yoga (act of discipline), both traditions also have alchemical schools. The Dhatuvada school stressed seeking bodily perfection solely through consuming drugs and potions, particularly ones compounded from mercury and cinnabar. This is theoretically different from the Buddhist Rasayana school, since the latter is said to use such material means only to prolong life until the body can be transmuted through meditation, ritual, and yoga. The conceptual foundation for Hindu alchemy is its analysis of the world as a series of bipolar opposites, and the conviction that unifying these opposing forces brings spiritual progress and the end of reincarnation (samsara). The governing metaphor for this combination of opposites is the union of sun and moon. In keeping with this bipolar symbolism, both the sun and the moon are connected to other opposing principles through an elaborate series of associations. The sun is identified with heat, drying power, fire, the goddess Shakti, and menstrual blood; the moon with coolness, healing power, water, the god Shiva, and semen. In alchemical practice, the two essential chemical elements are mercury and sulfur—the former identified with Shiva’s semen, and the latter with Shakti’s uterine blood. Through properly mixing and consuming these elements, the impure body is purified and refined, eventually rendering it immortal. Modern descriptions of this practice invariably warn that it should only be carried out under the direction of one’s guru (spiritual teacher); otherwise these combinations will be harmful. This warning is not surprising, since by itself mercury is a deadly poison. For further information see Shashibhushan B. Dasgupta, Obscure Religious Cults, 1962; and David Gordon White, “Alchemy: Indian Alchemy,” in Mircea Eliade (ed.), Encyclopedia of Religion, 1993.

Dhenuka
In Hindu mythology, a fierce demon (supernatural being) who appears in the form of a cow (dhenu). Dhenuka is only one of the demons slain by the god Krishna—this time in concert with his brother Balarama—during Krishna’s childhood in the village of Brindavan. In these episodes, Krishna dispatches the most ferocious demons as if it were child’s play, which in one sense it is. Krishna’s presence in the world, and his interaction with his devotees (bhakta), is considered to be a lila (“play”), and the ease with which he handles these demons attests to this playful revelation of his divine nature. For further consideration of this theme, see David R. Kinsley, The Sword and the Flute, 1975.

Dhobi
A washerman, traditionally one who has cleaned clothes by getting them wet and then beating them on a stone slab. As with all the occupations in traditional India, this was a hereditary occupational group (jati), although the names used to designate them are different from region to region. They were typically believed to be of low status, since they habitually handled clothes rendered impure by sweat and other bodily fluids.

Dhrshtadyumna

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Dhrshtadyumna is the son of King Drupada and the brother of Draupadi, King Drupada's daughter. Dhrshtadyumna and Draupadi are magically born by emerging from a sacrificial fire. Their father sponsors this rite of sacrifice to give birth to a hero who will kill Drona, who has taken away half of Drupada's kingdom after being insulted by Drupada. Drona accepts the boy as a pupil and teaches him the martial arts. Even though a heavenly voice has announced that the boy will eventually kill him, he does this under the conviction that fate cannot be avoided. Dhrshtadyumna is instrumental in arranging Draupadi's marriage to the five Pandava brothers, the epic's protagonists, and he fights on their side during the Mahabharata war. Dhrshtadyumna fights fiercely in the war and eventually kills Drona by cutting off his head, thereby avenging his father's defeat. Yet his triumph is short-lived, for that very night Dhrshtadyumna is killed by Drona's son Ashvatthama, who secretly gains entry to the Pandava camp and kicks Dhrshtadyumna to death.

Dhrtarashtra

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, the son of the sage Vyasa and queen Ambika. Dhrtarashtra and his stepbrother Pandu are the result of a desperate attempt to preserve the royal line of King Shantanu, after Shantanu's son Vichitravirya has died without heirs. Upon Vichitravirya's death, his mother Satyavati calls upon her oldest son, Vyasa, to sleep with Ambika and her sister, Ambalika, in the hope that the women will conceive. According to tradition Vyasa is very ugly, and each woman involuntarily reacts when Vyasa appears in her bed. Ambika covers her eyes, causing her son Dhrtarashtra to be born blind, and Ambalika turns pale, causing her son Pandu to be born with an unnaturally pale complexion. Despite his disability, Dhrtarashtra assumes the throne after Pandu's abdication; the latter renounces the world after being cursed by the sage Kindama. Pandu's two wives have five sons, known as the Pandavas, and Dhrtarashtra and his wife Gandhari have one hundred sons, collectively known as the Kauravas. The ultimate source of conflict in the Mahabharata stems from the conflict between these two royal lines, each of which has a legitimate claim to rule.

Dhrtarashtra does little to forestall this struggle. Although he is generally portrayed as a good person, he is also weak and unable to contain the ambitions of his eldest son, Duryodhana. Here Dhrtarashtra's blindness is not just literal, but also symbolic, as he lacks the vision and clarity that would have allowed him to recognize the breakdown between these two families and to therefore take steps to avoid it. His disability not only keeps him on the margin of daily life, but is also a sign of his inability to influence the course of events, whatever his feelings about them. One of the few times that he actually shows force is when he offers boons to Draupadi (daughter of King Drupada) after her humiliation by Duryodhana and his brother Duhshasana, through which she regains freedom for herself and her husbands.

Because of his blindness, Dhrtarashtra does not actually fight in the Mahabharata war, but receives regular reports from his bard Sanjaya, who has the ability to see events at a distance. After the Kauravas are defeated, he goes with Gandhari and several others to live in Dhruva ("fixed") In Hindu mythology, a boy who is a symbol for the unrelenting pursuit of a goal. Dhruva is a king's son, but for some unknown reason his father favors Dhruva's half-brother over Dhruva. Distressed by this insult, Dhruva takes a vow to attain a place above all others, and goes off to the forest to perform austerities (tapas). After enduring bodily mortifications for eons, the god Vishnu appears to Dhruva to grant him a boon. In response to Dhruva's request for a place above all others, Vishnu promises Dhruva that after his death he will be installed as the Pole Star, the pivot around which all the other stars in the sky will turn. Even now this star is known by that name in India.

Dhuni (from Sanskrit dhu, “to ignite”) A smoldering fire that is kept burning by ascetics. This fire serves multiple purposes in ascetic life: It is a means to stay warm in cold climates, a means to perform physical asceticism by withstanding heat, particularly in the summer, and its care and tending is also a form of religious observance. The dhuni is a natural gathering place, and for many ascetics it is the center of ascetic life, providing heat for warmth, a fire for cooking and making tea, and coals for lighting the chillum, a straight pipe used to smoke tobacco mixed with hashish (charas). The fire itself is seen as the deity Agni in material form. Agni is a witness to the conversation around the dhuni, which should be of a serious and spiritual nature. The dhuni's sacred character can be seen by certain restrictions that were designed to maintain its purity: one should not blow directly on the fire (lest some saliva should contaminate it), but through a tube used for this purpose; one should keep clean the boundary around the dhuni (usually of made of hardened clay); and one should not touch this boundary with one's feet. Certain ascetic centers have a long history of a continuous fire. One such example is the sacred village Trityuginarayan in the Himalayas, where a fire is claimed to have been burning for the past three cosmic ages (yugas).

Dhupa

(“incense”) The eleventh of the sixteen traditional upacharas (“offerings”) given to a deity as part of worship, which follows the model of treating a deity as an honored guest. In this offering, the deity is offered incense to enjoy the scent. The underlying motive here, as for all the upacharas, is to show one's love for the deity and minister to the deity's needs.

Dhushmeshvar

Another name for the form of the god Shiva known as Ghrneshvar. This is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a group of sacred sites (tirthas) deemed especially holy to Shiva, and at which Shiva is believed to be uniquely present. This site is located in Maharashtra state. See Ghrneshvar.

Dhyanani

(“echo”) In poetics—whether secular or sacred—the suggestion or connotation brought out by the poet's language. Indian literary theorists paid great attention to this notion, since attention to it allowed the poet to exercise much greater emotive depths than the surface meanings of the words would indicate and pack a much deeper range of images and associations into even a very short verse.

Dhyana

(“meditation”) In the ashtanga yoga (eight-point discipline) first arranged by the philosopher Patanjali, dhyana is the seventh of the eight elements of yoga practice. Along with dharana (“concentration”) and samadhi (“trance”), dhyana is one of the three parts known as the “inner discipline” (samyama), the culmination of yogic training. Dhyana is described as an extension of dharana, in which the fixed concentration upon an object acquired in dharana is continued and extended without break. In more colloquial modern usage, the word dhyana can be used to describe any sort of focused meditation.

Dhyanashloka

(“meditation verse”) A verse or verses specifying the physical attributes of a deity to give the worshiper a mental image upon which to meditate. Dhyanashlokas are particularly important in the esoteric ritual tradition known as tantra, in which one of the aims is to replace all outward acts of worship with mental activities. In this highly ritualized context, the dhyanashlokas provide both a form and a focus for one's interior worship.

Diaspora Populations

Although the vast majority of Hindus live in their traditional homeland of South Asia, particularly in India and Nepal, there is also a long history of Hindus settling in other lands. By about the fourth century C.E., Hindu traders had spread Indian influence throughout Southeast Asia, where the monuments at the Angkor temple complex and the culture of Bali bear witness to its presence. In the past century, poverty and overcrowding in certain parts of India (especially Bihar) led many of these traders to sign up as agricultural contract laborers in Fiji, South Africa, East Africa, the West Indies, Mauritius, and even Sri Lanka. All of these places have substantial Hindu communities, although their local status differs. In some of these places Indians are considered equal citizens with the indigenous peoples, and in others, such as Fiji, they suffer legal obstacles. Aside from agricultural labor, another possibility for mobility and advancement came through serving in the British army or civil service in other parts of the British Empire, such as Singapore or Hong Kong. Finally, the liberalization of immigration and nationalization laws since the end of World War II has led to the formation of a substantial Hindu community in North America, both in Canada and the United States.

Didarganj Yakshi
Statue found in 1919 in Didarganj, a village near Patna in the state of Bihar. The image is believed to date from the third century B.C.E. and is thus a product of the Maurya dynasty. The statue is of a voluptuous female figure, bare to the waist, wearing abundant jewelry and bearing a yak-tail whisk (chauri), which was a contemporary sign of authority. It is believed to be a statue of a yakshi, a class of nature-spirits connected with fertility and prosperity. It is notable as one of the earliest known stone statues, and there is speculation that this may have come through contact with the Greeks. The figure itself is masterfully rendered in highly polished Chunar sandstone from the sandstone quarries near Benares; the sharply detailed rendering of her clothing and jewelry conveys the illusion of softness and swelling of the bare flesh.

Digambara
("space-clad," i.e., naked) In a general ascetic context, this can refer to any ascetic who is completely naked, which is a sign of having renounced all possessions and all worldly conventions. Among the Bairagi Nagas, or renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Vishnu and who formerly made their living as traders and mercenary soldiers, the Digambaras are one of the three Naga anis (“armies”), the others being the Nirmohis and Nirvanis. In earlier times these anis were actual fighting units, but in modern times they are mainly important for determining bathing (snana) order in the bathing processions at the Kumbha Mela (“Festival of the Pot”). Of the three, the Digambaras are by far the most important, and at the time of the Kumbha Mela take precedence over the others.

Diksha
("initiation") A religious initiation involving the reception of secret religious teachings; the term is said to be derived from the verb dis, “to point out.” The word diksha carries a different sense from the life-cycle rite known as upanayana, the adolescent religious initiation that is the ritualized “second birth” conferred on young men from the three “twice-born” groups—that is, brahmin (priestly), kshatriya (martial), or vaishya (mercantile). Both are religious initiations, and both involve the creation of new capacities and entitlements. Yet diksha is not a rite usually seen as a transition point in the life cycle, but a religious initiation in which the initiate gains secret knowledge from a religious teacher (guru), usually given in the form of the verbal formulas known as mantras. Whereas upanayana takes place while a boy is an adolescent, the time for diksha is based not on physical age, but on a person’s willingness and readiness. Diksha is a particularly important concept in the ritual tradition known as tantra, in which such personalized initiations are the way of transmitting the tradition from master to student.

Dikshanama
("diksha name") Name given to a person after receiving initiation (diksha), as a way of acknowledging and reinforcing the new identity created by the act of initiation. Sometimes, as in the case of ascetic initiation, the initiate’s former name will be replaced with the dikshanama. In other cases the name will be kept secret, as a source of hidden power.
Dikshitar
Southern Indian brahmin (priest) sub-community. The Dikshitars are an extremely small community and are found mainly in the temple-town of Chidambaram in the state of Tamil Nadu. They are the hereditary servants at the temple of Nataraja—the god Shiva in his form as the “Lord of the Dance.” According to their own mythic understanding, the Dikshitars were members of Nataraja’s heavenly host (gana) when he lived in heaven. They accompanied Nataraja when he came down to earth, where they still serve him.

Dilip
In Hindu mythology, one of the figures in the charter myth describing how the river Ganges descended from heaven to earth. Dilip is the great-grandson of King Sagar, and the father of the sage Bhagirath, who finally accomplishes this task. The story begins with King Sagar, whose 60,000 heroic sons made the mistake of insulting the sage Kapila, and have been burned to ash by the fire of Kapila’s yogic powers. Kapila tells Sagar’s grandson Anshuman that the souls of his dead uncles will find peace only when the Ganges River (which is considered to be the material form of the goddess Ganga) comes down from heaven and touches their ashes. After this, the family labors unceasingly to do this; Anshuman and Dilip die with this goal unrealized, but Bhagirath finally brings it to fruition by performing asceticism until the gods agree to send the Ganges to earth.

Dindi
Pilgrim group in the Varkari Panth, a religious community that is centered around the worship of the god Vithoba at his temple at Pandharpur in modern Maharashtra. The primary Varkari religious practice is taking part in two annual pilgrimages, in which all the participants arrive in Pandharpur on the same day. On this pilgrimage, pilgrims travel in groups called dindis. Dindis are often made up of people from the same neighborhood or area and are usually formed along caste lines. During the pilgrimage, members of a dindi travel as a unit, walking and singing devotional hymns together during the day, and cooking and camping together at night. These dindis thus create smaller subcommunities within the larger pilgrim body.

Di Nobili, Roberto
(1577–1656) Jesuit priest and missionary who spent much of his life in Madurai in southern India. Di Nobili came to India to convert Indians to Catholicism and to facilitate his attempt at following the Jesuit pattern of learning the local languages, in this case Sanskrit (sacred language) and Tamil. He also strove to understand local culture and to gain the ritual authority that came with brahmin (priestly) status by emulating brahmin practices (vegetarianism, modes of dress, etc.), as a way to spread the Gospel more effectively. He was a perceptive and careful observer, but his writings remained unpublished during his lifetime. They have only been recently rediscovered. See also Tamil language.

Dipa
(“lamp”) The twelfth of the sixteen traditional upacharas (“offerings”) given to a deity as part of worship, following the model of treating the deity as an honored guest. In this action, the deity is given an offering of light by waving a lighted lamp before it. This rite more commonly goes by the name of arati, a word that is often used to denote worship in general. The underlying motive here, as for all the upacharas, is to show one’s love for the deity, and to minister to the deity’s needs.

Directions
In traditional Hindu reckoning, each of the primary and intermediate directions is associated with a particular divinity, which is believed to rule over this direction and to be the guardian associated with it. See Guardians of the Directions.

Divine Life Society

Religious organization founded in 1936 by Swami Shivananda. It is headquartered at the Divine Life Ashram, just outside the holy city of Rishikesh on the river Ganges in the state of Uttar Pradesh. Although Shivananda himself died in 1963, the society is still quite active in spreading the ways of Hindu life: through yoga (self-discipline) training programs at the Divine Life Ashram; through publishing religious texts, both traditional scriptures and the teachings of Swami Shivananda; through establishing religious centers throughout the world; and through various social service projects in India itself. Swami Shivananda was a Dashanami Sanyasi (ascetic) in the Saraswati division, which is one of the divisions that admits only brahmins (priests). The Swami’s brahmin background comes through in the organization’s teachings, which stress vegetarianism, rigorous spiritual development, an emphasis on learning, and a strict moral code. For all these reasons the organization is widely respected in Indian society, despite having a significant number of foreign practitioners.

Divine Powers

When a single divinity is deemed to be the supreme power in the universe, he or she is generally said to wield five overarching divine powers: creation, ordering and maintaining the cosmos, destruction, concealment, and giving grace (divine self-revelation). The first three powers describe the relationship between the deity and the physical universe, whereas the fourth and fifth focus on the deity’s relationship with individual devotees. By using the power of concealment, the deity becomes hidden in creation, and thus human beings are kept in ignorance. This power of concealment is often also described as the deity’s maya, or the power of illusion that keeps human beings from...
perceiving the divine reality that lies behind all things. This power of illusion is so strong that the only way human beings can break through it is through the deity's grace, the final power. This grace is an act of divine self-revelation, in which the deity shreds the concealing veil of illusion and reveals himself or herself to human beings.

Divorce
Until the twentieth century, formal divorce did not exist in traditional Hindu society. This absence was undoubtedly rooted in the Hindu perspective on marriage. Marriage was seen as a permanent binding of husband and wife (or more precisely, assimilating her identity to his), in a way that ruled out a dissolving of the marriage while both members were still living. When a wife failed to bear children, the husband would sometimes take a second wife, but the original marriage would remain intact. Among the lower social classes, who were often less concerned with maintaining group status through appropriate behavior, husbands and wives would simply abandon their spouses for other partners, but this was strictly forbidden among “respectable” people.

Divorce is legally available in modern India, but social and cultural factors continue to weigh against it. Various factors make many women in unhappy marriages reluctant to sue for divorce: lack of support from their natal families, who are often more interested in trying to make the marriage work; the inability to earn a living on their own; and the near certainty that their husband’s families will be awarded custody of their children, if they have any. Although attitudes are slowly changing, it is also still difficult for divorced women to remarry.

Divya Prabandham
(“Divine Composition”) Shorter name for the Nalayira Divyaprabandham, the collected hymns of the Alvars. The Alvars were a group of twelve Vaishnava poet-saints (devotees of the god Vishnu), who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. In conjunction with their Shaiva (devotees of the god Shiva) counterparts, the Nayanars, the Alvars spearheaded the revitalization of Hindu religion vis-à-vis the Buddhists and the Jains. Both the Alvars and the Nayanars stressed passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god—Vishnu for the Alvars, Shiva for the Nayanars—and conveyed this devotion through hymns sung in the Tamil language. In the southern Indian religious community known as the Shri Vaishnavas, the collected hymns of the Alvars have such high status that they are known as the “Tamil Veda”—that is, the religious texts in the Tamil language which carry the authority of the Veda, the oldest Hindu religious texts.

Diwali
One of the most important festivals in the Hindu religious year, which falls on the new moon in the lunar month of Kartik (October–November). This festival is dedicated to Vishnu’s wife Lakshmi, a goddess who represents wealth, prosperity, and good fortune. According to popular belief, on this night of the new moon Lakshmi roams the earth, looking for households in which she will be welcomed, and which she will render prosperous by her presence. People spend the days before Diwali cleaning, repairing, and whitewashing their homes to make them suitable for welcoming the goddess. On the evening of Diwali people open all their doors and windows to facilitate her entry and place lights on their window sills and balcony ledges, as an invitation to the goddess. In earlier times these lights would be clay lamps or candles, but today strings of electric lights are also widely used. It is from these lights that Diwali gets its name, as a shortened form of Dipavali (dipa “light” + avali “series”). The charter myth for displaying these lights describes how a poor old woman somehow gained a royal boon that all houses but hers would remain unlit on the night of Diwali. When Lakshmi wandered the land she went to the only house that was lit to welcome her. Because of Lakshmi's presence, the old woman's troubles quickly ceased.

Lakshmi's strong associations with money and good fortune account for several other practices often found on Diwali. For many traditional merchant families, Diwali is observed as the beginning of the fiscal year. All outstanding debts and obligations must be cleared up beforehand, for on Diwali new account books are begun. In some cases the account ledgers are ceremonially worshiped on this day and are seen as material manifestations of Lakshmi. Another common practice is gambling, although in most cases it is done within the family, and for small stakes. During the rest of the year gambling is condemned as a potential drain on one's wealth, but doing so on Diwali reaffirms the connection between money and Lakshmi's favor, here in the guise of Lady Luck. Diwali is also an occasion for eating sweets—the more the better—and celebrating the advent of the new year by shooting off fireworks. India's loose regulation of fireworks gives celebrants access to rockets and crackers of truly impressive size, and in the larger cities people celebrate the holiday with such zeal that it sounds like an artillery barrage.

Dog

In general, the dog is considered an extremely unclean and impure animal. Today, keeping dogs as pets in India is a practice that is gaining favor. Traditionally, however, Indian dogs roamed the streets as scavengers, eating whatever they could find, including each other. Such promiscuous eating habits render them ritually impure, even aside from the vermin and disease that they often harbor, particularly rabies. Aside from their practical importance as scavengers, the dog is also the animal vehicle of Bhairava, a wrathful form of
Dom

The model for traditional Indian society was as a collection of endogamous subgroups known as jatis ("birth"). These jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group's hereditary occupation, over which each group has a monopoly. In traditional northern Indian society, the Doms are a jati whose hereditary occupation was cremating corpses. They have extremely low social status because of their habitual contact with dead bodies, considered the most violently impure objects of all. Despite their low status, some of the Doms are unbelievably wealthy, particularly the ones who control the cremation ghats in the city of Benares, for without their cooperation, a body cannot be burned. The word ghat refers to any flat area on the bank of a river. In most cases ghats are used as places for bathing (snana), but in some other cases they are also places for burning bodies, so that the ashes can be placed in the river to ritually "cool" them.

Dorasamudra

Capital city of the Hoysala dynasty, who ruled the region in southern part of the state of Karnataka from the eleventh to the thirteenth centuries. Today Dorasamudra is known by the name of Halebid and is a village about sixty miles north and west of the city of Mysore. Although largely uninhabited, the site is known for a magnificent collection of temples, in particular the Hoysaleshwar Temple, dedicated to the god Shiva in his form as Lord of the Hoysalas. The Hoysala temples were built out of a particular type of stone—variously described as chlorite schist, steatite, or soapstone—that was quite soft when newly quarried, but gradually hardened with exposure to air. This initial malleability made the stone easy to carve, and facilitated the lush detail that characterizes these temples.

Doha

Metrical form in northern Indian bhakti (devotional) poetry, made up of two lines of twenty-four metric beats, divided unevenly after the thirteenth beat. The metric pattern for the first line is $6 + 4 + 3$, with the second line being $6 + 4 + 1$. The method of counting the metric beats is based on the distinction between "heavy" and "light" syllables. A heavy syllable is any syllable with a long vowel or a consonant cluster and is reckoned at two metric beats; all other syllables are reckoned as light, and reckoned as one. Aside from the metric pattern, there are rules about how each half line should end—that the three metric beats ending the first line cannot be a heavy syllable (two beats) followed by a light one (one beat)—which means that it must either be a light syllable followed by a heavy one, or three light ones—and that the line's final syllable must be light. These conventions still leave a great deal of fluidity, and the doha is one of the most important poetic forms for poets writing in Braj Bhasha (the language of Krishna devotion) and Avadhi (a dialect of medieval Hindi). At times the doha can stand alone, as in the epigrams of the poet-saint Kabir, which have become proverbial sayings in much of modern India. The doha was also used in conjunction with verses in other meters, as in the Ramcharitmanas. In this vernacular rendition of the epic Ramayana, written by the poet-saint Tulsidas, the doha usually comes after four verses in the chaupai (four-line) meter, and serves to sum up what has transpired in the preceding verses.

the god Shiva. Bhairava's symbolic association with an unclean animal clearly shows his marginal status in the pantheon—he is powerful, but also feared, because he is not bound by normal rules.

Dowry

In the strictest terms, this word is used in modern Indian society to designate any wealth transferred from the bride's family to the groom's as a condition for the marriage to occur. As with most marriages around the world, Hindu marriages often involve giving gifts to the couple, but Indians themselves draw distinctions between different categories of gifts. It is customary for the bride's parents to give her gifts of clothing and jewelry for her wedding, according to their means. This practice is attested in the dharma literature's (text on religious duty) description of the Brahma marriage. This is one of the eight recognized ways to perform a marriage and describes the bride as richly adorned. These gifts are her personal property, and serve both to give the bride some wealth of her own and as a last resort for the family. It is also common for the bride's family to give gifts to the groom and his family, of which the greatest is the "gift of a virgin" (kanyadan), i.e., the bride herself. In many cases, the newlyweds also receive gifts from other relatives, particularly when they are setting up a household. Both of these sorts of gifts carry no stigma in Indian society and in the popular mind are not considered "dowry."

Unfortunately, not all wedding "gifts" fall into these categories. Most marriages in India are still arranged by the parents, who are operating under differing imperatives. For the bride's parents, marrying off their daughter is a religious duty, which is over and above their natural inclination to provide for their daughter. This gives the groom's parents a distinct advantage, since they "take" the bride, and this advantage can give rise to ugly and even tragic situations. The parents of a young man with a promising career can usually expect larger and richer gifts from the bride's family, since her future will be more secure. In many cases these gifts are neither asked for nor negotiated, but simply given as part of the exchange between two families of equal status. In the worst cases, the groom's family presents a list of demands, which the bride's family is expected to fulfill as a condition for the marriage. Given the pressure to marry off their daughters, the bride's parents may promise more than they are actually able to "deliver." One consequence of this failure is the much-publicized dowry deaths, in which the bride is killed.

Most decent people in India recoil at the notion of "selling" their sons to the highest bidder, or of using his marriage as an opportunity for the family to get rich. At the same time, it is generally accepted that marrying one's daughter will entail considerable effort and expenditure, and that at her wedding one should give appropriate gifts. It is from these assumptions that the evils of dowry stem, and can be exploited by unscrupulous people.

Dowry Death

Name given to a particular type of violent crime against women. According to the much-publicized pattern, it is the killing of a new bride by her in-laws, either for failing to bring enough dowry with her into the marriage, or when her parents could not deliver the dowry that had been promised. In many cases these women were killed by being doused with kerosene and lit, since this could be passed off as an accidental death suffered while cooking. These murders received great publicity in India and abroad in the mid-1980s, in part because of their calculated and horrific nature. The aforementioned pattern simplifies the issues, however, by reducing it to a question of money. It is true that there have been many cases in which women have been killed solely for financial reasons—that is, for not bringing enough dowry. Yet many of the victims of these so-called dowry deaths had been married for years, and their deaths are better explained as the result of an escalating pattern of Draupadi

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Draupadi is the daughter of King Drupada, and the wife of all five Pandava brothers, the epic’s protagonists. This literary reference to polyandry (the marrying of one woman to several brothers) is interesting, since it seems to have been extremely rare throughout Indian history, and the epic has to give an explanation for how this happened. Draupadi’s father vows that he will give his daughter in marriage only to the man who can lift a giant bow, and then hit a target suspended in the air. This feat is child’s play for Arjuna, one of the Pandava brothers and the world’s greatest archer, and he wins Draupadi as his wife. The wedding party returns home, but while they are still outside, their mother Kunti calls out that whatever they have won must be shared between them. To obey their mother, each of the brothers marry Draupadi. They agree that each will live with her for a year, during which time the others shall not attempt to see her.

Draupadi’s most famous scene in the epic comes after her husband Yudhishthira has wagered and lost her in a game of dice. Yudhishthira has been gambling with his cousins Duryodhana and Duhasilana, who seize Yudhishthira’s gaming ineptitude as an opportunity to win the kingdom all to themselves. After the loss, Duhasilana comes to Draupadi’s chamber and drags her by her hair back to the gambling hall. Her pain and humiliation are compounded by the fact that she is in the middle of her menstrual period and is not allowed to change her stained robe. In the gambling hall Draupadi is paraded and humiliated before the crowd like an animal at auction, and her property status is emphasized when Duryodhana offers her his thigh (the euphemism for the genitals) as her place to sit. The final insult comes when Duhasilana tries to disrobe Draupadi by unwinding her sari. Here the god Krishna enact a miracle: No matter how much cloth Duhasilana pulls away, Draupadi remains fully clothed. Stunned and confused, he finally gives up.

Shocked by her humiliation, Duryodhana’s father Dhrtarashtra asks Draupadi to choose a boon. She chooses freedom for her husbands, although they eventually agree to spend a period in exile. Even before this incident there has been tension between the Pandavas and their cousins. With these insults to Draupadi, however, the seeds of discord are more deeply sown. Because Duhasilana has dragged her by the hair, Draupadi vows to leave her hair unbound until she can wash it in Duhasilana’s blood, while her husband Bhima takes an oath to avenge Duryodhana’s insult by smashing Duryodhana’s “thigh.” Draupadi’s hunger for revenge and uncompromising hatred for these two are a major force driving the remainder of the epic, pushing all the parties toward the inevitable fratricidal war.

Dravida

One of the three developed styles in medieval Hindu temple architecture; the others being the Nagara and the Veshara. The Dravida style is primarily found in southern India, particularly in the modern state of Tamil Nadu. Whereas the temple tower in the Nagara style stresses an unbroken verticality, culminating in one high peak, towers in the Dravida style are composed of a series of horizontal tiers, emphasizing the successive layers. Although earlier southern Indian temples have as their focus one central tower, as at the Rajrajeshvar Temple in the city of Tanjore, the focus shifted in about the twelfth century to the building of walls around the temple’s complex perimeters. These walls had enormous gopuraams or central gateways at the cardinal domestic violence, rather than a calculated extortion and murder.

These walls had enormous gopuraams or central gateways at the cardinal points, which were usually the temple's tallest structures by far. The enclosed area inside the temple complex was often enormous, as in the estimated 500 acres at the temple of Shrirangam, but most of the construction was only a single story. (There would be taller towers over the temple's primary images, however.) In the developed examples of the Dravida style, this lessened emphasis on soaring height was compensated by its enormous horizontal spread. The best examples of this later type are the Ranganathaswamy temple in Shrirangam, and the Minakshi temple in Madurai.

Dravida
(2) Brahmin (priestly) group that is one of the five southern brahmin communities (Pancha Dravida). As their name would indicate, the core region for the Dravida brahmans is in deep southern India, in the modern states of Tamil Nadu and Kerala. The most illustrious of the Dravida subcommunities are the Nambudiris, among whom the great philosopher Shankaracharya is believed to have been born.

Dravidian
In the strictest linguistic sense, the word Dravidian is the name for a particular family of languages in which the primary members are the four southern Indian languages: Tamil, Telegu, Kannada, and Malayalam. Aside from these four languages, all located in the southernmost part of the subcontinent, another language in the Dravidian family is Brahui. This is spoken by a small and fairly isolated population in modern Pakistan, far from any other Dravidian language speakers, and completely surrounded by people speaking Indo-Aryan languages. One theory to explain this irregularity is that the Dravidian languages were originally spoken all over the subcontinent, but were gradually displaced toward the south as Indo-Aryan language speakers—better known as the Aryans—came into India. According to this theory, the Brahui-speaking community is an isolated remnant of that earlier time, which somehow managed to remain intact.

This notion also affects how southern Indians form their identities. The word Dravidian can be used to denote a southern Indian or any person whose mother tongue is one of the four primary Dravidian languages. For southern Indians with a strong regional identity, it is a way for them to distinguish themselves from northern Indians and the “imperialism” of northern Indian culture. It is also used with an underlying tone of pride, that as Dravidians they are descendants of the subcontinent’s original inhabitants.

Dreams
As symbol and reality, dreams have multiple uses in Hindu thought. Philosophically, dreams are often used as examples to illustrate the illusory nature of the world as it is perceived. Just as a dream disappears when one wakes up and is perceived to have been unreal the entire time, so does the everyday understanding of the world disappear when one has perceived the ultimate truth. In quite a different understanding, the dream state is the second of the states of consciousness mentioned in the Mandukya Upanishad, or one of the religious texts known as the Upanishads. In the Upanishads, the dream state is the first step in turning one's awareness away from the outside world and into one's Self, where all sense of ego is lost. Waking consciousness is further away from one's Self than the dream state. The four-step pattern in this upanishad, and in others as well, is from waking consciousness, to dreams, to deep sleep, and from there to the realization of the eternal Self.

On quite another level, dreams are an important part of religious life in popular Hinduism. They are often believed to give omens for the future, which may be interpreted as favorable or unfavorable, according to the dream's content and context. Dreams are also seen as providing a channel for communicating with spirits, ghosts, village deities, and other nonhuman spiritual beings. Unquiet spirits of the dead will often appear to family members in dreams to reveal what they need to find peace. The same process is often found with village deities, who usually manifest themselves to specific people in the village, either to give warnings or to make demands.

Drona

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Drona is famous as a teacher of all the arts of war, but particularly for teaching archery. He is the martial preceptor to both the Pandavas and the Kauravas, the two royal factions whose battle for power is at the heart of the Mahabharata. Drona is the son of the sage Bharadvaja, born through an involuntary seminal emission when the sage sees a celestial nymph (apsara). Drona's skill in weapons is gained from the god Vishnu's Parashuram avatar, who bequeaths both his weapons and his skills to Drona as a boon. Drona's skill as an archer is legendary, as is his prowess as an archery teacher. Among his pupils he has a particular fondness for Arjuna (a Pandava brother), whose commitment and concentration so outstrip his peers that Drona promises Arjuna that he will be the world's greatest archer. This support for Arjuna can be seen in the story of Ekalavya, a tribal boy whom Drona refuses to teach because of his low status, but who becomes Arjuna's equal as an archer by worshiping a clay statue of Drona. When Drona discovers this, he demands that Ekalavya give him his right thumb as a preceptor's fee, to ensure that no one will be Arjuna's equal.

During the Mahabharata war, Drona fights valiantly on the side of Duryodhana (eldest son of Dhrtarashtra), but is finally killed by King Drupada's son Dhrshtadyumna. In the epic, Drupada and Drona have a long history of conflict. They have lived together as students, but after their student life ends Drupada becomes the king of Panchala, whereas Drona is so poor he cannot afford to feed his family. On one occasion, when Drona asks Drupada for alms, Drupada upbraids him most insultingly. Drona vows revenge, and after teaching the arts of war to the Pandavas and Kauravas, Drona demands Drupada's kingdom as his teacher's fee (dakshina) from his students. When Drupada is defeated, Drona takes half of his kingdom; Drupada vows to get revenge on Drona. Drupada subsequently performs a great fire sacrifice to give birth to a son who will kill Drona. Out of the fire come two luminous children, one of whom is Dhrshtadyumna, and the other his sister, Draupadi.
Dropsy
Bodily condition in which the body retains excess water, and in consequence swells up. In several hymns in the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts, dropsy is described as the punishment levied by the god Varuna for speaking falsehood. Varuna was conceived as the guardian of cosmic order (rta), and intentionally false speech was considered the paradigm of anrta, the destructive force that ran counter to the ordering force of rta. In this case the punishment was seen as fitting the crime, as if one had been metaphorically inflated by the lies one had told.

Drshtanta
("example") In Indian philosophy, the examples that are one of the required elements in the accepted form of an inference (anumana). These examples were provided as further evidence to prove the reason (hetu) given to support the hypothesis. As a rule, there had to be two such examples. One was a positive example (sapaksha) to show that similar things happened in comparable cases, and the other was a negative example (vipaksha) to show that this did not happen in other cases. In the most common example of an inference, “There is fire on the mountain, because there is smoke on the mountain,” the sapaksha could be “like kitchen” (a place with both fire and smoke), and the vipaksha “unlike lake” (a place without fire or smoke). The purpose of both examples is to support the reason given, by showing that this reason gives sufficient cause to support the theory.

Drugs
The attitude toward drugs in Hindu society shows the incredible variation for which the Hindu religion is famous. In general, the use of drugs is zealously condemned among “respectable” people, as is anything leading to a potential loss of control. Yet Hindu mythology also portrays the god Shiva as regularly consuming intoxicants, particularly bhang, a preparation made primarily from marijuana, and datura, a genus of plants containing poisonous alkaloids. Given this mythic example, some of Shiva’s devotees (bhakta) do the same as a variety of religious practice. Many ascetics regularly spend much of their day smoking hashish (charas) mixed with tobacco, although this is not always viewed as normal ascetic practice. There are also particular times and places when consumption of drugs is more accepted, even among “normal” people. Consuming bhang is a fairly common element in the celebration of certain festivals, such as Shivaratri ("Night of Shiva") and Holi (the festival of reversal). It is also sometimes consumed when people are on pilgrimage, and government-regulated stands selling bhang can be found at several important pilgrimage places (tirtha), including Benares, Puri, and Haridwar. Despite this more widespread use in particular specialized contexts, there are many people who do not use drugs under any circumstances and would never consider doing so. Such rigid refusal is still only one part of the “orthodox” picture, in which one can find many different attitudes.

Drupada
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Drupada is the king of the Panchala region, and the father of Drhghtadyumna and Draupadi. Much of Drupada’s life is absorbed by his struggle with Drona, who has been one of Drupada’s fellow students. After their course of studies is finished, Drupada assumes his throne and lives quite lavishly, whereas Drona is so poor that he cannot even afford to feed his family. In distress, Drona approaches Drupada for help, reminding him of their past connection. Drupada arrogantly dismisses him, telling him that such ties are of no consequence. Drona swears that he will get revenge, and after teaching the arts of war to the Pandavas and Kauravas, the two royal factions whose battle for power is at the heart of the Mahabharata, demands Drupada's kingdom as his preceptor's fee (dakshina). After Drupada is defeated, Drona takes half of his kingdom, whereupon Drupada swears revenge. He performs a great sacrifice to give birth to a son who will kill Drona. Two children emerge from the sacrificial fire: Dhrshtadyumna, who eventually kills Drona; and Draupadi, who becomes the wife of all five Pandavas. During the Mahabharata war, Drupada fights on the side of the Pandavas, his sons-in-law. He is eventually killed in battle by Drona but is later avenged by his son Dhrshtadyumna, who kills Drona.

Duhshasana

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Duhshasana is one of the hundred sons of Dhrtarashtra, who are collectively known as the Kauravas. The heart of the Mahabharata is the struggle for power between the Kauravas and their cousins the Pandavas, and the latter are the epic's protagonists. Duhshasana is most infamous for his misbehavior toward the Pandavas' common wife Draupadi after the eldest Pandava, Yudhishthira, loses everything—including Draupadi—in a game of dice. Duhshasana drags Draupadi into the gambling hall by her hair and with her garments stained by her menstrual blood; he also attempts to disrobe Draupadi by pulling off her sari, but is frustrated here by the god Krishna, who miraculously makes Draupadi's sari infinitely long.

Duhshasana's behavior in this incident only fans the enmity between the two families. Draupadi's husband Bhima, the Pandava brother renowned for his physical strength, vows to avenge this insult by ripping open Duhshasana's chest and drinking his blood, whereas Draupadi vows that she will leave her hair unbound until she can wash it in Duhshasana's blood. During the Mahabharata war Duhshasana fights with his brother Duryodhana and is eventually killed by Duryodhana, after which both Bhima and Draupadi fulfill their dreadful vows. As an extra measure of revenge before killing Duhshasana, Bhima tears off the hand that had held Draupadi's hair and beats Duhshasana with his own severed limb.

Durga

(“inaccessible, impassable”) A particular form of the Hindu Mother Goddess, although the name is often used as a more general title for the mother goddess in her fierce and powerful form. As depicted in images and pictures, Durga rides on a lion and holds in her eight hands the weapons of all the gods. Both of these features correspond to the description of the great goddess in the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most important mythic text used for the worship of the Goddess as the supreme divine power. The general identification of Durga with this great Goddess is underscored by the Devimahatmya’s other common name, the Durgasaptashati (“The 700 [verses] on Durga”). As a form of the great Goddess, Durga is a major divinity in the Hindu pantheon and in modern Hindu life. The eighth day in the waxing and waning halves of the lunar month are considered sacred to her, and her rites are practiced on those days. Her most important festivals are the Nine Nights (Navaratri), which occur in both the spring and the fall. In each of these festivals Durga is worshiped in her nine forms (Navadurga), one on each consecutive night. The variety of goddesses as which she is worshiped again shows us how Durga is conceived as the embodiment of the Goddess in all her forms.

Durgasaptashati

(“700 [verses in praise of] Durga”) Another name for the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most important mythic text for the worship of the Goddess as the supreme divine power. It has this name because the text is 700 verses long, and Durga is one of the common names designating this powerful goddess. The Devimahatmya is well-known for its assertion that God is female. This is a notion with no clear source in the earlier tradition, where female deities were insignificant. The text begins with a frame story, but the bulk of the work is three stories describing the salvific activity of the Goddess, who is portrayed as far superior to the pantheon’s male gods. See Devimahatmya.

Durvasas

In Hindu mythology, a sage who is a partial incarnation of the god Shiva. Durvasas is the son of Anasuya, who for her influence in persuading another woman to remove a curse has been given boons by the gods Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva. Anasuya requests that each be born as one of her sons, and Vishnu is born as Dattatreya, Shiva as Durvasas, and Brahma as Chandra. As a mythic figure, Durvasas is noted for his magic powers, which are not surprising given his background. He is also known for his bad temper and for his tendency... to curse anyone who makes him angry. One victim of his wrath is the maiden Shakuntala, who in her reverie on her newfound love with King Dushyanta does not notice and pay homage to Durvasas. She is cursed that her love would completely forget her. In another case Durvasas curses all the gods to be subject to old age and death. This is provoked by an “insult” from Indra's elephant Airavata, which had flung a garland given by Durvasas to the ground. As with most curses in Hindu mythology, neither of these curses can be withdrawn, but their severity is reduced by mitigating conditions.

Shakuntala is told that King Dushyanta will remember her if she shows him some sign of their relationship, which she does. The gods can avoid old age and death by obtaining and consuming the nectar of immortality (amrta).

As with all the sages, Durvasas can also grant wonderful boons to people with whom he is pleased. One such beneficiary was Kunti, one of the heroines in the epic Mahabharata. Durvasas gives Kunti a powerful mantra (sacred sound), which will allow her to have a child by any of the gods simply by thinking about him. As soon as Kunti receives this mantra, she tests it while looking at the sun, and immediately bears the golden child Karna. In her panic at unexpectedly becoming a mother—she is still unmarried, and understandably concerned about what people might think—she puts the child in a box and abandons him in the Ganges. After her marriage to Pandu (son of the sage Vyasa and queen Ambalika), this mantra is the only way that she is able to have children, since Pandu has been cursed to die the moment he sleeps with one of his wives. She uses this mantra to bear Yudhishthira, Arjuna, and Bhima, then teaches it to her co-wife Madri, who bears Nakula and Sahadeva. Thus, through the gift of Durvasas, all the Pandava brothers—the epic's protagonists—are children of the gods.

Duryodhana

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Duryodhana is the eldest son of King Dhartrarashtra, and thus the leader of the Kauravas, one of the two royal factions whose struggle for power is at the heart of the epic. Duryodhana and ninety-nine brothers are born in an unusual manner. Their mother Gandhari gives birth to a great lump of flesh, which is divided and put into one hundred pots of clarified butter. In these pots the lumps develop into infants. At the moment Duryodhana is born there are a host of evil omens, and when the court astrologers are asked to interpret these, they conclude that Duryodhana will be the ruin of the country and his family, and that it will be better to abandon him to the elements. Fatherly feelings prevent Dhartrarashtra from doing this, which sets the stage for the final conflict. Even though the major force driving the epic's plot is the animosity between Duryodhana and his cousins, the Pandavas, and this ends with the Kauravas being utterly destroyed, it would be inaccurate to paint Duryodhana as an unredeemable villain. He is less evil than ill-starred—proud, stubborn, unwilling to admit his mistakes, and after a certain point, unwilling to grant his cousins any advantage. These character flaws are magnified by the lack of strong guidance from his father Dhartrarashtra, and eventually spell his doom.

The rift between the cousins develops early, inflamed in part by the fact that the Pandavas are more heroic than Duryodhana and his brothers. As a child, Bhima, the Pandava brother best noted for his prodigious strength, used to whip all hundred Kauravas at once. Needless to say this does not endear him to them. Later in adolescence, when their archery teacher, Drona, requests the capture of King Drupada as his preceptor's fee, the Pandava brother Arjuna succeeds in doing this, whereas Drupada defeats Duryodhana in battle.
Another rift grows when the Pandavas contest the right of Duryodhana's friend Karna to take part in an archery match, claiming that Karna's unknown parentage makes him unfit to compete with kings. Duryodhana skirts that issue by proclaiming Karna as the King of Anga, but by then the bad blood between the cousins is well-established.

This bad blood becomes apparent in many different plots. Duryodhana first tries to kill the Pandavas by building a flammable house of lac for them, which is then set on fire. The Pandavas, however, are able to escape unharmed. Duryodhana later entices Yudhishthira (a Pandava brother) into a game of dice. Yudhishthira wagers and loses everything that he has, including himself, his brothers, and their common wife Draupadi. After this loss Duryodhana and his brother Duhshasana publicly humiliate Draupadi, after which Bhima swears a solemn oath to kill them both. Dhrtarashtra gives the Pandavas their freedom, which they promptly lose in yet another game of dice. The outcome of this loss is that the Pandavas agree to spend twelve years in exile in the forest, and live incognito for the thirteenth, with the condition that if they are discovered in the thirteenth year the cycle will begin anew.

Despite the best efforts of Duryodhana's spies, the Pandavas manage to escape detection during the thirteenth year, and at its conclusion send envoys to Duryodhana to claim their share of the kingdom. Perhaps emboldened by Yudhishtira's comment that he and his brothers will be satisfied with a mere five villages, Duryodhana replies that he will not give them enough land to put under the point of a needle. In the face of such stubbornness and injustice, the Pandavas prepare for war to claim what is rightfully theirs. During the war Duryodhana fights valiantly, but in the eighteen days of battle sees his forces disintegrate around him. His final battle is with Bhima, who in exchange for Duryodhana's earlier insult to Draupadi (he had directed her to sit on his thigh, which was a euphemism for the genitals), smashes Duryodhana's thigh with his mace, killing him.

Dushana
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Dushana is one of the brothers of the demon-king Ravana. Together with his brother Khara, Dushana tries to avenge the honor of their sister Shurpanakha, whose ears and nose have been cut off by Rama's brother Lakshmana. In a fierce battle with their demon (supernatural being) army, Rama destroys the army and kills Khara and Dushana. Seeing the failure of her two brothers, Shurpanakha goes to Ravana to beg for vengeance. Ravana realizes he cannot kill Rama in battle but resolves to avenge his sister by kidnapping Sita, wife of Ravana. This sets in motion the plot of the latter part of the epic.

Dushyanta
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Dushyanta is a king of the Lunar Line and the husband of Shakuntala. Their romance is also described in Kalidasa's drama Abhijnanashakuntala. Dushyanta meets Shakuntala, who is living in a forest ashram (abode of an ascetic), while he is hunting in the forest. They fall in love and are married by their mutual consent. After a short time Dushyanta has to return to his kingdom, with Shakuntala to follow soon after. In the meantime, Shakuntala has been cursed by the sage Durvasas that her beloved will completely forget her, although Durvasas later modifies the curse, and says that Dushyanta will remember everything if Shakuntala can show him any proof of their union. The bulk of the story in both episodes is concerned with Shakuntala's trials and tribulations as she strives to regain her rightful place as queen. In both versions, Dushyanta is a minor character, but clearly an essential one.
Dussehra
(variant of Dashahara, “ten days”) Festival celebrated on the tenth day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Ashvin (September–October), and one of the most important celebrations in the year. The festival celebrates the victory of good over evil, and is also known as Vijaya Dashami (“Victory Tenth”). The festival has two charter myths, both of which mark the ultimate triumph of good over evil. One charter comes from the mythology of the Goddess, and marks this as the day on which Durga (form of the Hindu Mother Goddess) slays the buffalo-demon Mahishasura. This episode comes from the Devimahatmya, and is the central theme of the text—the goddess is born to destroy Mahishasura when the gods cannot, and the struggle between the two is the climax of the text. Since the nine days preceding Dussehra are the fall Navaratri, the “nine nights” spent in worship of the Goddess, it seems reasonable that the tenth and concluding day would be marked by the climactic moment in the Devimahatmya, the most important source of mythology for the Goddess.

The other charter myth for this festivval comes from an entirely different source, the mythology of Rama (the seventh incarnation of Vishnu). This is celebrated as the day on which Rama slays Ravana (demon-king of Lanka) and regains Sita (wife of Rama) from captivity.
This victory is symbolized by burning huge effigies of Ravana and his son

In Kulu, people celebrating the festival of Dussehra carry temple images in procession through the streets.
Meghanada (an epithet of Indrajit) on the night of Dussehra, and these effigies often contain fireworks to enhance their pyrotechnic capacity. This time of year is often celebrated with dramatic enactments of the Ramayana (the Sanskrit epic), known as the Ram Lila. In some cases this lasts for ten days, ending on Dussehra; in other cases (as in the Ram Lila in Benares, the sacred city on the banks of the Ganges River) it will last an entire month, with Dussehra marking the death of Ravana.

Dussehra is a highly auspicious day, and popular tradition holds that anything begun on this day will succeed. Dussehra is thus a favored occasion for initiating any important projects, beginning endeavors, or forming organizations, even if it is only a token beginning. Dussehra also marks the beginning of the cool season, when the end of the hot weather and the monsoon rains bring better conditions for military action. Both charter myths have connections with battle and conquest, and in earlier times Dussehra was particularly celebrated by the royal and martial classes. On Dussehra it was customary for soldiers to worship their weapons. Given the festival’s martial associations and the guarantee that all things initiated on that day would be successful, it was also the day of choice for rulers to send out their armies to invade neighboring territories. Even today one of the most spectacular celebrations is in Mysore, where the ruler presides over this festival in his ritual position as king, even though he no longer rules. The other great celebration is in Kulu, where all the deities in the region journey to Kulu to celebrate this festival (along with hordes of their human retainers).

Dvaitadvaita Vedanta
One of the branches of Vedanta, the philosophical school claiming to reveal the ultimate (anta) teaching of the ancient sacred texts known as the Vedas. Dvaitadvaita Vedanta’s founder and most important figure was the fourteenth-century philosopher, Nimbarka. Nimbarka stressed the worship of the god Krishna and his companion Radha as a divine couple, but on a philosophical level he was attempting to find some middle ground between the monism of the Advaita Vedanta school and the dualism of the Dvaita Vedanta school. The former claimed that a single Ultimate Reality—called Brahman—lay behind all things, and that all things were merely differing forms of this single reality. The latter emphasized the utter distinction between God as Ultimate Reality on the one hand, and the world and human souls on the other. Nimbarka stressed that the world and souls were dependent on God, in whom they exist and with whom they had a subtle connection. Nimbarka thus supported the philosophical doctrine called parinamavada, which stressed the real transformation of the divine and the capacity of human beings to transform themselves back to their divine status.

Dvaita (“dual”) Vedanta
One of the branches of Vedanta, the philosophical school claiming to reveal the ultimate (anta) teaching of the ancient sacred texts known as the Vedas. Dvaita Vedanta’s founder and most important figure was the philosopher Madhva, who lived in southern India in the thirteenth century. Madhva’s basic theory is the utter transcendence of God, and this conviction leads him to suggest a philosophical position known as dualism. Dualism asserts a qualitative difference between God in his transcendence and the corruptions of material things. According to Madhva, God is completely different from human Selves and the material world, even though both of these come from God and depend on Him for their continuing existence. In this dualism, Madhva differs sharply from the major school of Vedanta, Advaita Vedanta. The Advaita school upholds a philosophical position known as monism, which is the belief that a single Ultimate Reality—called Brahman—lies behind all things, and that all things are merely differing forms of this single reality. Whereas Advaita collapses all things into one thing, Madhva firmly insists on maintaining differences.

Madhva's stress on dualism leads him to clarify these differing types of things, which is known as the "fivefold difference": the difference between God and the Self, between God and the world, between individual Selves, between Selves and matter, and between individual material things. Even though each Self is believed to contain an aspect of God, this fundamental difference gives the Self only a limited capacity for religious life. This limited power means that final liberation of the soul comes solely through the grace of God, who alone has the power to effect it. Final liberation is conceived both as freedom from rebirth and as the soul's opportunity to remain in the divine presence forever.

With its stress on God's utter transcendence and the emphasis on grace as the sole vehicle for salvation, Madhva's Dvaita Vedanta has often been compared to the theology of John Calvin. Madhva even stated that the world had three classes of beings: those eventually destined for liberation (muktiyogas), those destined for eternal rebirth (nityasamsarins), and those destined for eternal damnation (tamoyogas). Like Calvin, Madhva did not see these categories as promoting fatalism, but rather that the prospect of never attaining liberation could urge one to the faith necessary to pursue an active religious life. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Dvapara Yuga

Particular age of the world in one of the reckonings of cosmic time. According to traditional belief, time has neither beginning nor end, but alternates between cycles of creation and activity, followed by cessation and quietude. Each of these cycles lasts for 4.32 billion years, with an active phase known as the Day of Brahma, and the quiet phase known as the Night of Brahma. In one reckoning of cosmic time, the Day of Brahma is divided into one thousand mahayugas ("great cosmic ages"), each of which lasts for 4.32 million years. Each mahayuga is composed of four constituent yugas (units of cosmic time), named the Kruta Yuga, Treta Yuga, Dvapara Yuga, and Kali Yuga. Each of these four yugas is shorter than its predecessor, and ushers in an era more degenerate and depraved. By the end of the Kali Yuga, things have gotten so bad that the only solution is the destruction and recreation of the earth, at which time the next Kṛta era begins.

The Dvapara Yuga is thus the third of the four yugas contained in a mahayuga, and lasts for 864,000 years. The metal associated with the Dvapara yuga is bronze—less valuable than the gold and silver associated with the earlier ages, but better than the iron of the Kali yuga. This is popularly believed to be the cosmic age in which the god Krishna appeared on earth.

Dvarapala

("door-protector") Guardian images placed on either side of the entrance to a Hindu temple. These figures are usually portrayed as minor celestial beings and conceived as the protectors of the sacred space inside. Since any Hindu temple is first and foremost the home for the deity within, and since both kings and gods often used the same symbols to display and reinforce their status, it is not surprising that the deities would have some “servants” guarding theirs door and restricting access to them, in the same way as their human counterparts.

Dvija
(“twice-born”) Name for a member of the three “twice-born” groups in Indian society, that is, a brahmin (highest in status), kshatriya (second in status to brahmins), or vaishya (third in status to brahmins). This name exists because these groups are ritually eligible to receive the adolescent religious initiation called upanayana, which is often described as the “second birth.” See twice-born.

Dvipas
According to traditional mythic geography, the visible world is composed of a series of seven concentric dvipas, a word that literally means “islands,” but can be translated to “landmasses.” All but one of these are named after particular plants. At the center is Jambu (“Rose-apple”) dvipa, followed by Plaksha (“fig-tree”) dvipa, Salmala (“silk-cotton tree”) dvipa, Kusha (“kusha grass”) dvipa, Krauncha (“curlew”) dvipa, Shaka (“Teak”) dvipa, and at the outermost edge, Pushkara (“blue lotus”) dvipa. Each of these lands is separated from its neighbors by one of the seven oceans (the saptasindhu), with each ocean composed of a different substance. The innermost ocean, as experience shows, is composed of salt water, the ones beyond this are of sugar cane juice, wine, ghee, yogurt, milk, and sweet water, respectively. At the center of Jambudvipa (and thus the world) is Mount Meru, which is compared to the central calyx of a lotus, and is surrounded by the dvipas as its petals. The physical world is thus seen as a symmetrical whole, with the land of India (in the southern part of Jambudvipa) positioned at the symbolic center.

Dwara
(“door” or “gateway”) Among the Bairagis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, the word dwara is used to denote a branch or subsect of a particular order. Each dwara is named after its ascetic founder, who was himself usually a noted disciple of the larger order’s founder. For example, the Nimbarki ascetics are one of the four established orders among the militant Vaishnava ascetics known as the chatuh-sampradayi Nagas, along with the Ramanandis, the Vishnuswamis, and the Madhva Gaudiya (Brahma sampraday) ascetics. The Nimbarkis themselves are divided into nine dwaras, or subsects, each named after the dwara’s founder. The division of ascetics by means of dwaras is another means of subdividing ascetic orders, and creating even more sharply defined ascetic identities and loyalties.
Dwaraka
Sacred city (tirtha) on the western coast of Gujarat, on the shore of the Arabian Sea. In mythic terms, Dwaraka is most famous as the capital city for the god Krishna's kingdom, at which he is believed to have lived in the years following the Mahabharata war. Dwaraka's most important site is the Dwarakanath Temple, dedicated to Krishna in his form as the "Lord of Dwaraka." Dwaraka is also one of the four dhams ("divine abodes"), sacred centers that approximately define the geographic boundaries of India; the three others are Badrinath, Puri, and Rameshvaram. Dwaraka is also the site of the Sharada math, one of the four Dashanami Sanyasi maths (monastic centers) supposedly established by the philosopher Shankaracharya. The Sharada math is the headquarters of the Kitawara group of the Dashanami Sanyasis, one of the four major organizational groups, with each one centered at one of the maths. As with many other Hindu sacred sites, Dwaraka is sanctified by a network of mythic and religious associations.

Dyaus
A minor deity in the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts. Dyaus is a god associated with the sky, but his character is not well-developed, since even at the time of the Vedas he had been largely eclipsed by other gods. Dyaus is part of the oldest layer of Indo-Aryan deities, as evidenced by the Greek form of his name, Zeus.
Earth
In Hindu mythology, Earth is considered a goddess. The notion that India is a sacred land is one of the most deeply rooted elements in Hindu life, and many of India's mountains, rivers, and other geographical features are considered gods and goddesses. This belief extends to Earth itself. In the Vedas, the oldest Hindu sacred texts, Earth appears as the goddess Prthivi, who is lauded for her fertility, her nurturing capacity, and her firmness in supporting all things. Prthivi almost always appears in conjunction with Dyaus, a male deity associated with the sky, whose name is a cognate form of the Greek god Zeus. Sky and Earth thus form the divine couple, with the rain from the sky fertilizing and energizing the earth.

In later mythology the figure of Prthivi is supplanted by the goddess Bhudevi ("Earth Goddess"), who is considered to be one of the wives of the god Vishnu. Bhudevi is less frequently associated with fertility and nurturing; her primary function is as a supplicant to galvanize the world-rescuing activity of Vishnu. When the wicked become too oppressive, or a demon becomes too powerful and disrupts the cosmic order, Earth cries out to Vishnu for help, and Vishnu obligingly restores the cosmic balance. One example of this is the Boar avatar, in which Earth herself is rescued from bondage by Vishnu. For further information see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Eating
Throughout the world the act of eating is imbued with cultural significance and cultural messages, and Hindu culture makes no exception. Given the strong emphasis on purity, Hindus pay significant attention to the preparation and consumption of food. Factors such as whom one eats with, who may prepare one's food, and what types of food one will eat and how it should be prepared all send messages about the social status of an individual or a community. The groups with the highest status, particularly brahmins, are the strictest with regard to their dining habits. For the most part, such high-status groups adhere to a principle known as commensality—that is, only eating food cooked by members of their social group. With regard to the content of one's diet, the great divide is between vegetarian and nonvegetarian. An exclusively vegetarian diet indicates higher status, and among nonvegetarians there are status gradations depending on what types of meat one eats. For orthodox Hindus, every meal is a potential source of ritual contamination and must be carefully monitored. Food cooked in water is seen as far more susceptible to pollution (ashaucha) and greater care is taken in accepting it, whereas food fried in oil or ghee is believed to be much more resistant to pollution and thus a lesser source of ritual danger. From a religious perspective, the safest meal of all is the meal that is cooked and eaten at home. See also Vegetarianism.

Earth
(2) In its material form, one of the five elements in traditional Indian cosmology, the others being water, fire, wind, and akasha. In some philosophical schools, each of the elements is paired with one of the five senses; in this case earth is associated with smell. The element earth is also associated with certain bodily functions, especially the elimination of solid wastes.

Eclipses
Without exception, eclipses are considered highly inauspicious and ritually dangerous times. As in many other cultures, Indian astronomers were able to figure out the motion of the moon, and thus could predict both solar and lunar eclipses fairly accurately. The traditional mythic explanation for eclipses comes from the story of the Tortoise avatar, in which the gods and demons agree to join forces to churn the Ocean of Milk into the nectar of immortality, which they will then share. The gods manage to trick the demons out of their share, but as the gods divide it among themselves, the demon Sainhikeya slips into their midst in disguise. As Sainhikeya begins to drink, the sun and moon alert the god Vishnu to Sainhikeya’s presence, and Vishnu quickly uses his discus to cut off the demon’s head. Yet since the demon drank some of the nectar, both his head and trunk become immortal, with the head becoming Rahu and the trunk becoming Ketu. Rahu has particular enmity for the sun and moon, the deities responsible for his demise, and tries to swallow them whenever he meets them in the heavens. He always succeeds, but since he no longer has a body to digest them, they escape unharmed through Rahu’s severed neck.

This association with Rahu makes eclipses inauspicious and ritually dangerous times, and in popular culture eclipses are believed to emit malevolent rays that have a physical quality. Many people respond to this danger by remaining indoors for the duration of an eclipse. During an eclipse, people will often perform rites of protection, including giving donations (dana) as a way to give away potential bad luck. Pregnant women must take particular care, lest the inauspiciousness of the time affect the growing child. Some believe that pregnant women should lie completely motionless during an eclipse, fearing that the child will be born missing the body part corresponding to the one that the woman moved. After the eclipse, people bathe (snana) and perform other rites of purification to remove any possible lingering taint of impurity (ashaucha) or bad luck.

Eighteen Minor Works
(Padinenkilkanakku) Name given a collection of early Tamil works of literature, which was complete by the late fifth century C.E. All of these works have a moral emphasis and aim to inculcate ethical or religious values in the hearers. The two most famous examples in this collection are the Tirukkural and the Naladiyar.

Ekadashi
(eleventh day) Hindu religious life is primarily based on the lunar calendar, in which the year contains twelve lunar months, each of which is divided equally into “dark” (waning) and “bright” (waxing) halves. Ekadashi is the name of the eleventh day in both the waning and the waxing half of the lunar month. Certain days during each half of the lunar cycle are deemed sacred to particular gods and goddesses, and these are days for special worship. The ekadashi or eleventh day in each half of the lunar month is deemed sacred to the god Vishnu. With one exception, each of the twenty-four ekadashis has a separate name, charter myth, prescribed rites, and promised result for fulfilling it. Pious Vaishnavas observe each of these twenty-four festival days. In their order of occurrence throughout the year, the ekadashis are: Papamochani Ekadashi and Kamada Ekadashi during the lunar month of Chaitra, Baruthani Ekadashi and Mohini Ekadashi during the lunar month of Baisakh, Achala Ekadashi and Nirjala Ekadashi during the lunar month of Jyeshth, Yogini Ekadashi and Devshayani Ekadashi during the lunar month of Ashadh, Kamika Ekadashi and Putrada Ekadashi during the lunar month of Shravan, Aja Ekadashi and Parivartini Ekadashi during the lunar month of Bhadrapada, Indira Ekadashi and Papankusha Ekadashi during the lunar month of Ashvin, Rambha Ekadashi and Devotthayan Ekadashi during the lunar month of Kartik, Utpanna Ekadashi and Mokshada Ekadashi during the lunar month of Margashirsha, Saphala Ekadashi and Putrada Ekadashi during the lunar month of Phalgun, and Shattila Ekadashi during the lunar month of Paush, Jaya Ekadashi during the lunar month of Magh, and Vijaya Ekadashi and Amalaki Ekadashi during the lunar month of Magh. Of these ekadashis, some are more important to the general populace than others, particularly Devshayani and Devotthayan Ekadashis, which mark the rainy season “sleep” of Vishnu during the chaturmas period. The only ekadashi to appear twice is Putrada (“son-giving”) Ekadashi. This promises that faithful observance will bring the birth of a son, and its reappearance clearly points to the traditional preference for sons over daughters.

Ekalavya
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Ekalavya is a figure who illustrates the pervasive reach of the caste system. Ekalavya is a tribal boy who wants to learn archery from Drona, the royal archery teacher, but is refused because of his low birth. Undaunted, Ekalavya makes a clay image of Drona, treats it as his teacher, or guru, and through assiduous practice and devotion to his guru becomes the most skilled archer on the earth. When Arjuna, a young warrior-king and Drona’s best student, discovers this, he becomes jealous and complains to Drona, since Drona has promised Arjuna that no one will surpass him as an archer. Drona asks Ekalavya how he has become so skillful. When he learns that Ekalavya has worshiped Drona’s image as his guru, Drona notes that he is entitled to a preceptor’s fee (daksina). As his fee he requests Ekalavya’s right thumb, a gift that will considerably diminish Ekalavya’s shooting abilities. Ekalavya fulfills Drona’s wish without hesitation, but from that day is no longer better than Arjuna.

Eknath
(1533–1599) Poet and saint in the Varkari Panth, a religious community that worships the Hindu god Vithoba, at his temple at Pandharpur in the modern state of Maharashtra. Eknath was a brahmin who lived most of his life in the city of Paithan, which was an important trading and political center. Today, there is a shrine to Eknath in Paithan. In keeping with his birth as a brahmin, Eknath was highly learned in traditional Sanskritic lore. His best-known work is a translation into Marathi of the eleventh chapter of the Bhagavata Purana, a sectarian religious text that is the most important for the worship of the god Krishna. Yet Eknath also seems to have been intensely conscious of the spiritual capacities of the lower castes and the way in which social boundaries could be leveled by devotion. In short poems known as bharuds he speaks in a variety of voices, including those of untouchables, Muslims, and women. Traditional accounts of his life describe him as treating untouchable devotees (bhakta) as his equals, and even eating and drinking with them. Such flagrant transgression of social boundaries brought trouble from more orthodox brahmins—who are portrayed as the villains in these traditional accounts—but on each occasion Eknath managed to escape being outcasted by them, often through divine intervention. For further information see G. A. Deleury, The Cult of Vithoba, 1960; Justin E. Abbott, The Life of Eknath, 1981; and Eleanor Zelliot, “Chokamela and Eknath: Two Bhakti Modes of Legitimacy for Modern Change,” in Journal of Asian and African Studies, 1980, Vol. 15, Nos. 1–2, 1980. Ekoddishta “Intended for one [person].” A particular type of shraddha or memorial service for the dead, which is performed for the benefit of a single person. An ekoddishta shraddha can be performed as a series of sixteen offerings performed during the first year after the person’s death. These sixteen offerings are more commonly collapsed into a single rite performed on the eleventh day after death, the day after the ten-day period of ritual impurity (maranashaucha) has come to an end.

Elements

Traditional Indian cosmology holds that there are five basic elements, four of which are similar to those found in medieval European conceptions: earth, fire, water, and wind (as moving air that is perceptible to human beings). The fifth element, akasha, has no readily understandable correlate to European ideas. It is generally translated as “space” and is considered to pervade the environment around us, filling the empty spaces. An unusual feature in Indian cosmology is that each of these elements is associated with a particular sense: earth with smell, fire with sight, water with taste, wind with touch, and akasha with hearing.

Elements, Subtle

The subtle elements (tanmatras) are one of the stages in the evolution of the world and the human being in the Samkhya philosophical school. The subtle elements are the basis for the formation of the five gross elements: earth, air, fire, wind, and akasha. See tanmatras.

Elephant

In ancient India, one of the emblems of royalty, in part because an elephant’s prodigious appetite would soon bankrupt any individual pretending to have the wealth of royalty. Elephants also appear in the Hindu pantheon: The divine elephant Airavata is the animal vehicle of Indra, and the god Ganesha has an elephant’s head on a human body, a souvenir of his conflict with Shiva.

Elephanta

Island in the harbor outside the city of Bombay, most famous for its temple to Shiva by the same name. The date of the temple’s construction is disputed, but is generally ascribed to the seventh or eighth century C.E. Elephanta is a rock-cut cave temple, in which the sandstone hillside was carved away to form the temple itself, and the images of the deities. This follows the general pattern of the rock-cut temples at Ellora in Maharashtra and required careful planning, since carving errors could not be corrected. The Elephanta shrine displays images of Shiva in his various forms: as Lord of the Dance (Nataraja), as the Lord of Asceticism (Yogishvara), as Bearer of the Ganges (Ganghadhara), as the pillar-shaped form known as the linga, and as the combination of male and female known as Ardhanarishvara. The central image, and by far the most famous, is the three-headed, eighteen-foot-tall image of Shiva as Maheshvar, the “great Lord.” The face on the left shows his horrific and destructive facet as Bhairava, the face on the right his benevolent, creative facet as Uma, whereas the center face shows him as Tatpurusha—blissful, eternal, and transcending the ephemeral affairs of the world. Although the primary image is virtually untouched, many of the others sustained damage from Portuguese imperialists who considered the images idolatrous and used them for target practice. For further information see Pramod Chandra, Elephanta Caves, Gharapuri, 1970.

Ellora
Historical site in modern Maharashtra, about twenty miles north of Aurangabad. It is world famous for a group of thirty-three rock-cut temples, which were sculpted between the fourth and tenth centuries C.E. Twelve of the caves have Buddhist images, and these tend to be the oldest; four of the caves are Jain, and the remaining seventeen are Hindu. In each case, the caves were created by excavating into the volcanic stone outcrop of the hillside, carefully cutting away the stone to leave finished images. Several of the Hindu caves have images of exceptional artistic quality. The most famous is the eighth century Kailasanatha Temple for which the entire hillside was cut away, leaving the temple behind, looking as if it had been built there from the ground up.

Endogamy
In an anthropological sense, a marriage pattern in which members of a particular social group marry only members of the same group. In northern India, traditional marriages tend to be endogamous with regard to the jati (hereditary occupational group), and exogamous with regard to the village community and the gotra (mythic family lineage).

Eroticism
Although Hindu religious life is often associated with detachment and renunciation, Hindu culture has also fostered considerable eroticism, which has a recognized place in everyday life. One example of this is the Kama Sutra, a well-known "manual" on the art of love, which is but one example of a literary genre called ratishastra, or "treatises on [sexual] pleasure." Other examples of eroticism in the culture can be seen in the sculptures carved on the temples Konarak and Khajuraho, and in the amount of attention given to poetry on love. In Hindu culture kama ("desire," particularly sexual desire) is one of the purusharthas, or aims of life, with the others being artha (wealth), dharma (religious duty), and moksha (final liberation of the soul). Erotic pleasure is thus recognized as a legitimate goal, as long as it is kept in proper perspective. Although renunciation is one of the great themes in Hindu life, nonrenunciation has been stressed at least as strongly.

In modern popular Hindu culture, eroticism is expressed through the esoteric ritual tradition known as tantra, in which sexual union is a symbol for liberation. Sexual intercourse is sometimes incorporated as an actual element in tantric ritual, as the most notorious of the panchamakara or "Five Forbidden Things." Although tantric practice has strong popular associations with illicit sexuality, such acts are always performed within a strict ritual context. In tantric practice, the ultimate aim is not to satisfy one's carnal desires, but to demolish the dualism between sacred and profane that is ultimately a sign of ignorance. The act of ritualizing normally taboo behavior is one way to destroy this duality, as well as a way to emphasize the superiority of tantric practice over other forms of religious life. In such practice, the adept is also imitating Shiva, who is himself both the perfect yogi and the model husband.

One of the established genres in Indian literature was ratishastra, or "treatises on [sexual] pleasure," of which the best-known is the Kama Sutra. Sexual pleasure was seen as an established part of human life, which did not have to be hidden, and for which no excuses were necessary. Kama (as both “desire” and “sexual desire”) was one of the purushartha s or aims of life. Satisfying one’s desires was seen as a legitimate goal and considered a good thing, insofar as the pursuit did not interfere with other ends. The texts on erotics analyzed and classified sexuality in terms of aesthetic experience, as well as a vehicle for physical pleasure. For its sophisticated practitioners, such well-defined sexuality was intended to provide fulfillment for both partners, and here the literature is unusual for giving women equal desire and equal pleasure.

Error, Theories of

Indian philosophical schools give serious consideration to the questions of how and why people make errors in judgment. Although these schools may cite seemingly mundane examples, such as mistaking the silvery flash of a seashell for a piece of silver, investigating judgment errors is ultimately rooted in religious goals. Specifically, the religious goal is to gain true awareness of the actual nature of things, and through this to bring about final liberation of the soul (moksha) from the karmic cycle of reincarnation (samsara). Each school’s answers to the question of truth and falsity reveal fundamental differences about the understanding each has of the inherent nature of things, which have clear implications for bondage and liberation. Although the differing schools disagree on the mechanics of “how” one sees silver instead of a shell, there is general agreement about why such a mistake takes place. This and other errors are rooted in the karmic predispositions stemming from avidya, most specifically the greed that prompts human beings to look for items of value. Far more explanation can be found in the individual entries, but in brief there are six major theories of error.

In the Prabhakara branch of the Mimamsa school, the theory is akhyati or “nondiscrimination,” in which the source of error is the inability to make sharp distinctions. The theory in the Naiyayika school is anyathakhyati, the “discrimination of something else,” in which the mind projects an erroneous perception (pratyaksha) onto another object. The Mimamsa philosopher Kumarila explains error as viparitakhyati or “contrary discrimination,” in which the source of error is a bad assessment of an object’s similarities and differences. The Samkhya school propounds the theory of sadasa t khyati, or “discrimination of the unreal as the real,” in which the source of error is merely an extension of the original error to distinguish between the two basic realities, purusha and prakrti. Ramanuja, founder of the Vishishtadvaita Vedanta school, propounds the theory of satkhyati, “discrimination of the real,” in which one correctly perceives the silvery flash, but makes an incorrect assumption based on this. The final theory of anirvachaniyakhyati or “indescribable discrimination,” is advanced by the Advaita Vedanta school; according to this, one illusory perception is superimposed on another conventionally true but ultimately illusory perception. Evolution

Fundamental doctrine of the Samkhya school of Indian philosophy. The Samkhya school uses a theory of evolution to explain the human perception of an inner world of subjective experience and the objective outer world, which it argues are not true aspects of the real, or essential, world. Samkhya metaphysics posits two principles as the essence of the universe, purusha and prakrti. Purusha is pure awareness, which is conscious but inactive and unchanging. Prakrti is primal matter which, in its most basic form, is an equilibrium of three different unconscious forces (gunas): sattva (goodness), rajas (passion), and tamas (decay). According to the Samkhya, the conflation and confusion of purusha and prakrti is the basic cause for the bondage of the soul to the cycle of reincarnation (samsara)—where purusha is seen as if it is acting, and prakrti is seen as if it is conscious. While this misunderstanding does not effect purusha, it causes prakrti to undergo an evolutionary process, in which this primal matter becomes increasingly differentiated, leading to further confusion of the nature of the universe. The first stage of evolution is called mahat ("great one") and occurs when the original equilibrium between the three gunas has been disturbed; mahat is also known as buddhi, which is conceived as the cognitive faculty necessary for thought. The mental processes facilitated by buddhi spur the development of ahamkar ("I-making"), in which one finds the first feelings of ego-consciousness. With the rise of this subjective feeling comes the division into subjective and objective worlds: on one hand, ahamkar evolves the five subtle elements (tanmatras), the precursors of the gross elements, and on the other it evolves into the eleven faculties: five jnанendriyas or sense organs, five karmendriyas or organs of action, and the mind as the eleventh. At liberation this process of evolution happens in reverse, with the many successively devolving into the one. As in most Indian philosophical systems, liberation comes when correct understanding has replaced a mistaken one. Fallacies
In defining the parameters for what is and is not a valid argument, certain types of arguments have been dismissed outright by Indian logicians, since these arguments are held to be based on invalid premises. The key flaw shared by these objectionable arguments is the fallacy known as self-residence, in which the cause and its effect are the same thing. Varieties of this fallacy include reciprocal dependence, a vicious circle, and an infinite regress. The presence of any of these fallacies is sufficient grounds to dismiss an argument as invalid.

Family Custom
(kulachara) Hindu religion is fluid enough that a family's customary practices can heavily influence a person's individual religious life. For example, family custom plays an important role in worship. The Hindu pantheon contains many different gods, and the one that an individual worships as "God" is often strongly influenced by the family's practice, although other factors such as personal inclination can also play a role. Family custom also plays an important role in setting parameters for religious practice, both in everyday religious life, and in setting rules for performing the rituals of the life cycle. For example, many families have a customary age for performing the chudakarana samskara, the "tonsure" or head-shaving rite of passage that marks the definitive end of infancy. Some families perform this in the first year, others in the third, or the fifth, or even the seventh. Religious practice varies widely among families, although it tends to be very stable within families, since this is one of the ways in which families create a distinctive identity for themselves.

Family Deity
See kuladevata.

Family Relationships
Hindus consider the family the basis of society. The idealized Hindu family is a multigenerational joint family, composed of elderly parents, their adult sons, and their sons' families. The sons are considered the core of the family, since the daughters will live with their husbands' families after marriage and are considered to belong to them. When the families become too large, or tensions between brothers develop to an unbearable level, these joint families divide into smaller households, upon which the general pattern continues. Hindu families have different names for all possible family relationships. These differing names reveal the exact nature of the relationship and the person's precise relationship in the family—as one example, although in English the word "aunt" can designate the sister of either one's father or one's mother, there are different names for both in northern Indian languages. Some of this is related to the higher status connected with the father's or the husband's side of the family, and some of it has to do with proximity, since these relatives are more likely to be living with one another in a joint family or close by. These differences mark the lines of importance in Indian families, which give greater emphasis to the father's side. One noteworthy term is the word for the wife's brother (sala), which in modern times often serves as a term of abuse.

Fani, Muhsin
(ca. mid-17th c.) Traditionally thought to be the author of the Dabistan-i-Mazahib ("School of Manners"), which was probably written about 1665. The Dabistan is an invaluable outside source for the religious life of the times and gives one of the earliest descriptions of the Sikhs, as well as many other contemporary groups. Fani was a Persian, and a Parsi by birth, who came to India because of his intense curiosity about religious life, and his desire to see whatever he could. He is believed to have been a careful observer and relatively objective. He states that he had simply translated (into the Persian in which the text was written) what his friends and informants had told him, and the text seems to support this claim.

Faqir
(variant of fakir, from the Arabic poor)
In the strictest sense of the word, this refers to a Muslim ascetic, as is hinted by the Arabic origin of the word. Colloquially, the word has been used much more broadly, as an appellation for any ascetic (witness Winston Churchill's characterization of Mohandas Gandhi as a "half-naked faqir"). Both usages are still current in modern India. Although since the partition of India in 1947 the word more commonly designates a Muslim, Hindu ascetics still describe someone who is detached from all things and dependent on God for support as a “faqir baba.”

Fasting
See upavasa.

Fatalism
Philosophical position attributed to the Ajivika school. The Ajivikas believed that all things were preordained by an impersonal destiny (niyati), and therefore that one's conscious actions had no effect on one's future. Although this position would seem to undercut any reason for religious practice, the Ajivikas were also noted for performing strict asceticism, in the belief that they were only doing what had been predetermined for them. For further information see Arthur Llewellyn Basham, History and Doctrines of the Ajivikas, 1981.

Fathers, World of the
The earliest reference to the transmigration of souls, which is found in both the Brhadaranyaka Upanishad (6.2) and the Chandogya Upanishad (5.10), makes a qualitative distinction between two different paths for the soul. The path to the world of the gods ultimately led to the sun, and the person traveling it did not return again; the path to the world of the fathers led to the moon, and the person traveling it was eventually reborn on earth. The leitmotiv running through all the Upanishads is the need for individual spiritual realization, and this is the key to getting on the path to the world of the gods. Those who gain such realization attain the final and ultimate end, whereas those who simply do good deeds will return to earth, although their good deeds will give them karmic benefits.

Festival Calendar
Since few festivals are celebrated by all Hindus, establishing a single festival calendar is problematic. Festival celebrations are subject to the same differing forces that drive the rest of Hindu life. On one hand, there are significant regional differences in the celebration of festivals, and on the other there are major sectarian variations. Some of the sectarian festivals may be celebrated within particular regions or they may be celebrated across the nation. It is also true that the general public is aware of most festivals—by virtue of these days being public holidays, or being marked on the calendar—but far fewer people celebrate any particular festival as a religious holiday. Finally, some holidays are so significant that they are celebrated by almost everyone, although here too some people will observe them with far greater energy. For example, although the Goddess festival known as the fall Navaratri is celebrated throughout the country, it is kept with particular gusto in Bengal, where the cult of the Mother Goddess is particularly important.

With these considerations in mind, the festival calendar for the lunar year is given below, with the holidays given in order during the successive lunar months. The purpose in this entry is only to lay out the order of these festivals during the year; further details for the lunar months and each festival can be found in the individual entries.

- Chaitra (March–April)
  Papamochani Ekadashi, Spring Navaratri, Ram Navami, Kamada Ekadashi, Hanuman Jayanti, Chittirai.

- Baisakh (April–May)
  Shitalashtami, Baruthani Ekadashi, Akshaya Trtiya, Parashuram Jayanti, Narsingh Jayanti, Baisakhi, Mohini Ekadashi, Buddha Purnima.

- Jyeshth (May–June)
  Achala Ekadashi, Savitri Puja, Ganga Dashahara, Nirjala Ekadashi.

- Ashadh (June–July)
  Yogini Ekadashi, Rath Yatra, Devshayani Ekadashi, Guru Purnima, Chaturmas Vrat.

-  Shravan (July–August)
  Nag Panchami, Kamika Ekadashi, Tulsidas Jayanti, Putrada Ekadashi, Raksha Bandhan, Shravan Vrat.

- Bhadrapada (August–September)
  Kajari Teej (Tej), Bahula Chauth, Janmashtami, Radhashtami, Aja Ekadashi, Hartalika Teej (Tej), Ganesh Chaturthi, Rishi Panchami, Onam, Parivartini Ekadashi, Anant Chaturdashi.

- Ashvin (September–October)
  Pitrapaksha, Indira Ekadashi, Fall Navaratri, Dussehra (Vijaya Dashami), Papankusha Ekadashi, Valmiki Jayanti.

- Kartik (October–November)
  Karva Chauth, Rambha Ekadashi, Narak Chaturdashi, Diwali, Govardhan Puja (Annakut), Devotthayan Ekadashi, Tulsi Vivah, Kartik Purnima.

- Margashirsha (November–December)
  Bhairava Jayanti, Utpanna Ekadashi, Mokshada Ekadashi.

- Paush (December–January)
  Saphala Ekadashi, Putrada Ekadashi.

- Magh (January–February)
  Sakata Chauth, Shattila Ekadashi, Mauni Amavasya, Vasant Panchami, Bhishma Ashtami, Jaya Ekadashi, Ravidas Jayanti, Pongal, Magh Mela, Float Festival.

- Phalgun (February–March)
  Janaki Navami, Vijaya Ekadashi, Shivaratri, Amalaki Ekadashi, Holi.

The festival calendar is further complicated by the fact that the lunar year begins on the first day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Chaitra. This creates an unusual situation since, at least in northern India, the lunar months end on the full moon, making the two weeks of the waning moon the first half of the lunar month. The waning fortnight in Chaitra comes at the end of the lunar year, and the waxing fortnight that follows is the first fortnight of the following year. Thus, the month of Chaitra is both the first and the last month of the lunar year.
Feticide
This refers to selective abortion of female fetuses, which was made possible by the advent of reliable prenatal sex determination technology. This practice is driven by the desire for sons in Hindu culture, a desire spurred by economic, social, and religious concerns. Selective abortions were outlawed in India in 1995.

Fiji
One of the countries with significant Hindu diaspora populations. Indians were first brought to Fiji in 1879 as indentured laborers to work in the sugarcane fields. In the 1990s Indians comprised about 45 percent of Fiji’s population. Despite their near parity in terms of population, Indians in Fiji have been legally relegated to a minority role and for the most part have been prohibited from owning land. The split between the Indian and Fijian communities became transparent in 1987, when a military coup ousted a Parliament dominated by Indians, and installed a native Fijian as prime minister. Because of these restrictions, many Indians still work as tenant farmers for Fijian landlords, but they also play an important role as shopkeepers and professionals.

Fire
One of the five elements in traditional Indian cosmology, the others being earth, wind, water, and akasha. In some philosophical schools, each of the elements is paired with one of the five senses. Fire is associated with sight, since the eye’s action in apprehending a visual object is compared to flame darting out and scorching something. Within the body, fire is also associated with digestion, which is generally conceived of as “cooking” the foods in the digestive system.

Fish Avatar
The first of Vishnu’s ten full avatars or “incarnations” on earth. Each avatar appears when the cosmos is in crisis, usually because of a demon (asura) who has grown disproportionately strong, and whose power is throwing the universe out of its natural balance. According to the doctrine of the avatars, Vishnu takes material form when the earth has fallen out of equilibrium, to destroy the source of evil and restore the cosmic balance.

The tale of the fish avatar begins in the distant past, when the righteous king Manu discovers a small fish in the water he holds between his cupped hands as he performs the tarpana or water-offering rite for his ancestors. The compassionate king puts the tiny fish into a pot of water, but the fish soon outgrows it. As the fish keeps growing, Manu transfers it to larger and larger vessels, and finally puts the fish into the Ganges. When the fish grows too large for the Ganges and has to be put into the ocean, Manu realizes that the fish is Vishnu himself, and begins to sing Vishnu’s praises.

The fish then informs Manu that the destruction of the world is imminent—first through blazing fire that will scorch all life, then through floods that will turn the entire earth into a single cosmic sea. Vishnu informs Manu that the gods have built a boat from the Vedas, and directs Manu to collect all the creatures of the earth and put them on the boat for safekeeping. He promises Manu that all the creatures on this boat will survive the coming destruction, and when the world returns to normal with the advent of the Kṛta Age, Manu will be the ruler of the earth.

Manu does as he has been directed, and when the destruction of the world is imminent, Vishnu appears in the form of a great horned fish. Manu ties the boat to the fish’s horn and, protected by Vishnu’s power, all the beings on the boat survive to repopulate the earth.

Float Festival
Festival celebrated in the city of Madurai in the southern Indian state of Tamil Nadu, on the full moon in the lunar month of Magh (January–February). This is the birthday of King Tirumalai Nayak (r. 1623–1659), during whose reign large parts of Madurai’s Minakshi Temple was built. During the festival the goddess Minakshi and her consort Sundareshvara (an epithet of Shiva) are taken in procession to an artificial lake east of Madurai, where they are put on richly decorated floats and drawn back and forth over the lake’s waters.

Four Dhams
(“[divine] abodes”) Four major pilgrimage sites in the four geographical corners of India, which lay out the boundaries of India’s sacred geography: Badrinath in the Himalayas; the city of Puri in the east, on the Bay of Bengal; Rameshwaram in the south; and Dwaraka in the west. Each site is associated with one of the four Sanyasi maths all supposedly founded by the great philosopher Shankaracharya: Badrinath has the Jyotir math in the town of Joshimath (about thirty-five miles south of Badrinath), Puri has the Govardhan math, Dwaraka has the Sharada math, and Rameshvaram has the Shringeri math (in Shringeri). The first three of these maths are close to their associated sacred sites (tirthas), but Shringeri is about 450 miles away from Rameshvaram.

Four Great Crimes
In the dharma literature, four actions are deemed such heinous offenses that the person performing them becomes an outcast from society. These four actions are murdering a brahmin (brahmahatya), stealing a brahmin’s gold (steya), drinking liquor (sura-pana), and adultery with the wife of one’s guru (gurutalpaga). Aside from expulsion from society, another indication of the gravity of these acts was that their penalties were so severe that they normally ended in death, and in some cases this outcome was specifically prescribed. In addition to prescribing such punishments for the actual offenders, the dharma literature also prescribed expulsion for anyone who knowingly associated with such people for a period longer than one year.

Four States of Consciousness
A hierarchy of states of experience that is first outlined in the Mandukya Upanishad. In its description, the upanishad moves from greatest duality to utter nonduality; these four states are... also correlated with the phonetic elements of the sacred sound Om. Om symbolizes the four states of consciousness and is the sum and quintessence of them all. The first stage of consciousness is waking consciousness, in which one perceives both subject and object; then dreaming, in which one’s experience is totally subjective; then deep sleep, in which (until waking) even consciousness of oneself as subject has been lost. The final state is so removed from human experience that it cannot be designated by language, and so is simply called “the fourth” (turiya). In the Mandukya Upanishad, this fourth state is clearly identified as the ultimate truth, the atman or inner Self, knowledge of which brings final liberation of the soul.

Friday

(Shukravar) The fifth day of the Hindu week, whose presiding planet is Venus (Shukra). Friday is also the day of the week dedicated to the Goddess and is thus potentially a powerfully auspicious day. Although the Goddess can be worshiped in many forms, one of the most popular in northern India is Santoshi Ma. Worship of Santoshi Ma has spread dramatically since its origin in the mid-1970s.

Full Moon

(Purnimasa or Purnima) In northern India, the full moon is the final day of the lunar month, whereas in southern India it is often considered the midpoint. In either case, the full moon carries associations of fullness, completion, and abundance and is always an auspicious time. One sign of its auspiciousness is the commonly accepted belief that the religious merit generated from rites performed on the day of a full moon is equal to rites performed for an entire month. There are festivals associated with the full moon of each lunar month, but the most important are in Baisakh (Buddha Purnima), Ashadh (Guru Purnima), Shravan (Raksha Bandhan), Kartik (Kartik Purnima), and Phalgun (Holi).

Funerary Rites

See deathbed rites, antyeshthi samskara, and shraddha.
Gada
("club") In Hindu iconography, one of the identifying objects carried by the god Vishnu, along with the conch shell (shankha), lotus (padma), and discus (chakra). In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, the gada is also the weapon of choice for Bhima, one of the five Pandava brothers who are the epic’s protagonists. Of these five brothers, Bhima is noted for his prodigious size and strength, which gives him obvious advantages in wielding the gada.

Gadge Maharaj

Gahadavala Dynasty
(r. 1089–1194) Northern Indian dynasty whose core region was the western and central parts of the Gangetic plain. The Gahadavalas were a short-lived and transitional dynasty who filled a political vacuum during the tumultuous years following the turn of the first millennium. During this period the Gangetic plain was plagued by political instability and was regularly subjected to Muslim raids. The Gahadavalas supplanted the Rashtrakutas, whom they conquered in 1089, and consolidated their power through the middle Ganges basin. In 1194 the Gahadavalas were defeated by the Ghurids, an Afghani Muslim dynasty. Following their defeat, most of the Gahadavala territory became part of the Ghurid empire.

Gaja Hasta
A particular hand gesture (hasta) used in Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual. In the gaja ("elephant") hasta, the arm is extended straight out, with the hand gently curving down; the curved arm is fancifully compared to the trunk of an elephant.

Gajendramoksha
("release of the elephant-king") The name of a particular incident in Hindu mythology involving a battle between king Indradyumna, in the form of a giant elephant, and a Gandharva (celestial musician) named Huhu, in the form of a giant crocodile. Both Indradyumna and Huhu have assumed these forms as the result of a curse. Indradyumna has been cursed by the sage Agastya, who becomes angry when the meditating king fails to greet him with proper respect. Huhu has been cursed by the sage Devala, when the amorous water play between Huhu and some celestial damsels has disturbed the sage’s meditation.

The struggle between the two animals begins when the elephant comes to the water to drink and the crocodile grabs him by the leg. The crocodile attempts to pull the elephant into deeper water while the elephant struggles to break free. The pair are so evenly matched that neither can best the other. After the battle has raged for a thousand years the god Vishnu appears, kills the crocodile, and restores Indradyumna to his previous form. The story thus takes its name, the “release of the elephant king,” because Indradyumna was freed from the crocodile’s grasp and the effects of the curse.

Galta
A village in the state of Rajasthan, a few miles east of Jaipur, the capital. Galta is most famous for its connection with the Bairagi Naga ascetics, renunciant traders-soldiers who were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. According to Bairagi tradition, in 1756 a conference took place at Galta in which the different groups of Bairagi Naga ascetics were welded into one cohesive military unit called the Ramanandis or “army of Ram” under the leadership of a Bairagi named Balanand. Balanand organized the Ramanandis into three anis or armies—the Digambara Ani, Nirvani Ani, and Nirmohi Ani—which are still the major Bairagi divisions. According to tradition, this unification was necessary because of continual attacks by the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, a competing group of renunciant traders-soldiers who were devotees of the god Shiva. The dispute occurred during the festival Kumbha Mela, ostensibly over precedence in the bathing (snana) procession, which was a sign of relative status. However, an underlying cause may have been power and control of an area’s resources.

The exact circumstances under which the armies of Ram were formed are difficult to determine. Independent sources clearly show that the Bairagis became more cohesively organized during the late eighteenth century and that some of these bairagi bands were using their mobility, resources, and power to engage in long-distance trading. However, the decentralized nature of ascetic life makes the summary formation of such an army highly unlikely, unless this was the final fruition of an already existing trend.

Gambling
A practice with a long history in Indian culture, but that has almost always been portrayed in a negative light by Hindu texts. The earliest reference appears in the Rg Veda, the oldest Hindu religious text, in a hymn often described as “The Gambler’s Lament.” The hymn is a gambler’s first-person account of the ways in which his obsession with gaming ruined his life. It ends with a warning to the listener not to be seduced by gambling’s siren song. Gambling is also negatively portrayed in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics. A passion for gaming is the only fault afflicting Yudhishthira (the eldest of the five Pandava brothers who are the epic’s protagonists), but it brings disastrous results. In a dice game with the kingdom’s most skillful player, Shakuni, Yudhishthira loses his kingdom, his brothers, and even himself; as a result of the game, he and his brothers have to go into exile.

These mythic models mirror the attitudes toward gambling in Hindu society. Sober and upright Hindus have generally avoided games of chance, since they are not a stable or respectable way to risk one’s capital or earn a living. The only time that prudence and caution can be legitimately disregarded is on the festival of Diwali, which is sacred to Lakshmi, the goddess of wealth and prosperity. Gambling is a traditional part of the Diwali celebrations, used to pay homage to Lakshmi in her guise as Lady Luck. Diwali is most often celebrated in people’s homes, and thus any gambling will take place with one’s family and close associates, and with purely nominal betting. Aside from Diwali, gambling is strictly proscribed in polite society, and even on Diwali its disruptive capacities are strictly contained.
Gana

(“host”) In Hindu mythology, a collective term for a group of minor gods who are the god Shiva’s servants and attendants. The members of this gana are often represented in frightening forms—smeared with ash, bearing skulls and weapons, physically malformed, and grinning and laughing horribly. The members of the gana are Shiva’s followers, supporters, and minions, who are ready to do his bidding when commanded. The leader of the gana is the god Ganesh (“Lord of the Host”).

Ganapati

(“Master of Shiva’s host”) Another name for the god Ganesh. See Ganesh.

Gandaki River

One of the tributaries of the Ganges, it flows southward from Nepal, joining the Ganges at the city of Patna in the state of Bihar. Although the river’s source is now extremely poor, in the time of the Buddha it contained major urban centers, particularly the city of Vaishali.

Gandhari

A character in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics. Gandhari is the wife of the blind king Dhrtarashtra and the mother of the Kauravas, a group of boys who are the epic’s antagonists. Gandhari shows her devotion to her blind husband by always covering her eyes with a blindfold, thus sharing his sightlessness. As is often the case in Hindu mythology, her sons are born in an unusual manner. Gandhari receives a blessing (ashirvad) from the sage Vyasa that she will give birth to one hundred sons. Soon after, she becomes pregnant. However, her pregnancy lasts for more than two years. When she grows impatient and tries to hasten the delivery, she gives birth to a great lump of flesh. Vyasa advises Gandhari to divide the lump and place each piece in a pot of clarified butter (ghee). Eventually the pots break open, revealing one hundred handsome boys and a single daughter, Dussala.

All of Gandhari’s children are killed by her nephews the Pandavas in the Mahabharata war. Just as Gandhari is about to curse the Pandavas, Vyasa reminds her that her sons’ deaths are the result of their own misconduct. After the war, Gandhari retires to the forest with her husband and a few others. They live in retirement for six years before they are killed in a forest fire.

Gandharva

In Hindu mythology, a class of demigods who are celestial singers and musicians. The gandharvas occasionally interact with humans. One of their divine gifts is the ability to bestow good singing voices to girls. Since the Gandharvas are always watching from above, they are considered to be the witnesses in a Gandharva marriage, one of the eight forms of marriage recognized in the dharma literature. The gandharva marriage was a marriage contracted by consensual sexual intercourse. See also Marriage, eight classical forms.

Gandharva Marriage

One of the eight forms of marriage recognized in the dharma literature, the treatises on religious duty. A Gandharva marriage takes place when a man and woman have sexual intercourse by mutual consent, but without consulting anyone else. The marriage is so named because gandharvas, who are demigods and celestial musicians, are said to be the witnesses. Although the gandharva rite created a valid marriage, it was considered one of the four reprehensible (aprashasta) forms of marriage because it was done without parental consent, performed without religious rituals, and was rooted in lust. These marriages were recognized not to sanction and legitimize promiscuous behavior, but to provide the woman with the legal status of a... wife. Although Sanskrit literary sources are replete with Gandharva marriages—perhaps the most famous being the marriage of King Dushyanta and Shakuntala—it is doubtful that this form was ever widely practiced. See also marriage, eight classical forms.

Gandhi, Mohandas K.
(1869–1948) Leader of the Indian National Congress, one of the architects of the struggle for Indian independence, and one of the best-known Indians in history. Gandhi was born in Gujarat, where his father was a minister to one of the native princes. Shortly after Gandhi’s father died, the British ousted the ruling prince for mismanagement, and the family lost their position. Gandhi was sent to London to study law, and during this time he came into contact with a variety of new ideas that would strongly influence his future. Ironically, one of these influences was the Bhagavad Gita, an important Hindu religious text from which he drew continuing inspiration in his later life. After returning to India in 1891, Gandhi failed in his attempt to set up a law practice in Bombay, and he went back to Gujarat. In 1894 Gandhi traveled to South Africa to do some work for a Muslim trading firm. He intended to be gone only a short time, but ended up staying in South Africa for twenty years. During this time he discovered his true calling, political activism. This was sparked by his own experience of racial discrimination—being thrown out of a railway car reserved for “whites only”—and was fueled by the social, political, and legal disadvantages suffered by South Africa’s 40,000 Indians, most of whom were illiterate agricultural workers. During his time in South Africa, Gandhi developed and refined his basic tactics: mass non-cooperation, nonviolent resistance, willingness to face imprisonment, and skilful use of the print media to influence public opinion. In 1914 he returned to India, where he soon became one of the leading figures in the struggle against the British—first for home rule, and finally for outright independence.

Gandhi’s deeply held moral principles shaped his entire career. He saw his political activism not as a vehicle for personal advancement, but as a means for selfless action for the welfare of the world. This stress on selfless action drew heavily on the message of the Bhagavad Gita, in which the god Krishna recommends a similar path to his friend and devotee (bhakta), Arjuna. Throughout his life Gandhi remained committed to nonviolence. Gandhi felt strongly that the nature of any goal would be influenced by the means by which it had been attained. Another of his fundamental principles was truth, as seen in his insistence that evil and injustice had to be resisted, even by violence when all other means had failed. A third essential tenet was self-control, which he considered the prerequisite to leading others. His commitment to his principles gave him the strength to endure imprisonment, injury, and more than thirty years of struggle with the British government; it also moved him to campaign against many other injustices, particularly the notion of untouchability.

When independence finally arrived in 1947 it was tainted by the partition of British India into India and Pakistan, fueled in part by Muslim concerns about their minority status in an independent Hindu India. The partition sparked a massive exodus, in which fifteen million people migrated from one country to the other. It also sparked unspeakable communal violence, in which an estimated one million people died. Despite his best efforts, Gandhi was unable to prevent partition or to create good relations between the two countries. Within six months of independence, Gandhi was assassinated by Nathuram Godse, a Hindu nationalist who felt that Gandhi was being too soft on Pakistan.

Gandhi had critics and opponents throughout his career, many of whom felt that he did not deserve the sainthood that people attributed to him.
Mohandas K. Gandhi in 1931.

Mohandas K. Gandhi in 1931.
Among his critics were B. R. Ambedkar, who felt that Gandhi had used the untouchables as pawns in negotiations with the British because he opposed letting the untouchables separate from the larger body politic. His critics also included Subhash Chandra Bose, who advocated an armed struggle against the British, and Vinayak Damodar Savarkar, a Hindu nationalist who was Godse’s inspiration. For further information see Mohandas K. Gandhi, An Autobiography, 1993; Louis Fischer, Gandhi, 1954; Mark Juergensmeyer, “Saint Gandhi,” in John Stratton Hawley (ed.), Saints and Virtues, 1987; and Sudhir Kakar, “Gandhi and Women,” in Intimate Relations, 1990.

Gandhi Jayanti
Indian national holiday falling on October 2, celebrating the birth of Mohandas Gandhi. Perhaps because Gandhi is a relatively recent figure, or because the event is a national holiday, this celebration is one of the few that is marked according to the common era calendar, rather than the lunar calendar that is used to determine most Hindu festivals.

Gandiva
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Gandiva is the name of the bow carried by Arjuna. Arjuna is the world’s greatest archer and the third of the five Pandava brothers, the Mahabharata’s protagonists. Gandiva was originally fashioned by the god Brahma and is given to Arjuna by the god Varuna (identified with the ocean) at the request of another deity, Agni (“fire”). Agni makes this request because he wants to “eat” (burn) the Khandava forest, but is afraid of interference in the form of rain from the god Indra, ruler of the storm. Arjuna uses the bow to create a canopy of arrows that shields the forest from Indra’s storms, thus allowing Agni to consume the forest in peace. Arjuna uses this bow for many years. At the end of his life he returns it to Varuna by throwing it into the sea.

Ganesh
(“Lord of Shiva’s Host”) Elephant-headed god who leads Shiva’s horde of divine followers; another name for Ganesh is Ganapati. Ganesh is usually portrayed as short and fat, with a bowl of sweets and his animal vehicle, the rat, close by. Among the items most often portrayed in his hands are a lotus (padma) and his own broken tusk. He also often holds a noose and an elephant goad (ankusha), which symbolize his power to restrain or move obstructing forces.

Although Ganesh is worshiped as a primary deity by a small sectarian community, the Ganpatyas, most Hindus worship him as a subsidiary deity along with their principal divinities. Ganesh’s importance in Hindu life, however, is far greater than his relatively minor place in the pantheon. Hindus consider Ganesh as “Lord of Obstacles” (Vighneshvar), who has the power both to remove and to bestow difficulties, depending on whether or not a person has pleased him. Hindus invoke Ganesh at the start of any important undertaking—whether it is performing a religious ritual, starting a business, performing a marriage, building a home, or even taking a school examination—so that through his grace, potential obstacles may be removed or avoided and the undertaking will proceed smoothly and successfully. This power over obstacles is symbolized both by his elephant head and his animal vehicle, the rat. The elephant’s strength allows it to break down any impediments, while the rat is able to slip through the smallest cracks to gain access to locked places. Ganesh’s aniconic image is the threshold, the transitional strip dividing and separating different spaces, which further symbolizes his power to control transitions from one state to another.

Ganesh is considered to be the son of the god Shiva and his wife Parvati, but he is born in an unusual manner. One day when Parvati is bathing (snana), she forms a child from the dirt from her body, animates him, and directs him to permit no one to enter her bathing place. When Shiva comes to the door Ganesh bars his way, and in the ensuing battle Shiva cuts off Ganesh’s head. Parvati is so upset that Shiva promises to replace the missing head with the head of the first animal he encounters, which happens to be an elephant. Upon reviving Ganesh, Shiva appoints him as the leader of his troop of followers. As a further boon, Shiva tells Ganesh that he will be worshiped before any other deity.

Ganesh’s elephant head has a broken tusk, and there are differing myths recounting how this happened. In one story it comes from an altercation with the Parashuram avatar, who tries to enter Shiva’s chambers while Ganesh is guarding the door. According to another account, the injury is self-inflicted. In a fit of rage at the moon, Ganesh breaks off his tusk and throws it at the moon. According to tradition, Ganesh uses this tusk as a pen to write down the text of the epic Mahabharata as it is dictated by the sage Vyasa. For further information on Ganesh and his cult, see Paul Courtright, Ganesa, 1985; other information can be found in works on Hindu mythology.

Ganesh Chaturthi

Festival falling on the fourth (chaturthi) day of the bright or waxing half of the lunar month of Bhadrapada (August–September), dedicated to the worship of the god Ganesh. This festival is observed throughout India, but is particularly celebrated in Maharashtra. During this festival clay images of Ganesh are consecrated and worshiped. At the festival’s end the images are carried in procession for ceremonial immersion in bodies of water—whether the sea, a river, or the village pond.

Although Ganesh is a relatively minor deity in the Hindu pantheon, his role as the Lord of Obstacles (Vighneshvar) makes him important in everyday life, since his involvement can either further or hinder one’s efforts. For this reason, Ganesh is always worshiped at the start of any endeavor and at the beginning of all religious ceremonies. While Ganesh plays an important role in people’s everyday lives, the festival Ganesh Chaturthi gained prominence in Maharashtra for political reasons. Bal Gangadhar Tilak, one of the most important figures in the nineteenth-century Hindu renaissance, promoted the celebration of Ganesh Chaturthi as a visible way to assert and celebrate a Hindu nationalist identity during the time of British imperial rule. Given the power of British rule, outright rebellion was simply impossible, and the British government heavily restricted all forms of political dissent. The Ganesh festival provided a way to circumvent these restrictions, since the British had a longstanding policy of not interfering with religious observances. The celebration of this festival in Maharashtra, particularly the processions to immerse the images in the sea, became an important theater to demonstrate and affirm Hindu cultural and political identity.

Ganga
In Hindu mythology, the goddess whose material form is the Ganges River. The Ganges is sacred because the river is considered to be a goddess who has the power to take away the sins of those who bathe (snana) in her. There are numerous legends to explain her origin. The best-known is the tale of King Bhagirath, who by his ascetic practice succeeds in bringing the Ganges down from heaven to earth. Bhagirath is the great-great-grandson of King Sagar, whose 60,000 sons had been burned to ash by the sage Kapila's magic power after they had erroneously accused Kapila of being a thief. Kapila later tells Anshuman, King Sagar's grandson and sole surviving descendant, that the only way to bring peace to the souls of Sagar's sons is to bring the Ganges down from heaven to earth. Anshuman strives unsuccessfully to do this, as does his son Dilip after him. Dilip's son Bhagirath takes their efforts to heart and retires to the Himalayas, where he performs asceticism until the gods finally agree to send the Ganges down to earth. Yet Bhagirath's efforts are not yet over. Next, he has to gain the favor of the god Shiva, so that Shiva will agree to take the shock of the falling river on his head. Otherwise, its force will destroy the earth. When all is finally in place, the Ganges falls to earth onto the head of Shiva. Bhagirath leads Ganga out of the mountains to the sea, where she touches his ancestors' ashes and they finally find peace. This myth highlights both the salvific touch of the Ganga and her intimate association with the last rites (antyeshti samskara) for the dead.

According to another story, the Ganges comes down to earth because of a curse pronounced during a family quarrel between Vishnu and his wives Ganga, Lakshmi, and Saraswati. When one day Ganga and Vishnu begin exchanging lustful glances in public, Saraswati gets angry and begins to beat Ganga. As Lakshmi tries to stop her, Saraswati let loose a string of curses: that Vishnu will be born as a stone (the shalagram), that Lakshmi will be born as a plant (the tulsi plant), and that Ganga will be born as a river and take the sins of the world on her. In the struggle, Saraswati is cursed to become a river. Vishnu sweetens Ganga's curse by telling her that she will be considered very holy on earth and have the power to remove people's sins. Vishnu also tells her that she will fall from heaven onto the head of the god Shiva and become his consort.

Ganga Dashahara
Festival celebrated on the tenth day of the bright or waxing half of the lunar month of Jyesth (May–June), which marks the day that the goddess Ganga is believed to have descended from heaven to earth to become the Ganges River. The primary religious rite performed on this day is bathing (snana) in sacred rivers, particularly the Ganges.

Ganga Dynasty
(11th–15th c.) Eastern Indian dynasty that ruled the coastal strip on the Bay of Bengal in the modern states of Orissa and Andhra Pradesh. Although the Ganga dynasty was never more than a regional power, it left an artistic legacy in a series of stunning temples in modern Orissa. The Ganga dynasty was responsible for the temple to the god Jagannath in the city of Puri and the Sun Temple at Konarak, built by king Narasimhadeva (r. 1238–1264). The dynasty also built temples scattered throughout the modern city of Bhubaneswar, including the temple to the god Shiva as Tribhuvaneshvar, "the Lord of the Triple World," from which the city takes its name.
Gangaikondacholapuran
Temple town in the eastern part of Tamil Nadu, about forty-five miles north and east of the city of Tanjore. This was one of the temples in the Tanjore region built by the Chola kings during their era of preeminence between the ninth and thirteenth centuries. The temple at Gangaikondacholapuran was built in 1025 by King Rajendra I (r. 1014–1042) to commemorate his march to the Ganges in 1023 after vanquishing the king of Bengal. One of the images outside the temple door shows the kneeling Rajendra being garlanded by the god Shiva and his wife Parvati, doubtless intended to give Rajendra divine support for his entitlement to rule. See also Chola dynasty.

Ganga Sagar
Sacred site (tirtha) on Sagar Island, which is located at the outer edge of the Hugli River delta in the Bay of Bengal. Ganga Sagar is where the Ganges River merges with the sea (sagar). As with all the places where the Ganges makes some natural transition, this spot is considered especially holy. Ganga Sagar’s biggest festival comes on Makara Sankranti, the day in January when the sun resumes its northward course. On this day, hundreds of thousands of pilgrims come to bathe (snana). The site is also famous for a temple to the irascible sage Kapila, whose fiery power incinerates the 60,000 sons of King Sagar and sets in motion a series of events leading to King Bhagirath bringing the Ganges down to earth.

Ganges
Northern Indian river that has its source in various small rivers in the Himalaya Mountains. It comes onto the northern Indian plain at the city of Haridwar, flows east across the state of Uttar Pradesh to the city of Allahabad, where it unites with the Yamuna River, and then flows east through the states of Bihar and West Bengal before joining the sea at Ganga Sagar. At 1,560 miles in length, the Ganges is shorter than many other major rivers, but for Hindus no river carries greater religious significance. To pious Hindus the Ganges is not merely a river, but the goddess Ganga come down from heaven, and by whose touch they are purified of all sin and defilement. For the Ganges no superlatives are spared—every drop is sacred, every inch along its banks is... holy, and one gains great religious merit by seeing it, drinking from it, touching it, or merely by thinking about it. It is also considered the best place to perform certain rites for the dead.

Hindu devotion to and reverence for the Ganges has established it as a place of unique importance. The religious importance of the Ganges is reflected in the religious practices connected with it and the many well-known pilgrimage places (tirtha) that are found on its banks, particularly the city of Benares. The Ganges is considered the paradigm for the sacred river. Other Indian sacred rivers, such as the Godavari and the Cauvery, are claimed to “be” the Ganges—that is, one can gain the same religious benefits from bathing (snana) in them that one gains by bathing in the Ganges.

Ganges. Ritually speaking, Gangotri is considered to be the source of the Ganges, although the river’s actual source is the glacier at Gaumukh, another twelve miles upstream. Its high altitude also means that it is only accessible between late April and October, after which it is closed for the winter months. One ritual center in Gangotri is the river itself, in which pilgrims bathe (snana), braving the frigid waters. The other center is the temple to the goddess Ganga, first built about 250 years ago by the Gurkha monarch Amar Singh Thapa and restored in the late nineteenth century by the royal house of Jaipur. By the side of the river is a large stone slab, on which the sage Bhagirath is said to have performed his austerities to bring the Ganges down to earth. As with all the places where the Ganges makes some transition, Gangotri is considered particularly holy. Its sanctity is amplified because it is difficult to get to and is only accessible during the summer months.

Gangotri

Sacred site (tirtha) in the Himalayas at the headwaters of the Bhagirathi River, one of the Himalayan tributaries of the Ganges. Located in the Himalayas, Gangotri is traditionally considered the source of the Ganges River.
Ganika

(“harlot”) In Hindu mythology, a figure who serves as an example of the boundless power of God’s grace and the ease with which one can be saved by even unconscious devotion. Ganika is a notorious prostitute who devotes little time or attention to religious life. Her only pious act is to teach her pet parrot to repeat the name of the god Vishnu, and in trying to teach it she repeats the divine name over and over again. This continual repetition of the name is enough to gain Vishnu’s grace. Upon Ganika’s death, Vishnu’s servants rescue her from the minions of Death and convey her to his celestial realm, Vaikuntha.

Ganpatya

Sectarian Hindus who worship the god Ganesh as their primary deity. Most Hindus pay considerable homage to Ganesh, in part because his status as “Lord of Obstacles” (Vighneshvar) gives him power to help or hinder human endeavors. However, he is usually worshiped as a secondary deity. The Ganpatyas, in contrast, venerate Ganesh as their primary deity and worship no other deities. Most of the Ganpatyas live in the state of Maharashtra, where a network of shrines centered around the city of Pune and the nearby village of Chinchvad serves as their sacred center. The Ganpatya sect was founded by the sixteenth-century figure Moraya Gosavi, whose spiritual initiation came through a series of visions of Ganesh. One of his visions revealed that partial incarnations of Ganesh would be born in Moraya’s family for seven generations. For further information see Paul Courtright, Ganesa, 1985.

Garbhadrana Samskara

The first of the sixteen traditional life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras) performed at important moments throughout one’s life. The Garbhadrana Samskara was performed to ensure the conception of a child. This rite was performed on a specific day following the onset of the wife’s menstrual period, although different sources specify different days. Although part of this rite obviously involved sexual intercourse between husband and wife, as a whole it was meant to create a sacred context for the act of procreation.

Garbhagrha

(“womb-house”) In traditional Hindu architecture, the garbhagrha is the inner sanctum of a temple, which contains the image of the temple’s primary deity. In the Nagara architectural style found in northern and eastern India—in which the whole temple building culminates in one highest point—the garbhagrha was located directly below the summit of the highest tower (shikhara). In the Dravida style found in southern India—in which the temples are shorter, but tend to sprawl over vast areas—the garbhagrha’s location is marked by a tower higher than the rest of the roof.

Garhmukteshvar

Sacred site (tirtha) on the Ganges River in the Ghaziabad district of the state of Uttar Pradesh about sixty miles due east of Delhi. Garhmukteshvar’s primary temple is dedicated to the god Shiva in his form as the “Lord of Liberation” (mukteshvar), but the site’s major importance comes from its location on the Ganges as a place for bathing (snana) and performing memorial rites (shraddhas) for the dead. Large crowds gather there to bathe on festival days, particularly on Kartik Purnima, the full moon in the lunar month of Kartik (October–November).

Garhwal

In the most technical sense, Garhwal is the name of a particular hill district in the northern Indian state of Uttar Pradesh. Garhwal is more commonly used as the name for a cultural region in the Uttar Pradesh hills, made up of the districts of Garhwal, TehriGarhwal, Dehra Dun, Chamoli, and Uttarkashi. The Garhwal region contains all the major tributaries of the Ganges: the Bhagirathi, the Mandakini, the Pindara, and the Alakananda. It also contains many of the holiest sacred sites (tirthas) in the Himalayas, including Yamunotri, Gangotri, Kedarnath, and Badrinath. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, under the patronage of the king of the state of Tehri, the region was also one of the centers for the Pahari school of miniature painting.

Garibdas
(early 18th c.) Founder of the Garibdasi religious community. Garibdas was born in the Rohtak district in what is now the state of Haryana. Garibdas did not have a human guru. Instead, he claimed to have received his religious initiation from the poet-saint Kabir, who appeared to him in a dream. Garibdas was a householder, as were his immediate disciples. Under one of their later leaders the Garibdasis renounced their possessions and became an ascetic community. Garibdas preached and taught on a number of subjects and was a well-respected and influential religious reformer.

Garibdasi
Religious community founded by the religious reformer Garibdas (early 18th c.). The Garibdasi community was originally made up of householders, but was fundamentally altered by one of the later leaders, Swami Dayaludasa. Under his direction, the community renounced their possessions and became an ascetic sect. The Garibdasi have more than one hundred centers in northern India, mainly concentrated in the regions of Uttar Pradesh and Haryana around present-day New Delhi, where Garibdas lived during his life.

Garuda
A mythical bird, often portrayed as an Indian kite or eagle. All of the Hindu deities have animal “vehicles,” who are their symbols and their associates. Garuda is considered the vehicle for the god Vishnu. As Vishnu’s vehicle, Garuda reflects some of the protective, life-affirming qualities associated with Vishnu. Garuda is the son of the sage Kashyapa and the divine maiden Vinata. The most famous story associated with Garuda explains the proverbial antipathy between eagles and snakes. Vinata has given birth to a line of eagles, whereas her sister Kadru has engendered a line of serpents. One day the sisters get into an argument about the tail color of a certain celestial horse—Vinata argues that it is white and Kadru asserts that it is black. They finally agree that the person who is wrong will become a slave to the other. To ensure her victory, Kadru persuades a number of her children to hang from the back of the horse, which from a distance makes the white tail appear to be black. When Vinata sees the black snakes, she accepts her defeat and has to serve Kadru under extremely harsh conditions for many years. When Garuda learns what has happened, he embarks on an endless program of killing snakes.

Gauda
One of the five northern brahmin communities (Pancha Gauda); the other four are the Kanaujias, the Maithilas, the Utkalas, and the Saraswats. Gauda brahmans are most numerous in the western half of northern India, particularly in the western parts of the states of Uttar Pradesh and Madhya Pradesh, in the state of Haryana, and in the state of Rajasthan.

Gaudapada
(5th c.) Philosopher and textual commentator traditionally said to be the grand-teacher of the philosopher Shankaracharya. Shankaracharya maintained that Gaudapada was a proponent of Advaita Vedanta, one of the six schools of classical Hindu philosophy, despite Gaudapada's similarities to certain Buddhist positions. Gaudapada's most famous work is a commentary on the sacred text called the Mandukya Upanishad.

Gaudapada
(2) (5th–8th c.) Philosopher and commentator in the Samkhya school, one of the six schools of classical Hindu philosophy. Gaudapada is best known for his commentary on the Samkhyakarikas, the foundational text of the Samkhya school, which is ascribed to the philosopher Ishvarakrishna.

Gaudiya Vaishnava
Religious community founded by the Bengali saint Chaitanya (1486–1533). It takes its name from the ancient name for Bengal (Gauda), and its stress on the worship of the god Vishnu. The community's religious practices and beliefs are founded in Chaitanya's ecstatic devotionalism. He asserted that the path to religious ecstasy is the repetitive recitation of Krishna's name, often while singing and dancing in the streets. Chaitanya's religious charisma gained him many followers, of whom the most important were the Goswamis—the brothers Rupa and Sanatana, and their nephew Jiva. At Chaitanya's command the Goswamis went to live in Brindavan, the village where Krishna is believed to have grown up. The Goswamis' descendants live there to this day. In Brindavan, the Goswamis set about organizing and systematizing the philosophical foundation of Chaitanya's ecstatic experience. Although they conceived of themselves as Chaitanya's servants, they are equally important in the community's development. The Goswamis' key philosophical doctrine was achintyabhedabheda, the idea that there was an "inconceivable identity and difference" between the Supreme Divinity (Krishna) and the human being that renders the soul simultaneously identical to and different from the divinity. The Gaudiya Vaishnava community is also famous for its exhaustive analysis of devotion (bhakti) as an emotional experience. They enumerated the different ways to experience the love of god as five modes of devotion. For further information see Sushil Kumar De, Early History of the Vaishnava Faith and Movement in Bengal, 1961.

Gaumukh
(“cow's mouth”) Sacred site (tirtha) high in the Himalayas. It is located at the glacier that is the actual source of the Bhagirathi River, one of the tributaries of the Ganges. Gaumukh is twelve miles upriver from Gangotri, the place that is ritually celebrated as the source of the Ganges. In popular Hindu belief, the Ganges is believed to issue from the mouth of a cow, hence the name.

Gauna
This is the name for the ceremony of taking a new bride into her marital home for the first time. The addition of a new bride marks an important change for a family and is a time of both opportunity and danger. On one hand, it carries the potential for great blessings, since it is assumed that the bride and groom will soon begin a family. On the other hand, it also carries the threat of danger since the addition of a new person to the family brings the potential for disruption. The bride and her new family perform various rituals to ensure that her addition to the family will be auspicious and harmonious.

Gaura
Festival celebrated in central India that climaxes on the first day of the bright or waxing half of the lunar month of Kartik (October–November), the day after the festival of Diwali. The Gaura festival celebrates the marriage of the god Shiva and the goddess Parvati.
Gaurava

(“[needless] complexity”) In Indian logic, one of the faults to be avoided in constructing and pursuing an argument. According to the principle of “simplicity” (laghava), when one is presented with two equally plausible theories, one should choose the theory that is easier to understand and makes the fewest assumptions. The primary criterion in evaluating any argument is the validity of the argument itself, and it is only after this has been satisfied that one may raise objections based on complexity or simplicity.

Gaurika

Epithet of the goddess Parvati, wife of the god Shiva. According to a story from the Shiva Purana, a sectarian text recounting the mythology of Shiva, Parvati takes offense when Shiva refers to her as Kali (“black”). She performs harsh physical austerities (tapas) to accumulate the power to rid herself of her dark complexion. When this is accomplished, she receives the epithet Gauri to signify her new and lightened complexion. This story illustrates the pervasive religious belief that physical hardship can give one spiritual and even magical powers, a conviction that is still found in contemporary India. This brief story also reveals the stigma that Indian society attributes to people with dark complexions—a prejudice that persists in modern times.

Gaurikund

Village and sacred site (tirtha) in the Himalaya Mountains of the state of Uttar Pradesh. Gaurikund is located about ten miles downstream from the headwaters of the Mandakini River, which is itself one of the Himalayan tributaries of the Ganges. Gaurikund is the end of the motorable road on the way to Kedarnath, and after this pilgrims must travel on foot. Gaurikund’s mythic charter is connected with the god Shiva and his wife Parvati. Parvati is said to have performed harsh asceticism at Gaurikund in order to gain Shiva as her husband; after a long time Shiva is pleased with Parvati, reveals himself to her, and the two become lovers in that place. According to local geography, the place at which Parvati lived during this time is marked by a group of hot springs, which are another of Gaurikund’s attractions.

Gauri-Shankar

A particular variety of rudraksha, a bead made from the dried seed of the tree Elaeocarpus ganitrus, which is considered sacred to Shiva. The rudraksha is often strung into garlands and worn by Shiva’s devotees (bhakta). The Gauri-Shankar rudraksha is made when two seeds grow together naturally. Although the Gauri-Shankar is not as rare as certain other beads, it is unusual enough to command a fairly good price. The Gauri-Shankar is revered as a natural manifestation of the divine couple, the goddess Parvati (Gauri) and the god Shiva (Shankar). It thus represents the total presence of divinity in its eternal and its dynamic aspects: Shiva as knowledge and Parvati as Shakti or power.

Gautama

(6th c. B.C.E.) In Hindu mythology, one of the seven sages whose name marks a clan “lineage” (gotra); the others are Kashyapa, Bharadvaja, Vasishtha, Bhrgu, Atri, and Vishvamitra. All brahmans are believed to be descended from these seven sages, with each family taking the name of its progenitor as its gotra name. In modern times, these gotra divisions are still important, since marriage within the gotra is forbidden. A new bride adopts her husband’s gotra after her marriage as part of her new identity.

Gautama is most famous as the husband of Ahalya. When he discovers that the god Indra has slept with Ahalya, he curses his wife to turn into stone and curses Indra to have a thousand vulvas on his body. Both curses are later modified to reduce their severity. Ahalya is turned to stone, but returns to life when touched by the god Rama’s foot, whereas Indra’s body becomes covered with a thousand eyes. See also marriage prohibitions.

Gayasura
In Hindu mythology, the name of a very powerful asura (demon). Gayasura performs harsh asceticism (tapas), spurred by the traditional Indian assumption that to voluntarily endure physical suffering brings one spiritual and magical powers. Gayasura’s powers grow so large that all the gods become concerned that he might become powerful enough to overthrow them. As the gods’ fears grow, the god Vishnu advises the god Brahma to convince Gayasura to allow his body to be sacrificed. Vishnu promises Gayasura that the place where he dies will become holier than all the sacred sites (tirthas) in the world. The spot where Gayasura’s body lies becomes the holy place known as Gaya, which by virtue of Vishnu’s boon is claimed to be holier than all other places on earth. See also magic.

Gayatri Mantra
A particular verse from the Rg Veda (3.62.10), the oldest Hindu religious text; this verse is written in the poetic meter named gayatri, hence its name. The verse itself is an invocation to the sun and can be translated “let us meditate on the sun, most excellent of all the deities, may he inspire our minds.” Reciting the Gayatri mantra is part of the morning and evening worship (sandhya) prescribed for every “twice-born” man who has received the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” An important part of this initiation is the transmission of this mantra to the young man. Although the Gayatri must be recited every day, it should not be recited over water; in earlier times this was one reason why many orthodox Hindus were reluctant to travel abroad.

Gayawal
Endogamous group of pilgrimage priests (pandas) who live in Gaya, a pilgrimage place (tirtha) famous as a site for rites for the dead. Each Gayawal family... has exclusive hereditary rights to serve all the pilgrims whose ancestral homes lie in a particular region or regions, regardless of where those pilgrims may be living at the time. As at all pilgrimage sites, pilgrims are supposed to be served only by their hereditary family priest. This monopoly gives the Gayawals greater leverage in negotiating fees with their pilgrim clients, who are in a vulnerable position since most of them have come to perform rites for dead relatives. The Gayawals are notorious for their rapaciousness, greed, and general lack of learning. These qualities render them somewhat debased by brahmin standards, as does the fact that they make much of their income from the dead, which is considered inauspicious. In fairness to the Gayawals, the relative power derived from this monopoly is also balanced by a sense of hereditary obligation to their clients—the perennial issue is never whether the clients will be served, but how much they will have to pay.

Gemstones

In Hindu astrology, gemstones are used to strengthen, neutralize, or counteract the celestial influence of certain planets. Hindu astrology recognizes nine planets, each of which is associated with a particular gemstone: sun (ruby), moon (pearl), Mars (coral), Mercury (emerald), Jupiter (topaz), Venus (diamond), Saturn (sapphire), Rahu (agate), and Ketu (turquoise). Each of these nine planets is considered to be a minor deity and to have a distinct personality and characteristics. When deciding which gemstones to wear, one must make certain astrological considerations, particularly the position of the planets in one's natal horoscope (janampatrika), which is believed to reveal each planet’s influence. These gemstones are worn in rings, with the base of the stone in contact with the skin to give the gemstones their efficacy over their planetary counterparts.

Gesture, in Dance and Drama

Gestures in Hindu dance and drama are divided in two categories: hasta, which are broad positions of the arms and hands; and mudra, which are stylized hand gestures, usually with specific meanings.

Ghanta

A handbell. These bells typically have a long straight handle projecting upward from the top and are usually rung with the bell part projecting from the bottom of the closed hand. Ringing bells is an important element in Hindu worship (puja) and its pleasing sound is one of the sixteen traditional offerings (upacharas) given to the deity as part of worship. Many different deities are pictured with bells in Hindu iconography, but it is particularly associated with the goddess Kali, whose roaring voice is equated with a tolling bell.

Ghat

In its broadest meaning, a ghat is a bathing (snana) place by a body of water, such as a river, lake, or pond. The word ghat is also commonly used to refer to the permanent structures that have been built at these bathing places. They usually include a flat area at the water’s edge, where people can walk, stand, or sit. A set of steps leads from the platform into and below the surface of the water. Constructing a ghat is often considered a pious act that generates religious merit. This is particularly true in pilgrimage places (tirtha), where ghats are often centers for public religious life.

Ghatika

In traditional Indian timekeeping, a ghatika is a period of twenty-four minutes. There are sixty in each twenty-four hour day. The ghatika gets its name from the clay pots (ghata) that were used to make water-clocks; these water-clocks measured the time by allowing water to drip out from the pot through a small hole.

Ghatotkacha
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Ghatotkacha is a son of Bhima, one of the five Pandava brothers who are the epic's protagonists. Ghatotkacha's mother is a rakshasi (female demon) named Hidambi; Bhima's carnal relations with a nonhuman being are one sign of his earthy and unsophisticated personality. As the offspring of a rakshasi and the strongest Pandava, Ghatotkacha is a massive physical specimen. He is a staunch ally to the Pandavas all his life and fights valiantly on their behalf during the war between the Pandavas and their cousins the Kauravas, destroying large parts of the Kaurava army. He fights several times with the hero Karna, but is finally killed when Karna uses a magic weapon known as Vaijayanti Shakti.

Ghora
(“terrifying”) Term used to refer to Hindu deities in their frightful, terrifying, and powerful aspects, as opposed to their benevolent (saumya) manifestations. This distinction is particularly applicable to the god Shiva and the forms of the Goddess, both of whom can appear in either form, and devotees (bhakta) can focus their worship on either aspect.

Ghosts
Popular Hindu culture generally accepts the existence of ghosts and spirits, particularly of people who have died a violent or untimely death. Despite the virtually universal belief in reincarnation (samsara), it is generally accepted that the spirits of people who have died such deaths linger near where they lived during their lives. Ghosts will usually reveal themselves through disturbances, misfortunes, or by appearing to family members in visions or dreams. The family will then take measures to appease the spirit. Sometimes this is done by sponsoring rituals or ceremonies. Other times a family may prepare a shrine for the ghost to inhabit. Such ghosts are usually believed to have unsatisfied desires—either they died prior to getting married or having children, or they started major enterprises they were unable to finish. People who have lived long lives and fulfilled all the major human goals will not become ghosts.

Ghrneshvar
(“Lord of Compassion”) One of the twelve jyotirlingas, a group of images of the god Shiva that are deemed particularly holy and powerful. Shiva is believed to be uniquely present at these places. This particular jyotirlinga is located in the village of Velur in the state of Maharashtra, and is also known as Dhushmesvar. This site is unusual because the form of Shiva that resides here is known by two different names and has no unequivocal charter myth. At none of the other jyotirlingas is there any doubt about the presiding deity's form or how it came to be there. This indicates that Ghrneshvar is a minor site, perhaps one simply filling out the catalog of the jyotirlingas to get the number up to twelve. Despite this apparent lack of importance, Ghrneshvar is arguably the most-visited of the jyotirlingas. It is only a few miles from the world famous cave temples at Ellora and is a regular stop on the local tourist circuit. The temple is fairly small but is well kept and very impressive. Male visitors are required to remove their shirts before entering Shiva's presence.

Giri Dashanami
One of the ten divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva. The Dashanamis were supposedly established by the ninth-century philosopher Shankaracharya, in an effort to create a corps of learned men who could help to revitalize Hindu life. Each of the divisions is designated by a different name—in this case, giri (“mountain”). Upon initiation, new members are given this name as a surname to their new ascetic names, thus allowing for immediate group identification.

Aside from their individual identity, these ten “named” divisions are collected into four larger organizational groups: Anandawara, Bhogawara, Bhuriwara, and Kitawara. Each group has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by Shankaracharya. Each of the four groups is also associated with one of the four Vedas—the oldest Hindu sacred texts, a different geographical quarter of India, a different great utterance (mahavakya), and a different ascetic quality. The Giri Dashanamis belong to the Anandawara group, which is affiliated with the Jyotir math in the Himalayan town of Joshimath.

Giridhara (“mountain-lifter”) In Hindu mythology, a youthful and heroic form of the god Krishna. According to the story, as a young man Krishna observes that the village elders make yearly offerings to Indra, the god of the storm. After some persuasion, Krishna manages to convince the elders that instead of making offerings to Indra, who is too far off in heaven to do them any good, they should offer them instead to Mount Govardhan. This mountain looms over their village as a symbol of their prosperity, and since Krishna’s devotees (bhakta) consider this mountain to be another form of Krishna, he is actually persuading the elders to make offerings to him. Indra is furious when he discovers what has happened, and unleashes a violent storm that threatens to wash away the village and destroy all the inhabitants. To protect the villagers and their cattle from harm, Krishna lifts up Mount Govardhan, and holds it over their heads as an umbrella to protect them from the rain. After seven days, Indra admits defeat, and Krishna emerges as the hero of the village. This story illustrates the gradual eclipse of the older Vedic deities. The figure of Krishna as Giridhara is widely worshiped in Rajasthan and is particularly noteworthy as the “chosen deity” (ishtadevata) of the poet-saint Mirabai.

Girnar
Sacred site (tirtha) on a hill outside the city of Junagadh in the state of Gujarat. Girnar has been a holy site for at least 2,000 years and remains an important place for several religious communities. The hill’s summit is an important pilgrimage site for the Jains and has a cluster of Jain temples, some of them dating back to the twelfth century. It also has a long history as a center for Hindu ascetics—the Brahmachari Sanyasis (Brahmacharin) have an ashram there, and the summit is said to have a set of footprints left by Dattatreya, a famous mythic figure who is considered a partial avatar of the god Vishnu and a paradigm for asceticism. Girnar is the site of a large Hindu ascetic gathering on Kartik Purnima, the full moon in the lunar month of Kartik (October–November).

(“Govinda’s Song”) Lyric poem written in the twelfth century by the poet Jayadeva. Written in an era when vernacular languages were becoming the prevalent vehicle for devotional religiosity, the Gitagovinda is one of the last great devotional (bhakti) texts composed in Sanskrit and is an exquisite example of Sanskrit poetry. According to tradition, Jayadeva was associated with the temple to Jagannath in the eastern Indian city of Puri, and his wife Padmavati was a dancer at the same temple. The Gitagovinda is a devotional poem to the god Jagannath. The text was obviously meant to be sung, since its twenty-four cantos are set in various differing musical modes (ragas), each of which conveys a different emotion. The text has also been expressed through dance for at least 500 years in the Orissi dance style that originated in the Jagannath temple. The Gitagovinda is still used in the daily worship of Jagannath and occupies a position held by no other literary text.

The Gitagovinda is an allegory of the union of the human soul with God. This union is described through the story of the love between the god Krishna and his human consort Radha as they experience an initial flush of passion, followed by jealousy, separation, reconciliation, and reunion. Although Jayadeva’s text lavishly employs the images from Sanskrit love poetry, it is far more than a romantic novel. The poem was written to show that Krishna is the lord of the entire universe. The first cantos after the introduction, the Dashavatara Stotra, pay homage to Krishna in his ten avatars or earthly incarnations (Dashavatar), each of whom is instrumental in preserving the cosmic equilibrium. Although Krishna is considered an avatar of the god Vishnu in many parts of the Hindu tradition, Krishna is the supreme deity for Jayadeva. The place usually occupied by Krishna in the enumeration of the avatars is taken by Krishna’s brother, Balarama. The song that follows continues this theme, giving the divine attributes of Krishna as Vishnu, and further emphasizing that the entire Gitagovinda describes the deity’s divine play (līlā).

Having set the appropriate context in the opening songs, Jayadeva’s text returns to a more conventional tale of romantic love. The next chapter describes the symbols of spring, which are intended to evoke a mood of love. Yet this mood is marred by Radha’s jealousy when Krishna sports with a troop of cowherd girls, for she desires Krishna for herself alone. She withdraws and sits apart, sulking and despondent, only to burst into rage when Krishna comes to meet her, bearing the signs of another erotic liaison. Her anger and dismissal make Krishna realize what he has done. He eventually succeeds in dispersing her anger, and convinces Radha of his love. They reconcile and make passionate love. The text ends by describing their love play in the afterglow, in which Radha orders Krishna to ornament her as she wishes, showing her complete power over him.

As a text, the Gitagovinda can be read on many different levels simultaneously. The themes of love, betrayal, and reconciliation speak easily to everyday human experience, but the theological and mystical levels are always present. In the end, deity and devotee (bhakta) are described as needing and loving one another. Neither is complete without the other. Radha's demand for exclusive love is at first denied, but in the end her persistence and conviction are rewarded. The Gitagovinda has been masterfully translated by the late Barbara Stoller Miller as The Love Song of the Dark Lord, 1977.

Goa
One of the smallest states in modern India. It lies between the states of Maharashtra and Karnataka on the shore of the Arabian Sea. Goa was a Portuguese colony for more than 400 years and did not become a part of the Indian union until 1961, when India engineered a nearly bloodless takeover. Goa still retains much of its Portuguese influence—in its food, easygoing pace, and the continuing presence of Roman Catholicism—which makes it one of the most unusual cultural areas in India. For general information about Goa and all the regions of India, an accessible reference is Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.

Gobind Deo Mandir
A temple built in 1590 in Brindavan, the town believed to be the god Krishna's childhood home. The temple is dedicated to Krishna in his form as the “Divine Cowherd.” From an architectural perspective, the temple is unique for its vaulted ceiling, which is seldom found in Hindu temples. The temple's interior and exterior are also notable for their almost complete lack of figural ornamentation, which is extremely unusual. The temple is close to the major road connecting Agra and Delhi. These are the two major political centers of the Moghul empire (1525–1707), whose rulers were Muslims. Since many orthodox Muslims believe that figural representations are idolatrous, particularly in places of worship, the temple's austere style may have been an attempt to avoid inciting Muslim iconoclasm. There is evidence of conflict between Hindus and Muslims at this site since the few figures inside the temple, carved into the lintels of door and windows, have had their heads broken off. See also Moghul dynasty.

Godana
(“gift of a cow”) In Hindu religious practice, gift giving (dana) is common and believed to be a pious act that generates religious merit. Godana is the gift of a cow, usually to a brahmin. Traditional religious texts highly laud the gift of a cow, both as a charitable act and as a way to expiate one's sins. However, since many of these texts were written by brahmans, one can detect a hint of self-interest.

Godavari
River running from west to east in central India. The Godavari's headwaters lie in the state of Maharashtra on the inland side of the western Ghats. It meanders through that state to Andhra Pradesh, where it enters the Bay of Bengal. The Godarvi is traditionally considered one of India's seven sacred rivers, along with the Ganges, Yamuna, Cauvery, Saraswati, Narmada, and Indus. The Godavari has special status in central India, where it is often referred to as the “Ganges”—the most sacred river for Hindus. Although its entire length is considered sacred, the Godavari’s most important religious sites are all in the west: Nasik, Tryambakeshvar, and Paithan. See also ghat.

Goddess
India is home to a host of different goddesses. Although goddesses differ greatly in demeanor and character, they are all generally seen as expressions of a single underlying female deity. This vision of the goddess coincides with the characteristic Hindu practice that allows for multiple manifestations of a divinity, while at the same time asserting his or her underlying reality as a single entity. Many of India’s goddesses are the deities of a specific site, who might be worshiped only in that specific place. Yet as these local goddesses are all mythically linked as differing forms of a single great Goddess, the sacred sites (tirthas) are also connected with this great Goddess. The sites, called pithas or “benches,” form a sacred network stretching throughout the entire subcontinent.

The origins of the goddess cult in India are uncertain. Excavations of cities of the Indus Valley civilization have unearthed female figures with enormous breasts, hips, and buttocks. These figures resemble the Venus of Willendorf found in Bronze Age Europe and suggest that there was some kind of cult associated with women’s fertility. Some interpreters have seen the Indus Valley figures as proof that the cult of the Mother Goddess originated in the Indus Valley civilization, but hard evidence supporting this claim is slim. Another reason some interpreters believe that goddess worship must have come from the indigenous Indian culture is that the deities mentioned in the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts, are almost exclusively male. The female goddesses in the Vedic hymns are infrequent and unimportant—Ushas (the dawn), Prthivi (the earth), and Nirriti (death and destruction). But somehow female divinities were elevated from virtual obscurity and became conceived as the reigning power in the universe.

The cult of the great Goddess appears fully formed, seemingly out of nowhere, in about the fifth century. She first appears in the text known as the Devimahatmya (“greatness of the Goddess”), which is itself a section of the Markandeya Purana. The depth and subtlety of her characterization in this text leads scholars to infer that this cult had existed for some time, perhaps as a secret religious community open only to initiates. The goddess in the Devimahatmya is a powerful, independent female force and is able to do what the gods cannot. She is created from the collected radiance (tejas) of all the gods, and comes into the world to kill a demon against whom the gods have struggled in vain. The Devimahatmya's three different episodes portray her in three different divine personas: as Mahasaraswati in the slaying of the demons Madhu and Kaitabha, as Mahalakshmi in slaying a demon named Mahishasura, and as Mahakali in the battle against the demon generals Shumbha and Nishumbha.

Many of India's goddesses are the patron deities of particular locales, and are considered unique to that place. The Shiwalik goddesses, for example, are unique to particular sites in the Shiwalik hills. At the same time, all of these goddesses are considered different manifestations of the same divine energy. According to the sites' charter myth, each site is associated with a particular body part of the primeval goddess. The myth tells of the death of Sati, who commits suicide when her father Daksha insults her husband Shiva. Shiva picks up Sati’s body and wanders the earth, carrying her on his shoulders. In his grief Shiva neglects his divine duties, and the world begins to fall into ruin. The other gods beg Vishnu for help, lest the world be destroyed. Vishnu uses his razor-sharp discus to cut off pieces of Sati’s body, until finally there is nothing left. When the body is completely gone, Shiva goes to the mountains, where he becomes absorbed in meditation. Wherever a part of Sati’s body falls, that place becomes a Shakti Pitha (“seat of the Goddess”), sanctified to the Goddess in a particular form. The number of these places differs from source to source—some list fifty-one, and others 108. Whatever the number, the sites are spread throughout the subcontinent, from Baluchistan in modern Pakistan, to Assam in the far east, to deep in southern India. Each Shakti Pitha is associated with a particular body part of the great Goddess, has a particular presiding female deity, and has a particular Bhairava as a consort to that goddess.

From this perspective, the entire subcontinent is seen as a single cohesive unit, with the network of sites connected to one another as are the parts of the body. Different places may claim the same body part, the result of the drive to establish a site and to give it prestige. For example, Sati’s vulva, the most powerfully charged part of the female body, is usually accepted to have fallen at Kamakhya in Assam, but the same claim is made at Kalimath in the Himalayas. There is no single authoritative list of sites and competing claims are not uncommon. Many Hindus seem unconcerned with the seeming inconsistency of having the same body parts claimed by different sites; perhaps this reflects the conviction that the Goddess is behind them all, and that the specifics are therefore less important.

While some goddesses are only worshiped in their particular locale, such as the goddesses found in the Shiwalik hills, other goddesses have become more widely worshiped, and some have become pan-Indian. In the pantheon, the Goddess generally appears in two widely differing types of manifestations. At times she appears as a wife and mother, in forms such as Parvati, Lakshmi, and Saraswati. Although these married goddesses are not completely powerless, they tend to be benign, benevolent, and auspicious. Her other manifestation is in forms such as Durga and Kali, whose male consorts are considered subordinate to them. These independent manifestations of the Goddess have the power to help their devotees (bhakta), but they are also volatile and potentially dangerous, since their power is sometimes unleashed without control. Cultural observers have suggested that this dual perspective represents... cultural perspectives on Indian women, particularly the belief that women’s procreative capacities should be channeled through the safe, confining bounds of marriage. Married women, as wives and mothers, are auspicious, life-giving, and life-sustaining because their creative power has been regulated under male control. Unmarried women remain a source of danger, particularly to the family’s prestige, since the quickest way to ruin a family’s good name is through the corruption of its women.

Godman
Colloquial name for a particular type of charismatic Hindu ascetic. As religious figures, godmen are generally characterized by a high-profile presence, by their ability to attract attention and support from the larger Indian society, and by their claims to advanced spiritual attainments. They sometimes claim to possess magic powers—such as the ability to heal, read minds, foretell the future, or to influence future events—which are exhibited to prove the godman’s spiritual attainments. Godmen often come from outside the established ascetic orders and may have never even taken formal ascetic initiation. They are able to flourish in the Indian religious “free market,” which recognizes and rewards religious charisma. Godmen typically dwell in their own ashrams rather than one belonging to an order. Although most of them acknowledge a guru or religious preceptor, their success stems more from their personal qualities than the strength of their spiritual lineage. In recent years a number of these godmen have cultivated large numbers of foreign disciples, which can bring both wealth and enhanced prestige. One contemporary example of such a godman is Sathya Sai Baba, whose ashram is in Puttaparthi in the southern state of Andhra Pradesh. For an example of one person’s encounters with a variety of these figures, see Peter Ludwig Brent, Godmen of India, 1972.

Gods, World of the
The earliest reference to the transmigration of souls is found in both the Brhadaranyaka Upanishad (6.2) and the Chandogya Upanishad (5.10). These texts make a qualitative distinction between two different paths. The path to the world of the gods ultimately led to the sun, and the person traveling it did not return again, whereas the path to the world of the fathers led to the moon, and the person traveling it was eventually reborn on earth. The leitmotiv of the Upanishads is the need for individual spiritual realization, which is the key to getting on the path to the world of the gods. Those who gain this realization attain the final and ultimate end, whereas those who simply do good deeds will return to earth, although their good deeds will give them karmic benefits. See also karma.

Godse, Nathuram
(1912–1948) Hindu nationalist figure who is most famous as the assassin of Mohandas Gandhi. Godse was a devoted follower of Vinayak Damodar Savarkar, whose articulation of Hindu nationalism equated Hindu identity and Indian patriotism. Savarkar and his followers saw the partition of India in 1947 as the “vivisection” of Mother India, dividing her into India and Pakistan. Like many of Savarkar’s followers, Godse was enraged by Gandhi’s post-partition efforts to protect Indian Muslims and to influence the Indian government’s policy toward Pakistan, particularly his hunger strike to force the Indian government to transfer to Pakistan a large sum of money that had been promised. Filled with the conviction that Gandhi had to be stopped, Godse intercepted Gandhi on the way to a prayer meeting, touched his feet as a sign of respect, and then shot him three times. Godse was tried and executed for his action and is sometimes cited as a martyr by the most ardent contemporary nationalists.
Gokarna
(“cow’s ear”) Sacred site (tirtha) in the state of Karnataka on the shore of the Arabian Sea, just south of Karnataka’s border with the state of Goa. Gokarna is most famous for a temple to the god Shiva in his form as Mahabaleshvara, the “exceedingly powerful Lord.” According to the site’s charter myth, Shiva intends to perform the work of creation, but before he begins he becomes rapt in meditation in the depths of the earth. The god Brahma grows impatient with the delay and carries out the work of creation himself. Shiva is enraged when he discovers what has happened and is about to force his way up through the earth, which will create a terrible cataclysm. The earth appears to Shiva in the form of a cow, who begs him to rise to the surface through her ear. It is claimed that a cave at Gokarna is the remnant of that passage through which Shiva rose.

Gokhale, Gopal Krishna
(1866–1915) College professor, legislator, and reformist Hindu, who worked for much of his life with his older contemporary, Mahadev Govind Ranade. Unlike Ranade, whose position as a judge barred him from active political involvement, Gokhale spent the last fifteen years of his life as a legislator. Thirteen of these years were spent as Bombay’s Indian representative to the Imperial Legislative Council, the highest lawmaking body in India. Like Ranade, Gokhale sought to influence British policy by working within established institutions, in this case through the British colonial government. This willingness to compromise brought him opposition from leaders such as Bal Gangadhar Tilak, who advocated stiffer, even violent opposition to British rule.

Gokulnath
(1551–1640) The third guru of the religious community known as the Pushti Marg. Gokulnath inherited the mantle of leadership from his father Vitthalnath, who was the successor to his father Vallabhacharya, the community’s founder. During his tenure Gokulnath helped solidify the religious community and paid particular attention to its organization. He is best known for compiling several hagiographic works describing the careers of his father and grandfather, to provide an appropriately reverent picture for their followers. Gokulnath was also the moving force behind a text named the Chaurasi Vaishnavan ki Varta (“Account of eighty-four Vaishnavas”), although the actual text was probably compiled by Gokulnath’s disciple Hariray. This text is a sectarian hagiography describing the lives of eighty-four paradigmatic Vaishnavas, all of whom—at least according to the text—were associates and disciples of Vallabhacharya and Vitthalnath. The text’s real purpose is not to provide a biography, but to illustrate the importance of the Pushti Marg and its leaders.

Golden Embryo
One of the earliest cosmological myths. It first appears in the Rg Veda (10.121), the oldest Hindu religious text. According to this account, the universe originally consisted of the Golden Embryo (Hiranyagarbha). The Golden Embryo stirred and evolved into Prajapati, the creator of all things and ruler over all creatures. In this story, as with most other accounts of Hindu cosmology, the cosmos originates from a single source and is thus an organic whole.

Golwalkar, Madhav Sadashiv
(1904–1973) Second sarsanghchalak (“Supreme Leader”) of the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (rss). The rss is a conservative Hindu organization whose express purpose is to provide the leadership cadre for a revitalized Hindu India; for most of its history it has characterized its mission as cultural, rather than religious or political. Golwalkar is a pivotal figure in RSS history. He took office in 1940 upon the death of its founder, Dr. K. B. Hedgewar, and guided it through the tumultuous years surrounding India’s independence. After Mohandas Gandhi’s assassination by the Hindu nationalist Nathuram Godse in 1948, the RSS and several other organizations were briefly banned. Despite initial suspicions, the RSS has never been implicated in Gandhi’s death. During the ban the RSS continued to function underground, and many of its leaders became more politically active, a trend that Golwalkar had earlier discouraged. When the ban was rescinded in 1949, the RSS began to exercise greater influence by forming and sponsoring affiliated organizations, such as trade unions, student organizations, charitable institutions, and political parties. This trend continued throughout the rest of Golwalkar’s tenure, although he was far less activist than his successor, Balasaheb Deoras. For further information see Walter K. Andersen and Shridhar D. Damle, The Brotherhood in Saffron, 1987; and Tapan Basu et al., Khaki Shorts and Saffron Flags, 1993.

Gond

Tribal (adivasi) community in central India. The Gonds are concentrated in the state of Madhya Pradesh, particularly in the hills on both sides of the Vindhya Mountains, in the Kaimur Range at the eastern border of Madhya Pradesh and Uttar Pradesh, and in the Ramgarh Hills on the border of Madhya Pradesh, Orissa, and Bihar. Like most tribal peoples, they tend to be quite poor and eke out a living from subsistence agriculture.

Gopala

("protector of cows") Epithet of the god Krishna, reflecting his childhood occupation as a cowherd. See Krishna.

Gopi

(feminine of gopa, “cow-keeper”) In Hindu mythology, the gopis are the cow-keeping women who are the god Krishna’s companions in Braj, the region south of Delhi in which Krishna is believed to have spent his early life. The gopis are the simple village women of Braj, who keep the village cows, churn the milk into butter for sale, and provide Krishna with an adoring and familiar presence as he grows up. They exclaim over his beauty as an infant and they endure his boyhood pranks—particularly his continual theft of their hard-earned butter. When he becomes an enchanting adolescent, they respond to the nightly call of his flute to join him in the circular dance (ras lila) on the shores of the river Yamuna. Although the gopis are completely devoted to Krishna and love him above all else, their relations with him are also devoid of any affectation or awe. The gopis are simple country women, and they treat Krishna as one of their own. For example, they feel no qualms about scolding him when he has stolen their butter. Their intimate but unaffected relationship with Krishna makes them paradigms for the ideal devotee (bhakta). For his part, Krishna is said to prefer this sort of natural and spontaneous relationship to any sort of calculated worship. Krishna loves Braj more than any other place on earth because the people there treat him as one of their own.

Gopichand

Princely protagonist of The Song of Gopichand, an allegorical adventure that is much beloved throughout northern India and has even spread to Bengal where it is called The Song of Manik Chandra. The story tells of the trials of Gopichand, who loses his kingdom through the vicissitudes of fate but eventually regains it after numerous trials and setbacks. Aside from the song’s story, it is also embedded with the ideas of the Nathpanthis, an ascetic community supposedly founded by Gorakhnath. Some members of this community believed that perfecting their bodies through yoga would make them immortal. This idea appears in the song through its description of Gopichand's mother Mayana, who has power over Death himself. In some versions of the story Mayana’s religious preceptor is identified as a low-caste sweeper, while in others it is the sage Gorakhnath himself. Two versions of this song have been translated by G. A. Grierson in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, the first published in 1878 and the second in 1885.

Gopuram

In the Dravida style of temple architecture, which was mainly prevalent in southern India, gopurams are the ornate temple gateways in the center of the temple’s perimeter walls. Temples built in the Dravida style tend to be shorter than temples built in the northern Indian Nagara style, but compensate for this by stretching over vast areas, often forming towns in their own right. There are usually four gopurams, one for each of the cardinal directions; in some cases these gopurams are ten stories tall and can be seen for miles from the surrounding countryside. The gopurams were originally fortified gateways built to restrict access to the temple, but in present times their function is more decorative. By dominating the skyline around the temple—much like spires of Gothic cathedrals—gopurams are a pronouncement about the power of the resident deities (and their client rulers); they have also helped to educate the faithful, since they are usually covered with sculptures detailing mythological themes.

Gora

(1267–1397?) Poet and saint in the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba at his temple at Pandharapur in modern state of Maharashtra. According to tradition, Gora was a potter, which by the standards of the time was a very low-status occupation; Gora’s inclusion as one of the Varkari saints helps underscore the devotional (bhakti) conviction that birth status was less important than genuine love of God. Gora is reported to have lived most of his life at Teradhoki village in the state of Maharashtra, but since he is a minor Varkari figure, little is known about his life. For further information see G. A. Deleury, The Cult of Vithoba, 1960; and Justin E. Abbott and Narhar R. Godbole (trans.), Stories of Indian Saints, 1982.

Gorakhnath
(13th c.?) Medieval yogi and wonder-worker who is the founder of the Nathpanthi ascetics. There is little doubt that Gorakhnath was a historical person, and his teacher was named Matsyendranath (also known as Minanath). However, the accounts of his life tell of him performing so many miracles and wonders that they cannot be taken as factual. He is generally believed to have lived early in the thirteenth century, since the Maharashtrian poet-saint Jnaneshvar (1275–1296?) described his own spiritual preceptor as one of Gorakhnath's disciples.

Tradition regards Gorakhnath not only as a magician and a wonder-worker, but also as the author of the Gorakhshatakam. This text is a religious manual that gives instruction on a specific type of yoga practiced by Nathpanthi ascetics. The ultimate goal of this yogic practice is to transform the perishable elements in the physical body into immortal elements. Whether or not Gorakhnath authored this text, the spiritual instructions therein are consistent with those of the Nathpanthi ascetics who claim to be his disciples. According to legend, Gorakhnath and his most accomplished followers have never died, and their victory over death is a sign of their spiritual accomplishment. The most complete source on Gorakhnath and his followers, despite its age, is George Weston Briggs, Gorakhnath and the Kanphata Yogis, 1973; and Shashibhushan B. Dasgupta, Obscure Religious Cults, 1962. See also Maharashtri.

Gorakhnathi
Ascetic community who claim to be the disciples of sage Gorakhnath and claim to have conserved his teachings. These ascetics are also known as the Nathpanthis. See Nathpanthi.

Gorakhshatakam
("Gorakh's Hundred") Text attributed to the sage Gorakhnath. Although his authorship is ultimately unprovable, its teachings are consistent with those of the Nathpanthi ascetics who claim to be his disciples. In at least one of its forms, as translated by Briggs, the text has 101 verses, not 100 verses as the title suggests. The Gorakhshatakam gives instruction on the type of yoga practiced by the Nathpanthi ascetics in which the major motif is the union of polar opposites. It begins with instruction on the structure of the subtle body, an alternate physiological system that resides on a different plane of existence than gross matter, but possesses certain correspondences to the material body. The subtle body is visualized as a set of six psychic centers (chakras) running roughly along the course of the spine. Above and below these centers are the bodily abodes of the two divine principles, Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power). The aspirant aims to awaken a latent spiritual energy residing in the shakti called kundalini and move it to union with the Shiva principle at the crown of the head. The ultimate aim of this practice is to gain control over the forces that affect the body, allowing one to become purified and immortal.

Gosain
Vernacular form of the Sanskrit word goswami ("master of the senses"). Although this epithet could be used to refer to any ascetic, during British colonial rule in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries it was most commonly used to denote certain subgroups among the Sanyasis, the ascetic devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. The name was particular to Sanyasis at the low end of the ascetic status scale, such as the Nathpanthis or the Naga (militant) Sanyasis, who were often recruited from the lower classes of society.

Gosala Maskariputra
(5th c. B.C.E.?) According to tradition, a philosopher who was a contemporary of the Buddha. Gosala is believed to be the founder of the Ajivikas, an extinct religious community whose philosophical position is generally described as fatalism. In the Buddhist and Jain literature he is generally referred to as Makkhali Gosala (“cow-shed”), referring to his lowly birth.

Goshala
(“abode of cows”) In modern India, a goshala is a rest home for aged, infirm, and unproductive cows, where they can live for the rest of their lives in peace and happiness. Goshalas are usually established and supported as acts of religious merit, to provide for cows that would either be slaughtered or abandoned. These institutions are built as a sign of respect for cattle, which is one of the most pervasive ideas in Hindu culture.

Goswami, Jiva
(ca. late 16th c.) A pivotal figure in the Gaudiya Vaishnava religious community, along with his uncles Sanatana Goswami and Rupa Goswami. Although the Gaudiya Vaishnavas were founded by the poet-saint Chaitanya, it was the Goswamis who brought order and systematic thinking to Chaitanya’s ecstatic devotionalism. The Goswamis were southern brahmans by origin, but their family had resettled in northern India. Their lives were transformed when Rupa and Sanatana met Chaitanya. Chaitanya dispatched the brothers to Brindavan, the village where the god Krishna is believed to have spent his childhood, with instructions to settle there and reclaim it as a holy place. The three Goswamis lived there for several decades, reclaiming the sacred sites (tirthas), having temples built, and above all providing the ideas and institutions that defined the Gaudiya Vaishnava community. Jiva was a versatile scholar who wrote on many different aspects of Vaishnava devotion, but is best known for his works on metaphysics, which provide the community’s basic philosophical underpinnings. For further information see Sushil Kumar De, Early History of the Vaishnava Faith and Movement in Bengal, from Sanskrit and Bengali Sources, 1961.

Goswami, Rupa
(ca. mid-16th c.) A disciple of the Bengali saint Chaitanya, a pivotal figure in the establishment of the Gaudiya Vaishnava community, along with his brother Sanatana Goswami, and his nephew Jiva Goswami. Although the Gaudiya Vaishnavas were founded by the poet-saint Chaitanya, it was the Goswamis who brought order and systematic thinking to Chaitanya’s ecstatic devotionalism. Records indicate that the Goswamis were brahmans whose families originally hailed from the Karnataka region. The family had settled in Bengal, where Rupa and Sanatana were in the service of a local Muslim ruler. However, their lives were transformed when Rupa and Sanatana met Chaitanya. Chaitanya dispatched the brothers to Brindavan, the village where the god Krishna is believed to have spent his childhood, with instructions to settle there and reclaim it as a holy place. The three Goswamis lived there for several decades, reclaiming the sacred sites (tirthas), having temples built, and above all providing the ideas and institutions that defined the Gaudiya Vaishnava community. Rupa was a passionate devotee (bhakta) of Krishna, but also had interests as a dramatist and a scholar. In addition to writing poetry as a vehicle for expressing devotion to Krishna, he also focused on analyzing bhakti as an emotional experience. He is most famous for enumerating the five modes of devotion, explaining the different possible ways to experience the love of God. For further information see Sushil Kumar De, Early History of the Vaishnava Faith and Movement in Bengal, 1961; and Shrivatsa Goswami, “Radha” in John Stratton Hawley and Donna Wulff (eds.), The Divine Consort, 1982.

Goswami, Sanatana
(ca. mid-16th c.) A disciple of the Bengali saint Chaitanya, and a pivotal figure in the establishment of the Gaudiya Vaishnava community, along with his brother Rupa Goswami and his nephew Jiva Goswami. Although the Gaudiya Vaishnavas were founded by the poet-saint Chaitanya, it was the Goswamis who brought order and systematic thinking to Chaitanya’s ecstatic devotionalism. Records indicate that the Goswamis were brahmins whose families originally hailed from the Karnataka region. The family had settled in Bengal, where Rupa and Sanatana were in the service of a local Muslim ruler. However, their lives were transformed when Rupa and Sanatana met Chaitanya. Chaitanya dispatched the brothers to Brindavan, the village where the god Krishna is believed to have spent his childhood, with instructions to settle there and reclaim it as a holy place. The three Goswamis lived there for several decades, reclaiming the sacred sites (tirthas), having temples built, and above all providing the ideas and institutions that defined the Gaudiya Vaishnava community. Sanatana was more of a devotee (bhakta) than a scholar. This is evident in his written works, which tend to be either devotional songs or commentaries on religious texts. Sanatana’s most famous text is the Hari-bhakti-vilasa (“The delight of devotion to Hari”), for which he wrote a commentary as well.

For further information see Sushil Kumar De, Early History of the Vaishnava Faith and Movement in Bengal, 1961.

Gotra
A word for exogamous lineages. Lineages are particularly stressed among brahmins, although the status associated with some lineages sometimes led other twice-born groups to adopt them as well. The word literally means “cow pen,” and by extension the family is associated with a particular herd of cattle. Brahmins were believed to be descended from the seven sages—Kashyapa, Vasistha, Bhrgu, Gautama, Atri, Bharadvaja, and Vishvamitra—with each family taking as its gotra the name of the sage believed to be its progenitor. The only situation in which it was really important was in marriages, since marriage within the gotra was forbidden. After marriage, a woman would adopt the gotra of her husband as part of her new identity. Since this practice was observed by brahmins, having a gotra became something of a status symbol. This led other twice-born groups to imitate the brahmins and adopt gotras as well.

Govardhan
Sacred mountain in the western part of the Mathura district of the state of Uttar Pradesh. According to Hindu mythology, this was the mountain that the god Krishna held up as an umbrella over the Braj region to protect its inhabitants from the storms generated by the wrath of Indra, god of the storm. According to the traditions of the Pushti Marg, a religious community founded by Vallabhacharya (1479–1531), a particular image of Krishna called Shrinathji was discovered by Vallabhacharya on Mount Govardhan, after Krishna revealed its location to the saint in a dream.
Govardhan Math

One of the four maths or sacred centers traditionally believed to have been established by the great philosopher Shankaracharya; the others are the Sharada math, Shringeri math, and Jyotir math. These four sacred centers are each associated with one of the four geographical corners of the Indian subcontinent; the Govardhan math is in the eastern quarter, in the city of Puri on the shores of the Bay of Bengal. Shankaracharya is traditionally cited as the founder of the Dashanami Sanyasis, the most prestigious Hindu ascetic order. The Dashanami (“ten names”) ascetics are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva and are divided into ten divisions, each with a different name. These ten divisions are organized into four larger organizational groups—Anandawara, Bhogawara, Bhuriwara, and Kitawara—each of which has two or three of the ten divisions and is associated with one of the four sacred centers. Of these, the Govardhan math is associated with the Bhogawara group.

Govardhan Puja

Festival celebrated on the first day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Kartik (October–November), the day after the festival Diwali. The charter myth for this festival comes from the mythology of the god Krishna, and this festival is celebrated mainly in the Braj region south of modern Delhi, where Krishna is said to have lived. According to legend, this is the day that Krishna lifted up Mount Govardhan to protect the people of Braj from the storms sent by the god Indra. Indra was angry because Krishna had persuaded the village elders to make offerings to Mount Govardhan, rather than to Indra. Krishna held up the mountain as an umbrella for an entire week, after which Indra admitted defeat. On this day pilgrims circle Mount Govardhan on foot. The mountain is seen as a physical manifestation of Krishna himself, and because of Krishna’s association with cattle, they also adorn and worship cows and bulls. In memory of the offerings given to Mount Govardhan in that story, as well as the mountain of offerings (particularly milk-based sweets) that are prepared for celebration in modern times, the festival is also known as Annakut (“mountain of food”).

Govinda

(“gaining cows”) Epithet of the god Krishna, referring to his childhood in Braj as a cowherd. See Krishna.

Govindswami

(late 16th c.) One of the poets of the ashtachap, a group of eight northern Indian bhakti (devotional) poets. The compositions of these eight poets are used for liturgical purposes by the Pushti Marg, a religious community whose members are devotees (bhakta) of Krishna. The Pushti Marg named all eight poets as members of the community and associates of either the community’s founder, Vallabcharya, or his successor Vitthalnath. Govindswami is believed to have been an associate of Vitthalnath. In his poetry, Govindswami writes from the perspective of a companion (sakhi) to Krishna’s consort Radha, and in this voice not only gives a picture of the divine activities, but also an extremely detailed picture of everyday village life.

Grace

The notion of divine grace has been and remains vitally important in Hindu devotional religiosity (bhakti), although it is perceived differently among the various devotional movements in Hinduism. In the Tamil devotionalism that marked the earliest articulation of the bhakti movement, the two major religious groups, the Alvars and the Nayanars, both stressed the utter transcendence of their chosen god and the gulf between God and human beings. In this understanding, grace became something only God could give freely. Only God had the power to transform human beings and bring their souls to final liberation—a notion of grace not far removed from Christian ideas. Within the Shrivaishnavas, a later southern Indian religious community, there was a debate whether liberation was primarily achieved through one’s faith or one’s works. The Tengalai school favored faith and argued that liberation came from God alone. In contrast, the Vadagalai school favored a person's works and countered that humans had to respond to divine grace in order for their souls to gain final liberation. The importance of divine transcendence and omnipotence, as articulated by Tamil devotionalism, has remained an important part of Hindu piety, even to the present time.

Southern Indian bhakti tended to express the deity-devotee (bhakta) relationship using images of master and servant. Northern Indian bhakti, particularly that which focused on the gods Rama and Krishna, stressed other images of this relationship: friend and friend, parent and child, lover and beloved. These differing conceptions necessarily influenced the notion of grace, ranging from the idea of God as other and saving power to the sacred quality coming from sharing everyday interactions. In the latter, grace is manifested through being able to take part in God’s divine play (līla), to play with God, and thus take part in the divine world. In this model, God is immanent rather than transcendent, and divine activity comes in the guise of sharing the ordinary activities of human life. All of these models can be found in modern Hindu religious life, although certain ones are more strongly associated with particular groups or religious communities.

Grammarians
Philosophical school based in the teachings of Bhartrhari (7th c. C.E.). The Grammarians conceived of Brahman, the Ultimate Reality, as being manifested in sound, particularly the sound of the spoken word. They centered their cult around the word Om, a word that is described as the source of all things in the Mandukya Upanishad, an early speculative text. For further information see Harold Coward and K. Kunjunni Raja (eds.), The Philosophy of the Grammarians, 1990.

Grand Bassin
Mountain lake in the southern part of Mauritius, an island in the Indian Ocean 1,200 miles east of the east African coast. The Hindu population of Mauritius have established sacred sites (tīrthas) in the landscape that often... relate or correspond to sacred landscape features on the Indian subcontinent. Grand Bassin is a remote and high lake, which the Hindus on Mauritius call the Ganges River. In the days before the festival of Shivaratri (February–March), great crowds of people come to Grand Bassin. They bathe (snana) in the lake, worship at the temples surrounding it, and then draw pots of water from the lake and carry them on foot back to their homes. The pilgrims time their departures to arrive at their homes on the evening of Shivaratri, and the water is offered to the god Shiva in their local temple. This sort of rite can be found in several places in India, most notably at Vaidyanath in Bihar.

Grhastha

(“householder”) In the dharma literature, which gives instruction on religious practice and duties, a grhastha is a “householder.” According to the dharma literature, the grhastha is the second of the four stages of life (ashramas) in the life of a man born into one of the three twice-born groups—brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya—which have the highest religious and social status in Indian society. The householder stage is preceded by that of the brahmacharin or celibate student, and succeeded by the vanaprastha or forest-dweller, and the sanyasi or wandering ascetic. In practical terms, for most men the householder stage is the final stage of life, since most men do not choose to move beyond it. The householder stage begins with marriage, and leads to raising and supporting a family. This stage is an active and fruitful time of life, and the householder is indispensable to society since his labors and resources support those in the other three stages of life. This is also the only stage of life in which sexual intercourse is not explicitly forbidden, since the general fruitfulness of this stage of life is expressed through procreation. A householder is permitted to pursue three of the traditional aims of life (purushartha): wealth (artha), desire (kama), and religious duty (dharma). Given the depth and richness of the householder’s life, it is not surprising that many men have little inclination to move on to the two other stages.

Grhya Sutras

(“aphorisms on domestic [rites]”) The name given to texts that outline correct procedures for domestic religious ceremonies, in particular the daily rites connected with the domestic sacred fire, and the life-cycle rites known as the samskaras. The latter rites span the time before birth to the memorial offerings after death and are still observed by many pious Hindus, although the rites have been modified over time. In theory, a Grhya Sutra should be one part of a Kalpa Sutra, which should also contain prescriptions for Vedic rituals (Shrauta Sutras) and for appropriate human behavior (Dharma Sutras). In reality this doesn’t always seem to be the case, since aside from the three complete surviving Kalpa Sutras, there are at least six other Grhya Sutras, indicating that these texts were composed independently. See also Veda.

Guardians of the Directions

A collection of eight deities, each associated with one of the four cardinal and intermediate directions. In their traditional order, the deities are as follows: Indra for the east; Agni for the southeast; Yama for the south; Nirriti for the southwest; Varuna for the west; Vayu for the northwest; Kubera for the north; and Shiva for the northeast. Most of these are deities who were important in the Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious texts. Except for Shiva, they were replaced as traditions changed and have become minor deities in modern Hindu religious life. These eight deities protect the directions with which they are associated. Each direction also carries certain associations because of its presiding deity. For example, south is generally considered an inauspicious direction because it is associated with Yama, the god of death.

Gudimallam Linga
A particular linga, or symbolic form of the god Shiva. It is reliably dated from the second century B.C.E. and is arguably the oldest existing Hindu image. It is named after the place in which it is found, the village of Gudimallam, which is in the southeastern corner of the state of Andhra Pradesh, near the border with Tamil Nadu. Despite its venerable age, the linga is still enshrined in its original temple and remains an object of worship. The linga itself is a five-foot pillar of polished stone, which bears a four-foot-high carving of Shiva on its front side. The sculptural work is quite detailed and shows several surprising features. Shiva's hair is woven into a turban-like shape, rather than in the usual matted locks. Shiva has only two arms, rather than the multiple arms one commonly finds in later images. He carries a ram in his arms, rather than a deer—the only sculpture in which a ram appears. Finally, the figure of Shiva has no sacred thread (yajnopavit), which became commonplace later. The linga is also notable for the detailed work at the top of the pillar, which exactly models the head of an erect penis. This is also a departure from later iconography, in which the top of the linga is usually smoothly rounded. Although linga worship should be interpreted symbolically as an homage to the power behind the universe, the object's form is clearly phallic.

Guha
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Guha is the king of the Nishadas, a tribe who lived on the banks of the Ganges River. When the god Rama goes into exile with his wife Sita and his younger brother Lakshmana, they pass through Guha's kingdom. Guha arranges for a boat to take them to the other side of the Ganges and personally conveys the three over to the other side. Although Guha is of very low social status, his humble services are accepted because of his sincere devotion to Rama. In the Ramayana of Tulsidas, a later vernacular rendition of the Ramayana that emphasizes the power of devotion, Guha symbolizes how sincere devotion can transcend all social boundaries.

Gujarat
Modern Indian state, located on the Arabian Sea at the border with Pakistan. Gujarat is one of the so-called linguistic states formed after Indian independence to unite government people with a common language and culture (in this case, Gujarati). It was formed in 1960 by splitting what was Bombay into the present states of Gujarat and Maharashtra. Gujarat's presence by the sea has given the area a long history as a trading center, beginning as the port of Lothal in the Indus Valley civilization, one of the earliest, highly developed urban cultures.

Most of the Indians who migrated to Kenya, Uganda, and other parts of East Africa are Gujaratis; substantial numbers of Gujaratis have migrated to the United Kingdom and the United States, especially New York City. Gujarat is also famous as the birthplace of Mohandas Gandhi. The Sabarmati Ashram near the city of Ahmedabad in Gujarat was his home base during much of the struggle for independence. Gujarat is also famous for several prominent holy places:
Dwaraka, which is the site of Krishna's mythical kingdom, as well as the location of the Sharada math of the Dashanami Sanyasis religious community; Somnath, which is one of the twelve sites where Shiva, in his first manifestation as the jyotirlinga, came to earth; and Girnar, which is famous as a dwelling-place for ascetics. For general information about Gujarat and all the regions of India, an accessible reference is Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.

Gujarati
One of the five southern brahmin communities (Pancha Dravida); the other four are the Maharashtris, Karnatas, Andhras, and Dravidas. As their name indicates, the core region for Gujarati brahmins is the modern state of Gujarat.

Gujjar
In traditional northern Indian society, the Gujjars were a jati whose hereditary occupation was herding cattle, buffalo, and other livestock. Jatis were endogamous subgroups in traditional Indian society that were organized (and their social status determined) by the group's hereditary occupation.

Guler
Historical site in the Shiwalik hills, the foothills of the Himalaya Mountains. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries these hills were the home to many small kingdoms, which served as important sites for the development of arts and culture. In Guler, the Pahari style of miniature painting first appeared in its developed form. The developed Pahari style differs from the earlier Rajasthani style in its emphasis on more linear drawing—perhaps influenced by European art—and a more restrained use of color, both of which tend to give the paintings a more lyrical feel.

Guna
("quality") A fundamental concept that originated in the Samkhya philosophical school, but has become one of the key ideas in the Hindu worldview. The word guna literally means "strand," and by extension a "quality," of which there are believed to be three: sattva ("goodness"), rajas ("passion"), and tamas ("darkness"). According to the Samkhyas, in the time before the evolution of prakrti (primal matter), these three qualities were in perfect equilibrium. As mental activity began to disturb the balance, prakrti evolved into the subjective self and the objective world. All things and beings in the world have these three basic qualities, but their nature and tendencies differ according to the differing proportions. The quality sattva is always positive and carries associations with goodness, truth, wholesomeness, health, cognitive thought, and deep-rooted religious life. The quality tamas is always negative and is associated with darkness, ignorance, sloth, spoilage, and death. Rajas can be either positive or negative, depending on the context. It is negative when one becomes a slave to one's passions, blinding one to careful and conscious thought. However, one's passions can also help to engender activity and industriousness. Although much of Samkhya metaphysics has been long discredited, the notion of all things drawing their tendencies from the differing proportion of these three gunas has become an accepted part of Indian culture.

Gupta Dynasty
(ca. 350–550) Northern Indian dynasty whose ancestral homeland was in the lower Ganges River basin. The Gupta capital was initially at Pataliputra, identified with the city of Patna in the modern state of Bihar, but was later moved to the city of Allahabad, which lies at the confluence of the Ganges and Yamuna rivers. At its zenith under Chandra Gupta II, the Guptas controlled all of northern India and modern Pakistan, as well as the eastern Coromandel Coast all the way south to modern Madras. The Gupta reign is associated with an efflorescence of Indian culture, and with the revival of Hinduism in northern India. The force behind both of these trends was the royal patronage of the Gupta kings. According to tradition, one of their court poets was Kalidasa, who is considered the greatest Sanskrit poet. The Guptas are also characterized as ardent devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, a devotion they displayed through temple building and religious endowments. Aside from Chandra Gupta II, the dynasty's most famous rulers were his father Samudra Gupta and his grandfather Chandra Gupta I.

Guptakashi
("hidden Kashi") Village and sacred site (tirtha) in the Himalaya Mountains of the state of Uttar Pradesh. Guptakashi is located on the Mandakini River, one of the Himalayan tributaries that combine to create the Ganges River. The site's charter myth is connected to the Pandavas, the five brothers who are the protagonists of the epic Mahabharata. According to local legend, the Pandavas went to Benares (also known as Kashi) seeking an audience with the god Shiva, but Shiva slipped away and hid in Guptakashi. Guptakashi's two holiest sites are temples to Shiva. At one of these temples, Shiva is worshiped in his form as Vishvanath, the "Lord of the Universe," who is the presiding deity at the most important temple in Benares. The other is dedicated to his form as Ardhanarishvara, in which the left side of the image has female form, dress, and ornamentation, whereas the right side is male. The local claim that Guptakashi is a "hidden" Kashi shows the fluidity of the Indian sacred landscape, in which the sacredness of one place can be appropriated by another. This is a way to claim some of the splendor of Kashi as a sacred site and to attribute power to a much smaller and more remote site.

Gurjara-Pratihara Dynasty
(7th–11th c.) Northern Indian dynasty that filled the political void created by the collapse of the Pushyabhuti dynasty late in the seventh century. Like the Pushyabhutis, the Gurjara-Pratiharas initially had their capital at the city of Kanyakubja, on the Ganges River in eastern part of the state of Uttar Pradesh. At its peak early in the eighth century, the Gurjara-Pratiharas controlled most of the Indian subcontinent north of the Vindhya Mountains, and the Ganges basin well into West Bengal. The dynasty was weakened when the kingdom split in two in the mid-eighth century, with the Gurjaras reigning over the kingdom's western part from their capital at Ujjain and the Pratiharas remaining in Kanyakubja. Both kingdoms were engaged in constant warfare with the Rashtrakuta dynasty, which controlled central India south of the Vindhya Mountains; they were also harassed by Muslim raiders from modern day Afghanistan. The Gurjara kingdom was conquered by the Chandella dynasty in 1019 and became restricted to the lower Ganges basin. It finally disappeared about 1050 C.E.

Guru
(2) Sanskrit term for the planet Jupiter. It is called Guru ("heavy") because it is considered the heaviest and most important planet in one's horoscope.

Guru Maharaj Ji
(b. 1957) Modern religious teacher and founder of the Divine Light Mission. In the early 1970s, Guru Maharaj Ji enjoyed phenomenal but fleeting success during a tour of the United States. Maharaj was the fourth son of Hans Ji Maharaj, a respected religious figure who founded the Prem Nagar Ashram in Haridwar, a sacred city on the Ganges River in the state of Uttar Pradesh. Maharaj's father died when he was eight, after which his mother announced that Maharaj had inherited his father's mantle. As with many modern Hindu missionary figures, Maharaj's religious message stressed the need for devotion to an enlightened master, which he claimed to be. At fourteen, he came to the United States to considerable success. It quickly dissipated when he and his mother disagreed over his lifestyle and his marriage to an American woman. He later reconciled with his family, but not before his mother had named his eldest brother Satpal as successor to the family line.
Guru Purnima
Religious holiday falling on the full moon (purnima) in the lunar month of Ashadh (June–July). Guru Purnima is a day of respect and reverence to one's guru, a word that has historically indicated a religious preceptor, but is used now for any teacher, adviser, or mentor. In the dharma literature, a young man is to spend his adolescence as a member of his guru's household, receiving room, board, and instruction. In return he renders to his guru obedience and loyalty. On Guru Purnima, a guru's students are directed to enshrine and worship their guru as a deity, giving their guru gifts and fees, according to their means. Modern Hindus celebrate this day in various ways, depending on the type of guru they have. Although some religious preceptors are enshrined and worshiped, this practice is not always performed. However, modern Hindus still celebrate this day by paying particular honor and homage to their teachers. This day falls on the full moon, which is associated with completion and perfection—the same qualities that gurus are considered to have. This day is also known as Vyas Purnima, since the sage Vyasa was renowned as a great guru.

Gurutalpaga
("going to the guru's bed") In the dharma literature, which outlined rules for religious duty and appropriate behavior, Gurutalpaga was one of the four great crimes that made one an outcast from society. This particular offense was committed by having sexual relations with the wife of one's guru or religious teacher. Since the disciple is considered a member of the guru's family and must treat the guru with reverence and loyalty, this was obviously a serious breach of trust. Since these disciples are adolescent men and many of their gurus may have had wives much younger than themselves, such proximity could have easily generated serious temptation and required a strict prohibition to maintain appropriate relationships. The gravity of this offense can be seen by the penances prescribed for its expiation (prayashchitta). According to the dharma literature, the offender could either tear off his genitals, or embrace the red-hot statue of a woman while lying on a red-hot iron bed. In either case it was expected that this expiation would result in his death, although the texts always note that death blots out the offense.

Guruvayur
Sacred site (tirtha) in the Thrussoor district in the southern Indian state of Kerala, a short distance inland from the Arabian Sea. Guruvayur is most famous for a temple to the god Vishnu, worshiped in his form as Krishna, and the temple's main image is of Krishna as a young boy just past toddler age. According to the temple's charter myth, the image at Guruvayur was originally at Krishna's mythic kingdom in the city of Dwaraka, on the Arabian Sea in the northern Indian state of Gujarat. When Dwaraka was destroyed by floods, the image was saved from destruction by Guru, the planet Jupiter, and Vayu, the god of wind. These two deities brought the image to Kerala, and in their honor the place was named Guruvayur. Guruvayur's mythic charter also describes the site's power to heal ailments such as rheumatism and leprosy. This healing power is a great attraction in modern times, not only for people with rheumatism, skin diseases, and other afflictions, but also for childless women seeking children and pregnant women seeking an easy delivery and a happy child.

Gyan Vapi
("well of knowledge") A well that is the sole part of the original Vishvanath temple in the city of Benares. The temple's name refers to the god Shiva in his form as Vishvanath, “Lord of the Universe,” and was one of the most sacred Hindu sites in medieval India. In 1669 the armies of the Moghul emperor...
Aurangzeb razed the temple and built a mosque in its place. Although the temple's destruction is usually portrayed as an act of Muslim iconoclasm, according to Gyan Vapi’s account, Aurangzeb may have also intended it as a political message to punish local rebellion. According to local legend, the image of Shiva as Vishvanath was thrown into the well to protect it from desecration, and it remains there to this day.

Gyan Vapi, Battle of Battle reportedly fought in Benares by the Naga ascetic warriors of the Mahanirvani Akhara. According to a handwritten book in the akhara’s archives, in 1664 the akhara’s soldiers won a great victory near the Gyan Vapi well. This document simply states that the Sanyasis were victorious against the forces of "the Sultan," although historians have inferred that this figure was the Moghul emperor Aurangzeb. If the story is true, this battle may have been a contributing factor in Aurangzeb’s decision to raze the Vishvanath temple in 1669.

In light of this claim, it is possible that the temple's destruction was motivated not simply by intolerant iconoclasm, but by the desire to inflict punishment for resistance and rebellion.
Hair
According to traditional Hindu notions regarding purity and impurity (ashaucha), head and facial hair trap and retain ritual impurity. In ordinary cases this impurity is removed by simple washing in running water, just as for the rest of the body. In cases of particularly violent impurity, such as that connected with death (maranashaucha), men will often conclude the period of impurity by completely shaving both their heads and beards. They may also have their nails cut, probably reflecting that conviction that any dispensable parts of the body should be removed as a way to get rid of any residual impurity.

Shaving the head is also the major feature in the chudakarana, the tonsure ceremony that marks the ritual conclusion of infancy to remove any residual impurities left from childbirth. Among adults such head shaving is usually restricted to men; women usually offer a token lock of hair as a symbol for the whole, although women may have their heads shaved to fulfill a religious vow. While shaving the head is fairly common, shaving the body hair is not—the Sanskrit language has different words for these two types of hair, and they are considered to be different things entirely.

Hala
("plow") In Hindu iconography, the branch of study concerned with the representation of various figures, the hala is an ordinary Indian plow, which represents farming; it is also considered a weapon. The hala is most often associated with the avatars of the god Vishnu, but the only figure who always bears it is Krishna's brother Balarama, for whom one of the epithets is Haladhara ("bearing a plow").

Haladhara
("bearing a plow") Epithet of Balarama, elder brother to the god Krishna. Balarama was given this name because of his strong associations with farmers and farming, and also because he occasionally used the plow itself as a weapon.

On one occasion he is said to have menaced the Yamuna River with his plow when he was displeased with the course she was taking. This threat to dig a new channel for her induced the Yamuna her to change her course to one with which Balarama was happier.

Halahala
In Hindu mythology, the name of the deadly poison produced when the gods and demons churn the Ocean of Milk. The gods and demons churn the ocean to produce amrta, the nectar of immortality. Yet their action produces not only the amrta, but also its antithesis, the halahala poison. This is an event of great peril, since if left unchecked this poison is so powerful that it will destroy the earth. The poison is neutralized by the god Shiva, who holds it in his throat without swallowing it. The poison turns his throat blue, hence one of his epithets is Nilakanth, "the blue-throated [one]." See also Tortoise avatar.

Halebid
Village in the southern Indian state of Karnataka, about sixty miles northwest of the city of Mysore. As at its sister city, Belur, Halebid is known for a magnificent collection of temples from the Hoysala dynasty, who ruled western Karnataka from the eleventh to thirteenth centuries C.E. The most notable site at Halebid is the magnificent Hoysaleshvar Temple,
Hampi

Ruins of the city of Hampi. These structures were once a part of the capital of the powerful Vijayanagar empire.

dedicated to Shiva in his form as Lord of the Hoysalas.

At both Belur and Halebid, the temples were built from a particular type of stone—variously described as chlorite schist, steatite, or soapstone—that is quite soft when newly quarried, but gradually hardens with exposure to air. This initial malleability makes the stone easy to carve, and resulted in the lush detail characteristic of Hoysala temples.

Architecturally speaking, Hoysala temples have certain unique features: a central hall connecting three star-shaped sanctuaries, and temple towers (shikharas) composed of well-defined horizontal tiers, rather than the continuous upward sweep characteristic of the northern Indian Nagara architectural style.

Hampi

Deserted city in central Karnataka, about 170 miles northwest of the state's capital, Bangalore. Hampi was the capital of the Vijayanagar empire (1336–1565 C.E.), which at its peak in the early sixteenth century controlled most of the Indian peninsula south of the Narmada River. The empire's wealth primarily stemmed from its control of the spice and cotton trade—both highly valuable commodities at the time—and the city of Hampi was built on a scale to reflect its importance. The empire came to an abrupt end after the battle of Talikota in 1565, when the last Vijayanagar king, Rama Raja, was defeated by a coalition of Muslim sultans from further north in the Deccan. The city was sacked by the invading sultans, and has been deserted ever since. See also Vijayanagar dynasty.

Hamsa

The name for the Barheaded Goose (Anser indicus), a bird with several important symbolic associations; the most significant is purity and transcendence, since the bird's color is largely white. It flies at very high altitudes, and it is reputed to nest in Lake Manasarovar in the high Himalayas, the region believed to be the land of the gods. Since it is popularly believed to be able to separate milk and water—drinking for former, and discarding the latter—the hamsa is also a symbol for a discriminating person, who is able to take counsel from many different people, and to separate the good from the bad.

Perhaps because of these associations, the hamsa is also the name for a particular type of Hindu ascetic. The Hamsa ascetics were described as peripatetic—they were directed to stay no more than one night in a village or five nights in a town. They were also directed to perform different sorts of ascetic practices, such as subsisting on cow’s urine or dung, fasting (upavasa) for a month at a time, or observing the chandrayana rite, a fast in which one increases and decreases one’s food consumption according to the waxing and waning of the moon.

Hanuman
Monkey-headed Hindu god. Hanuman originally appears in the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, where he is described as a minister of the monkey king Sugriva and a devoted servant of Rama, the god-king who is the epic’s protagonist. Despite Hanuman’s seemingly minor place in the Hindu pantheon, he is an enormously popular deity in modern India, because he gives humans a god essentially like themselves (or as they would like to be) but on a greater scale and with greater capacity.

Hanuman is said to have been born of a union between the wind-god, Vayu, and the nymph Anjana. After his birth the infant Hanuman is continually hungry, and one day he attempts to eat the sun. Indra, the king of the gods and ruler of heaven, is incensed at Hanuman’s action, and strikes the infant with a thunderbolt, breaking his jaw (hanu). Vayu becomes very angry upon learning of his son’s injury and ceases to perform his usual activities. Since in Indian physiology winds are responsible for all internal functions—including digestion, respiration, and elimination—Vayu’s strike means that no one can live a normal life. After a short time the gods realize their predicament and beg Vayu for forgiveness; he is placated when each of the gods promises to give Hanuman a divine gift.

By virtue of these divine gifts, Hanuman gains great powers. He is immensely strong, and his image portrays him with bulging muscles. He is also skilled as a healer, both through his skill with herbs and natural medicines, and his magical abilities to protect people from evil supernatural beings. Among his most unusual divine gifts are the power to live as long as he likes and to choose the time of his death.

His greatest virtue, and many would say the real source of his power, is his devotion (bhakti) to Rama. In the Ramayana, Hanuman plays a pivotal role in advancing the story. Hanuman is sent out with a troop of other monkeys to search for Sita, Rama’s kidnapped wife, and after a long and arduous search finally finds her imprisoned in the kingdom of Lanka.
Hanuman plays an even greater role in the Ramcharitmanas (a vernacular version of the Ramayana written by Tulsidas), in which he is transformed from a powerful monkey servant to the devotee (bhakta), whose only aim is to serve Rama with loving devotion. This devotion precludes any type of worldly attachment, including marriage and family, and Hanuman remains a model for a religious lifestyle stressing celibate asceticism. In Indian culture, celibacy is perceived as a source of power, since it prevents the loss of a man's vital forces that takes place with ejaculation.

Yet for Hanuman's devotees, his greatest virtue is not his strength, but his ability to act as an intermediary to Rama, who is usually perceived as far more remote from human affairs. Because Hanuman is also a devotee, people feel an affinity and kinship with him, even though his powers are far greater than theirs. In fact, they believe that messages conveyed by Hanuman have a better chance of reaching Rama's presence and getting action. In a text aptly named the "Letter of Petition" (Vinaya Patrika), the poet-saint Tulsidas appoints Hanuman as his messenger, in the full confidence that his plea will be heard in the divine court. Hanuman's intimate access to divine power, his own undeniable strengths, and his perceived accessibility and sympathy have all combined to make him one of the most widely worshiped deities in India, and one who crosses sectarian boundaries.

Because of his service to Rama, he is usually counted as a Vaishnava or devotee of the Vishnu. Yet in an interesting twist, Hanuman is also considered to be an avatar or "incarnation" of the god Shiva, and is thus revered by the Shaivites, Shiva's devotees. As a protective deity, Hanuman is often worshiped on astrologically inauspicious days, to keep these inauspicious forces at bay. His prodigious strength, celibate lifestyle, and single-minded devotion have made him the patron deity of Indian wrestlers, who strive to imitate him as they train.

Finally, he plays an important role as a healer and sustainer. On one hand, he is famous as an exorcist, helping people get rid of evil spirits. On the other, he preserves life for those who know his special mantra, which gives them the power—as he had—to choose their time of death. Given his importance in modern Hindu life, Hanuman is only now receiving the attention he deserves. For more information see Sudhir Kakar, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1982.

Hanuman Chalisa

("Hanuman's forty") Forty poetic stanzas in praise of the god Hanuman, written in Hindi. A signature line (bhanita) at the end of the text attributes it as written by the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623), best known as the composer of the Ramcharitmanas, a vernacular version of the epic Ramayana.

Short texts like the Hanuman Chalisa are often sung as a devotional act, or as an established part of worship, and in many cases people can recite the text by heart. The text is written in the chaupai meter, the predominant meter in the Ramcharitmanas.

The text begins with a description of Hanuman's physical features, then relates his devotion to Rama and his heroic deeds in the Ramayana. The closing verses reiterate Hanuman's power, promise benefits as a result of the recitation of the verses, and reclaim Tulsidas's wish that Hanuman will reside in his heart.

Hanuman Jayanti

Festival of the god Hanuman's birthday. In southern India, this is celebrated on the full moon in the lunar month of Chaitra (March–April), whereas in northern India it is more commonly celebrated on the fourteenth day of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Kartik (October–November). This latter date reflects the date of Shivaratri, the most important festival of Shiva, which is celebrated on the fourteenth day of the waning half of the month Phalguna (usually in February). The two festivals are associated because Hanuman is sometimes deemed an avatar or “incarnation” of Shiva, come to earth to serve the god-king Rama.

Although Hanuman’s primary mythic importance is as a faithful and powerful servant of Rama, in everyday religious life Hanuman is a very important deity, with a wide following. His birthday has no prescribed celebrations, but usually his devotees (bhakta) often mark it with worship, festive processions, and devotional reading of religious texts, particularly the Hanuman Chalisa and the Ramayana.

Hara
(“taking away,” “Destroyer”) Epithet of the god Shiva. See Shiva.

Harappa
Ancient city and archeological site on the Ravi River in Pakistan, about one hundred miles southwest of the modern city of Lahore. Harappa is one of the cities of the Indus Valley civilization, a highly developed urban culture that flourished in the Indus Valley region between the fourth and third millennia B.C.E. Harappa and Mohenjo-Daro have been the most extensively excavated of these cities, although archeological work is proceeding in some of the others, and the similarities between these different cities have revealed a great deal about this civilization’s material culture.

Hare Krishnas
Colloquial name for the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON). See ISKCON.

Hari
(probably derived from the Sanskrit verb hr, “taking away [evil]”) Epithet of the god Vishnu, particularly in his avatar or “incarnation” as the god Krishna. See Vishnu and Krishna.

Haridasa
(ca. late 16th c.) Poet, singer, and devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna, who founded the sect known as the Haridasis. According to tradition, Haridasa was the teacher of Tansen, the consummate musician at the court of the Moghul emperor Akbar. Most of the songs of Haridasa describe the love between Radha and Krishna. See also Moghul dynasty.

Haridwar
Sacred city (tirtha) on the Ganges River about 140 miles northeast of Delhi. Haridwar is one of India’s Seven Sacred Cities. Dying in one of these cities is believed to ensure the final liberation of one’s soul. It is located on the edge of the Shiwalik Hills, the foothills to the Himalayas, and is the place where the Ganges is believed to leave the mountains and enter the northern Indian plain. As with all the places where the Ganges makes some natural transition, Haridwar is considered especially holy, and has been a pilgrimage destination since at least the sixth century, when the Chinese pilgrim Hsuan Tsang reported enormous pilgrim crowds.

Haridwar’s primary importance is as a bathing (snana) place, and it draws large crowds on festival days. For centuries it has been an important site for performing asthi-visarjana, the last of the funerary rites (antyeshti samskara), in which the ashes of the deceased are immersed in the Ganges. Haridwar is also important as the gateway to the pilgrimage sites in the Garhwal region of the Himalayas, and during the pilgrim season (April–October) it serves as an important transit and supply point to places farther up in the mountains.

Finally, Haridwar has a long history as a dwelling place for ascetics. It is a major center for several ascetic groups, particularly the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, trader-soldiers who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. It also serves as the winter quarters for many ascetics who spend their summers in the Himalayas. The presence of so many ascetics has had a profound effect on the city’s general character, both in the hundreds of ashrams that are spread throughout the city, and in the prohibitions on the sale of eggs, meat, and liquor.

Harihara
(early 14th c.) The founder of the Vijayanagar (“city of victory”) empire, established in 1336, which ruled over much of southern India for the following two centuries. The empire took its name from the capital city that Harihara built near the city of Hampi in the modern state of Karnataka.

As a boy, Harihara was captured by soldiers of the Bahmani sultanate to the north, and had converted to Islam in captivity, which rendered him an outcast in the eyes of traditional Hindus. As a man, Harihara was sent to regain the southern region for the sultanate, but instead used the opportunity to establish his own kingdom. After gaining power, Harihara reconverted to Hinduism, despite having become an outcast through his acceptance of Islam. His example not only shows the fluidity of religious identity in early medieval India, but also Hindu pragmatism in relation to the ruling powers. Although Harihara had earlier become an outcast, his power as ruler gave him the authority to reconvert without orthodox opposition. See also Vijayanagar dynasty.

Harihara
(2) A deity seen as a combination of the gods Hari (Vishnu) and Hara (Shiva). Behind this hybrid deity lay the conviction that both of these divinities were differing manifestations of the same divine power.

This underlying unity was represented in several different ways. One way was to create a figure whose right half had the attributes of Shiva, and whose left half had those of Vishnu. Another method, found most often in modern poster art, is to display both Vishnu and Shiva in their full forms, riding on their respective animal vehicles. Vishnu’s elephant and Shiva’s bull are conjoined at the head, in a way that one can discern the heads of both animals, but only one can be perceived at any given moment. Both the elephant-bull and the divided figure show that Vishnu and Shiva are manifestations of the same divine energy, and that the particular deity one perceives depends on one's perspective at the moment. The joint Harihara figure presents an important religious truth, but this idea is far too abstract to become popular or widespread. In their everyday religious lives people have tended to worship one or the other of these deities, rather than their idealized union.

(“child of God”) Name used by Mohandas Gandhi (1869–1948) to designate those social groups formerly known as untouchables. The name reflected Gandhi's conviction that these people were human beings like any others, and thus children of God.

Unfortunately, the word harijan can also carry a pejorative sense in modern India. It is used for any child whose father is unknown—with the child's paternity ascribed to God—and is thus a euphemism for “bastard.” In modern times, the people whom Gandhi called Harijans prefer to use the name dalit (“oppressed”), since they feel that this more accurately describes their social status.

(mid-17th c.) A noted disciple of Gokulnath (1551–1640 C.E.), the third guru of the Pushti Marg, a religious community founded by his grandfather Vallabhacharya.

Aside from being a disciple, Hariray is considered Gokulnath’s scribe. He is the commentator on a text called the Chaurasi Vaishnavan ki Varta ("Account of eighty-four Vaishnavas"), and probably compiled the text itself under Gokulnath's direction. This text describes the lives of eighty-four Vaishnavas, or devotees (bhakta), of the god Vishnu, all associates and disciples of Gokulnath's father Vitthalnath or his grandfather Vallabhacharya. The text's real purpose is not to provide biographies of these figures, but to illustrate the importance of the Pushti Marg and its leaders. Besides the Chaurasi Vaishnavan ki Varta, a number of poems are also attributed to Hariray, but these may be the work of a later figure.

Harishchandra

In Hindu mythology, a king who is famous for his truthfulness and integrity. In modern Hindu culture, he has become the symbol for someone who patiently endures undeserved suffering.

Harishchandra's suffering is a result of the long-standing feud between the sages Vasishtha—his family priest—and Vishvamitra. When Vasishtha praises the virtue of Harishchandra, Vishvamitra becomes determined to prove him wrong. Disguised as an old brahmin, Vishvamitra conjures up an imaginary son using his magical powers and gets Harishchandra to promise that he will give whatever is necessary for the boy's wedding.

When the time comes to redeem this promise, Vishvamitra demands Harishchandra's kingdom. Vishvamitra expects that the king will balk at this demand, but Harishchandra immediately fulfills it. Vishvamitra then remarks that when giving a gift to a brahmin it is customary to give a gift of money (dakshina) and demands a large sum. To raise this amount, Harishchandra first sells his wife (Chandramati) and son into slavery and finally sells himself to an outcast, who puts him to work burning bodies at the cremation ground.

After enduring these miseries for some time, Harishchandra's son is bitten by a snake and dies. When Chandramati brings the body to be burned, he does not recognize her. He refuses to cremate the boy until the cremation fee is paid, since this will cheat his master of his rightful income. Chandramati has no money for the fee, and after listening to her lamentations Harishchandra recognizes her and becomes doubly miserable. The couple finally decides that suicide is their only escape from their misery and make a pyre on which to burn themselves. When Harishchandra is about to light the pyre, the gods appear before them, praising his righteousness and his commitment to his word, and Harishchandra's outcast master is revealed as dharma ("righteousness") incarnate. Harishchandra's son is restored to life, his kingdom is restored back to him, and everyone lives happily ever after.

Harivamsh
(d. 1552) Poet, singer, and founder of the Radhavallabh religious community, which is based on the figure of Radha. Initially portrayed as the god Krishna's human consort, she was later considered his adulterous mistress. The Radhavallabh community took a very different perspective, stressing Radha's nature as a deity, her equality and identity with Krishna, and her status as his lawful wife. The Radhavallabh community took a very different perspective, stressing Radha's nature as a deity, her equality and identity with Krishna, and her status as his lawful wife. The Radhavallabh community took a very different perspective, stressing Radha's nature as a deity, her equality and identity with Krishna, and her status as his lawful wife. The Radhavallabhs focused on the love (hit) of Radha for Krishna, and because of this emphasis the poet is also known as "Hit Harivamsh."

Harivamsh's poetry treats many of the traditional themes found in Krishna devotionalism, but from the perspective of a female companion (sakhi). He compiled a collection of eighty-four poems known as the Hit-chaurasi, which are notable both for their highly Sanskritized language and for their incorporation of the alamkara ("poetic ornamentation") tradition of earlier Sanskrit poetry. For further information see Charles S. J. White, The Caurasi Pad of Sri Hit Harivams, 1977.

Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics. The Harivamsha is one of the important puranas, which describe the mythology of the Hindu deities, as well as many other facets of popular Hindu life.

In particular, the Harivamsha is devoted to the mythology of the god Krishna (also known as Hari). It is especially important for the traditional stories connected with Krishna's childhood in the Braj region, for which it is the earliest identifiable source. The episodes described in the Harivamsha are further developed in the Bhagavata Purana, a later work that is considered the most influential text for the cult of Krishna.

Harsha
(r. 606–647) Ruler in the Pushyabhuti line, a dynasty whose capital was the city of Kanyakubja in eastern Uttar Pradesh. Harsha is generally considered the greatest Pushyabhuti ruler; he controlled a large part of northern India and to some extent restored the glory of the Gupta dynasty (350–550).

Historically, Harsha's reign is well-documented, in part by the Chinese pilgrim Hsuan Tsang, whose account gives invaluable information about Indian life at that time. Harsha was an able and energetic ruler who spent much of his later life evaluating the condition of his empire. He was also a cultured and literate man—he was the author of three Sanskrit plays—whose court was graced by significant literary figures, especially the playwright Bana. After his death, his kingdom quickly disintegrated when he died without an heir. See also Pushyabhuti dynasty.

Harshacharita
(“The Deeds of Harsha”) A drama written by the playwright Bana (7th c.), which chronicles the emperor Harsha's rise to power. Bana was a member of Harsha's court, and thus a contemporary; his tale contains some evident exaggeration, but also a great deal of historical detail. Bana was a careful observer, and the detailed descriptions in the Harshacharita give significant information about courtly and everyday life in his times.

Hartalika Teej
Hindu women's festival also known as Teej. See Teej.

Haryana
Modern Indian state that surrounds Delhi, the nation's capital, in every direction but the east. Haryana is one of the so-called linguistic states formed after Indian independence, to unite people with a common language and culture (in this case, Hindi) under one state government. Haryana was created in 1966, from the Hindi-speaking regions of the former Punjab state. It has traditionally been an important agricultural region, since the land is fertile and productive, but more recently it has also benefited from the attempt to create “satellite cities” around Delhi, in order to spread out the development in the capital region. These efforts have greatly raised the land values in the areas closest to the capital. Aside from this localized land boom, Haryana is a largely rural state.

Haryana's major religious sites, which are right next to one another, are Kurukshetra and Thanesar. The former is cited as the battleground for the war described in the epic Mahabharata; the latter is named as the place that the god Shiva was worshiped by the Pandavas, the Mahabharata's protagonists.

From a true historical perspective, the level plains around the town of Panipat have seen three decisive battles that influenced the course of Indian history. In 1526, Babar, a central Asian monarch who had been displaced from his own homeland in Afghanistan, crushed the Lodis to end the Lodi dynasty and establish his own Moghul dynasty. In 1556 Babar's grandson Akbar decimated the Sur dynasty, which had temporarily occupied the Moghul capitals at Delhi and Agra, and thus reestablished Moghul rule. In 1761 an invading Afghan army defeated the Marathas, ending the period of Maratha territorial expansion. Hasta (“hand”) In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, a hasta is a particular hand position. In some cases, this hand position may have symbolic meaning, as in varada hasta or the “gift-giving” gesture; in other cases the hasta's name may simply describe the shape of the hand, as in kataka hasta, in which the tips of the fingers are loosely joined to the thumb. In the context of dance, all of these gestures have been given multiple symbolic meanings, and the dancer can use these gestures to tell a story through her gestures.

There is some overlap in meaning between the words hasta and mudra (“seal”), which are both used to describe hand gestures, and the two are sometimes used interchangeably. Of the two, mudras tend to be more strictly defined, and to be far more stylized than hastas. They stress the positions of the fingers, rather than of the entire hand; the fingers are always in very specific positions. Mudras always have very specific symbolic meanings.

Hastinapur
Archeological site about sixty miles northeast of Delhi. This site has yielded pottery and other artifacts believed to be from the ninth to sixth centuries B.C.E., which would make them contemporary with the latest parts of the Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious texts. In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Hastinapur is the capital of the Kauravas, a group of one hundred brothers who are the epic’s antagonists. Although the name of the site and the place named in the epic matches, nothing has been found to provide a connection between these two.

Hatha Yoga
System of religious discipline (yoga) based on a series of bodily postures known as asanas. Practicing this yoga is widely believed to provide various physical benefits, including increased bodily flexibility and the ability to heal chronic ailments. Yet in the Yoga Sutras written by Patanjali, the earliest systematic treatment of yoga, these asanas are only one part of an eight-step program that also includes such practices as breathing exercises and meditation. The purpose of hatha yoga is to train and strengthen the body so that the practitioner can sit comfortably in meditation. Although Hatha yoga’s emphasis is on the body, it assumes a spiritual and religious context that in contemporary times has often been either evaded or ignored—leading some Hindus to disparage such yoga as simply a technique to develop better sexual control.

A more esoteric meaning of hatha yoga comes from the Nathpanthi ascetics, who understand hatha yoga as referring to processes in the subtle body. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system believed to reside on a different plane of existence than the actual body, but with certain correspondences to the actual body. It is visualized as a set of six psychic centers (chakras) running roughly along the course of the spine; above and below these centers are found the two divine principles, Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power), the latter as the latent spiritual energy known as kundalini. The aspirant aims to combine kundalini with the Shiva principle at the crown of the head; through this union, the physical body will become immortal.

According to the Nathpanthis, the phoneme ha refers to the sun, a symbol for Shakti, and the phoneme tha to the moon, which is a symbol of Shiva. Hatha yoga is interpreted as the union of the sun and moon—that is, these two centers of power are believed to exist in the subtle body.

Heavens
In Hinduism, there are believed to be many additional planes of existence besides the visible earthly realm. These other planes of existence include the heavens, which are realms of reward, pleasure, and enjoyment. Beings are born in heaven as a reward for their past good deeds, and the life of the gods living in these heavens is invariably described as long and pleasurable. Yet heaven is not permanent, and when one’s karmic merit is exhausted and one’s stay in heaven is done, one inevitably descends from heaven to take birth in a lower form.

In general, heaven is viewed as a distraction to serious religious life. Birth in heaven comes only through accumulating and expending an enormous amount of religious merit generated by past good deeds, and thus is a tremendous drain on one’s accumulated spiritual resources. Furthermore, once one has been born in heaven, life is so easy and carefree that people generally feel no inclination to engage in religious life. For both reasons, life in heaven is considered a goal to which people should not aspire.

Hedgewar, Dr. K. B.
(1889–1940) Founder and first supreme leader (sarsanghchalak) of the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (rss), which he formed in the central Indian city of Nagpur in 1925. The rss is a conservative Hindu organization formed for the express purpose of providing leadership for a revitalized Hindu India; for most of its history it has characterized its mission as cultural, rather than religious or political.
The character of Dr. Hedgewar and the RSS are inextricably linked to the turbulent years immediately after World War I, and the profound dislocation in Indian society that came with the struggle for independence. In his youth, Hedgewar had been involved in the independence movement, and for some time even supported Mohandas Gandhi’s Congress Party. But by the early 1920s, he had become disillusioned with Gandhi’s methods. He had also been deeply influenced by the Hindu nationalist Vinayak Damodar Savarkar, whose central thesis was that the Hindus were a nation, despite their profound regional, social, linguistic, and religious differences.

On the festival of Vijaya Dashami (Dussehra) in 1925, Hedgewar formed the RSS to help create this Hindu nation by unifying Hindus previously separated by divisions of caste and class. This date is highly significant, since according to popular Hindu belief any endeavor begun on Vijaya Dashami will invariably succeed. Hedgewar led the RSS until his death, fifteen years after the organization was founded.

Aside from training a leadership corps, the RSS was also formed to protect Hindu interests. On one level, it endeavored to do this by developing more assertive, tough members, and by training them to use traditional weapons such as the wooden staff. On quite another level, the RSS has a long history of charitable work with refugees and victims of natural disasters, and one of its missions is service to the Hindu community.

In either case the RSS has often been perceived as anti-Muslim—until 1977, non-Hindus were barred from being members—and many of its members view the Muslim community as aliens in India, if not actual enemies. Throughout his life, Hedgewar kept the RSS strictly aloof from politics, and his insistence that it was a cultural and character-building organization helped keep it from being banned by the British. Under its banner as a cultural organization, the RSS spread from the state of Maharashtra to other parts of India, aided in part by deteriorating Hindu-Muslim relations in the years prior to independence in 1947. For further information see Walter K. Andersen and Shridhar D. Damle, The Brotherhood in Saffron, 1987; Tapan Basu et al., Khaki Shorts and Saffron Flags, 1993; and Christophe Jaffrelot, The Hindu Nationalist Movement in India, 1996.

Hells
In Hinduism there are believed to be many additional planes of existence besides the visible earthly realm. These alternate planes of existence include the hells, which are conceived of as places of punishment for one’s past misdeeds.

Traditional Hindu accounts describe the hells in great detail, often linking particular sorts of punishments to particular sinful actions. Just as with heavens, life in a hell is ultimately an impermanent state, although the time of punishment is usually described as enormously long and incredibly painful. Still, when the time of punishment is done and one’s bad deeds have been expiated, one will be reborn in a higher form.

Needless to say, birth in any of the hells is something to be avoided if at all possible, and for this reason people are urged to perform penances (prayashchitta) for their sins while they are still living, so that the consequences of these sins may not burden them in their next lives.

Hemp
Colloquial name for Cannibus indica, more commonly known as marijuana. In earlier times the plant’s long fibers were used in the manufacture of rope and cloth. In contemporary times it is mainly used for its narcotic properties, either by crushing and processing the leaves to make bhang or by collecting the plant’s resins as hashish (charas).
The use of hemp as a narcotic is illegal, except for specific places and times, including certain pilgrimage sites and festivals. However, many ascetics continue to smoke hashish regularly.

Hero-Stones
Monuments erected on the site where a person met a heroic death. These stones are known as viragal. See viragal.

Hetu
("reason") In Indian philosophy, this is an important part of formulating an inference (anumana). In this context, the word has two differing meanings, one general, the other more obscure.

The accepted form for an inference has three terms: a hypothesis (pratijna), a reason (hetu), and examples (drshtanta); each of these three have their own constituent parts. In its most general sense, the word hetu refers to the reason or evidence that supports the assertion in the initial hypothesis. For example, the hypothesis that a mountain is on fire would be supported by the reason that there is smoke on the mountain.

In a narrower sense, hetu can also refer to the part of a reason that proves the hypothesis. For example, if one proves the statement “the mountain is on fire” with the reason “the mountain has smoke,” the part of the reason that indicates that there is smoke is the hetu.

Hetvabhasa
This is the term for a fallacious argument. For a valid inference (anumana), certain conditions must be met, or the inference will be invalid. The accepted form for an inference has three central terms: the first is a hypothesis (pratijna), which contains a subject class (paksha) and a thing to be proved (sadhya); the second is a reason (hetu) giving evidence for the hypothesis; and last come examples (drshtanta), which give further evidence for the hypothesis. In the stock example, the hypothesis that “there is fire on this mountain” is making a certain claim (sadhya)—namely, that there is fire—about a certain class of things (paksha)—namely, this mountain. The inference's second part gives the reason (hetu) “because there is smoke on this mountain,” which also makes a claim about the subject class—namely, this mountain.

One condition necessary for a valid inference is the subject class to fall within the reason given, so that in all cases the reason would apply to it. The statement “there is fire on this mountain because there is smoke on that mountain” is an example where the subject class and the reason given are clearly separate.

Yet the most important condition for a valid inference is that the reason given must account for every case of the thing to be proved, such that it cannot be explained in any other way. This is known as pervasion (vyapti) and is a critical test for the hetu. For the Indian logicians, claiming that smoke implied the presence of fire was a valid inference, since smoke was always produced by fire.

On the other hand, the claim that fire implied the presence of smoke was invalid. This was because the logicians could name a case in which fire was not invariably accompanied by smoke, and thus failing this requirement of “pervasion”—the case of the red-hot iron ball, which was considered fiery, but not smoky. This counterexample is known as an upadhi ("obstruction"). It gives an example when one thing does not inevitably bring another, and thus shows that the hetu fails to pervade the sadhya, since there is a class of fiery things that do not smoke. For further information see Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India’s Philosophies, 1972.

Hijra
Name for a class of male transvestites, most of whom have undergone self-castration as a ritual renunciation of their sexuality. Hijras often serve as homosexual prostitutes, and they are an established feature of the decadent underside in most Indian cities. Their most important social function is to sing and dance at houses in which a male child has been born, although they may also be called to perform on other auspicious occasions.

Their ritual role in connection with births shows a strong association with fertility, and at any function their presence is believed to confer health and prosperity on the sponsoring family, for which the hijras will demand appropriate compensation. At the same time, the life of the hijras seems fraught with contrary notions: Although they are ritually associated with fertility, they are themselves sterile, and their sexuality is non-procreative. Though they are associated with auspiciousness and prosperity, they are a socially marginal group with very low social status. For the only reliable study to date, see Serena Nanda, Neither Man Nor Woman, 1999.

Himachal Pradesh
("Himalayan State") Modern Indian state located in the Himalayan region between the state Jammu and Kashmir and the kingdom of Nepal. Himachal Pradesh was created in 1966 when the former state of Punjab was divided into Punjab, Haryana, and Himachal Pradesh. As its name implies, Himachal Pradesh is a mountain state, with its lower regions in the Shiwalik Hills and its upper regions in the high Himalayas. Most of the state's people live in the long, fertile river valleys between the mountain ranges, and in the hot season its hill stations provide welcome relief from the scorching heat.

Himachal is the home for seven of the nine Shiwalik goddesses. These seven goddesses are all the presiding deities of a particular site, and some of them have become quite important in northern Indian religious life. Himachal Pradesh is also home to a spectacular Dussehra festival in the town of Kulu, at which all the gods in the Kulu Valley are brought to Kulu to honor the god Rama on his victory over the demon-king Ravana. For general information, an accessible reference is Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.

Himalaya
A minor deity who is the personified form of the Himalaya Mountains. Although the Himalaya Mountains are one of the defining features of the Indian subcontinent, the deity Himalaya has a very insignificant place in Indian mythology. His most important role is as the father of the goddess Parvati, who when she reaches maturity is married to the great god Shiva. Himalaya is described as exceedingly wealthy, because of the mineral riches that the mountains contain. See also Himalayas.

Himalayas
("abode of the snow") Mountain range that arcs across the northern border of India, although the only Indian states with significant Himalayan regions are Jammu and Kashmir, Himachal Pradesh, Uttar Pradesh, and, further east, Sikkhim.
In a Hindu religious context, the Himalayan regions in the first three states are the most significant; the mountains in these three contiguous states are all part of an extended Himalayan cultural region, fronted by the Shiwalik Hills. They are considered sacred, both as the literal abode of the Hindu gods (in particular Shiva, who is believed to live on Mount Kailas) and also as the source of sacred rivers such as the Ganges, Yamuna, and Indus. These high mountains are also a traditional home for Hindu ascetics wishing to renounce the everyday world and search for personal spiritual realization; the physical hardships these ascetics must endure in the mountains are also believed to generate spiritual power.

Given their religious importance, the Himalayas are full of sacred sites (tirthas); among the most important are Amarnath, Yamunotri, Gangotri, Kedarnath, Badrinath, and Nanda Devi.

Hindi
Modern Indian language classified as a member of the Indo-European language family; Hindi is the “official” language of the Republic of India. Hindi is spoken throughout most of northern and central India as a second or “link” language and as a “mother” tongue in much of the states of Uttar Pradesh and Madhya Pradesh. It is also one of the broadcast languages for the television and radio networks run by the Indian government and by virtue of these mediums can be found throughout the nation.

As with many of India’s regional languages, Hindi has a long history as a literary language, particularly in an earlier version known as Braj Bhasha, which was the dominant language in which northern Indian devotional (bhakti) poetry was written. The slow demise of Sanskrit in contemporary times has helped make Hindi an important language for fiction, learned scholarship, and writing on Indian culture.

In modern India, speaking a certain language often carries political implications, since an important factor in preserving regional identities has been the stress on maintaining one’s regional language. For this reason, many people are not about to let Hindi replace their regional languages. This sentiment is particularly marked in southern India, where the imposition of the Hindi language is decried as a new form of imperialism.

Hindu Mahasabha
Hindu religious and political organization, formed at the 1915 Kumbha Mela, a gigantic religious festival. The Hindu Mahasabha was originally formed to help foster Hindu causes, such as a call for a complete ban on cow slaughter, promoting the use of the Hindi language in the DevaNagari script, and addressing the problem of caste discrimination.

In the early 1920s, the movement became more overtly political and by the early 1930s espoused an unabashed Hindu nationalism, exemplified by its leader, Vinayak Damodar Savarkar. The dark underside of this Hindu nationalist crusade was a pronounced animus toward Muslims, which was only strengthened by the deteriorating relations between the two communities in the years preceding World War II.

Although the Hindu Mahasabha was eager for official recognition by the ruling British government and sought to be recognized as the sole legitimate speaker for the Hindu community, these hopes were never realized. The British government included them in talks only after negotiations with the Indian National Congress Party had broken down, and cut relations with the Mahasabha after fences had been mended with the Congress.

After independence in 1947, the party’s image was damaged by its association with Mohandas Gandhi’s assassin, Nathuram Godse. It continued to field political candidates until the early 1960s, but never gained significant political power. For further information see Kenneth W. Jones, “Politicized Hinduism: The Ideology and Program of the Hindu Mahasabha,” in Robert D. Baird (ed.), Religion in Modern India, 1998.

Hindutva

(“Hindu-ness”) An idea first propounded by the political activist Vinayak Damodar Savarkar. It first appeared in a pamphlet titled Hinduutva/Who is a Hindu? and is the fundamental basis of modern Hindu nationalism.

Savarkar’s thesis was that the Hindus were a nation, despite their sharp regional, cultural, linguistic, and religious differences; furthermore, he defined a Hindu as anyone who considered India both fatherland and holy land. This loose definition was broad enough to encompass all of the variety found in Indian Hindu culture. But it was also clearly reaching for the lowest common denominator. For most Indians, identity is invariably based on concrete regional, linguistic, or sectarian grounds, rather than an abstract notions of being “Hindu.”

Yet it is important to note who this loose definition excludes—Muslims and Christians, India’s most visible minorities, who are marginalized by virtue of their “alien” holy lands. By this definition, Hindus “belong” in India simply by virtue of who they are, whereas Muslims and Christians, no matter how long their families may have lived in India, are always considered to be outsiders.

Hindutva ideology is a fundamental assumption of the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), a contemporary conservative Hindu organization, and the organizations that are affiliated with the rss, particularly the Vishva Hindu Parishad, and to a lesser extent the Bharatiya Janata Party. Hindutva ideals are also a prominent feature of parties such as the Shiv Sena, which combine Hindu and regional identity. For further information see Christophe Jaffrelot, The Hindu Nationalist Movement in India, 1996.

Hinglaj

Sacred site (tirtha) located on the coast of the Arabian Sea in the Baluchistan Province of modern Pakistan. Hinglaj is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites located throughout the subcontinent that are sacred to the goddess Sati. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess fell to earth, and then took form as a different goddess; in the case of Hinglaj, the body part was the crown of Sati’s head. Hinglaj is the furthest west of all the Shakti Pithas, and thus represents the furthest boundaries of the traditional Hindu cultural area.

The presiding goddess at Hinglaj is known by various names, the most common being Hinglaj Devi. She is considered an extremely powerful goddess—partly because of her dangerous location on the periphery of India, but also because the crown of the head (brahmarandhra) is considered the highest and most powerful part of the subtle body.

The subtle body is an alternate physiological system believed to reside on a different plane of existence than the actual body, but with certain correspondences to the actual body. It is visualized as a set of six psychic centers (chakras) running roughly along the course of the spine. Above and below these centers are found the two divine principles, Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power)—the latter at the base of the spine, and former in the crown of the head.

Because of Hinglaj’s association with mastery of the subtle body, a visit to her shrine was considered essential for anyone striving for perfection in yoga. By the 1800s the area around her shrine had become completely dominated by Muslims and thus well outside the Hindu culture area. To travel outside of this area is to risk loss of one's Hindu identity. To counter the danger of traveling outside this area, it became traditional for ascetics who had gone there on pilgrimage to be branded with her symbol on their return to India, as a way to purify them and remake them as Hindus. The political tensions between India and Pakistan since their independence in 1947 have made it almost impossible for Hindu pilgrims to visit the shrine. For further information see George Weston Briggs, Gorakhnath and the Kanphata Yogis, 1973. See also pitha.

Hiranyagarbha
One of the earliest Hindu cosmological myths. See Golden Embryo.

Hiranyakashipu
In Hindu mythology, Hiranyakashipu is a demon king who is killed by the god Vishnu, in his avatar or incarnation as a Man-Lion. As a result of his harsh physical asceticism, Hiranyakashipu gains a series of divine powers, which render him virtually invulnerable: notable of these powers is that he cannot be killed by man or beast, by day or by night, and neither inside nor outdoors.

Protected by these powers, Hiranyakashipu first conquers the entire earth and then drives the gods from heaven, growing prouder and more oppressive as his power increases. He particularly oppresses his son Prahlada, who despite his father's power remains a sincere devotee (bhakta) of Vishnu. Incensed at the thought that someone refuses to worship him, Hiranyakashipu finally gives Prahlada the ultimatum to worship him or die.

Prahlada calls on Vishnu for help, and Vishnu appears in the form of a Man-Lion—a man from the torso down, with the head and shoulders of a lion—which is neither man nor beast. The Man-Lion seizes Hiranyakashipu in the palace doorway, which is neither inside nor out, at twilight, which is neither day nor night, and uses his sharp claws to tear out the demon's entrails, killing him. The story of Hiranyakashipu is meant to illustrate the danger of pride, and the mythic reality that no power, however powerful, can keep one from the consequences of one's evil deeds.

Hiranyakeshin
(4th c. B.C.E.?) Sage, writer, and commentator, also considered a disciple of the writer Apastamba. Apastamba is the author of a type of text known as a Kalpa Sutra. He is only one of three authors, along with Baudhayana and Hiranyakeshin, whose surviving works contain all three elements prescribed for a Kalpa Sutra: prescriptions for Vedic rituals (Shrauta Sutras), for domestic rites (Grhya Sutras), and for appropriate human behavior (Dharma Sutras).

All three of these men belonged to the same school, the Taittiriya school of the Black Yajur Veda. According to tradition, Baudhayana was the oldest, Apastamba his disciple, and Hiranyakeshin Apastamba's disciple. This chronology is supported by the texts themselves, since Baudhayana's text is much less organized than the others, and more archaic in its language.

Hiranyaksha
In Hindu mythology, Hiranyaksha is a demon king who is killed by the god Vishnu, in the latter's avatar or incarnation as a Boar. Hiranyaksha has performed harsh physical ascetic practice (tapas) and as result, gained various divine powers. He eventually grows so powerful and proud that he spirits away the earth herself, hiding her at the bottom of the cosmic ocean. It is at such times of cosmic crisis that Vishnu takes form on earth, to restore the equilibrium of the cosmos through his actions. Vishnu takes the form of a giant boar and dives to the bottom of the ocean, where he slays Hiranyaksha, places the earth on the tip of his tusk, and lifts her from the waters. With the reappearance of the earth, the process of creation resumed. See also Boar avatar.

Hitopadesha
("beneficial teaching") A well-known moralistic story that is drawn from Panchatantra, a set of moralistic fables aimed at conveying practical and worldly wisdom. The Hitopadesha was compiled in the twelfth century as an introductory reader to Sanskrit.

The frame story for the both of these texts describes a king who is distressed by his sons' lack of learning and good moral character; these doubts lead to grave misgivings about their abilities to be good and fair rulers after his death. He resolves this problem by hiring a teacher who teaches the boys using fables, often with several shorter fables embedded in a longer tale. The Hitopadesha was intended to give pragmatic advice about how to be successful in the real world and maintains that caution and self-interest are the keys to success in life.

Holi
Major religious festival celebrated on the full moon in the lunar month of Phalgun (February–March), which in northern India comes very close to the end of the lunar year. Holi is essentially a festival of reversal and is celebrated with great enthusiasm throughout much of India. As the lunar year's final major festival, the celebrations for Holi mirror the pattern of cosmic dissolution found in other units of time, whether the solar day or the basic unit of cosmic time, the mahayuga. In this pattern, the order in the cosmos steadily deteriorates until all order finally disappears, but after a certain time is suddenly, completely, and perfectly reformed.

The festival of Holi is celebrated in two parts: a bonfire on the evening before Holi, and the “festival of colors” on the morning of Holi itself. Material for the bonfire is collected in the weeks before Holi and although the things put on this bonfire pile are supposed to be old and worn-out (with the symbolism of getting rid of the old), much newer things are often put on it as well, and this is a time in which people guard their possessions carefully.

The days before Holi see the breakdown of various social taboos. In his The Divine Hierarchy, author Lawrence Babb reports the use of obscenity and bawdy discourse during this time, including stamping the word “penis” all over town using stamps carved from potatoes. As Holi gets closer, pranks such as pelting passersby with water balloons become more and more common. Such behavior is ultimately harmless, but is still completely unacceptable in ordinary times and symbolizes the coming cosmic dissolution. On the night of Holi, the bonfire is lit, symbolizing the destruction of the old, and people may direct obscenities toward the fire as a vehicle for getting rid of enmities from the previous year. Mythologically, the bonfire comes from the burning of the demon Holika, who tries to trick her brother Prahlada into being burned on a bonfire, but is herself consumed by the flames.

The morning after the bonfire is the high point of Holi, the “festival of colors.” For weeks before Holi, the shops in the markets display mounds of powders in various colors, most commonly in vivid greens, reds, and purple; the colors are used as powder, or are mixed with water. People play with the colored water using syringes or balloons. In the gentlest type of play, each person takes a small pinch of colored powder and gently applies it to the other person’s forehead. Needless to say, the play with colors can often become much rougher, with people smearing and soaking each other with colors, dyeing each other’s clothing in multiple hues, and often staining the skin for weeks afterward.
The evening before the festival of Holi, men in Delhi arrange colored powders to prepare the site for a bonfire.
This and all other Holi-related antics are always described as “play” (khel), and the operating assumption is that one cannot become angry with the people with whom one is playing, no matter how outrageous the behavior or how pointed the insults. The festival of Holi is the one day in the year when the boundaries of the usual social hierarchy are completely disregarded, along with the taboos on physical touching that are primarily based on the inherent concern for ritual purity. Another characteristic of Holi is that it is one of the few occasions when socially respectable people consume bhang, an intoxicating preparation made from ground-up marijuana.

The morning passes in a welter of noise, confusion, and color, with (at street level) absolutely no rules, symbolizing the chaos of cosmic dissolution. Yet in the afternoon, cosmic (and social) order are suddenly restored. People take baths, change into new clothes, and go out visiting without fear of being colored, and any person bold enough to pelt someone with dyes at this time is subject to severe disapproval.

In recent times, particularly in the larger cities, the license associated with Holi has been taken as an opportunity for all sorts of antisocial behavior: public drunkenness, molesting women, destroying property, and the chance to settle old grudges by physically harming people. The chaos is so intense that in larger cities many people stay in their houses on Holi, “playing” with members of their immediate family in the gentler spirit that is characterized as “true” Holi.

Given the threat to public order, the government has taken some action, but the very nature of the holiday makes it difficult to regulate—since it is a festival of reversal, the government is one more force to be disregarded on that morning. Various government agencies have also tried to discourage the practice of making bonfires, although here the concern stems from worries about deforestation rather than the breakdown of social order. For further information see McKim Marriot, “The Feast of Love,” in Milton Singer (ed.), Krishna: Myths, Rites, and Attitudes, 1966; and Lawrence Babb, The Divine Hierarchy, 1975.

Holika

In Hindu mythology, the wicked sister of the demon-king Hiranyakashipu. Holika helps Hiranyakashipu try to kill his son Prahlada, who is a steadfast devotee (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. Because of a divine power, she cannot be harmed by fire. She tricks Prahlada into sitting on her lap in a bonfire, expecting that she will be unharmed and he will die. Fortunately Vishnu transfers her power from Holika to Prahlada, and she is consumed by the fire, while he remains completely unscathed.

The myth of the burning of Holika is the model for the bonfires for the festival of Holi. On a mythic level, the bonfire symbolizes the triumph of good over evil; on another level, since the materials in the fire are supposed to be old and broken things, the bonfire symbolizes getting rid of one’s baggage from the previous year, and starting anew.

Holkar, Ahalya Bai

(r. 1761–1795) Hindu queen in the Holkar dynasty. The family ruled one of the successor states resulting from the breakup of the Maratha empire, whose capital was in the central Indian city of Indore.

She came to power at a time when the influence of the Moghul dynasty had been greatly reduced and moved to fill the political vacuum that this created. During her long reign she managed to wield genuine political power over much of north-central India. She also served as a highly visible royal patron at several Hindu pilgrimage sites, including Benares, where she funded the reconstruction of the Vishvanath temple, and Haridwar, where she is said to have paid for the construction of a ghat, which is a structure that leads to a sacred bathing (snana) area. For further
Homa

In its most specific meaning, homa refers to the “sacrifice to the gods” (devayajna), which is one of the Five Great Sacrifices (panchamahayajna) prescribed in the dharma literature, or texts on religious duty. Homa refers to the act of making offerings of clarified butter into a sacrificial fire, a rite that is directed toward satisfying the gods. Today, the word homa is often used with a far more general meaning, to refer to any religious rite in which offerings are placed in the sacred fire.

Homosexuality

Although homosexuality is not unknown in Indian culture, it has never had a very prominent presence. The Kama Sutra contains a brief account of homosexual oral sex and the classes of men who performed this, but it is little more than a passing mention.

In modern times, the male transvestites known as hijras often serve as homosexual prostitutes, and they are an accepted if marginal presence in Indian life.

Although according to the dominant Hindu ethos the search for pleasure—of any kind—is an aim of life (purushartha), other factors have channeled the expression of sexual desire in other directions, especially toward traditional marriage. One of these is the general desire for progeny, particularly sons; another is the notion of the family as the basic unit for social life. In addition, the traditional male concern with losing vitality through seminal emission is a reason to abstain from sexual relations. Finally, the cultural assumption that ultimate wisdom comes only when one has renounced all desires would have affected sexual desire of all kinds.

Hookswinging

One of the more extreme vows performed by devotees (bhakta) of the god Skanda during the annual pilgrimage at Kataragama, in the southern part of the island of Sri Lanka. This vow is performed in return for finding healing from physical ailments or deliverance from distress. Those keeping this vow inserted hooks into their back and thigh muscles; ropes are attached to these hooks, and the devotees are suspended over the heads of passersby.

These ardent devotees are reportedly rewarded for their suffering with a state of ecstasy in which they feel no pain and suffer no bleeding. In this state, they are also believed to be mouthpieces for the god Skanda, and other pilgrims seek their advice for every conceivable kind of problem. For further information see Paul Wirz, Kataragama: The Holiest Place in Ceylon, 1966; and Bryan Pfaffenberger, “The Kataragama Pilgrimage,” in Journal of Asian Studies, Vol. 28, No. 2, 1979.

Hotr

Type of priest mentioned in the Brahmana literature, one of the later strands in the sacred literature known as the Vedas. The Brahmanas largely functioned as manuals describing how to perform sacrificial rites—which primarily involved burning offerings in a sacred fire. These rites were so complex that they required specialized ritual technicians: the hotr, the adhvaryum, the udgatr, and brahman. Of these, the hotr was the sacrificial priest who recited the verses from the Rg Veda that were used in the sacrifice.
House of Clay
Realm of punishment described in a verse in the Rg Veda (7.89), the earliest Hindu religious text. As described in this verse, the House of Clay is a place to which evildoers—particularly those guilty of speaking falsely—will be sent by the god Varuna, who is considered the guardian of righteousness and cosmic order (rta).

As its name indicates, the House of Clay is a gloomy and joyless place. What is notable in the original verse is the lack of any notion of reincarnation (samsara), which later became a central Indian assumption. At the time it was seen as an undesirable and permanent state after death.

House of Lac
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, this is one of the stratagems through which the epic’s antagonist, Duryodhana, tries to kill the five Pandava brothers, who are his cousins and the epic’s protagonists. Duryodhana builds the Pandavas a magnificent palace, without telling them that it is constructed completely of lac, a highly flammable substance. After the Pandavas have settled into the palace, Duryodhana has his minions set it on fire in an effort to burn them alive. The Pandavas are saved by the sagacity of their uncle Vidura, who not only warns them of the danger, but has constructed an underground passage allowing them to escape from the house and a tunnel to convey them far away without being discovered. When the house is set afire, the Pandavas escape through the tunnel and for some time are safe from Duryodhana, since they are presumed to have died in the fire.

Hoysala Dynasty
(11th–14th c.) Southern Indian dynasty that ranged over the southern part of the southern Indian state of Karnataka. The capital city was Dorasamudra, which is now called Halebid.

The Hoysalas were originally hill chiefs who were vassals to the Chalukyas (a central Indian dynasty that ruled from the seventh to eighth century C.E.), but who became independent in 1093. At their peak they ruled much of the states of Karnataka and northern Tamil Nadu, but by the beginning of the fourteenth century had seen their power decline. By the middle of the century, their kingdom had been annexed by the Sangamas, whose capital was at Vijayanagar.

The Hoysalas are most famous for the magnificent temples they constructed at the cities of Belur and Halebid, which are treasure-houses of medieval southern Indian sculpture.

Hoysaleshvar Temple
Largest and most magnificent of the Hoysala temples at Halebid, the dynasty’s capital city; the temple itself was built in 1141–1182. The Hoysaleshvar Temple is dedicated to the god Shiva, in his form as “Lord of the Hoysalas.”

Hoysala temples were built from a particular type of stone—variously described as chlorite schist, steatite, or soapstone—that is quite soft when newly quarried, but gradually hardens with exposure to air. This initial malleability makes the stone easy to carve and facilitated the lush detail characteristic of Hoysala temples. The Hoysaleshvar Temple is known for the quantity of lush detail, which surpasses other Hoysala temples. See also Hoysala dynasty.

Hrshikesha
(“Lord of the Senses”) Epithet of the god Vishnu, particularly in his avatar or incarnation as the god Krishna. See Vishnu and Krishna.

Hsuan Tsang
(605–664) Chinese Buddhist scholar and translator, whose account of his extended stay in India (629–645) provides one of the few reliable sources for Indian life in that period.

Hsuan Tsang’s purpose in coming to India was to find reliable copies of the Buddhist scriptures, which had become severely garbled and corrupted during their transmission to China. He was a highly learned man and during his stay spent years studying in Buddhist educational institutions, particularly the Buddhist university at Nalanda. He traveled all over northern India and because of his piety and learning was honored by the kings he met, including the Emperor Harsha. For further information see his Si-yu-ki: Buddhist Records of the Western World, Samuel Beal (trans.), 1969.

Huhu
In Hindu mythology, Huhu is a particular gandharva, or celestial musician. He has the misfortune to displease a Hindu sage, when his amorous water play with some celestial damsels breaks the sage’s meditation. The sage curses Huhu to become a giant crocodile, and he remains in this state for many years. The crocodile preys on the creatures in the lake, and one day seizes the leg of a giant elephant. This elephant is really King Indradyumna, who has also assumed this form as the result of a curse. The elephant and the crocodile struggle for one thousand years, so evenly matched that neither can best the other. Huhu is finally released from his curse when the god Vishnu himself comes down from heaven and kills him. See also Gajendramoksha.

Human Sacrifice
The practice of human sacrifice was uncommon in the history of Hindu religious life, but not unknown. One of the common mythic motifs in the worship of certain fierce and powerful deities is for devotees (bhakta) to offer their own heads to the Goddess as the ultimate sacrifice and act of devotion, but experts are uncertain how frequently this rite was performed. One mythic example of this is the demon-king Ravana, who cuts off nine of his ten heads before the god Shiva grants him divine power. The resolve to commit this action is also attributed to the Bengali saint Ramakrishna, although the goddess Kali intervened before he could carry it out.

The one place where human sacrifice was undoubtedly a regular practice was at the temple of the goddess Kamakhya in Assam. This temple is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the Goddess that spreads throughout the subcontinent. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess. In this case, the body part was Sati’s vulva, and the presence of such a highly charged part of the female body made Kamakhya a very powerful goddess.

When the new temple was dedicated in 1565, she was reportedly offered the heads of 140 men, and this practice continued until the British halted it in 1832. The men offered as human sacrifices were reportedly volunteers, who believed that they had been called by her to do this; in the time between announcing their intention to be sacrificed and their deaths they were treated as virtual divinities, since they were considered to have been consecrated to the goddess. For further information see E. A. Gait, A History of Assam, 1963. See also pitha.

Humors, Bodily
See tridosha.

Hundi
In earlier times, the name for a letter of credit issued from a mercantile house. By the early 1800s, these letters functioned as a virtual currency, since in some cases they would pass through twenty or thirty transactions before being returned for payment. Hundis are significant because they allowed families to transact business over large areas without having to actually carry large sums of money with them and thus helped to foster long distance trade.

In modern times, this is also the most common term for a temple collection box, where visitors deposit their offerings.

Hygiene
Orthoprax Hindus (that is, Hindus who stress correct religious practice) lay great stress on cleanliness of their bodies and their immediate environment. Although to the outside eye this scrupulous attention would seem to indicate a concern for hygiene, these actions are performed primarily to protect and retain religious purity.

In many cases, concerns for hygiene and purity overlap, as in the pervasive practice of bathing (snana) and the regulations concerning bodily cleanliness. Both of these simultaneously remove dirt and impurity (ashaucha), but in other cases these concerns clearly diverge.

One example of this divergence is the way that household refuse is often simply put out in the street—a practice that keeps the home pure and clean, but which fosters unhygienic conditions directly outside the home. Another example of this disjunction can be seen in the traditional use of cow dung as a purifying substance, or the way that the Ganges River is always considered pure, even in its lower reaches where it is full of sewage and industrial effluents. These examples clearly show that purity and hygiene are very different concepts and that, from a religious perspective, purity is by far the more important of the two.

Hypermamous Marriage
A marriage in which the wife comes from a group with lower social status than the husband. Although the ideal Hindu marriage is between a man and woman of equal social status, hypergamous marriage was admitted as a possibility in the dharma literature, although it was not encouraged. In most cases, it was specified that a man’s first wife should be of equal social status, but that he was then permitted to marry women of lower status.

In modern India, where the predominant form of marriage is still arranged marriage, most marriages are still between men and women of equal status. However, a hypergamous marriage is likely to generate less opposition than a hypogamous marriage, where a woman marries a man from a lower status group. In the dharma literature, hypergamous marriage was known as anuloma, “with the hair” (i.e., in the natural direction).

Hypogamous Marriage
A marriage in which the wife comes from a group with higher social status than the husband. Such marriages were strictly forbidden in the dharma literature, and this prohibition illustrates the role of women in determining a group’s social status.
It is deemed acceptable for women to marry people of higher social status (hypergamous marriage), because it is believed that they are improving the status of their group by becoming associated with a higher status group. Marriage to a man of lower status was strictly forbidden, since the exchange of women implies some sort of equality between the two groups, and thus drags the community's status down. In the dharma literature, hypogamous marriage was known as pratiloma, “against the hair” (i.e., in an unnatural direction). For further information see Jadunath Sarkar, A History of the Dasanami Naga Sanyasis, 1958.
Iconic Image
A pictorial or representational likeness of a deity, such as a statue or picture. This is in contrast with an aniconic image, in which there is no such representational image, and the connection between image and deity is symbolic.

Ida Nadi
One of the vertical channels (nadi) in the traditional conceptions of the subtle body. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system believed to reside on a different plane of existence than the actual body, but with certain correspondences to it. It is visualized as a set of six psychic centers (chakras) running roughly along the course of the spine, connected by three parallel vertical channels. Above and below these centers are found Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power), the latter as the latent spiritual energy known as kundalini.

The ida nadi is the vertical channel on the left side of the body. As with the rest of the subtle body, the ida nadi has certain symbolic correspondences; in particular, it is identified with the moon and is thus visualized as being light in color.

Ikshvaku
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Ikshvaku was a king who was the founder of the Solar Line. The Solar Line is one of the two great Indian mythic lineages in ancient India, along with the Lunar Line; the most illustrious members of the Solar Line were the god-king Rama and his brothers. Ikshvaku is the grandson of Vivasvan (Surya), the sun, and thus he and his offspring are descendants of the sun.

Ilango vadigal
Poet traditionally named as the author of the Tamil epic poem Shilappadigaram (“The Jeweled Anklet”). The poem highlights several themes important to Hindu culture, particularly the need for kings to be righteous in their judgments, and the power gained by a wife through devotion to her husband.

The main characters in the poem are a young couple, Kannaki and Kovalan. When Kovalan is executed because of a tragic misunderstanding, his wife Kannaki pronounces a curse on the city of Madurai, which causes many of the citizens to die before Kannaki retracts it at the behest of Madurai’s patron goddess.

Ilango vadigal is believed to have lived in the first or second century C.E., a date that makes his authorship improbable, since the poem was probably written several centuries later.

Impalement
One of the favored means of execution that seems to have been particularly prevalent in ancient southern India. To impale someone is to kill them by piercing them with a sharp stake.

The most stunning instance is reported to have taken place in the city of Madurai, where 8,000 Jain ascetics were impaled by one of the kings in the Pandya dynasty, after the latter had renounced Jainism to become a Shaiva, that is, a devotee (bhakta) of Shiva. A tradition persists that the ultimate responsibility for this can be traced to the Nayanar saint Sambandar, who had converted the king and whose surviving poetry shows a deep animus for the Jains. If this report is true, it also indicates one of the rare cases of religious persecution in Hindu India, which on the whole has been remarkably tolerant of differing ways of religious life.
Depictions of this mass impalement can be seen in murals painted at the Minakshi temple in Madurai—whose construction far postdates the alleged event—as well as in popular art of different kinds.

Impurity

See ashaucha.

Inauspiciousness

This concept refers to events or conditions that in their very essence hinder or are inimical to life, prosperity, and general well-being. Along with purity and impurity (ashaucha), auspiciousness and inauspiciousness are fundamental categories in Hindu life.

Inauspicious conditions can be caused by a variety of factors. At times the inauspiciousness lies in the very moment itself—in an hour or day considered to be unlucky, in unusual events such as eclipses, or in astrological conjunctions that are considered inherently unlucky. In such “dangerous” times, one’s activities should be severely curtailed, except for things that are absolutely necessary. Certain normally innocuous activities can become inauspicious in conjunction with particular times, and at these times such activities should be avoided.

Inauspiciousness can also arise from certain conjunctions in one’s natal horoscope, or from erecting a home or building in an inappropriate place. As a quality, inauspiciousness is conceived of as a physical entity that is generated by certain conditions, and which then attaches to individuals, families, or larger communities.

Some of these inauspicious conditions can be avoided by refraining from certain activities at certain times, yet there are certain conditions that cannot be avoided—in particular, the inauspiciousness arising from eclipses or other astrological conjunctions. Whereas impurity (ashaucha) can be removed or destroyed through purification, inauspiciousness can only be transferred from one person to another, most often through the medium of gifts (dana). For more information see Gloria Goodwin Raheja, The Poison in the Gift, 1988; and David F. Pocock, “The Evil Eye,” in T. N. Madan (ed.), Religion in India, 1991.

Independence Day

Indian national holiday celebrated on August 15—one of the few holidays celebrated according to the solar calendar—which marks the date in 1947 on which India gained independence from Great Britain.

Indigenous Aryan Theory

The theory that the Aryans were indigenous to the Indian subcontinent, rather than immigrants from other lands. The word Arya (“noble”) is the name used for themselves by the people who composed the Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious texts.

Nineteenth-century European scholarship discovered structural relationships between Sanskrit and classical European languages and speculated that all these languages came from a common parent. Based on further analysis, these researchers hypothesized that people speaking this parent language originated in central Asia, somewhere near the Caspian Sea. From there, some went west to Europe, some went southwest to Turkey, and some went south toward Iran, and later to India. The conclusion that these Indian pilgrims came from Iran is based on comparisons between the Avesta and the Veda, the Iranian and Indian religious texts. These texts show broad linguistic similarities, and thus indicate that the people speaking the languages were closely related. This entire theory is thus based solely on the observed similarities between languages, and assumptions about how it changed.

Indigenous Aryan theory supporters reject this claim and maintain that the Aryans are the original inhabitants of India, and as proof point to the artifacts found in the Indus Valley civilization, an ancient urban network in northeastern India. Both of these claims are highly tenuous and do not address the philological evidence behind the original Aryan theory. The Indigenous Aryan theory has political implications that have helped to spur its growth. Some supporters are reacting against the Aryan migration theory's perceived colonialist bias, since the theory was developed by Europeans and assumes that the dominant groups in modern India must have come from outside. Other supporters of this theory are the proponents of Hindutva, who claim that all Indians are “really” Hindus, and thus one social group, whatever their particular religious beliefs. This assertion has profound political implications in modern India, where Christians and Muslims are not only religious communities, but social and political ones. By connecting Hindu identity and good Indian citizenship, Hindutva proponents are marginalizing Christians and Muslims as outsiders.

Indira Ekadashi

Festival falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Ashvin (September–October). As with all the eleventh-day observances, this is dedicated to the worship of Vishnu, on this day in his form as the Shalagram. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, usually involving fasting (upavasa) and worship, and often promise specific benefits. This ekadashi falls during the pitrpaksha, the fortnight dedicated to the ancestors, and faithfully observing this festival day is believed to result in the rescue of millions of one’s forebears from woeful incarnations and bring them rebirth in heaven. The name “Indira” is an epithet of Lakshmi, Vishnu’s wife.

Indra

One of the oldest and most powerful Hindu deities. His status has changed over the years and this evolution shows how Hinduism has transformed.

In the earliest Hindu scriptures, the hymns in Rg Veda, Indra is the Vedic deity par excellence. As with most Vedic deities, Indra is associated with certain natural phenomena, in this case the power of the storm; he was seen as inhabiting the region (antariksha) between the earth and sky, the region where storms take place. In many ways Indra seems a paradigm for the virtues and powers celebrated in the Vedas, and (as many have inferred) celebrated as virtues by the Aryans themselves. Indra is the invincible warrior and the performer of great deeds.

One of the central hymns in the Rg Veda (1.32) describes Indra’s battle with the serpent Vrtra, who is finally killed and cut into pieces, allowing the pent-up waters that Vrtra has blocked to flow freely over the land.

Indra is a drinker of the intoxicating beverage soma, whose influence leads him to expanded reveries on his own greatness; he is the ultimate man’s man in a culture that is usually believed to have stressed manly virtues. Of the 1,028 hymns in the Rg Veda, nearly a quarter are devoted to Indra, who is described as the power encircling the earth.
Some of Indra’s attributes and functions remain constant as the Hindu tradition changed and developed. In later Hindu mythology, Indra’s realm is still the atmospheric region between the earth and sky, and he is still considered the god of the storm, the bestower of rain, and the wielder of the divine thunderbolt. Indra is also one of the eight Guardians of the Directions, holding sway over the eastern quarter.

Yet some things about Indra changed around the first millennium; most importantly, Indra has been “demoted” to being merely the ruler of the heavenly realms and the king of the gods. Far from being the supreme, unchallenged power in the universe, his position is much more precarious, for he is seen as affected by the workings of karma. Indra is actually subject to replacement when he is spiritually exhausted or when a challenger on earth grows spiritually strong enough to unseat him. Many of the stories in the classical Sanskrit texts have their plot advanced by Indra’s throne becoming hot (a sign that a human being is gaining the power to replace Indra), and with Indra taking some action to counter this threat. In cases where the challenger is a celibate ascetic, whose source of power is the power of renunciation, Indra usually dispatches an apsara (divine nymph) whose heavenly charms can seduce the ascetic and by destroying his celibacy destroy his power as well. In other cases the threat can come from people completing one hundred great sacrifices; here Indra somehow forestalls the hundredth sacrifice, as he does by stealing the sacred horse of King Sagar. Indra is the lord and ruler of the gods, but his position can only be retained by keeping a sharp eye on all possible threats.

This loss of “divine” position is seen by the way Indra is portrayed in certain mythic tales. In the story of Ahalya he is portrayed as a lecher and an adulterer, seducing Ahalya by assuming the form of her husband, the sage Gautama. When Gautama discovers what has happened, he curses Indra to have a thousand vulvas on his body, although the curse is later modified to give Indra a thousand eyes. Indra’s helplessness before his own lust and his inability to withstand Gautama’s curse are sure signs that his divine position has slipped.

Although he is still regarded as the bestower of rain and the wielder of the thunderbolt, another indication of his diminished power can be seen in his encounter with the adolescent god Krishna. When Krishna persuades the village elders to cease making offerings to Indra, the latter sends torrential rains that threaten to destroy the village. In the face of this threat, Krishna calmly lifts Mount Govardhan, and for seven days and nights holds it over their heads to block the rain. Although Indra expends all his strength, he is unable to prevail against the adolescent Krishna, clearly demonstrating where the real divinity lies.

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Indra is revealed to be the divine father of Arjuna, one of the five Pandava brothers who are the epic’s protagonists. Arjuna shares his father’s strengths and weaknesses; he is heroic and gallant, the archetypal warrior who relishes the clash of battle and is unceasing in defense of his personal and family honor. He can also be selfish, egocentric, and boorish, and has many extramarital liaisons, some of which produce offspring. Both are wonderful warriors, if that is what is needed at the time, but they lack other qualities to make them productive in times of peace. This story of Indra and Arjuna is further evidence that Indra has fallen from the most important deity to a minor one who is not an object of worship.

Indradyumna

In Hindu mythology, a righteous king who is a great devotee (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. He has been cursed to become a giant elephant by the sage Agastya, who becomes angry when the king, deep in meditation, fails to greet the sage with proper respect. After much pleading, Agastya decrees that the curse will be broken when Vishnu touches the elephant on the back. As a result of this curse, Indradyumna roams the earth as an elephant for many years.

On one occasion when he is drinking at a lake, his hind leg is seized by a giant crocodile. The crocodile is actually a gandharva or celestial musician named Huhu, whom another sage had cursed to become a crocodile. Their struggle lasts for a thousand years, with the elephant unable to get free, and the crocodile unable to overpower the elephant. Finally Vishnu himself appears, kills the crocodile, and restores Indradyumna to his previous form. The release of Indradyumna from both the curse and the crocodile is known as Gajendramoksha, the “release of the elephant king.”

Indrajit ("Conqueror of Indra") In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Indrajit is the son of the demon-king Ravana by his wife Mandodari. In some later versions of the Ramayana, he is portrayed as the son of the god Shiva himself, born after his mother had married Ravana. Like his father, Indrajit is a great devotee (bhakta) of Shiva, and because of his devotion Shiva teaches Indrajit how to make himself invisible. For a warrior, this power is obviously very valuable, and through it Indrajit is able to conquer Indra's heavenly realm and take Indra as a prisoner back to Lanka, hence his name.

The god Brahma goes to Lanka, the kingdom of Ravana, to arrange for Indra's release, in return for which Indrajit demands physical immortality. When he is told that this is impossible, Indrajit requests a different power—that when he performs a certain sacrifice he will receive horses and a chariot so that he can kill whatever enemy he faces, and while in the chariot he cannot be killed.

When the god-king Rama and allies are storming Lanka, in an effort to regain Rama's kidnapped wife Sita, Indrajit begins to perform this sacrifice. Warned about this danger by Brahma, Rama sends his brother Lakshmana to interrupt it. Lakshmana successfully disrupts the sacrifice, and in the ensuing battle kills Indrajit.

Indrani (Feminine form of Indra) The wife of the god Indra, the ruler of heaven. Perhaps reflecting Indra's diminished status in later Hindu mythology, Indrani is not a prominent figure. Her only important role is as an object of desire in the story of Nahusha, who through his meritorious deeds has displaced Indra as the king of heaven. Nahusha assumes that he is entitled to Indrani as well as Indra's throne, and makes advances toward her. For his hubris, the sage Agastya curses Nahusha to be reborn as a giant serpent.

Indraprastha The name given to the earliest of the cities built on the site now occupied by modern Delhi; Indraprastha was built on the banks of the Yamuna River, in the southeastern part of modern Delhi.

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Indraprastha is named as the capital of the Pandavas, the five brothers who are the epic's protagonists. According to the epic, the city is built after their uncle, King Dhrtarashtra, has divided his kingdom between the Pandavas and his own sons, the Kauravas.

Although the epic is replete with descriptions of Indraprastha, there is little hard connection between the archeological site and events described in the epic.

Indus River whose source lies in the high Himalayas, but which flows through...
Pakistan for most of its length. The Indus is traditionally considered one of the seven sacred rivers of India—the others are the Ganges, Yamuna, Godavari, Saraswati, Narmada, and Cauvery—although in modern times this has diminished, especially since the creation of Pakistan in 1947 rendered it inaccessible to most Hindus.

Despite its diminished religious significance, the Indus remains important from a historical perspective, since many archeological sites from the Indus Valley civilization have been discovered on its banks.

Indus Valley Art

Despite the plethora of artifacts that have been recovered from the cities of the Indus Valley civilization, objects that could be interpreted as works of art are surprisingly sparse. No traces of decoration have been found inside or outside the buildings, nor has any monumental architecture been discovered.

The art objects that have been found in Harappa, a city on the Ravi River in Pakistan, have all been on a smaller scale; several stone statues of male torsos, the head and torso of a bearded man, a copper statue of a young woman naked except for bangles and jewelry (said to be a “dancer,” because her arms and legs are lifted), statues of women with elaborate headdresses believed to be icons for a Mother Goddess cult, and the images of plants, animals, and humans carved on the Indus Valley Seals. The latter show delicate and quite realistic work, indicating a great deal of skill in working the stone, as well as the ability to make realistic figural images.

Indus Valley Civilization

(3000–2000 B.C.E.) An ancient and highly developed urban culture, so named because the first two sites discovered, Mohenjo-Daro and Harappa, both lie on the Indus River in what is now Pakistan. Further searching has uncovered other sites along much of the Indus, as well as a web of settlements stretching east to the upper Ganges basin, south through the modern state of Gujarat and into modern Maharashtra, and along the coast of modern Pakistan. The greatest concentration of these settlements has been found along the banks of the Ghaggar River, a small and seasonal watercourse that runs through the state of Rajasthan. Some historians claim that it is the bed of the ancient Saraswati River. Evidence from the sites seems to indicate that the sites further to the south developed later, but remained vital after the cities in the Indus River Valley, particularly Harappa and Mohenjo-Daro, had fallen into oblivion. The discovery of these sites in the early twentieth century prompted significant historical revision, since before then it had been generally assumed that the people known as the Aryans were the earliest developed culture in India.

The most striking feature of these cities is their uniformity—their general city plan was nearly identical from place to place (although they differed in scale), the bricks used throughout all the cities were exactly the same size, and there was a standardized set of weights and measures. Each of the cities also had a large central granary, which stored the grain necessary to feed such a sizable urban population. Such evident uniformity over such long distances bears clear witness to a strong and centralized government, which some analysts have speculated was religious in nature.

Another striking feature of all the cities was an advanced sanitation system. All the houses had channels for water, and an elaborate network of drains and sewers ran throughout the city, even in those sections where the houses were the smallest, and people presumably the poorest. Mohenjo-Daro also has a great tank built of brick and sealed with pitch, which the archaeologists have dubbed the “Great Bath.” Why were the people who built these cities so concerned with sanitation and bathing?
Some experts believe this reflected religious concern for ritual purity, rather than hygiene.

Many of the artifacts from these cities are remarkably well preserved, and give us a fairly comprehensive picture of their material culture: what they ate (wheat and barley were the primary food grains), what they wore (cotton), which animals they had domesticated (cattle, fowl, goats, sheep, pigs, donkeys, and dogs), and the implements of everyday life.

Archeological excavations have also found more than 2,000 small seals, which are assumed to have served as the insignia for mercantile families. Many of the seals bear writing, although it has never been deciphered, as well as realistic pictures of animals and human beings. Three of the seals display a horned figure sitting with his upper legs splayed and his heels touching one another. Some viewers have cited the figure on these seals as proof that the Indus Valley culture is the ultimate source for the god Shiva, a figure who does not appear in the Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious texts, but who later becomes one of the primary Hindu deities. In the same way, recovery of several statues of women with grossly exaggerated female characteristics—breasts, buttocks, and genitalia—have prompted others to claim that this culture was the source for the later Hindu cult of the Mother Goddess.

One of the controversies connected with the Indus Valley culture is what people were living there and whether their descendants still live in India. The generally accepted theory among Western scholars describes a period of contact between the people in these cities and a pastoral group of outsiders called the Aryans. The language of the Aryans, Sanskrit, shows certain structural relationships with classical European languages and even closer connections to the Avesta, religious texts of ancient Iran. Based on an analysis of the relationships between these languages and the rate at which these languages have changed, scholars have inferred that all these languages came from a common mother language, and that people speaking this parent language originated in central Asia, somewhere near the Caspian Sea. From there, some went west to Europe, some went southwest to Turkey, and some went south toward Iran, and later to India. This entire theory is thus based almost solely on the observed similarities between languages and assumptions about the rate of linguistic change—some of which are necessarily arbitrary.

The one piece of material evidence for this theory comes in the remains of horses found at the Indus Valley sites. The horse was an established part of Aryan life, according to references based on the Aryan religious texts, the Vedas, whereas it seems to have been absent from the Indus Valley cities—it is not portrayed on any of the carved seals, which show many other animals, and the only bones that have been recovered from the Indus Valley cities are found in the most recent archeological strata. This theory describes a period of contact and possible conflict between the Aryans and Indus Valley peoples, after which the Aryan culture and religion became the dominant force in Indian life. The Indus Valley cities were completely forgotten until they were excavated in the early twentieth century.

The Aryan migration theory accounts for the dissemination of various languages, but is not universally accepted. Many modern Indians subscribe to the Indigenous Aryan (IA) theory, which contends that the Aryans are the original inhabitants of India, and as proof points to the artifacts found in the Indus Valley civilization. Some IA supporters are reacting against the Aryan migration theory's perceived colonialist bias, since the theory was developed by Europeans and assumes that the dominant groups in modern India must have come from outside. Other supporters are the proponents of Hindutva, who identify being Hindu with being an Indian. The IA theory allows Hindutva proponents to claim that all Indians are "really" Hindus and thus one social group, whatever their particular religious beliefs. This assertion has profound political implications in modern India, where Christians and Muslims are not only religious communities, but social and political ones. By connecting Hindu identity and good Indian citizenship, Hindutva proponents are marginalizing Christians and Muslims as outsiders.

Such claims are intriguing, but there is slim evidence for them. The real truth is that researchers have recovered lots of material objects, but what these things mean is open to interpretation. At the very least, we know that this culture flourished for about a thousand years. Its final collapse—because of a prolonged drought, according to one theory—took place around 2000 B.C.E. For further information see Walter Ashlin Fairservis, The Roots of Ancient India, 1975.

Indus Valley Religion

Although some experts have made definitive claims about the religion of the Indus Valley civilization, it must be remembered that all these claims are highly speculative, since they are solely based on the remains from the cities. Artifacts such as grains, animal bones, traces of fabric, and building foundations give us a good basis for knowing about the material life of this culture—what people ate, what they wore, and the types of dwellings they lived in.

The notion of religion, however, is far more abstract. It is thus not only harder to infer what types of religion were practiced from the artifacts that have been recovered, but these same artifacts can also be used as evidence for widely differing conclusions. The objects themselves are mute and can be interpreted in many ways. Still, among these objects are several artifacts that are intriguing.

Among the artifacts found at sites in the Indus Valley civilization have been ceramic female figures with grossly exaggerated female characteristics—breasts, buttocks, and genitalia. These figures strongly resemble the Bronze Age European image known as the “Venus of Willendorf,” which has been associated with the worship of female fertility and procreative power. Given these similarities, it seems likely that a similar cult existed in the Indus Valley civilization. The statues give no indication of how widespread this cult was—whether it was related to fertility cults in other places or was simply a parallel development. There is no proof that this cult was the basis for the later Hindu worship of the Goddess as the supreme reality. Any such claims are making broader inferences from this limited material evidence—at best, such claims are highly speculative; at worst, they are irresponsible and driven by an underlying agenda.

The other intriguing artifacts from the Indus Valley civilization have come from seals, of which several hundred have been found. Many of the seals have pictures of animals or objects from everyday life, but three of the seals from Harappa bear the image of a horned figure sitting cross-legged on a small platform. Some viewers have described this figure as a “Proto-Shiva,” since it has several features associated with the Hindu god Shiva—the sitting posture is associated with the practice of yoga, and the figure’s horns indicate his form as Pashupati, the “Lord of Beasts.”

Proponents of this theory point to the Indus Valley culture for the roots of Shiva, rightly noting that although Shiva becomes prominent in later Hinduism, he is virtually absent from the Vedic pantheon. Virtually the only place that Shiva appears is in the Shvetashvatara Upanishad, one of the latest of the mystical texts known as the Upanishads, which describes the god Rudra—later identified with Shiva—as the supreme power in the universe.

Although it is possible that the worship of Shiva lies in the Indus Valley culture, anyone not inclined to believe this at the outset will be hard-pressed to find this particular evidence persuasive. There is also mysterious writing on the seals, and if and when this writing is deciphered these relationships may become clearer. See also Veda.

Indus Valley Seals

The most enigmatic objects from the Indus Valley civilization are small square or rectangular-shaped pieces of soapstone, which are believed to have been official seals for merchants and other individuals. Archaeologists have unearthed more than two thousand of these seals, which generally combine a pictorial image with an inscription. Most of the seal images are common domestic animals, particularly the bull, but a few portray mythical beasts such as a unicorn, or even more intriguing human figures. One well-known example of the latter shows a human figure—perhaps a mythic hero—strangling a tiger with each hand. Other figures include a horned man, in one case standing in front of a table and in another sitting in a yoga-like position. He is sometimes identified as an early form of the god Shiva and cited as evidence that this deity’s cult came from the Indus Valley cities.

Far less is known about the seal inscriptions, since the writing system for these inscriptions has never been deciphered, although many different theories have been advanced. One reason for the disagreement is the division of opinion regarding the Indus Valley culture itself. Those who believe that Indus Valley culture preceded the arrival of the Aryans, and was distinct from it, tend to look for evidence in the Dravidian language family, which is linguistically distinct from the Indo-Aryan language family. Those who espouse the Indigenous Aryan view, which identifies the Indus Valley culture with that of the Aryans, tend to seek their evidence in the earliest Sanskrit texts known as the Vedas.

None of these theories have proved irrefutable, and part of the difficulty in deciphering this script comes from the inscriptions themselves. Linguists have identified 419 different symbols, which seems too many for the script to be alphabetic, but too few for each of these symbols to stand for a single word, as is the case in Chinese. The seals’ small size also means that these inscriptions tend to be extremely short. Such brevity makes the text difficult to understand, since one lacks the contextual patterns that a longer text would supply. In their efforts to decode these inscriptions, linguists are working with a series of short and unrelated textual fragments. The script could probably be definitively deciphered with the discovery of a bilingual inscription, but in the absence of such a key, the problems may prove to be insurmountable. For further information see F. Raymond Allchin, The Archaeology of Early Historic South Asia, 1995; and Romila Thapar, Interpreting Early India, 1992. For the Indigenous Aryan viewpoint, see David Frawley, The Myth of the Aryan Invasion of India, 1994; and Vedic Aryans and the Origins of Civilization, 1997.

Infanticide

The practice of parents killing their child is uncommon and subject to sharp condemnation. In some cases these infants are illegitimate, and infanticide or abandonment is an attempt to avoid the social repercussions of what is considered an immoral act.

There are several examples of this practice in Hindu mythology, of whom the best known is Kunti. Kunti has been given a mantra by the sage Durvasas, which gives her the power to conceive and bear children by the gods. On a whim, Kunti impulsively uses the mantra to invoke the Sun, by whom she conceives and bears her son Karna. In her panic at unexpectedly becoming a mother—she was still unmarried, and understandably concerned about what people might think—she puts the child in a box and abandons him in the Ganges.

In other cases, infants are killed by their parents because of the family’s desperate poverty. Almost without exception, the children killed in such cases are daughters. If caught, the parents would be subject to a murder charge. But infanticide is often hard to prove if a baby was not born in a hospital, where births are formally registered. For poor families, daughters are often seen as a tremendous financial burden, because the expense that will be necessary to arrange their marriages is often more than people can pay. This attitude toward daughters is also reinforced by the traditional Indian marriage pattern, in which a family’s sons bring their brides into the family home, continue the joint family, and care for their parents in their old age. Since after marriage daughters become members of their husband’s family, they are often seen as “temporary” residents in the homes of their parents. For further information see Elizabeth Bumiller, May You Be the Mother of a Hundred Sons, 1990.

Inference

See anumana.

Infinite Regress

In Indian logic, one of the fallacies to be avoided in constructing an argument. An infinite regress is not only an infinite series, but one in which there is no final cause to make it happen or not happen.

A standard Western example of an infinite regress is the man who informs the philosopher that the world is supported on the back of a giant tortoise. Upon being asked what supported the tortoise, the man replies, “another tortoise.” Several similar queries bring the same reply, until in frustration the man bursts out “It’s no use trying to trick me—after this, it is tortoises all the way down!”

In an Indian context, the infinite regress fallacy is seen as an extended case of the fallacy of self-residence, and equally objectionable.

Inherence

In the Nyaya philosophical school, inherence (samavaya) is the name for a weak relational force that is assumed to connect objects and their attributes—for example, connecting the color red with a particular ball, and thus making the ball red. See samavaya.

Inheritance

Traditional Hindu law has several different patterns for inheritance. A few communities in southern India practice matrilineal succession, in which inheritance is passed through the mother’s line.

In much of the rest of India, inheritance is patrilineal. Patrilineal inheritance takes two major forms, according to the prescriptions found in two major legal texts: the Dayabhaga in the region of Bengal; and throughout much of the rest of India, variants on the Mitakshara.

The Mitakshara vests joint family property only in males born into the male line. All males have equal shares in the family property, although the head of the family is normally in charge of administering it. Under this arrangement, the death of a male heir automatically increases the share of all the other surviving males, whereas the birth of a male decreases this share. The Mitakshara gives women no right to inherit family property, although women generally have rights to personal wealth (stridhan) that was theirs to bequeath and inherit.

The Mitakshara system was based on the principle of survivorship, under which only living people could inherit property. The Dayabhaga model stresses succession, under which sons do not become shareholders of the family property at birth, but upon the death of their father. If a son happens to die before his father, the son’s heirs (including his wife and daughters) become inheritors, not in their own right, but as representatives of the deceased heir.

Under the Dayabhaga model both widows and daughters could have a share in family property, and they are allowed to act as agents in their own right. In theory this seems far more advantageous to women, but in fact it is believed to have had some gruesome consequences. When the British first came to Bengal late in the eighteenth century, they were horrified by the prevalence of sati, the rite in which a widow would be burned on her husband’s funeral pyre. Based on admittedly incomplete evidence, it seems that sati was not nearly so common in many other parts of India. One theory to explain this discrepancy is that sati was the family’s way to keep their daughter-in-law—who was an outsider to the family—from being able to gain control over their ancestral property.

Initiation

In general, an initiation is a ritual in which a person is given certain new rights, capacities, and responsibilities. In a Hindu religious context, there are two important rites of religious initiation.

One of these is the upanayana sanskar, an adolescent religious initiation performed on a “twice-born” male—that is, a member of the brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya group—which is also known as the “second birth.”

The other rite of initiation, diksha, is conferred on a person at the pleasure of a guru or religious preceptor and has no limitations on who or when it can be received.
Inscriptions
The oldest Hindu inscriptions are the edicts of Ashoka, which were either carved on rock faces or on stone pillars; many of these inscriptions are still readable today, despite being more than two thousand years old. Inscriptions on pillars were ordered by rulers, and were concerned with more sweeping issues, probably due to the inscriptions' public quality and their often monumental nature.

Aside from stone, the inscriptions were often done on copper plates. These were often used to record land grants, deeds, and other sorts of bequests, since their permanence made them more preferable than paper for safeguarding property rights. In themselves such inscriptions generally contain very specific historical information, which can help to fill out more general knowledge about their time.

Installation
This is a general term that refers to the rites for both constructing and establishing the image of a deity in a temple setting (devapratishtha), and for ritually “awakening” the image so that it becomes a seat for the deity (pranapratishtha).

Intentional Language
General term for a cryptic and coded language (Sandhabhasha) intended to conceal information from people who have not been initiated into that particular religious group. See Sandhabhasha.

Intercalary Month
The Hindu ritual year is largely based on a lunar calendar, whose twelve lunar months are finished in about 354 solar days (as opposed to our 365-day calendar). This disparity with the solar calendar means that each lunar year begins eleven days earlier than the previous lunar year. The discrepancy meant that the two calendars would increasingly diverge, such that (for example) “spring” festivals could occur at any time of the year.

It has been resolved by the addition of an intercalary month about every 2½ years—more precisely, every thirty-two months, sixteen days, one hour and twenty-six minutes. This intercalary month can take place during any of the year’s twelve lunar months and takes the name of the regular lunar month preceding it.

As an unusual phenomenon, the extra month is generally seen as a ritually dangerous time, and one of its common epithets is the “impure month” (mala-masa). During this month it is believed that one should not initiate any new projects, or perform any religious ceremonies whose timing is fluid and can be postponed, particularly marriages. Worship is highly encouraged during this time and keeping religious fasts and giving charity (dana) are also thought to be highly efficacious.

All of these are means of countering the inauspiciousness of this calendrical time—fasts and worship are ways to gain divine favor and protection, while charity acts as a channel to remove any potential bad fortune, by transferring it to the recipient.

When this extra month comes in the lunar month of Ashadh, it is called Purushottama Mas, and especially marked by the devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu as a time for worship and other spiritual exercises.

Internal Sacrifice
In general, a type of worship in which concrete external actions have been replaced by internal and purely mental ones. See antaryaga.

Intoxicants
In general, Hindu culture condemns anything that could lead to loss of control, including intoxicants such as alcohol and mind-altering drugs. The level of disapproval associated with these substances depends on the substance itself and the circumstances under which it is consumed. For example, consumption of distilled spirits (“foreign liquor”) is seen as a sign of adopting outside values, while consuming undistilled, fermented beverages such as “country liquor” and toddy is considered a low-class activity. However, there are a handful of Hindu temples at which liquor is the everyday offering to the deity and worshipers consume it as prasad, the sanctified food or drink that carries the deity’s blessing.

The attitude toward intoxicating drugs is also complex. Although they are also subject to general disapproval, Hindu mythology portrays Shiva as regularly consuming both bhang, made from crushed marijuana, and the intoxicating datura plant. Some of Shiva’s devotees (bhakta) do the same in emulation of their chosen deity, and many ascetics regularly smoke hashish (charas) mixed with tobacco, a habit interpreted by some as an intentional separation from the normal social system. Consuming bhang is a fairly common feature of certain religious festivals, such as Shivaratri and Holi, although there are many people who abstain.

Isha (“Lord”) Upanishad
At eighteen verses, one of the shortest of the early speculative texts known as the Upanishads; the name of this upanishad comes from the first word of the text. It is believed to be one of the late upanishads due to its brevity, its composition in verse rather than prose, and the use of verses that appear in other upanishads. As with many of the later upanishads, the Isha Upanishad propounds a loosely defined monism, in which the source of all things is ascribed to a single power. This power can be discovered through a flash of mystic insight when the seeker is able to transcend the illusion that objects are unconnected and recognize the one real power in the universe. The insight is believed to give a definitive understanding into the workings of the universe and to bring the individual final release of the soul (moksha) from the cycle of reincarnation (samsara).

Ishitvam
(“superiority”) One of the eight superhuman powers (siddhi) traditionally believed to be earned when a person reaches a high degree of spiritual attainment. This particular power stems from the control over matter (prakrti), which along with purusha are the two principles of the Samkhya philosophical system. This control over primal matter allows one to create, destroy, and rearrange material objects.

Ishtadevata
(“chosen deity”) The specific Hindu divinity that an individual has chosen for more or less exclusive worship and devotion. In many cases, this choice is done without denying the existence of the other Hindu deities, although they are sometimes interpreted as secondary manifestations of the ishtadevata. On the whole, Hindus have been willing to acknowledge a plurality of divine names and forms, but each person generally directs attention and worship to only one of these deities. The particular deity one worships is ultimately a matter of personal choice, although family and regional loyalties usually play a strong role in this choice.

Ishvara
(“lord”) Primarily an epithet of the god Shiva, especially when the word is used at the end of compound names, such as Rameshvar, “the Lord of Rama,” or Mahakaleshvar, “the Lord of Death.” In its more general meaning as “lord,” ishvara can also be part of the name taken by earthly rulers, such as the Chalukya monarch Someshvara (r. 1242–1268).

Ishvarakrishna
(4th c.) Indian philosopher who is traditionally cited as the author of the Samkhya karikas, a collection of sayings that explain the basic position of the Samkhya philosophical school. The Samkhya school is one of the six schools in traditional Hindu philosophy, and its position is an atheistic philosophical dualism, in which two fundamental principles, prakrti (“nature”) and purusha (“person”), are the source of all things.

Ishvara Puri
(c. 1500) Ecstatic devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna, who is famous as the guru of the Bengali saint Chaitanya. Little is known about Ishvara Puri’s background, although his surname “Puri” indicates that he took formal ascetic initiation in the Puri branch of the Dashanami Sanyasis. After meeting Ishvara Puri in 1508 in the pilgrimage town of Gaya, Chaitanya was fired with devotion to Krishna, and he began to perform the public ecstatic recitations of Krishna’s name that have become an established element in the religious life of the community that claims him as its founder, the Gaudiya Vaishnavas. See also ISKCON.

ISKCON
Acronym for the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, a Hindu missionary community commonly known as the Hare Krishnas. This name comes from ISKCON’s emphasis on the importance of repeating the divine name, particularly the formula known as the mahamantra (“Hare Krishna, Hare Krishna, Krishna Krishna, Hare Hare”). ISKCON was founded by A. C. Bhaktivedanta Prabhupada, and its religious roots lie in the Vaishnava piety of his native Bengal. The Bengali Vaishnava tradition has long emphasized the importance of publicly chanting Krishna’s name, particularly in the Gaudiya Vaishnava community founded by the Bengali saint Chaitanya.
ISKCON comes out of this Bengali tradition, but in other ways it shows tensions that mark it as a twentieth-century phenomenon. Its strong missionary activities make it a highly unusual Hindu religious organization, as does its membership—Prabhupada founded ISKCON in New York City, most of ISKCON’s members are Western converts from Judaism and Christianity, and the bulk of its missionary activities have been performed outside of India. The roots of ISKCON’s membership, and the general fervor associated with converts, have led to some theological contradictions. On one hand, ISKCON doctrine tends to denigrate human capacity, putting the emphasis on the saving power of God’s grace. On the other hand, ISKCON devotees (bhakta) believe that they gain religious merit by living a rigorously regulated lifestyle that mandates a strict vegetarian diet, abstinence from liquor and nonmedicinal drugs, sexual activity only for procreation, and a well-established daily religious routine; many devotees also adopt Indian clothing and hair styles. In these two opposing emphases—complete surrender to God’s grace, and strict adherence to a prescribed “holy” lifestyle—ISKCON shows surprising parallels to evangelical Christianity. Since Prabhupada’s death in 1977, the organization has been run by these Western converts, and thus ISKCON can be characterized as a “countercultural” Euro-American phenomenon, despite its Indian origins. ISKCON has a significant presence in Brindavan, the village celebrated as Krishna’s childhood home, where the group has built a magnificent temple; they are also active in Mayapur in Bengal, which they claim as Chaitanya’s birthplace. After a period of growth in the 1970s, ISKCON had serious legal problems in the 1980s, including losses in civil suits and allegations of money laundering and murder. For a sympathetic perspective on the movement, see Larry Shinn, The Dark Lord, 1987; and Robert D. Baird (ed.), Religion in Modern India, 1998. See also vegetarianism.
Jabali
A famous sage in Hindu mythology and son of the sage Vishvamitra. Despite his biological origins, Jabali eventually becomes associated with his father’s sworn enemy, the sage Vasishtha. As a member of Vasishtha’s group, Jabali becomes one of the advisers to King Dasharatha, the father of the god-king Rama in the epic Ramayana.

Jada
(“inert,” “insentient”) In a philosophical context, the word jada is used to designate physical matter, which is inert and devoid of cognitive functions. In a more extended sense, the word can refer to any person completely lacking religious capacities, sensibilities, or interest, and who is, thus, from a religious perspective, simply inert.

Jagadamba
(“Mother of the Universe”) Epithet of the Goddess, highlighting her creative and generative capacities. See Goddess.

Jagadisha
(“Lord of the Universe”) Epithet of the regional deity Jagannath, and by extension the god Vishnu, to whom Jagannath has been connected as a form of Krishna, the eighth avatar or incarnation of Vishnu. Jagadisha is the name given to Jagannath in the Dashavatara Stotra, the opening hymn in the Gitagovinda, a lyric devotional poem composed by the poet Jayadeva. In modern northern India, the name Jagadisha is used in one of the most popular and best-known devotional hymns, the Jagadisha Arati, a hymn directed more particularly to Vishnu.

Jagamohan
In the temple architecture of Orissa, one of the major forms of the northern Indian Nagara style, the jagamohan is the entrance porch to the temple, which provides a transitional space between the outside world and the sacred space further in. In Orissan temples, the jagamohan tended to be low and squat, in sharp contrast to the deul, or main internal area, a beehive-shaped tower under which the image of the temple’s primary deity resided.

Jagannath
(“Master of the Universe”) Presiding deity of the Jagannath temple in Puri. Puri is and has long been a major center for Hindu culture, a circumstance that has underlined and reinforced Jagannath’s importance as the city’s presiding deity. Although Jagannath is identified as a manifestation of the god Krishna, his roots lie elsewhere. He is generally considered to be an autochthonous (“of the land”) deity, who was originally the local deity of Puri but who has been assimilated into the wider pantheon as a form of Krishna, and therefore, by extension, a form of Vishnu. This assimilation shows Jagannath’s importance and influence in the local setting, since he could not be simply marginalized. It is also an example of the Vaishnava tendency for such assimilation, most often through the doctrine of the avatars or divine incarnations.

unusual in Krishna devotion, as is the form of these images, which clearly come from a folk or tribal tradition. All three deities are made from logs so roughly cut that the facial features are almost indistinguishable, their arms are unnaturally short and stubby, and the images are brightly painted. Each of these peculiar elements is seen as further evidence of Jagannath's indigenous roots. A final piece of evidence for his local origins is seen in his connection with his hereditary servants, the daitas, a tribal people who are considered virtually untouchable. Despite their marginal status in conventional society, the daitas are responsible for sculpting new images of the trio when they are periodically replaced. The daitas also consider Jagannath their blood relative, further pointing to his ambiguous roots.

The myth explaining these images is based on the virtuous King Indradyumna. Indradyumna has a vision of Vishnu in a dream, in which Vishnu directs the king to make an image of Jagannath from an enormous log that he has found. While the king is wondering how to do this, a mysterious man appears, who is actually Vishvakarma, the architect of the gods. The mysterious man offers to carve the statues, on the condition that he will not be disturbed until he is finished. He then disappears into his workroom for two weeks, but the people are mystified by what he is doing, since they hear no sounds of carving. This seeming inactivity piques the people's curiosity, and finally one of the queens prevails on the king to look inside. When the king opens the door, he finds no one there, and the statues only half-finished. In another dream that night, the king is ordered to paint and consecrate the statues as they are, and this form has reportedly remained the same ever since. For further information on the history and influence of Jagannath, by far the best source is Anncharlott Eschmann, Hermann Kulke, and Gaya Charan Tripathi, The Cult of Jagannath and the Regional Tradition of Orissa, 1978.

Jageshvar

Temple complex and sacred site (tirtha) in the village with the same name, located in the Kumaon foothills of the Himalayas in the state of Uttar Pradesh. The Jageshvar temple complex contains 124 different temples, concentrated in an area about the size of a football field. Virtually all of these temples are dedicated to some form of the god Shiva, and the few that house other deities are either temples to the Goddess—considered to be Shiva's wife—or in one case to the god Hanuman, who is sometimes considered an avatar or incarnation of Shiva. Most of these temples are extremely small—either an open image of Shiva's aniconic symbol, the linga, or a temple building no larger than a telephone booth. The three largest most important temples are to Shiva in his forms as Kedarnath, as Mrtyunjaya ("Conqueror of Death"), and as Jageshvar, from which the site gets its name. The name Jageshvar means "The Wakeful Lord" and signifies that this particular form of Shiva is always alert to the needs of his devotees (bhakta) and will quickly fulfill any request.

Local tradition claims that Jageshvar is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites deemed especially sacred to Shiva, and at which Shiva is uniquely present. This claim is not supported by the traditional list of the jyotirlingas, but Jageshvar has been a pilgrimage site for more than a thousand years. The Mrtyunjaya temple has been dated to the eighth century C.E., while the Jageshvar temple was built about two centuries later. Since that time, further building at the Jageshvar complex has come through patronage by several different groups of hill kings, most recently those of the Chand dynasty, who ruled the region between the fifteenth and eighteenth centuries. The temple complex's indisputable antiquity, its association with royal power, and its identity as a place where Shiva readily grants one's wishes, have all combined to make it the most important pilgrimage place in the Kumaon region.
Jahnavi

(“daughter of Jahnu”) Epithet of the Ganges River, which Hindus consider to be the physical form of the goddess Ganga. The name Jahnavi refers to an incident during her creation in which she encounters Jahnu, a great ascetic who has amassed great power through performing harsh physical asceticism (tapas). After the Ganges has been brought down to earth by the sage Bhagirath, but before she makes her way to the ocean, the playful river picks up and carries away Jahnu's belongings while the sage is meditating nearby. Jahnu is enraged at this disrespect; to punish Ganga, he drinks all of the water in the river. When the gods realize what has happened, they are very concerned. They somehow manage to placate Jahnu, and the sage agrees to release her. The problem then is how to release the Ganges in a way that will not defile her, since vomiting her up or voiding her as urine are both unacceptable. In the end, Jahnu bypasses this dilemma by releasing her through his ear. She continues on her way to the sea, but acquires the name Jahnavi by virtue of being “born” from Jahnu.

Jahnu

In Hindu mythology, an ascetic who has amassed great power by performing harsh physical asceticism (tapas). One day while Jahnu is deep in meditation, his belongings are picked up and carried away by the river Ganges (believed by Hindus to be the physical form of the goddess Ganga), who has recently come down from heaven and is being led to the sea by the sage Bhagirath. Jahnu is enraged at this disrespect; to punish Ganga, he drinks all of the water in the river. When the gods realize what has happened, they are very concerned. They somehow manage to placate Jahnu, and the sage agrees to release her. The problem then is how to release the Ganges in a way that will not defile her, since vomiting her up or voiding her as urine are both unacceptable. In the end, Jahnu bypasses this dilemma by releasing her through his ear. She continues on her way to the sea and acquires the name Jahnavi by virtue of being “born” from Jahnu.

Jaimini

(4th c. B.C.E.?) Figure traditionally cited as the author of the Mimamsa Sutras, the central texts of the Purva Mimamsa school, one of the six schools of Indian philosophy. The Mimamsa school is most concerned with the examination and pursuit of dharma (“righteous action”). In their pursuit of dharma, the Mimamsa also believed that all necessary instructions were contained in the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. Given these twin assumptions, much of Mimamsa thought is devoted to the principles and methods of textual interpretation used to unlock the instructions that they were confident the Vedas contained.
Jajman
Common form of the Sanskrit word yajamana, “patron of the sacrifice.” From the time of the earliest Vedic sacrifices, there was a sharp distinction between the people who performed the sacrifice (basically hired technicians) and the people who actually paid the money to sponsor it and were considered the rite’s true beneficiaries. In contemporary times, jajman is the term used by pandas, the priests at pilgrimage places (tirtha), to refer to their pilgrim clients, with whom they have a hereditary relationship. This usage admits the reality that the pilgrims are their patrons, since the priests’ livelihood comes from serving them, but the term also carries associations of mutual obligation. Pandas are entitled to fees from their pilgrim clients but must also render services to them, while pilgrims are bound to uphold this hereditary relationship but can depend on their pandas for help.

Jallianwala Bagh
A park (bagh) in the center of the northern Indian city of Amritsar at which several thousand people were killed or wounded in 1919. A crowd had gathered at this park despite a strict ban on public meetings established the day before. The British officer in charge, General Dyer, interpreted the gathering as willful defiance of the law and commanded his men to fire on the crowd. This incident was highly significant in the struggle for Indian independence (finally achieved on August 15, 1947), for it undercut British claims that their presence was necessary to keep the country from chaos and, in the minds of many Indian leaders, removed any moral authority by which the British could justify their rule.

Jambhavan
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Jambhavan is one of the ministers of Sugriva, king of the monkeys. Jambhavan is generally described as a bear, although in some sources he is said to be a monkey. In the search for Rama’s kidnapped wife Sita, it is Jambhavan who convinces the monkey-god Hanuman to attempt to jump over the ocean to Lanka, reminding Hanuman of his birth, deeds, and the divine boons he has been given. Although at first Hanuman doubts his ability, he is convinced by Jambhavan’s encouragement and, with a mighty spring, leaps over the sea to Lanka, where he eventually discovers Sita.

Jambudvipa
(“rose-apple”) In traditional mythic geography, the first and innermost of the seven concentric landmasses (dvipas) making up the visible world. At the center of Jambudvipa stands Mount
Meru, the center of the entire universe. Mount Meru is surrounded by mountain ranges, and the part of Jambudvipa south of Mount Meru is the land known as Bharata, the traditional name for the Indian subcontinent. See also Cosmology.

Jambukeshvar
Sacred site (tirtha) and southern Indian temple-town near the city of Tiruchirappalli in the state of Tamil Nadu, directly opposite the great temple complex of Shrirangam. The temple at Jambukeshvar is dedicated to the god Shiva in his role as “Lord of the Rose-Apple (jambu) Tree;” the image of Shiva is placed under one of these trees. Jambukeshvar is also one of the bhutalingas (“elemental lingas”), a network of five southern Indian sites sacred to Shiva. In each of these sites Shiva is represented as a linga, the pillar-shaped object that is his symbolic form, and at each site the linga is believed to be formed from one of the five primordial elements (bhuta)—earth, wind, fire, water, and space (akasha). At Jambukeshvar, Shiva’s image is associated with water, and the linga is set into a pool created by a natural spring.

Jammu
One of the three distinct cultural areas in the modern Indian state of Jammu and Kashmir; the other two are western Kashmir and Ladakh. Jammu and Kashmir is a former princely state once ruled by the Dogras, a small regional dynasty. Although the Dogra kings were Hindus, they ruled over the minority populations of the mostly Muslim Kashmiris and the mostly Buddhist Ladakhis; this ethnic and religious division continues in modern times. The Jammu region is geographically part of the northern Indian plain, and the surrounding regions south of the Shiwalik Hills are Hindu majority regions. However, Jammu is also in close proximity to the Punjab, the center of Sikhism, a monotheistic religion that combines elements of Hinduism and Islam; consequently Jammu is also home to a significant Sikh population. By far the most celebrated shrine in the Jammu region is the one dedicated to Vaishno Devi, a goddess who is reputed to grant all of one’s wishes. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, Jammu was also one of the centers for the Pahari school of miniature painting. Aside from being the name of this region, Jammu is also the name of the region’s largest city, the state’s traditional winter capital. For general information about Jammu and all the regions of India, an accessible reference is Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.

Janabai
(d. c.1350) Female poet and saint in the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba at his temple at Pandharpur in the modern state of Maharashtra. According to tradition, Janabai came to Pandharpur with her parents when she was seven but refused to go home with them, saying that she wanted to remain close to the Lord. She became the servant of another Varkari saint, Namdev, who made her a member of his circle of devotees (bhakta). Janabai is famous for her devotional songs, which remain popular today. For further information see Justin E. Abbott and Narhar R. Godbole (trans.), Stories of Indian Saints, 1982; and G. A. Deleury, The Cult of Vithoba, 1960.

Janaka
The foster father of the goddess Sita. He discovered her one day while plowing a furrow in a field. In Hindu mythology, Janaka is the paradigm of the sage-king, a person who despite his wealth and position was as perfectly dispassionate as any ascetic living in the forest.
Janaki Navami
Festival falling on the ninth day (navami) of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Phalgun (February–March). This festival celebrates the birth of Sita, wife of the god king Rama and heroine of the epic Ramayana. Sita is not born in the usual manner, but is found by King Janaka in a furrow as he plows a field (hence the name Janaki, a female form of Janaka). As the wife of Rama, himself an avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu, Sita is believed to be a form of Lakshmi, Vishnu’s wife. In her absolute devotion to her husband, Sita is considered a model for Indian women; women performing the prescribed religious rites for this day are promised children and prosperity.

Janakpur
City and sacred site (tirtha) in the western part of Nepal, seven miles north of the border with the Indian state of Bihar. Janakpur is said to be the capital of King Janaka, a noted sage and the foster father of the goddess Sita in the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics. According to tradition, Janaka’s capital was destroyed during the war described in the Mahabharata—the other great Hindu epic—and disappeared without a trace. The present site of Janakpur dates from the early eighteenth century and is said to have been discovered by two Vaishnava devotees (bhakta), Chaturbhuj Giri and Sur Kishor. Chaturbhuj Giri had a vision of the god Rama in a dream and was directed to dig beneath a banyan tree. When he did, he found four images of Vishnu, each in a differing divine manifestation. Sur Kishor was a great devotee of Sita, and through her agency discovered the spot as well. Other ascetics began to come to this site, which is still an important stop on the annual pilgrimage cycle of the Ramanandi ascetics. The ascetics were followed by shepherds and merchants, and the town of Janakpur gradually grew up from there. For extensive treatment of this site and the veracity of these stories, see Richard Burghart, “The History of Janakpur,” in Kailash, Vol. 6, No. 4, 1978.

Janamjeya
In Hindu mythology, the son of King Parikshit; Janamjeya rules after his father’s untimely death from the bite of the serpent Takshaka. Janamjeya has a pronounced hatred of serpents because of Takshaka’s role in his father’s death, and during his reign he performs a great sacrifice known as the Sarpasatra, through which most of the snakes on earth are killed. Takshaka manages to stop the sacrifice before all of the earth’s serpents are completely wiped out by pleading with a brahmin to help him. The brahmin comes to Janamjeya’s sacrifice as a guest and requests that the sacrifice be stopped. Since, according to tradition, a brahmin guest’s request cannot be refused, Janamjeya is compelled to curtail the rite.
Janardana
("exciting his devotees") Epithet of the god Krishna. See Krishna.

Jana Sangh
Modern Indian political party, founded in 1951 by Shyam Prasad Mookerjee. Despite Mookerjee's earlier roots in the Hindu Mahasabha, a Hindu nationalist organization, the Jana Sangh's leadership largely came from workers dispatched by another conservative Hindu organization, the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS). By the mid-1950s the Jana Sangh had become the political arm of the RSS, with RSS members filling most of the party's important positions. In its political platform the Jana Sangh espoused many populist Hindu causes, such as a ban on cow slaughter and the prohibition of alcoholic beverages, but the party was also noted for its sympathetic orientation toward farmers, who formed one of its important constituencies. The Jana Sangh's high point came in the 1977 general elections, when it won ninety-three seats in Parliament. It was the largest single party in the coalition of political parties that ousted Indira Gandhi's Congress Party and ended their two years of martial law. This triumph quickly turned to failure: the Janata government dissolved over the so-called dual-membership controversy, which was rooted in concerns over Jana Sangh members simultaneously being members of the RSS. Legislators from other parties saw this as creating a conflict of interest and were also wary of their government being directed by the RSS, which was considered a Hindu chauvinist organization. These outside legislators demanded that Jana Sangh members renounce all RSS ties, which the latter were unwilling to do. All attempts at compromise eventually failed, and after the Congress Party came back to power in 1980, the Jana Sangh legislators and other remnants of the Janata government formed a new party, the Bharatiya Janata Party. For further information see Walter K. Andersen and Shridhar D. Damle, The Brotherhood in Saffron, 1987; and Bruce Desmond Graham, Hindu Nationalism and Indian Politics, 1990.

Janeu
The sacred thread worn by all “twice-born" (dvija) men, as a visible symbol of having undergone the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth." The janeu is a circular cord made of three strands (in which each cord also has three strands), which is worn over the left shoulder, crossing the body to fall on the right hip. See sacred thread.

Jangama
(“moving”) Priestly subgroup in the Virashaiva or Lingayat community, whose members are mainly concentrated in the southern Indian state of Karnataka. The Virashaivas are a devotional community who stress the worship of Shiva as the only real deity; aside from being essentially monotheistic, they have also rejected all forms of image worship except for Shiva's symbol, the linga. The Virashaivas were founded by the poet-saint Basavanna, partly in rebellion against the prevailing caste system, and he created the jangamas as a parallel priesthood to care for his community's members. The major function of the jangamas is to officiate at lifecycle ceremonies for the members of the community, such as birth, coming-of-age, marriage, and death. Jangamas may be married and raise families, but this Virashaiva subcommunity also serves as the major source of recruits for the celibate Virashaiva monks (viraktas), who have the highest status as religious leaders in the community.

Janmashtami
Festival on the eighth day (ashtami) of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Bhadrapada (August–September), which is celebrated as the god Krishna's birthday. As with all holidays connected with Krishna, this festival is particularly observed in the Braj region, where Krishna is supposed to have lived, although it is also celebrated throughout the country. Devotees (bhakta) often stay up late into the night, since Krishna is said to have been born at midnight, and the observances are often punctuated with singing, chanting, parades, and dramas enacting events in Krishna's life. It is during the month around Janmashtami that the dramas known as the Krishna līlas are presented in the town of Brindavan, traditionally believed to have been Krishna's childhood home.

According to tradition, Krishna is the eighth son of Devaki and Vasudeva. He is born in a prison in the city of Mathura in which his parents are held by Devaki's brother, the wicked king Kamsa. Kamsa has imprisoned the pair in an attempt to thwart the prophecy that he will be killed by his sister Devaki's eighth son. Kamsa has killed all of Devaki's older children at birth and intends to do the same with Krishna, but when Krishna is born wondrous things begin to happen: the jailers fall into a deep sleep, the locked prison doors miraculously open, and Vasudeva is able to spirit the infant out of the prison to the home of the couple who will become his foster parents, Nanda and Yashoda. Vasudeva returns that night, bearing Yashoda's new-born baby girl, who is really the goddess Bhadrakali in disguise. The next morning Kamsa kills the child by dashing her against a stone, but from the body arises a fearsome form of the Goddess, who taunts Kamsa by telling him that the person who will slay him has already escaped.

Japa

(“muttering,” “whispering”) Individual recitation, usually the repeated utterance of a particular mantra or divine name(s), often while using a string of beads (mala) to perform a definite number of such repetitions. Such recitation is usually performed as an individual religious act, in a tone of voice audible to the reciter but not others who may be present. Japa is a particularly important practice in Hindu traditions stressing the benefits of reciting the divine name—such repetitions are believed to have gradual spiritual benefits. Japa is particularly stressed in the Gaudīya Vaishnavas community founded by the Bengali saint Chaitanya, where public recitation of the divine name is an important part of religious life.

Jaratkarava Artabhāga

One of the sage Yajnavalkya's interviewers in the Brhadarānyaka Upanishad, one of the earliest of the Upanishads. The third chapter of this upanishad presents a series of questioners, each trying to test Yajnavalkya's assertion that he is the best brahmin of all. Artabhāga finally questions Yajnavalkya about the human sense faculties and their realms of action, and eventually asks what happens to a person after death. Yajnavalkya draws him aside in private, and talks to him about karma (“action”), in what is generally regarded as the oldest reference to this fundamental Indian religious idea.

Jaratkaru

In Hindu mythology, a sage famous not only for his asceticism and knowledge but also because he illustrates the importance of male children in Hindu culture. Jaratkaru is a lifelong ascetic with no intention of marrying until he has a vision of his ancestors suspended over one of the hells by a grass rope, through which a rat (time personified) is gradually gnawing. His ancestors inform Jaratkaru that his failure to have a son means that the lineage will end with him, along with the rites performed for the deceased in that lineage, and that they will then fall into hell. To forestall this disaster, they instruct Jaratkaru to marry and beget a son. Jaratkaru is initially hostile to this idea, but later specifies that if a woman also named Jaratkaru is found and given to him as alms, he will marry her. His conditions eventually reaches the Naga (snake) king Vasuki, who has a sister by this name. The marriage is performed under the condition that if she displeases Jaratkaru, he will leave her. Given Jaratkaru's ascetic past, it is not surprising that things did not work out between them. After being married several months, his wife has the dilemma of allowing Jaratkaru to sleep past sunset, which will make him late for his evening prayers, or to wake him and risk his displeasure. She chooses the latter; Jaratkaru is displeased with her and leaves despite her entreaties. Some time later the wife Jaratkaru gives birth to a son, Astika, and thus the sage's obligations are fulfilled.

Jat
One of the hundreds of subgroups of traditional Indian society known as jatis ("birth"). Each jati was associated with—and held a monopoly over—a particular occupation, and that occupation determined the social status of the jati's members; this system led to the modern caste system. The Jats are a northern Indian jati whose members are spread through many of the states of northern India, particularly Haryana, Punjab, Uttar Pradesh, and Rajasthan. In the Punjab the Jats are evenly split between Hindus and Sikhs, but in other areas the community is solidly Hindu. The Jats' hereditary occupation is farming, and they are often described as tough and resilient peasants; these qualities have also made them superior soldiers, both in the service of the British Empire and in independent India.

Jata
A long matted lock of hair. Ascetics often wear their hair in jatas for a number of religious and symbolic reasons. On one level, the uncut hair is a symbol of renunciation; its unkempt, matted quality demonstrates the ascetic's distance from worldly concerns with order and propriety. On another level, ascetics wear jatas in imitation of the god Shiva, the paradigmatic ascetic, who is always portrayed wearing his hair in matted locks. Although jatas are most commonly worn by devotees (bhakta) of Shiva, some strict renunciants who are devotees of the god Vishnu also favor this hairstyle. Finally, from a non-religious perspective, jatas are simply a very low-maintenance hairstyle. They are usually rubbed with wood ash to keep them relatively neat; as the hair grows the jatas simply become longer, and in many cases they can be neatly twisted into a crown, or jatamakuta, on the top of the head.

Jatakarma Samskara
The fourth of the traditional life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras). The first three were to be performed before and during pregnancy, while the jatakarma samskara was to be performed immediately after the birth. This ceremony had several elements, but the most prominent were uttering the word "vak" ("speech," a synonym for Saraswati) into the child's ear and feeding the child honey, ghee, and other items believed to bring good luck. This samskara is seldom performed in modern times, although there are many other rites connected with birth that are intended to protect the mother and child and to kindle the child's potential.

Jatamakuta
A crown (makuta) made of matted locks of hair (jata) twisted together and bound on top of the head. In Hindu iconography the jatamakuta is most closely associated with the god Shiva, who is the paradigmatic ascetic and always wears his hair in matted locks. In modern times, the jatamakuta is still a hairstyle associated with many ascetics, both Shaiva and Vaishnava.
Jatayu
A virtuous vulture in the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics. When Rama’s wife Sita is kidnapped by the demon-king Ravana and is being spirited away in Ravana’s aerial chariot, Jatayu makes a valiant effort to rescue her. In his battle with Ravana, Jatayu’s wings are cut off; the force of his subsequent fall left him near death. With his dying breaths he informs Rama and Rama’s brother Lakshmana of what has happened, and identifies Ravana as Sita’s kidnapper. Although Jatayu fails to rescue Sita, he is critical to the plot of the epic because he gives Rama the crucial information he needs to begin to searching for her.

Jati
(“birth”) A traditional social subgroup in Indian society. There were hundreds of these groups, considered exogamous because strict taboos existed against marrying outside one’s jati—people belonging to different jatis were looked upon as different “species” of people. Jatis were usually defined by the subgroup’s traditional occupation, which they and they alone had the right to practice. The jatis were hierarchically arranged in society, based on the perceived purity or impurity (ashaucha) of their occupations, and this hierarchy formed the basis for the traditional Hindu social structure known as the caste system.

Jatra
Vernacular form of the Sanskrit word yatra (“journey”). The word yatra is most often used to describe journeys to far-away places, whereas jatra is used to denote visits to spots within the immediate region.
Jauhar

A mass suicide in which women and children threw themselves on a bonfire to protect the family from dishonor when the men were defeated or killed in battle. Jauhar was considered the women's counterpart to death in combat. If their husbands and fathers were heavily outnumbered and faced certain death in battle, women would perform a mass suicide after the men left their fortresses. This phenomenon was most closely associated with the desert state of Rajasthan, which has strong martial traditions and a great stress on the importance of family honor. It is particularly associated with the Rajasthani city of Chittorgarh, where jauhars occurred in 1303, 1535, and 1568.

Jaya

In Hindu mythology, one of the gatekeepers of the god Vishnu's heavenly abode, Vaikuntha, who, with his brother Vijaya, is cursed to be born three times as a demon (asura) and to be killed each time by Vishnu. The sage Sanaka places this curse on them when they prevent him from seeing Vishnu. In their first birth the two are born as Hiranyaksha and Hiranyakashipu, who are killed by the Boar avatar and the Man-Lion avatar respectively. In their second incarnation they are born as Ravana and Kumbhakarna, who are both killed by Vishnu's Rama avatar. In their final birth they incarnate as Shisupala and Dantavakra and are killed by Vishnu's Krishna avatar. After the conditions of the curse have been fulfilled, they return to their duties as Vishnu's gatekeepers.

Jayadeva

(12th c.) Poet and author of the Gitagovinda, a lyric devotional poem that uses the separation and eventual reunion of the lovers Krishna and Radha as a metaphor for the union of the human soul with God. According to tradition, Jayadeva lived at the temple of the god Jagannath in the city of Puri, where his wife Padmavati was a dancer. She is said to have been the first to dance to Jayadeva's songs as an offering to Jagannath, and the Gitagovinda has been sung and danced as a regular part of temple worship up to the present time. For further information see Barbara Stoller Miller (ed. and trans.), The Love Song of the Dark Lord, 1977.

Jayadratha

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Jayadratha is a king who is married to the princess Dussala. Dussala is the only sister of the Kauravas, a group of one hundred brothers who are the epic's antagonists. Jayadratha once sought the hand of Draupadi, and because of his bitterness at having lost her to the warrior Arjuna, he opposes Arjuna and his brothers, the Pandavas, for the rest of his life. During the Mahabharata war between the Pandavas and the Kauravas, Jayadratha takes the side of the Kauravas and is eventually killed by Arjuna. At Jayadratha's birth a celestial voice has prophesied that the head of the person who causes Jayadratha's head to fall to earth will split into a hundred pieces. Mindful of this, Arjuna, a peerless archer, cuts off Jayadratha's head with an arrow in such a way that it lands in the lap of Jayadratha's father, Brhatkaya. Brhatkaya is so startled that he allows the head to fall from his lap to the ground, and his own head breaks into a hundred pieces.

Jaya Ekadashi

Festival falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Magh (January–February). As are all eleventh-day observations, this festival is dedicated to the worship of Vishnu, on this day particularly in his form as Krishna. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, usually involving fasting (upavasa) and worship, and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance:
faithfully observing the “jaya,” or “victory,” festival is said to ensure that one's desired goal will be attained.

Jayapala
(d. 1001) One of the last kings of the Pratiharas, a northern Indian dynasty whose capital was in Kanyakubja on the Ganges River. By Jayapala's time the divided Hindu kingdoms in northern India were being threatened by the Turkish emirs, especially Mahmud of Ghazni, who had settled in modern-day Afghanistan. Jayapala was defeated and captured in battle with Mahmud and subsequently committed suicide; a short time later, Jayapala's son Anandapala suffered a crushing defeat, leaving a nearly complete collapse of power in northern India. Because of this absence of any effective opposition, Mahmud was able to indulge in almost yearly campaigns of pillage and plunder.

Jayarashi
(7th c.) Author of the Tattvopaplavasimha, one of the only surviving texts of the materialist philosophical school. One of the philosophical peculiarities of the materialist school was that they accepted only perception (pratyaksha) as a reliable pramana, or means by which people can gain true and accurate knowledge. In his text, Jayarashi argued against the reliability of inference (anumana) as one of the pramanas by refuting the concept of cause and effect. To make an inference, such as inferring the result an action will bring in the future based on the result it brought in the past, one must believe that the cause-and-effect model is reliable.

Jejuri
Town in the Pune district of the central Indian state of Maharashtra, about forty miles south and east of the city of Pune. Jejuri is primarily noted as the site of the primary temple to Khandoba, an important Maharashtrian regional deity who has been brought into the pantheon of gods as an avatar, or incarnation, of the god Shiva.

Jhanki
("glimpse") A momentary “glimpse” of the divine, in which the devotee (bhakta) gains momentary access to the world of the gods. Jhankis are most often conveyed through the performing arts: through the mental images created when devotional poetry is read, recited, or sung, or through the images presented in religious dance, drama, or film. During these momentary encounters, the devotee comes briefly into the presence of the deity, sharing the deity's world. This stress on the opportunity to experience a brief physical presence in the deity's world is particularly strong in the Vaishnava devotionalism connected with the gods Krishna and Rama. Worship of these deities often stresses visualization of the deity's life and everyday actions as a way for devotees to gain access to that divine world. Devotees of both deities have created plays, or lilas, to aid them in this process: for Rama, they are the Ram Lilas, which are performed throughout India during the autumn festival season, and for Krishna, they are the Krishna Lilas, performed during the annual monsoon season in Brindavan, Krishna's childhood home.

Jimutavahana
(early 12th c.) Author of the Dayabhaga, a legal text primarily concerned with inheritance, partition, and the division of property. It eventually became the primary legal authority for the Bengal cultural region; areas outside Bengal were usually governed by a different legal text, the Mitakshara. One of the major differences between these texts concerns the nature of inheritance. The Mitakshara stresses inheritance by survivorship, in which only living males can inherit property, whereas the Dayabhaga stresses inheritance by succession, in which a dead man's heirs can inherit in his name.
Jiva
("life") In philosophical and Vaishnava (devotees of the god Vishnu) discussion, jiva is the name used for the embodied soul of a human being. In a more general sense, the word can refer to any living being.

Jivacchraddha
("Shraddha for a living [person]") A particular type of shraddha, or memorial service for the dead, although in this case it is performed for a person who is still living. In many cases, a person performs the Jivacchraddha for himself if he has no sons to fulfill the responsibility or if he suspects that the rite may not be performed properly after his death. The person performing this rite makes a small figure of sacred kusha grass, representing the person for whom the shraddha is being performed, and then proceeds with the normal shraddha ceremony.

Jivanmukta
In Indian philosophy, a person who has attained final liberation of the soul while still living (jivanmukti) and who continues to live in a state of liberation. The concept of the jivanmukta is essential in many branches of Advaita Vedanta, one of the six schools of classical Indian philosophy. The Advaita school upholds a philosophical position known as monism, which is the belief that a single Ultimate Reality known as Brahman lies behind all things, and that all things are merely differing forms of that reality. For Advaita proponents, the problem of human bondage is that human beings, blinded by avidya or mistaken understanding, do not recognize this ultimate unity. Liberation is not attained by “doing” anything or by becoming something that one is not, but by realizing what has always been the case, and thus exchanging a mistaken understanding for a correct one. Although this cognition forever changes how a person perceives the world, it brings no ontological changes, meaning that on a physical level one continues to exist as before, until the karma that has created one’s present body is exhausted. For further information see Karl H. Potter (ed.), Advaita Vedanta up to Sankara and His Pupils, 1981.

Jnana
In Indian philosophical thought, a word with different meanings in different contexts. The word jnana is derived from the verb “to know,” and one of its meanings, at least in a perceptual context, is “awareness.” In a more abstract sense it stands for what it means to truly “know” something; along with karmamarga and the bhaktimarga, the jnanamarga is one of the paths to liberation of the soul mentioned in the Bhagavad Gita. In this latter context, an appropriate translation might be "wisdom" or "realization," since this is not the sort of "knowledge" that comes from reading a book or receiving instruction, but instead reflects profound understanding gained through great effort.

Jnanakarmasamucchaya
("combination of awareness and action") Religious discipline for ending the bondage and reincarnation (samsara) of the soul, which was advocated by members of the bhedabhada ("identity-in-difference") philosophical school. According to this school, correct awareness (jnana) and ritual action (karma) were both necessary elements in gaining final liberation of the soul. The preparatory step was to perform meritorious ritual actions—fasting (upavasa), worship, and pilgrimage—to weaken one's negative karmic dispositions, such as greed, anger, and ignorance. These weakened dispositions were later completely destroyed through meditation. The assumptions behind this path were attacked by other philosophical schools, particularly the Advaita Vedanta school, which minimized the value of ritual action and claimed that final liberation came from awareness alone.

Jnanamarga
("Path of Realization") One of Hinduism's three generally accepted paths to gain final liberation of the soul, along with the Path of Devotion (bhaktimarga) and the Path of Action (karmamarga). While the bhaktimarga stresses devotion to God and the karmamarga emphasizes selfless action in the world, the jnanamarga stresses realizing the ultimate identity of one's individual Self (atman) and Ultimate Reality (Brahman). This realization is usually described as coming in a flash of insight, which may take years of effort to attain but which fundamentally shifts one's perspective on the world.

Jnana ("knowledge") Mudra
A particular symbolic hand gesture (mudra) in Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual. In the jnana mudra, the tips of the thumb and index finger are touching, with the palm and hand held across the region of the heart. As its name clearly shows, it is used to indicate a profound understanding of the basic workings of the universe.

Jnana ("organ of awareness") In Indian philosophy, jnana refers to any of the sense organs, traditionally considered to be the eyes, ears, tongue, nose, and skin.

Jnaneshvar
(1275–1296?) Poet and saint who is the first great figure in the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba at his temple at Pandharpur in the modern state of Maharashtra. According to tradition, Jnaneshvar was an outcaste brahmin. He incurred this penalty because his father was a lapsed ascetic—he left his wife to become an ascetic, only to rejoin his family at his guru's command. Jnaneshvar came from a very religious family: His sister Muktibai is revered by the Varkaris in her own right, and his elder brother Nivrttinath is supposed to have been a "spiritual grandson" of the great ascetic Goraknath. Varkari tradition makes clear that Jnaneshvar lived much of his life in the town of Alandi, but the truth of the accounts of many events associated with his life is questionable—for example, he is said to have caused a buffalo to recite the sacred text known as the Veda in order to humble the pride of the local brahmin priests. Jnaneshvar’s greatest work was the Jnaneshvari, a Marathi-language commentary on the Bhagavad Gita, one of the most influential Hindu religious texts. He is also famous for his songs in praise of Vithoba, which the Varkaris still sing today. For further information see G. A. Deleury, The Cult of Vithoba, 1960; and Justin Abbott and Narhar R. Godbole (trans.), Stories of Indian Saints, 1982.

Jnaneshvari
Marathi-language commentary on the Bhagavad Gita, one of the most influential Hindu religious texts. The Jnaneshvari was composed by the Maharashtrian poet-saint Jnaneshvar, whose intentions in writing it were to make the Bhagavad Gita accessible to the common people, who were not able to read the text in the original Sanskrit, and to give his own learned interpretation of the text’s contents. This emphasis on giving ordinary people full access to religious life was one of the consistent themes in the (devotional) bhakti movement and, like many other figures, Jnaneshvar is reported to have faced considerable opposition from the brahmin priests, who thought that such advanced teachings should not be revealed to the common public.

Jogi
(variant of yogi, “adept”) An epithet for various sorts of ascetics. It often refers to the Nathpanthis, followers of the teacher Gorakhnath. Their designation as “jogis” comes from the fact that the practice of yoga, particularly hatha yoga, is one of the major emphases in their religious life. The term may also refer to the Aghoris.

Joking Relationships
Within the traditional Hindu joint family, the types of relationships within a single generation differ markedly according to family status, particularly among the family’s adult brothers and their wives. As the eventual head of the family, the oldest brother is usually portrayed as a serious and grave authority figure, toward whom everyone must act with respect. The eldest brother’s wife is also given considerable respect, but she is also said to share a “joking relationship” with her husband’s younger brothers, as do all wives with their husband’s younger brothers. Whereas women are expected to behave decorously toward relatives with higher status, joking relationships have much greater freedom of expression. These are usually characterized as full of banter and casual conversation that would be inappropriate with a person of higher status.

Jones, Sir William
(1746–1794) Founder of the Asiatic Society of Bengal and one of the fathers of modern Indology. Jones came to Calcutta from England in 1783 as a Supreme Court judge during the governorship of Warren Hastings, considered one of the founders of the British Empire in India. He was employed by the East India Company, who, in its pursuit of trade and profit, acquired political power over regions of India. Jones immediately applied himself to the study of Sanskrit, in part to discover the particulars of traditional Hindu law, since the East India Company’s general policy was to allow different religious communities to be governed by their own traditional laws. Jones was a linguistic genius who had mastered the current and classical European languages, as well as Persian. He immediately recognized Sanskrit as a distant relative of Greek and Latin, and through his influence the serious study of Sanskrit texts began. From a legal perspective, his most important work was a translation of the laws of Manu (Manu Smrti). This was one of the most important texts in the dharma literature and prescribed ideal rules and regulations for all sorts of human conduct. This translation was intended to give the British some idea of classical Hindu law, but they failed to realize that this text was composed not as a legal manual but as a guide to religious life. Jones died at age forty-eight from an inflammation of the liver. His translation was published posthumously.

Joshimath
Town and sacred site (tirtha) in the Himalayas on the banks of the Alakananda River, in the Chamoli district of the state of Uttar Pradesh. Joshimath is the location of the Jyotir math, one of the four maths, or dwelling places for ascetics, supposedly established by the philosopher Shankaracharya. The Jyotir math is home to Dashanami Sanyasis, or twice-born renunciant ascetics. According to local legend, the Jyotir Math is the place where Shankaracharya attained the ultimate realization and composed his commentaries on the Hindu scriptures. Aside from the Jyotir math, Joshimath is famous for its connection to a temple dedicated to Narasimha, the god Vishnu’s Man-Lion avatar. This temple was also reportedly established by Shankaracharya and contains several stunning sculptural images. Joshimath is an important transit point on the road to the temple at Badrinath, and it is also the winter seat of Badrinath’s presiding deity, where he (symbolically represented by a traveling image) resides and is worshiped during the winter months, when Badrinath becomes snowbound and inaccessible.

Juggernaut
Anglicized form of Jagannath, who is the presiding deity of the temple with the same name in the eastern Indian city of Puri. The word “juggernaut,” which in general English usage refers to anything that requires blind devotion or horrible sacrifice, comes from a widespread myth surrounding the procession of Jagannath, or Juggernaut, and his two siblings around Puri during the Rath Yatra each summer. The cars that carry them in the procession are enormous—Jagannath’s measures forty-five feet high and thirty feet wide, and travels on sixteen wheels that are seven feet high—and are drawn by ropes pulled by hundreds of people. One of the staple fictions of British colonial lore described Jagannath’s frenzied devotees (bhakta) committing suicide by throwing themselves under the car’s wheels, in order to die in the sight of the god. Despite the legendary status of such stories, suicides of this sort were in fact extremely uncommon: most of those who died under the wheels of the Juggernaut procession were pulling the ropes when they lost their footing, fell into the car’s path, and were prevented from escaping by the crushing crowds.

Juna (“Old”) Akhara
Name of one of seven subgroups of the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. The subgroups are known as akharas and are similar to regiments of an army. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century the Nagas were primarily mercenary soldiers but were also active in merchandise trading; neither of these characteristics applies in contemporary times. Members of the Juna Akhara revere the sage Dattatreya as their “tutelary deity,” the primary deity from which they learn; each of the akharas have different tutelary deities. Some accounts say Bhairava was the patron deity of the Juna Akhara in earlier times, which would explain the fact that the group is also known as the Bhairava Akhara. The literal meaning of the present name and its connection with Bhairava imply that it is very old. In contemporary times it is a large organization found only in northern India. In some places it is given low status for admitting members from the lower social classes.
Up until the middle of the present century, the Juna Akhara marched with the Niranjani Akhara in the bathing (snana) processions during the Kumbha Mela and was thus considered a subsidiary part of that akhara. For most of this century the Junas were upset that they held subordinate status despite the fact that they have far more members than any other akhara. The Junas began their attempt to gain the status of a separate procession with the 1903 Haridwar Kumbha Mela, but were not accorded this position until 1962. The akharas agreed that during a Haridwar Kumbha Mela, the Junas would lead the Sanyasi processions for the bathing on the festival of Shivaratri. However, the Niranjanis would be first for the other two major bathing days—the new moon in Chaityra and the Kumbha bath on April 14. This arrangement broke down at the 1998 Kumbha Mela in Haridwar, when the Junas demanded that they be allowed to go first at the Chaityra bath as well, based on their status as the largest akhara. On the day of the second bath, this disagreement erupted into a full-scale riot between ascetic groups and police in which many people were hurt. There was great worry that such violence would recur on the main bathing day, but the day came off without incident when the Juna Akhara boycotted the bathing processions.

Jupiter

In Hindu astrology, a planet associated with knowledge, power, and good character. In Sanskrit, Jupiter's name is guru, and its importance in Hindu astrology reflects the importance of the guru or religious figure in Hindu religious life. Jupiter is the most powerful of the benevolent planets—the others are the sun, moon, Mercury, and Venus—although for each person Jupiter's powers vary according to its place in the natal horoscope, or alignment of the heavenly bodies at the time of birth, and the influence of friendly or hostile planets. During the week, Jupiter presides over Thursday which, because of the planet's astrological powers, is considered an auspicious, or lucky, day.

Jutha

In its most general sense, jutha refers to any food that has come into contact with saliva. Such contact is believed to render that food impure and unfit for anyone else to eat. Since eating is traditionally done with one's fingers, any food on one's plate after one has begun to eat is considered contaminated by association, even if it has not yet been taken into one's mouth. As with all bodily fluids, saliva is considered particularly impure, a substance that "imprints" food with the nature of the person eating it. Eating food from the same plate is a sign of extreme closeness—most commonly done by husband and wife, but also by very close friends. Conversely, eating another's person's leftovers is a sign of extreme status difference—it is done only by people who are desperately poor, by disciples as a sign of devotion to their guru or religious leader, or by devotees (bhakta) receiving prasad or sanctified food, the vehicle for grace from their chosen deity.

Jwalamukhi

(“flame mouth”) Presiding deity of the Jwalamukhi shrine in the state of Himachal Pradesh, and one of the nine Shivalik goddesses. According to the site's mythic charter, Jwalamukhi is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the goddess that spreads throughout the Indian subcontinent. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess; in the case of Jwalamukhi the body part was Sati's tongue. The human tongue is an extremely powerful part of the body—connected with speech, eating, and sex—and thus Jwalamukhi is considered a very powerful shrine. The cave containing the shrine has a small vent of natural gas, which has been lit for as long as people can remember. This flame is believed to be a self-manifested (svayambhu) form of the Goddess, here in the form of her tongue. For further information see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986; and Kathleen Erndl, Victory To The Mother, 1993. See also pitha.
Jyeshth
According to the lunar calendar, by which most Hindu religious festivals are determined, Jyeshth is the third month in the lunar year, usually falling in May–June. This is considered the first month in the hot season: The weather in this month is scorchingly hot and bone dry. The major holidays in Jyeshth are Achala Ekadashi, Savitri Puja, Ganga Dashahara, and Nirjala Ekadashi.

Jyotirlinga
(“linga of light”) In several different mythic sources, the first manifestation of the god Shiva is described as a giant pillar-shaped image that mark places where the god Shiva is believed to have appeared in a shaft of light.

The Mahakaleshvar Temple in the city of Ujjain. This site contains one of the twelve jyotirlingas, pillar-shaped images that mark places where the god Shiva is believed to have appeared in a shaft of light.
pillar of fire, which stretches above the heavens and below the earth. The gods Brahma and Vishnu try to find this pillar’s top and bottom but cannot. When they admit their failure, the figure of Shiva emerges from the pillar of light and blesses them. Shiva’s devotees (bhakta) believe that there are twelve sites in India where this jyotirlinga came down to earth; these twelve sites are deemed extraordinarily holy, and at each of them Shiva is believed to be uniquely present. At each of these sites the primary image is a linga, the pillar-shaped image that is a symbolic form of Shiva. Each of these lingas is considered a different manifestation of Shiva, and these twelve sites each take the name of the linga that is their presiding deity. The other eleven manifestations of Shiva and their locations are: Somnath and Nageshvar in the state of Gujarat; Kedarnath in the Himalaya Mountains; Vishvanath in the city of Benares; Vaidyanath in the state of Bihar; Mahakaleshwar in the central Indian city of Ujjain; Omkareshvar in the state of Madhya Pradesh; Bhimashankar, Ghrneshwar, and Tryambakeshvar in the state of Maharashtra; and Rameshvar in the state of Tamil Nadu.

Jyotir Math

One of the four maths or sacred centers traditionally believed to have been established by the great philosopher Shankaracharya; the others are the Sharada math, Shringeri math, and Govardhan math. These four sacred centers are each associated with one of the four geographical corners of the Indian subcontinent; the Jyotir math is in the northern quarter, in the town of Joshimath in the state of Uttar Pradesh, high in the Himalaya Mountains. Shankaracharya is traditionally cited as the founder of the Dashanami Sanyasis, the most prestigious Hindu ascetic order. The Dashanami (“ten names”) ascetics are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva and are separated into ten divisions, each with a different name. These ten divisions are organized into four larger groups—Anandawara, Bhogawara, Bhuriwara, and Kitawara—each of which has two or three of the ten divisions, and each of which is associated with one of the four sacred centers. Of these, the Jyotir math is associated with the Anandawara group of the Dashanamis.

Jyotisha

In its most general usage, the word jyotisha refers to astrology. The word itself is derived from jyotis (“light,” and by extension the heavenly bodies) and is concerned with the movement of the celestial bodies, their varying configurations, and the divisions of time that are derived from them. This attention to the heavens is a very old cultural concern, for jyotisha is one of the six Vedangas, the auxiliary branches of knowledge connected with the sacred scriptures known as the Vedas. As one of the Vedangas, jyotisha was concerned with identifying appropriate days and times to perform Vedic sacrifices.

Even in modern times, many traditional Hindus take astrology very seriously, based on the assumption that the results of one’s previous karma lead one to be born at a particular moment. One’s natal horoscope, or the positioning of the celestial bodies at the time of birth, thus provides a karmic “itinerary” indicating where one has been and what one might expect in the future. People frequently consider astrology when making important decisions, particularly in arranging marriages—to determine the couple’s compatibility, to see whether any trouble is lurking ahead, and to arrange an auspicious or lucky time for the ceremony itself. In the same way, some Hindus will consult an astrologer before beginning any important undertaking, to be sure that the work will begin at an auspicious time and will therefore be more likely to succeed.

The basic principles of Indian astrology are very similar to those of Western astrology. The zodiac signs are nearly identical. However, the two systems... have a different method for determining each sign's starting point, causing some discrepancies between the two systems. Aside from the sun, moon, and five visible planets in Western astrology, Indian astrology has two additional planets, Rahu and Ketu, which are both considered inauspicious and malevolent. In addition to the twelve signs of the solar zodiac, Indian astrology also has a lunar zodiac with twenty-seven “lunar mansions” (nakshatras), each of which has particular qualities. Although at the most basic level astrological reckoning is fairly simple, it can quickly become highly complex and is thus generally left to professional astrologers. This is still a viable profession throughout much of India, since the generally accepted belief that some times are auspicious and others inauspicious means that ordinary people will hire specialists to keep them informed of these times.
Kabandha

(“headless trunk”) A demon in the Ramayana (the earlier of the two great Hindu epics) who attacks the god-king Rama, the epic’s protagonist, and Rama’s brother Lakshmana. In a previous life Kabandha has been a king of the gandharvas, or celestial musicians; but in a battle with the god Indra, Kabandha’s head is pushed down into his body. When Kabandha requests some means by which he can eat, Indra places a mouth in Kabandha’s belly. Indra tells him that the curse will be broken when Rama and Lakshmana cut off his arms.

As Rama and Lakshmana travel through a forest, searching for Rama’s kidnapped wife Sita, they are set upon by Kabandha, who grabs each of them in one of his long arms. Finding they could not escape, Rama and Lakshmana each slash off one of his arms, and with his dying breaths Kabandha asks the brothers to burn his body. As the body is burning, the gandharva king arises from the fire in his previous form and advises the brothers to seek help from the monkey-king Sugriva.

Kabir
(mid-15th c.?) A poet who is widely regarded as one of the greatest northern Indian religious figures. Kabir is among a group of central and northern Indian poet-saints known as Sants who shared several tendencies: emphasis on individualized, interior religion leading to a personal experience of the divine; disdain for external ritual, particularly image worship; faith in the power of the divine Name; and a tendency to ignore hierarchical distinctions between castes. Kabir strongly adhered to these beliefs—in his writings he uncompromisingly attacks any sort of religious practice based on habit or tradition, including asceticism, special modes of dress, fasting (upavasa), image worship, caste, and scripture.

In his poetry, Kabir identifies himself as belonging to a caste of weavers (julaha), and according to tradition he supported himself through this occupation. Kabir’s history makes it difficult to link him with a particular religion. In Arabic, the name Kabir (“Great”) is one of the names given to Allah in the Qur’an, identifying him as a Muslim. However, his poetry reveals his great knowledge of Hindu religious life. It is generally believed that the members of Kabir’s julaha community were recent converts to Islam who had not yet been fully assimilated. Kabir’s poetry, however, clearly shows that he considered himself neither Hindu nor Muslim. Part of Kabir’s popularity undoubtedly stems from his blunt, passionate affirmation that real religious attainment is only gained by internal, individual experience of the divine, to which he gives the name Ram. This is not the god-king who is the hero of the Ramayana, but a name for the indescribable, absolute Supreme Reality. Both of these emphases reflect the influence of the Nathpanthi ascetics, who also stressed internal experience and yoga.

In one of his songs, Kabir once boasted that he had been so absorbed in the divine that he had never put pen to paper. His songs remain popular even today, and many of his shorter epigrams have become proverbial sayings. Kabir’s oldest attested poetry survives in three major collections: one in the Adigranth, the Sikh scripture also known as the “Primal Book”; one collected by the Dadupanth, the religious organization founded by the Sant poet-saint Dadu; and the Bijak, which was compiled by the Kabirpanth, a religious community that claimed Kabir as its guru (religious preceptor). The significant differences

Kabirpanth

Religious community whose members are followers of the northern Indian poet-saint Kabir. Some Kabirpanthis are ascetics, and some are householders. The group’s most important center is located in Benares (where Kabir is believed to have lived) and houses an ascetic community. Although in his poetry Kabir rejects ritual, worship, and reliance on anything but one’s own unmediated experience—a context implying the practice of yoga—the Kabirpanth has taken on all of these conventional religious trappings. The community’s sacred text is the Bijak, a collection of poems and epigrams attributed to Kabir. Its sacred centers have pictures of Kabir, who has become an object of worship. Elaborate rituals are performed on certain prescribed days. This situation is ironic because it appears that many of the practices Kabir condemned have been adopted by the community professing to follow his teachings. Given Kabir’s continual emphasis on the need for unmediated personal experience of the divine, the notion that he would be seen as the founder of a sect would itself have been outrageous to him. For further information see David Lorenzen, “Traditions of Non-Caste Hinduism: The Kabir Panth,” in Contributions to Indian Sociology, Vol. 21, No. 2, 1987.

Kadambari

Sanskrit romance novel authored by the writer and dramatist Bana (7th c.), who was a contemporary of the northern Indian emperor Harsha. The love story between the main characters, a princess named Kadambari and a prince named Chandripida, is but one element of the book’s complex plot. The Kadambari was left unfinished at Bana’s death. It gives a detailed picture of Indian life during Bana’s time.

Kadru

In Hindu mythology, the daughter of the divine sage Daksha and sister of Vinata. Kadru gives birth to a line of serpents, whereas her sister’s children are born as eagles, the most famous of whom is Garuda. The well-known hostility between these species is attributed to a conflict between Vinata and Kadru: one day they are arguing about the tail color of a certain celestial horse, with Vinata arguing that it is white and Kadru asserting that it is black. The disagreement becomes more intense until they finally agree that whoever is wrong will become a slave to the other. To ensure her victory, Kadru persuades a number of her snake children to hang from the back of the horse. From a distance the tail appears to be black. (Some of her children disapprove of such dishonesty and refuse to participate. In revenge Kadru curses them to die in the snake-killing sacrifice performed by King Janamjeya.) When Vinata sees the black snakes, she believes she has been defeated and serves Kadru under extremely harsh conditions for many years. Vinata is finally rescued by her son Garuda, who discovers the fraud behind Vinata’s defeat and embarks on a program of killing snakes that has never stopped.

Kaikeyi

In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Kaikeyi is the second wife of King Dasharatha, the mother of Bharata, and foster mother to Rama, the epic’s protagonist. Kaikeyi is directly responsible for one of the most villainous acts in the Ramayana: She forces Rama into fourteen years of exile in the forest, a major event in the epic's plot. Despite her evil action, she is not considered an evil person, but rather a person who acts out of love for her son yet who is burdened with extremely bad judgment and bad advice. When Dasharatha announces that he intends to anoint Rama as the heir to the throne, Kaikeyi is as happy as everyone else. Rama has always respected her as much as his own mother, Kausalya, and has treated Bharata as his equal. But as the day of the ceremony approached, Kaikeyi's mind is slowly poisoned by her maid, Manthara. Manthara convinces Kaikeyi that after Rama has been crowned the heir-apparent, she and Bharata will be treated as little more than chattel, or objects, if they are allowed to live at all.

Kaikeyi's concern for her son leads her to drastic action. Many years before, Dasharatha gave Kaikeyi two boons, or rewards, for her help in winning a great battle. She has never redeemed these boons, but now demands that Dasharatha exile Rama to the forest for fourteen years and crown Bharata as ruler in his place. Dasharatha pleads with Kaikeyi, but she does not change her mind. He is finally forced to grant her wish. Kaikeyi's request brings her disgrace not only from her husband, who curses her for separating him from Rama, but also from her son. Bharata rebukes Kaikeyi for depriving Rama of what is rightfully his, and refuses to rule until Rama orders him to serve in his place during the exile. The only person who does not condemn her is Rama, whom the epic portrays as serenely happy to obey his parents' commands, whatever they might be.

Kailas
Himalayan peak in southwestern Tibet renowned as a pilgrimage place (tirtha) for both Hindus and Buddhists. In Hindu mythology, Kailas is believed to be Mount Meru, the center of the universe. It is also believed that the top of Mount Kailas, overlooking the Chiu Monastery in Tibet. Kailas is considered to be the mythic Mount Meru, home of the god Shiva and the center of the universe.

Mount Kailas is the place where the god Shiva makes his home. For both Hindus and Buddhists, the central act of pilgrimage to Kailas is to walk around the mountain, thus symbolically traversing the entire earth. The journey begins at Manasarovar, a lake near the mountain’s base, which in Hindu mythology is esteemed as the lake of the gods. Many factors combine to make the sixty-five-mile circuit an extremely difficult journey: The area is extremely remote, the climate is harsh and unforgiving even in June (the customary pilgrimage time), and the circuit itself is physically strenuous, with its highest point over 19,000 feet above sea level. Storms can suddenly arise at any time of the year, and pilgrims who are unprepared can easily die of exposure. Given these difficulties, relatively few people perform this pilgrimage; it raises the status of those who do. For many years Chinese prohibitions on travel in Tibet made it impossible for people to undertake this pilgrimage. Since the early 1990s these rules have been relaxed and small groups of religious pilgrims are again making the sacred journey.

Kailasanatha
The largest and most famous of the rock-cut temples at Ellora in the state of Maharashtra; the temple is dedicated to the god Shiva in his form as the “Lord of Mount Kailas.” The temple was constructed late in the eighth century by kings of the Rashtrakuta dynasty and completed during the reign of Krishna I. The Kailasanatha temple is modeled after other contemporary temples: its main elements are an outer gateway, an assembly hall, and a central shrine (garbhagrha) surrounded by a processional path (pradakshina) to smaller shrines. It is set on a high platform base topped with a ninety-six-foot-high spire representing Mount Kailas in the Himalayas and covered with decorative carving. The amazing point about this temple is that the entire structure is a sculpture—workers carved it out of a single rock outcropping, starting at the top and working down. It is estimated that during construction, the builders had to remove three million cubic feet of stone from the temple and the excavated courtyards surrounding it. See also caves, artificial.

Kaitabha
In Hindu mythology, one of two demons who attempt to kill the god Brahma (the other is Madhu). The story is recounted in several mythic sources, with some important differences among them. All versions agree that Madhu and Kaitabha are born from the god Vishnu’s earwax during the period of cosmic dissolution (pralaya). As the creation of the world begins, a lotus sprouts from Vishnu’s navel. It opens to reveal the creator-god, Brahma, who is immediately attacked by Madhu and Kaitabha. In all versions of the myth, Brahma appeals for help. Vishnu tricks the demons (who are strong but not too bright) and slays them. The difference comes in the deity to whom Brahma appeals for help. The story first appears in the mythology of Vishnu; here Brahma invokes that deity. Yet this same story also appears in the Devimahatmya, the earliest mythic source for the cult of the Mother Goddess as the supreme divine power. In this version, Brahma’s hymn of praise is to the Goddess, who in her form as Yoganidra (“sleep of yoga”) has lulled Vishnu into a cosmic stupor, rendering him unable to come to Brahma’s aid. Pleased by Brahma’s praise, the Goddess withdraws her influence over Vishnu; he awakens and slays the demons.

Kaivalya
(“isolation”) In Samkhya and Yoga, two of the six schools of Hindu philosophy, kaivalya is the state of final liberation. A person who has attained kaivalya has fully comprehended the difference between two important principles: the conscious but inert purusha, which is identified as the Self, and the active but unconscious prakrti. According to Samkhya metaphysics, confusion between these two eternally distinct principles triggers the evolution of subjective consciousness and the exterior world, in which the eternal Self becomes the witness to repeated rebirths. Of the two schools, Samkhya provides the theoretical explanation for bondage and liberation of the soul, whereas Yoga provides the method to liberation. The purpose in performing yoga is to help the person distinguish between these two principles, removing obstructions to understanding, particularly the karmic tendencies rooted in egoism. According to the Yoga Sutras, the foundational text for the Yoga school, those who can distinguish between these two principles and discern the soul’s identity with the purusha attain independence from all external causes, mastery over all states of being, and omniscience. For further information see Gerald Larson and Ram Shankar Bhattacharya (eds.), Samkhya: A Dualist Tradition in Indian Philosophy, 1987; and Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Kajari Teej
One of two festivals called Teej. See Teej.

Kala
In Sanskrit and its daughter languages, a word that can mean both “time” and “death.” Kala is used as one of the alternate names for the god Yama, the lord of death and the master of all living beings.

Kalahasti
Temple and sacred site (tirtha) in the southern state of Andhra Pradesh, about fifty miles east of the town of Tirupati and 125 miles northwest of the city of Madras. Kalahasti is famous as one of the bhutalingas (“elemental lingas”), a network of five southern Indian sites sacred to the god Shiva. At each of these sites Shiva is worshiped as a linga, the pillar-shaped object that is his symbolic form, and at each site the linga is believed to be formed from one of the five primordial elements (bhuta)—earth, wind, fire, water, and space (akasha). Kalahasti’s linga is associated with the element of wind, and the manifestation of Shiva there is Kalahasteshvar, the “Lord of Kalahasti.”

Kalahasti is also one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites throughout the subcontinent that are sacred to the Goddess. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess; in the case of Kalahasti the body part was Sati’s left shoulder. Kalahasti’s sanctity is thus reinforced by having two highly powerful and sacred sites to two different deities. See also pitha.

Kalamukha
(“black face”) Extinct monastic sect whose members were devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva and whose name may refer to their practice of marking their heads with a black streak. Little is known about their doctrines or practices. While there are contemporary literary references to the Kapalikas, another extinct Shaivite ascetic community, the only sources for the Kalamukhas are a series of inscriptions. From these inscriptions we know that the Kalamukhas were strongest in the Karnataka region, although they were also present in other southern Indian regions. They flourished between the ninth and thirteenth centuries.

Kalasha
(“pitcher”) In the Nagar style of temple architecture predominantly found in northern India, the kalasha is an inverted vase-shaped piece that crowns the temple towers (shikharas). In many cases, kalashas were made of gold to provide a decorative contrast above the stone. The kalasha on the highest tower typically has a banner fluttering from it. The architectural symbolism in Hindu temples corresponds to the structure of human body, so the kalashas stand for the crown of the head, the highest and purest part of the body. They are also a symbol of the highest human religious potential.

Kalhana
(12th c.) Kashmiri poet and author of the Rajatarangini ("River of Kings"), a poetic chronicle of the kings of Kashmir. Kalhana's chronicle is an unusually descriptive and accurate history of Kashmir and its political, social, and religious institutions. The text’s only shortcoming is that it pays little attention to the outside world. Kalhana’s historical emphasis is unusual for Indian writers, and his chronicle is one of the few indigenous Indian histories.

Kali
("black") Incomprehensibly fierce and powerful divine form of the Mother Goddess. Kali is the awful, uncontrolled power of the divine in its most terrifying aspects. She is consistently associated with images of blood, death, and destruction; her dwelling place is the cremation ground. Her iconography portrays her as clothed with severed heads and limbs, and her form is lean, gaunt, and haggard, with lolling tongue and lips smeared with blood. Paradoxically, millions of Kali’s devotees (bhakta) refer to her as “mother.”

Kali’s roots are uncertain, but she is generally assumed to be an autochthonous (“of the land”) deity. Her dark color—associated with low social status, her preference for dwelling in inaccessible places, and her worship by Indian aboriginal tribes and people at the margins of society, all seem to point to origins as a local goddess, perhaps of tribal people. Some early Sanskrit dramas, such as the poet Bhavabhuti’s Malatimadhava, mention fierce goddesses who received offerings of blood from their devotees. This same motif was a central element in the stories about the Thugs in the nineteenth century.

One of Kali’s earliest descriptions comes in the Devimahatmya, the earliest known source for the notion that God is feminine. One of the Devimahatmya’s episodes describes the birth of Kali (in her form as Mahakali) as the anger of the Goddess incarnate. In the story, Kali first destroys the demon armies by stuffing them into her mouth and eating them whole, symbolizing her all-consuming power to destroy. Her other feat in this text is the destruction of Raktabija, a demon who receives the boon that any drop of his blood that falls to the earth will instantly turn into a clone of him—a boon that renders him practically unconquerable. Kali defeats him by drinking his blood as it is shed until it is completely gone. Both of these episodes reinforce her image as a terrifying and powerful goddess, her destructive capacity, and her associations with substances and practices normally considered to be defiling. As Kinsley notes, Kali can also be seen as a symbolic statement that human life is uncertain and that tragedy and misfortune can occur without warning, despite the best-laid plans.

Worship of Kali has followed two paths, one in agreement with these horrific images and one in contradiction to them. On one hand, Kali has been an important deity for practitioners of the secret, ritually-based religious practice known as tantra. The tantras describe reality as resulting from the interaction between polar opposites, symbolized in the deities of Shiva (consciousness) and Shakti (“power”). Shiva provides the ordering principle and is the Ultimate Reality, but Shakti provides the energy and dynamism that actually makes things happen. Consequently, goddesses take on an important role in tantric practice. Among these goddesses Kali stands preeminent, perhaps because she is the most radical articulation of feminine power and can thus be seen as bringing the greatest power to bear on behalf of her devotees. Her power over all things and Shiva’s helplessness without this power is symbolized by the images of Kali standing over the prostrate Shiva, clearly in a dominant position. In this tradition, the tantric expert is seen as a heroic figure who gains power from the goddess.

The tantras also stress the reconciliation of opposites as a way to destroy all conceptual dualism and affirm the ultimate unity of the entire universe. To carry this out, tantric rituals may include practices involving substances normally forbidden, such as the so-called Panchamakara, or “Five Forbidden Things,” as a way to affirm the provisional nature of all judgments of purity and impurity (ashaucha). Again, Kali is the quintessential tantric deity, since her iconography and mythology involve things normally considered impure: drinking blood and receiving animal sacrifices, living in the cremation ground, and clothing herself with severed limbs.

The other dominant image for the worship of Kali is as a mother. This image is preeminent in the Bengal region, and has become widely established there during the past few hundred years. This image of Kali is rooted in Indian images of motherhood, which are greatly idealized in terms of a mother’s devotion to her children. The central belief is that if a devotee approaches Kali as a submissive child, ready to take whatever blows she gives, she will ultimately turn her awesome forces toward protecting her devotee. Kali’s most famous devotees are the nineteenth-century Bengali figures Ramprasad and Ramakrishna; the former is famous for a poem in which he states that there are bad children but never a bad mother.

Religious adepts such as Ramprasad and Ramakrishna have been able to maintain this tension between Kali’s horrific persona and her image as a mother, but in popular devotion this tension has been largely lost. Modern images of Kali tend to sweeten or ignore her horrific aspects, often portraying her as young, beautiful, and almost benevolent. For more information on Kali, see David R. Kinsley, The Sword and the Flute, 1975; and Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Kalibangan
Archeological site in the western state of Rajasthan, a short distance from the border with Pakistan. Kalibangan is one of the cities of the Indus Valley Civilization and is part of cluster of cities in what many archaeologists believe was the Saraswati River valley, although at present the river disappears into the desert. The site at Kalibangan is nearly as large as the cities at Harappa, Mohenjo-Daro, and Lothal. The city plan is virtually identical to the others, thus revealing the scope of this mysterious ancient culture.

Kalidasa
(5th c.?) Generally considered the greatest Sanskrit writer, noted both for his command of the language and his ability to evoke poetic emotion (rasa) in his listeners. There is little definite information about Kalidasa’s life; even the dates of his birth and death have been widely debated. According to legend, Kalidasa was an illiterate village boy. As a joke he was presented as a suitor for a learned princess who had vowed that she would only marry a man who could defeat her in a silent debate—that is, a debate using gestures instead of words. Kalidasa “defeated” the princess through coincidence and mutual misunderstanding and became her husband. When the princess discovered the depths of Kalidasa’s ignorance, she threw him out of the house, ordering him not to return until he had become educated. In desperation he went to a temple of the goddess Kali and was about to offer himself as a human sacrifice, when Kali appeared to him and gave him absolute mastery of Sanskrit. Upon his return, his wife is reported to have asked him, “Have you gained proficiency in [Sanskrit] speech?” (‘Asti kascit vagviseshatah?"). Kalidasa gave his answer over time, using the three words in his wife's question as the first words of his three greatest works—Kumarasambhava, Meghaduta, and Raghuvamsha. He is also the author of the dramas Abhijnanashakuntala, Vikramorvashiya, and the Malavikagnimitra. These works reportedly gained him the patronage of king Vikramaditya, with whose court Kalidasa is traditionally associated.

Legend also recounts that Kalidasa's miraculous gift of learning caused his death. Since his wife had spurred his search for learning, Kalidasa thought of her as his guru or religious teacher. Out of respect, he refused all sexual relations with her. Enraged at his refusal, she cursed him to meet his death at the hands of a woman. Many years later, a king composed a line of verse and offered a large prize to the person who could compose the best ending. Kalidasa heard about this contest while enjoying the company of a courtesan and effortlessly composed the perfect ending. In her greed for the prize, the courtesan stabbed and killed Kalidasa. Although her crime was discovered and she was punished, this legend illustrates the Hindu belief in the unstoppable power of fate, particularly when driven by a curse.

Kalighat
Temple dedicated to the goddess Kali in the southern section of modern Calcutta. This temple is several hundred years old and is considered one of the most important temples in Calcutta. The city's name is supposedly an anglicized version of the temple's name. Local tradition claims that Kalighat is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the Goddess. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess; in the case of Kalighat the body part was one of Sati's toes. See also pitha.

Kalika Devi
Name of both a shrine in the Shiwalik Hills (foothills of the Himalayas) and of its presiding deity. Kalika Devi is one of the nine Shiwalik goddesses and is believed to be a form of the goddess Kali. The temple itself is in the town of Kalka, on the road between the cities of Chandigarh and Simla. As is the case with many of the other Shiwalik goddesses, the image of Kalika Devi is a natural stone outcropping. This is considered a self-manifested (svayambhu) form of the Goddess. Unlike many of the other Shiwalik goddesses, the Hindi literature on this shrine does not claim that the temple is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the Goddess, mythically connected as places where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth. Instead, the literature simply commends the temple for its power and majesty. The literature does note, however, that local priests claim it as the place where Sati's hair fell to earth. This illustrates both the influence that pamphlet literature can have in channeling pilgrim traffic and the need to tie one's site into the network of the Shakti Pithas.

The stone outcropping that forms Kalika Devi's image is considered to be her head. According to tradition, Kali took the form of a beautiful woman and came to the temple to sing festive songs during the festival of Navaratri. The local monarch was so smitten by her voice and beauty that he asked her to marry him. Enraged at this insult, Kali cursed the king to lose his kingdom. As a further sign of her displeasure, she caused the temple image to begin sinking into the earth. At the plea of an ardent devotee, she allowed the head of the image to remain visible. Kalimath
Mandakini River about ten miles from the village of Guptakashi; the Mandakini is one of the Himalayan tributaries that combine to create the Ganges. According to local tradition, Kalimath is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the Goddess. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess. Local sources claim that Kalimath is the place where Sati's vulva fell to earth. It took form there as the goddess Kali, thus associating a highly charged female body part with a powerful and often dangerous form of the Goddess. The temple's image of the Goddess is extremely unusual—a brass plate a little more than a foot square, whose center is cut out in a small triangle, an aniconic symbol of the Goddess. This plate supposedly covers a pit—a clear symbol of the part of Sati's body which is supposed to have fallen there—but the area under the plate is deemed so sacred that looking under it is forbidden.

The claim that Kalimath is the place where Sati's vulva fell to earth illustrates the fluidity of the Indian sacred landscape. There is a much more widely accepted tradition associating this specific body part with the temple of Kamakhya in Assam. Such competing claims are not uncommon in the Indian sacred landscape, since people often make these claims to enhance their particular site's sanctity and prestige. It is notable that many Hindus seem little concerned with such apparent inconsistencies, perhaps stemming from the conviction that a single Goddess lies behind all her individual manifestations. See also pitha.

Kalivarjya
The name for a collection of about fifty-five acts “to be avoided in the Kali [Age],” the last age in the cycle of cosmic time after which it is believed the world will be destroyed and recreated. This was one of the strategies used by brahmin scholars to forbid certain religious practices that were prescribed in the sacred literature but were no longer acceptable because of changing ideas. The Kalivarjya prohibitions first appear in texts around the twelfth century C.E. Some of the practices considered acceptable in earlier times but prohibited during the Kali age include certain animal sacrifices prescribed in the Vedas (the earliest Hindu religious texts) and suicide by a person suffering from a terminal illness. For further information see Pandurang Vaman Kane (trans.), A History of Dharmasastra, 1968.

Kaliya
In Hindu mythology, a thousand-headed serpent who is defeated by the adolescent god Krishna in one of the earliest acts foreshadowing the god's future greatness. Kaliya has settled into a deep pool in the Yamuna River, rendering the pool and its surroundings uninhabitable because of the noxious poison he constantly emits. One day as Krishna and his companions tend the cows, Krishna decides to get rid of Kaliya. Despite his friends' pleas, Krishna climbs to the top of a tall tree and dives deep into the pool. A tremendous battle ensues. Krishna finally subdues Kaliya by dancing on his hoods, stamping each of the serpent's heads until blood runs out of Kaliya's mouths. Kaliya's wives beg Krishna to spare his life, and Krishna grants this request but banishes him to a more appropriate place. His mercy mirrors the Hindu world view that even beings such as Kaliya have a rightful place in the world. Although problems arise when such beings are in the wrong place, these can be corrected by sending them to a more appropriate one. For further elaboration of this idea, See John Stratton Hawley, “Krishna's Cosmic Victories,” in Journal of the American Academy of Religion, Vol. 47, No. 2, 1979.
Kali Yuga
A particular age of the world in one of the reckonings of cosmic time. According to traditional belief, time has neither beginning nor end, but alternates between cycles of creation and activity, followed by cessation and quietude. Each of these cycles lasts for 4.32 billion years, with the active phase known as the Day of Brahma, and the quiet phase as the Night of Brahma. In one reckoning of cosmic time, the Day of Brahma is divided into one thousand mahayugas ("great cosmic ages"), each of which lasts for 4.32 million years. Each mahayuga is composed of four yugas, the Kṛta Yuga, Treta Yuga, Dvapara Yuga, and Kali Yuga. Each of these four yugas is shorter than its predecessor and ushers in an era more degenerate and depraved. By the end of the Kali Yuga, things have gotten so bad that the only solution is the destruction and re-creation of the earth, at which time the next Krta era begins.

Kali Yuga is the last of the four yugas, lasting for "only" 432,000 years. It is also considered to be the most degenerate yuga, symbolized by its identification with iron—a metal that is not particularly precious, and whose black color is associated with Saturn, the malevolent planet. Kali Yuga is considered the time when human wickedness runs rampant, virtue virtually disappears, and the world is inexorably falling into ruin. Hindus believe that the Kali Yuga began with the commencement of the great war described in the epic Mahabharata, and not surprisingly, it is the age in which we now live.

Kalka
Town in the Ambala district of the state of Haryana, about ten miles north and east of Chandigarh. Kalka is famous as the site of the temple of Kalika Devi, who is considered to be a form of the goddess Kali and is one of the nine Shiwalik goddesses.

Kalki Avatar
The tenth avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu, and the only one of these incarnations who has not yet appeared. In traditional art, Kalki is portrayed as riding a white horse and brandishing a sword. It is believed that he will come at a time when the state of the world has completely degenerated. His arrival will signal its imminent destruction; his purpose will be to purify the world by destroying the wicked.

Kalpa
The largest unit of cosmic time, equivalent to 4.32 billion years. According to one concept, the kalpa is broken up into one thousand mahayugas, each lasting 4.32 million years. The kalpa, or Day of Brahma, is the longest conceived measure of time and is used to determine the duration of the universe. After the kalpa is complete, it is followed by an equally long "Night of Brahma," a period of universal dissolution (pralaya).
Kalpa
(2) ("proper," “fit”) One of the six Vedangas, auxiliary branches of knowledge connected with the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. The Kalpa section prescribes the rites connected with the Vedic rituals and gives rules for performing ceremonial and sacrificial acts. The other Vedangas are vyakarana (Sanskrit grammar), chandas (Sanskrit prosody), nirukta (etymology), shiksha (correct pronunciation), and jyotisha (auspicious times for sacrifices).

Kalpa Sutras
("aphorisms on sacred law") An important class of smrti or “remembered [literature].” The Kalpa Sutras were first composed around the sixth century B.C.E. The sutras were collected to provide a unified religious and legal worldview. According to the general scholarly consensus, the theory used to associate these sutras imposed an appearance of conceptual order on what was more likely an organic development of Hindu religious law. The Kalpa Sutras are all attributed to famous sages. In theory each Kalpa Sutra contains three separate parts: prescriptions for Vedic rituals (Shrauta Sutras), prescriptions for domestic rites (Grhya Sutras), and prescriptions for appropriate human behavior (Dharma Sutras). The real picture is far more complex since only three sutras contain all three parts and are attributed to a single author. The three surviving Kalpa Sutras are attributed to the sages Apastamba, Baudhayana, and Hiranyakeshin and are all associated with the same school, the Black Yajur Veda. There are many other collections that have one or another of these parts, but not all three. Each of the Kalpa Sutras is also theoretically connected with one of the four Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious texts. However, it is likely that this claim was made to give authority to the collection.

Kalpataru
("wishing-tree") Extensive collection of writings on matters relating to religious law, compiled by the scholar Lakshmidhara in the middle of the twelfth century. The Kalpataru is one of the earliest examples of commentarial literature known as nibandhas ("collections"). The nibandhas were collections of Hindu lore, in which the compilers drew references on a particular theme from the Vedas, dharma literature, puranas, and other authoritative religious texts. Then they compiled these excerpts into a single volume. Each of the Kalpataru’s fourteen volumes is devoted to a particular aspect of Hindu religious life, including daily practice, worship, gift-giving (dana), vows, pilgrimage, penances (prayashchitta), purification, and final liberation of the soul (moksha). As one of the earliest nibandhas, the Kalpataru formed a model for later writers and was also an important resource for them. Lakshmidhara’s writing is unusual because he used very few sources for his work—primarily the epic Mahabharata and a few of the sectarian collections known as puranas. Unlike later commentators, he does not cite the Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious texts, or the prescriptions found in the dharma literature. His text also consists mostly of these excerpted passages with very little commentary of his own, whereas later nibandha writers often give voluminous explanations.

Kalpavas
("residence for a kalpa") Strict religious vow taken during the annual Magh Mela festival in the city of Allahabad during the lunar month of Magh (January–February). Allahabad is located at the confluence of two sacred rivers, the Ganges and the Yamuna. The festival’s primary religious act is bathing (snana) at this confluence. Although most people stay at this festival only a brief time, kalpavasis, or people taking the kalpavas vow, do not leave the site of the festival for the entire month. Kalpavasis also take vows to live a strict ascetic lifestyle, which includes daily baths in the Ganges, a restricted diet, particular dress and worship, and attendance at the religious gatherings known as satsang.

Kama
(2) Minor deity identified as the personification of kama (“desire”). Kama is comparable to the Greek deity Eros and carries similar responsibility for igniting human sexual attraction and sensual desire. Kama is represented as a young man riding on a parrot, armed with a bow and arrows. The bow is a stalk of sugar cane, the bowstring a line of buzzing bees; his five arrows are five different flowers, each bringing a different emotional effect to the person it pierces. The five flowers and emotions are: lotus, infatuation; ashoka, intoxication (with love); mango, exhaustion; jasmine, pining; blue lotus, paralysis. Kama's iconography carries strong associations with spring, and the spring season (personified as another minor deity, Vasant) is perceived as Kama's friend and ally in awakening desire through the regeneration of the natural world and the showy display of spring blossoms.

The most famous episode in Kama's mythology begins with the ascent to power of a demon named Taraka, who can only be killed by a son of Shiva. Taraka seems impossible to defeat, since Shiva has no sons and is in deep meditation, grieving over the death of his wife Sati. The other gods ask Kama to shoot Shiva with an arrow of desire so he will marry the goddess Parvati and produce a son. Kama creeps up on Shiva and shoots him with an arrow. When Shiva realizes who has disturbed his meditation, he releases a stream of fire from the third eye in the middle of his forehead, instantly burning Kama to ashes.

Through Shiva's grace, Kama is eventually brought back to life. One of Kama's epithets or alternate names is Ananga, or “bodiless,” because of the loss of his

Kalpeshvar
Temple and sacred site (tirtha) in the Garhwal region of the Himalayas, about ten miles down the Alakananda River from Joshimath. The temple's presiding deity is the god Shiva in his manifestation as Kalpeshvar, the “Lord of the Cosmic Age.” The Kalpeshvar temple is one of the Panchkedar, a network of five sites in the Garhwal region that are sacred to Shiva; the other four sites are Kedarnath, Rudranath, Tungnath, and Madmaheshvar. Shiva is believed to dwell in the Himalayas. This network of five sites is seen as a symbolic representation of his body. Kalpeshvar represents Shiva's matted locks (jatas).

Karyanamandapam
(“marriage hall”) One of the common architectural features of southern Indian temples built in the Dravida style. The karyanamandapam is a hall where the images of the temple's primary deity and that deity's spouse could be ceremonially united on festival days to symbolize their married state.

Kama
In Indian philosophy, one of the four purusharshas, or aims of life, with the others being artha (wealth, power, and prosperity), dharma (righteousness), and moksha (liberation). The most basic meaning of kama is “desire,” with strong overtones of sexual desire, but kama can also refer to all types of attraction, including aesthetic pleasure from the arts. The most famous treatise on the fulfillment of kama is the Kama Sutra, which details the satisfaction of sexual desires. When pursued within the boundaries of righteous action, or dharma, desires and their satisfaction are recognized as a normal, acceptable part of life. It is when this governing force is absent that the search for pleasure becomes inappropriate and destabilizing.

Kama
(2) Minor deity identified as the personification of kama (“desire”). Kama is comparable to the Greek deity Eros and carries similar responsibility for igniting human sexual attraction and sensual desire. Kama is represented as a young man riding on a parrot, armed with a bow and arrows. The bow is a stalk of sugar cane, the bowstring a line of buzzing bees; his five arrows are five different flowers, each bringing a different emotional effect to the person it pierces. The five flowers and emotions are: lotus, infatuation; ashoka, intoxication (with love); mango, exhaustion; jasmine, pining; blue lotus, paralysis. Kama's iconography carries strong associations with spring, and the spring season (personified as another minor deity, Vasant) is perceived as Kama's friend and ally in awakening desire through the regeneration of the natural world and the showy display of spring blossoms.

The most famous episode in Kama's mythology begins with the ascent to power of a demon named Taraka, who can only be killed by a son of Shiva. Taraka seems impossible to defeat, since Shiva has no sons and is in deep meditation, grieving over the death of his wife Sati. The other gods ask Kama to shoot Shiva with an arrow of desire so he will marry the goddess Parvati and produce a son. Kama creeps up on Shiva and shoots him with an arrow. When Shiva realizes who has disturbed his meditation, he releases a stream of fire from the third eye in the middle of his forehead, instantly burning Kama to ashes. Through Shiva's grace, Kama is eventually brought back to life. One of Kama's epithets or alternate names is Ananga, or “bodiless,” because of the loss of his body (and the fact that desire seems to strike in unseen ways). Despite being destroyed by Shiva and seemingly foiled, in the end Kama achieves his goal. His attempt to draw Shiva out of his meditation succeeds, and eventually Shiva marries Parvati. For more information on the interplay between Shiva and Kama, see Wendy Doniger O’Flaherty, Siva, 1981.

Kamada Ekadashi
Ekadashi, or eleventh-day, festival of the bright, waxing half of the lunar month of Chaitra (March–April). Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites usually involving fasting (upavasa) and worship, and often promise-specific benefits for faithful performance. As promised by its name (“wish-granting”), faithfully observing this festival will fulfill one’s desire (kama), whatever it may be.

Kamadhenu
In Hindu mythology, a goddess in the form of a cow (dhenu) who has the power to grant all one’s wishes (kama). The Kamadhenu is considered the mother of all cattle. She is associated with giving gifts of food, and thus is an extension of the gifts of food given by all cows. In Hindu mythology, Kamadhenu is the property of the sage Jamadagni. Her theft by a local king prompts Jamadagni’s son, Parashuram avatar, to circle the earth twenty-one times, in an attempt to wipe out the kshatriya (kingly) class.

Kamakhya
(“desiring eyes”) A particular manifestation of the Mother Goddess, whose temple on Nilachal Hill overlooks the Brahmaputra River just outside the city of Guwahati in Assam. This temple is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites that spreads throughout the subcontinent and is sacred to the Goddess. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess. The Kamakhya temple is the place where Sati’s vulva fell to earth. Its image of the goddess is a natural cleft in the rock, around which the temple has been built. Since Kamakhya sprang from the most sexually charged part of the female body, it is no surprise that she is believed to be extremely powerful. Like many powerful goddesses, her productive capacity must be constantly recharged through receiving sacrifices, especially the blood of living beings. In modern times the usual sacrifice is a goat, but in earlier times the offering of human sacrifices is well documented. Kamakhya was reportedly offered 140 men when her present temple was consecrated in 1565. This practice continued until the British halted it in 1832. The men offered as human sacrifices were reportedly volunteers who believed that they had been called by her to do this. In the time between announcing their intention to be sacrificed and their deaths, they were treated as virtual divinities, since they were considered to have been consecrated to the goddess. For further information see George Weston Briggs, Gorakhnath and the Kanphata Yogis, 1973. See also pitha.

Kamakotipith
An important center for the Dashanami sect of Sanyasi ascetics, located in the southern Indian city of Kanchipuram. According to local tradition, the Kamakotipith was the first and most important of the maths or monastic centers, established by the philosopher Shankaracharya, who later established four other centers at Joshimath, Puri, Shringeri, and Dwaraka. This claim to primacy has generated fierce controversy. Opponents who support one of the other four maths, not only deny Kamakotipith’s place as the first of the maths, but also assert that Kamakotipith is only a branch of the Shringeri math. Support for these claims can be drawn from the symbolism connected with the number four—the four cardinal directions, the four sacred texts known as Vedas, and the four organizational groups of the Dashanami Sanyasis themselves. The number four symbolizes completion and totality, which makes a fifth sacred center problematic. Despite their possible merit, these contentions have not diminished Kamakotipith’s status. It has a long history as an ascetic center, and its head monk is routinely considered one of the Shankaracharyas, the most important modern Hindu religious leaders. Kamakotipith’s importance probably reflects the importance of Kanchipuram itself, which was such a significant sacred and political hub that any ascetic center located there could gain considerable authority.

Kamalakanta
(d. 1820) Bengali poet, devotee (bhakta) of the goddess Kali, and teacher and practitioner of the secret, ritually-based religious practice known as tantra. Kamalakanta spent most of his life as the guru and learned adviser (pundit) of the king of Burdwan, a region northwest of modern Calcutta, whose capital is also named Burdwan.

Kamandalu
A water pot traditionally used by ascetics, usually having a removable lid for ease in filling and a spout for pouring. Kamandalus may be made from various materials, such as gourds, wood, metal, or baked clay. They are generally wider than they are tall, making them stable and less likely to tip over. In India’s climate, water is an obvious necessity. Even ascetics with very few possessions will generally have some means to carry and store it. Aside from satisfying their physical needs, water is an important element in ascetic religious life, since it is often an offering used in worship as well as the preferred medium for bathing (snana) and other rites of purification. This religious importance makes the kamandalu a powerful object in its own right. A kamandalu is considered especially significant when it has been used for years by a noted ascetic—objects kept in close proximity to such a person are believed to be charged with their spiritual power. In modern times, kamandalus are still important ritual objects, but their practical function has largely been replaced by screw-top plastic vessels.

Kama Sutra
(“manual on desire”) By far the most famous of the ancient erotic manuals, traditionally attributed to the sage Vatsyayana. This text is usually associated with an exhaustive catalog of sexual positions and pleasures, but in fact it goes far beyond this stereotype. Vatsyayana was interested in exploring desire in all its manifestations. The text begins with a consideration of the four aims of life (purushartha): worldly goods (artha), desire (kama), religious duty (dharma), and liberation of the soul (moksha). Vatsyayana argued that since desire was one of the established goals of human life, its pursuit was thus a good thing, as long as this pursuit did not interfere with the others.

Having established the legitimacy of desire, Vatsyayana then discussed how to foster it. The Kama Sutra’s second book contains the text’s best-known material, the discussion and categorization of various types of sexual union. It begins by characterizing types of sexual endowment, both male and female. Next it describes different sorts of embracing, kissing, scratching, and biting as symbols of passion, along with sexual positions and oral sex. This is followed by chapters on gaining a wife, attracting other men’s wives (which the text discourages, except in cases where one’s passion is “too strong”), courtesans, and general remarks on the nature of attraction.

The text is a manual for all phases of erotic life in which sex can be refined into a vehicle for aesthetic experience as well as pure carnal pleasure. The Kama Sutra is also notable for its perspective on women, who are seen as having equal sexual desire and gaining equal pleasure. The ultimate aim is the sexual satisfaction of both partners, rather than one partner simply serving the other. The Kama Sutra has been translated many times.

Kamvasayitvam
(“suppression of desire”) One of the eight superhuman powers (siddhi), traditionally believed to be conferred by high spiritual attainment. This power gives one the ability to control desires. It also means that any declaration one makes, such as pronouncing a blessing (ashirvad) or a curse, will inevitably come to pass. The basis for this latter power seems to stem from the absence of individual desire in such a person, meaning that person will never be motivated by self-interest. This power reflects the pan-Indian belief that by renouncing everything, one can eventually gain power over everything.

Kamban
(9th c.) Southern Indian poet most noted as the author of the Tamil-language version of the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics. Kamban’s text is known as the Kamba Ramayana, and remains popular in modern times. As with all vernacular translations of the Ramayana, Kamban did not simply translate Valmiki’s Sanskrit epic from Sanskrit to a more common language, but adapted and even added to it as he saw fit. Of particular interest is his heroic portrayal of the demon-king Ravana, who is the villain in the original story. This shift may reflect feelings of regional pride, since Kamban was from southern Indian. Ravana’s kingdom of Lanka is generally identified as the island of Sri Lanka in the Indian Ocean, southeast of the Indian mainland.

Kamba Ramayana
Tamil language version of the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics. The Kamba Ramayana was written in ninth century by the southern Indian poet Kamban. As with all vernacular renditions of the Ramayana, Kamban did not simply translate Valmiki’s Sanskrit epic, but adapted and added to it as he saw fit. Of particular interest is his heroic portrayal of Ravana, the demon-king, who is the villain in the original story. This shift may reflect feelings of regional pride, since Kamban was from southern Indian. Ravana’s kingdom of Lanka is generally identified as the island of Sri Lanka in the Indian Ocean, southeast of the Indian mainland.

Kamika Ekadashi
Festival falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the dark, waxing half of the lunar month of Shravan (July–August). As with all eleventh-day observances, Kamika Ekadashi is dedicated to the worship of Vishnu. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites usually involving fasting (upavasa) and worship, and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. The name Kamika means “desiring,” a theme supported by the charter myth. According to this story, the brahmins in a certain village refuse to perform religious rites for a landowner guilty of murdering another brahmin. The landowner is freed from that sin by observing the Kamika Ekadashi and is thus able to have the desired rites performed.

Kamsa

In Hindu mythology, the wicked king of Mathura who is considered the brother of Devaki, the god Krishna’s mother, and thus Krishna’s uncle. According to legend, Kamsa is born when a demon takes the form of Ugrasena, Devaki’s father, and under this guise has intercourse with Kamsa’s mother.

On Devaki’s wedding day, a divine voice warns Kamsa that his sister’s eighth child will eventually kill him. In an effort to prevent this prophecy, he kills all of Devaki’s children as soon as they are born. Yet on the night Krishna is born, a deep sleep falls over the inhabitants of the palace, the locked doors magically open, and the infant is spirited away to the home of his foster parents, Nanda and Yashoda. When Kamsa finds out what has happened, he first sends his men to kill all the newborn children in the country. When that attempt fails to destroy Krishna, Kamsa sends various demon assassins, such as Putana, Shakata, Trnavarta, Keshi, and Bakasur. Krishna dispatches all of these with ease, and Kamsa eventually has to try other strategies. He announces a grand festival and dispatches his chariot to pick up Krishna and his brother Balarama, who by then have grown into adolescents. Kamsa’s plan is to lure the brothers to the festival grounds where they can be killed in a “friendly” match with some experienced wrestlers. The two boys derail this plot by killing the wrestlers, after which Krishna leaps up into the royal box and kills Kamsa as well.

Kamya Karma

(“desiderative [ritual] action”) One of three general categories of ritual action, the others being nitya karma and naimittika karma. Kamya karma is a ritual performed solely for the performer’s desire (kama) to obtain the benefits of this action. Unlike the other two categories, which must be performed at specific times or occasions, this one is completely voluntary and based solely on the desire for its benefits. One example of a kamya karma is religious pilgrimage, which one is not required to do but which is believed to generate religious merit. Another example would be performing a particular vrat, or religious vow, which might be done daily, weekly, monthly, or yearly.

Kanada

(2nd c. B.C.E.?) Philosopher who is traditionally named as the author of the Vaisheshika Sutras and founder of the Vaisheshika philosophical school, one of six schools of Hindu philosophy. Kanada’s date is uncertain, but he is believed to have lived after the third century B.C.E. In its earliest form, the Vaisheshika school followed a doctrine of atomism, asserting that there are simple building blocks that cohere to form complex objects. This cohesion also attaches objects to their qualities. As Vaisheshika combined with the Nyaya school, another of the six schools, the Vaisheshikas gradually adopted the Nyaya idea of God as the regulating force behind these atomic relations.

Kanauj

Small city on the Ganges River, about fifty miles upstream from the city of Kanpur. Kanauj is now insignificant, but the city, formerly known as Kanyakubja, was once one of the most important in northern India. Its existence is documented as early as the sixth century B.C.E. The city was an important stop on the trade route running through the Ganges basin. It is referenced in Ptolemy's Geography, written around 150 C.E. Kanauj was also an important political center; in the early seventh century it was the capital of the Pushyabhuti dynasty, ruled by the emperor Harsha. In later centuries the Pala, Rashtrakuta, and Gurjara-Pratihara dynasties fought over the city, with the Gurjara-Pratihara eventually gaining control. After suffering an attack by Mahmud of Ghazni in 1017 C.E., Kanauj seems to have gone into permanent decline. Its modern legacy is being the location of the dominant branch of brahmins in the Gangetic Plain. They call themselves Kanaujia brahmins.

Kanaujia
One of the five northern brahmin communities (Pancha Gauda); the other four are Gauda, Maithila, Utkala, and Saraswat. Kanaujia brahmins trace their origin to the city of Kanauj. Kanaujia brahmins are found in greatest density in the eastern section of the state of Uttar Pradesh, near the city of Kanauj; subgroups can be found throughout Bihar, Bengal, Madhya Pradesh, and the inland regions of Orissa.

Kanchipuram
Temple-town and sacred site (tirtha) about forty miles southwest of the city of Madras in the state of Tamil Nadu. Kanchipuram is important as one of India’s Seven Sacred Cities. Dying in one of these cities is believed to bring final liberation of the soul (moksha). At differing times Kanchipuram served as a capital for the Pallava, Chola, and Vijayanagar kings; each of these dynasties left its mark in the city’s architecture. Kanchipuram is filled with temples, many of them magnificent examples of the southern Indian Dravida architectural style. Kanchipuram's importance as a political center and its concentration of temples, brahmins, and scholars made it one of the greatest centers of Hindu life, learning, and religion.

Kanchipuram is also noted for its temples to each of the three major Hindu deities—Vishnu, Shiva, and the Goddess. The Vaikuntaperumal Temple is dedicated to Vishnu in his form as “Lord of Vaikuntha,” his celestial realm. The Goddess is worshiped as Kamakshi (“desiring eyes”). Kamakshi is identified with the goddess Kamakhya, whose temple in Assam is the most powerful of all the Shakti Pithas.

Shiva is worshiped at the Kailasanatha temple, in his manifestation as the “Lord of Mt. Kailas,” and at the Ekambareswar temple. The image of Shiva at the former site is one of the bhutalingas (“elemental lingas”), a network of five southern Indian sites sacred to the god Shiva. In each of these sites Shiva is worshiped as a linga, the pillar-shaped object that is his symbolic form. At each site the linga is believed to be formed from one of the five primordial elements (bhuta)—earth, wind, fire, water, and space (akasha). The Kanchipuram linga is associated with the element of earth, the humblest but most essential of all.

Another reason for Kanchipuram's prominence is its long tradition as a center for asceticism. Kanchipuram's Kamakotipith is an ancient center for the Dashanami sect. Its leader is considered to be one of the Shankaracharyas, the most important contemporary Hindu leaders. According to local tradition the Kamakotipith was the first and most important of the maths, or monastic centers, established by the philosopher Shankaracharya, who later established four other centers at Joshimath, Puri, Shringeri, and Dwaraka. This claim to primacy has generated fierce controversy, with opponents not only denying Kamakotipith's place as the first of the maths, but also asserting that Kamakotipith is only a branch of the Shringeri math. Some support for these claims can be drawn from symbolism connected with the number four—the four cardinal directions, the four sacred texts known as Vedas, and the four organizational groups of the Dashanami Sanyasis themselves. The number four symbolizes completion and totality, which makes a fifth sacred center problematic. Kamakotipith reflects the importance of Kanchipuram as a significant sacred and political hub in which any ascetic center could gain considerable authority. See also pitha.

Kandariya Mahadev
The largest of the temples at Khajuraho in the state of Madhya Pradesh. It is dedicated to the god Shiva in his manifestation as “Skanda’s Lord”; Skanda is another deity who is considered to be Shiva’s son, and the general of Shiva’s army. The Kandariya Mahadev temple was built by the kings of the Chandella dynasty between 1025 and 1050. It was constructed at the end of the wave of creativity that produced all of the Khajuraho temples. It is the best-developed example of the Khajuraho branch of the Nagara architectural style, in which all of the temple’s smaller towers lead to and culminate in one central tower directly over the sanctuary. Like most of the temples at Khajuraho, the Kandariya Mahadev temple is covered with erotic sculpture—perhaps as a symbol for union with the divine, perhaps as a religious affirmation of every aspect of human existence.

Kandarpa
Epithet of the god Kama, a minor deity identified as the personification of kama (“desire”) who is comparable to the Greek deity Eros. See Kama.

Kangra
The name of a town and district in the state of Himachal Pradesh; the town was formerly the capital of a small hill kingdom with the same name. Kangra is famous for the temple of Vajreshvari Devi, one of the nine Shiwalik goddesses. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, Kangra’s status as a courtly center brought in patronage for the Pahari school of miniature painting.

Kanha
Epithet of the god Krishna. The name Kanha is actually a form of the name Krishna, modified in the transition between Sanskrit and vernacular language. See Krishna.

Kanhaiya
Epithet of the god Krishna. As with the name Kanha, Kanhaiya is actually a form of the name Krishna that has been modified in the transition between Sanskrit and vernacular language. See Krishna.
Kankhal
City and sacred site (tirtha) three miles south of the city of Haridwar in the state of Uttar Pradesh. Kankhal is most famous for the Daksha Mahadev temple, dedicated to the god Shiva in his form as "Daksha's Lord." This temple's charter myth is one of the most famous of all the stories of Shiva. Daksha is one of the sons of the god Brahma and the father of Sati, the goddess whom Daksha gives in marriage to Shiva. When Daksha feels that Shiva has not shown him proper respect, he plans a great sacrifice to which he invites all the gods, but purposely excludes Shiva. When Sati asks why her husband has been excluded, Daksha responds with a stream of abuse, denouncing Shiva as worthless and despicable. Humiliated, Sati commits suicide. Shiva is furious when he hears of Sati's death, and in his rage creates the fierce deities Virabhadra and Bhadrakali. He then comes storming with his minions (gana) to the sacrificial ground, completely destroying the sacrifice, and cuts off Daksha's head. Daksha is eventually restored to life, repents his foolish pride, and asks Shiva to remain at that site forever, which he agrees to do.

There are numerous smaller temples near the Daksha Mahadev temple, some of which are dedicated to figures associated with this story, such as Virabhadra. Across the street from the Daksha temple is a large ashram, or religious community, built by devotees (bhakta) of the Bengali mystic Anandamayi Ma. The ashram also contains her samadhi shrine, or burial place.

Kannada
One of the four Dravidian languages, along with Tamil, Telegu, and Malayalam; all four languages are spoken in southern India. Kannada is the predominant language in modern Karnataka, one of the "linguistic" states, formed after Indian independence in 1947 to unite people with a common language and culture under one state government. Despite its recent political significance, Kannada has a long history as a literary and cultural language and is particularly important as the language for the devotional (bhakti) poetry of the Lingayat religious community. See also Tamil language.

Kanphata
("split ear") Colloquial name for the Nathpanthi sect of ascetics, who are followers of the sage Gorakhnath. This particular name stems from the Nathpanthi's most characteristic feature: When a Nathpanthi ascetic is ready for final initiation, the cartilage in his ears is slit with a razor to insert the large earrings by which members of this group are easily identified. See Nathpanthi.

Kanvar
A bamboo pole with baskets or receptacles suspended from each end. In earlier times a kanvar would have been a natural way for people to carry heavy loads. Its major use today is for religious rites in which pilgrims carry water from one place to offer to a deity in another. The kanvar is the device by which the water is kept elevated the entire way. This keeps the water's original purity unbroken, preserving it as an appropriate offering for a deity. The most famous example of this rite is at the temple of Vaidyanath in the state of Bihar. It is also found at temples in Haridwar in Uttar Pradesh, Tarakeshvar in West Bengal, and the hills of Maharashtra.

Kanyadan
("gift of a virgin") In its most specific sense, the kanyadan is the part of the traditional wedding ceremony in which the bride's father (or guardian) formally transfers her to her husband's family. In a more general sense, the word refers to giving a daughter in marriage to another family. This "gift" is believed to be highly commendable for the father, since the bride is supposed to be given without asking for anything in return. At the same time, the status difference between the bride's family (as wife "givers") and the groom's (as wife "takers") can make this "gift" an extremely expensive proposition for the bride's family. See Dowry.

Kanyakubja
("[city of] humpbacked maidens") Ancient name for the site now known as Kanauj, which was the capital for several northern Indian dynasties in the latter half of the first millennium. The name Kanyakubja comes from a tale about a king who has a hundred daughters. One day the daughters' games disturb the meditation of a local sage who is filled with desire for them. The king worries about angering the sage and promises him one of his daughters in marriage. Ninety-nine of his daughters flatly refuse to marry the sage because of his advanced age and gruff demeanor, but the youngest agrees to do so in obedience to her father. The sage accepts the youngest daughter and curses the others to become humpbacked so they will never be able to marry.

Kanyakumari
("virgin girl") City and sacred site (tirtha) at the extreme southern edge of the state of Tamil Nadu, at the confluence of the Indian Ocean, Arabian Sea, and Bay of Bengal. Kanyakumari is important as a bathing (snana) place. Kanyakumari is also the name of the site's major deity, a local goddess who has been assimilated into the pantheon as a manifestation of the goddess Parvati. According to local tradition, Kanyakumari set her heart on marrying Shiva; when this was prevented she vowed to remain a perpetual virgin (kanya). Her manifestation here is clearly different from all the other forms of Parvati, who are invariably married to Shiva, yet Kanyakumari's unmarried status also gives her independent power.

Kapala
A human skull. In Hindu art, a skull is often carried by the god Shiva, who uses it as a vessel to hold his food and drink. As with many of Shiva's attributes, such as the snakes he wears as jewelry and the ash from the cremation ground with which he smears his body, the skullbowl is a sign of Shiva's untamed nature.
and his aloofness from the standards and concerns of everyday life. Use of a skull-bowl has also been adopted by some Shaiva ascetics, both past and present, in imitation of this myth. The skulls are usually taken from cremation grounds; the upper skull is separated to be made into a bowl.

Kapalamochana
("releasing the skull") Bathing (snana) tank and sacred site (tirtha) in the northern section of the city of Benares. According to Hindu mythology, when the wrathful deity Bhairava cuts off the fifth head of the god Brahma, insulting the god Shiva, the skull sticks to Bhairava's hand as a visible sign of his crime. Bhairava visits all the holy places of the earth trying to get rid of the skull, but to no avail. When he arrives in Kapalamochana, the skull spontaneously drops from his hand, liberating him from his crime. This act indicates that Kapalamochana is the holiest place on earth.

Kapalika
Extinct monastic sect of Shaivite ascetics, or devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. Although none of the Kapalikas' own written records have survived, there are numerous descriptions of them by other ascetic groups and by dramatists of their time such as Bana (7th c.) and Bhavabhuti (8th c.). The sources describe the Kapalikas as worshiping the god Shiva in his wrathful form as Bhairava and as emulating Bhairava's characteristics: wearing their hair long and matted, smearing their bodies with ash (preferably from the cremation ground), and carrying a club and a skull-bowl (kapala). The Kapalikas are cited as indulging in forbidden behavior—drinking wine, eating meat, using cannabis and other drugs, performing human sacrifice, and enjoying orgiastic sexuality. Needless to say, most of the available sources do not approve of them.

David Lorenzen argues that despite the disapproval of their contemporaries, all the Kapalika practices must be seen in the context of tantra. Tantra is a secret, ritually-based religious practice that its initiates believe is far more powerful and effective than ordinary religious worship. One of its most essential themes is the ultimate unity of everything that exists. From a tantric perspective, to affirm that the entire universe is one principle—often, conceived as the activity of a particular deity—means that the adept must reject all concepts based on dualistic thinking. One way to do this is to partake of the "Five Forbidden Things" (panchamakara), consciously breaking societal norms forbidding illicit sexuality and consumption of intoxicants and non-vegetarian food. This is always done within a carefully defined ritual setting, in a conscious effort to sacralize what is normally forbidden.

Seen in this context, the Kapalikas' behavior is shocking but becomes more understandable. Lorenzen also speculates that in performing such behaviors (which may have only taken place during religious ceremonies), the Kapalikas were identifying themselves with their chosen deity, Bhairava. In the Hindu pantheon Bhairava is known for his uncontrolled excesses, particularly for cutting off one of the heads of the god Brahma, for which he has to perform severe penances (prayashchitta). In this understanding, the Kapalikas' practices are not motivated by hedonistic self-gratification but by the desire to imitate their chosen deity. The only developed source on the Kapalikas is David Lorenzen, The Kapalikas and the Kalamukhas, 1972.

Kapalin
("skull-bearer") The name for any ascetic bearing a human skull, either as a begging bowl or as a piece of ascetic paraphernalia. Such ascetics are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva in his terrible form. Their use of the skull is a symbol that, like Shiva, they have transcended all earthly concerns of purity, impurity (ashaucha), and conventional standards of what is and is not appropriate.

Kapha

(“phlegm”) Along with vata (“air”) and pitta (“bile”), one of the three bodily humours (tridosha) in ayurveda, the traditional system of Indian medicine. Every person has all three of these humours, but usually one is dominant; this marks a person in certain ways, particularly with regard to health, digestion, and metabolism. Kapha is associated with the elements of earth and water, since phlegm has both liquid and solid characteristics. It provides solidity and fluidity. Those who exhibit this humor are said to be strong, healthy, and have great stamina. At the same time, this solidity can take the form of inertia and fatigue; “phlegmatic” people must do their best avoid these tendencies.

Kapila

A powerful and ornery sage in Hindu mythology. Kapila’s most famous mythic exploit occurs in the story of the Descent of the Ganges. King Sagar is on the verge of completing his hundredth horse sacrifice (ashvamedha). This will give him enough religious merit to claim the throne of Indra, king of the gods. Indra forestalls this threat by stealing the sacrificial horse and tying it outside Kapila’s ashram. Sagar dispatches his sixty-thousand sons to find the horse. When they finally locate it at Kapila’s ashram, they find the sage deep in meditation. The sons assume that the sage’s meditation is a ploy to keep from having to answer their questions, so they begin to abuse him physically. Kapila becomes extremely angry. The accumulated power generated by his long asceticism (tapas) is released like fire, burning the sixty-thousand sons to ash. Kapila later informs Sagar’s sole surviving descendant, Anshuman, that the only way to bring peace to the souls of the departed is to bring the Ganges down to earth and have their ashes touched by her waters. Fulfilling this condition galvanizes several generations of Sagar’s descendants—Anshuman, Dilip, and Bhagirath—until the last is finally successful in bringing the river to earth.

Kapilavastu

Ancient city in southern Nepal, just over the Indian border from the state of Bihar. Buddhist sources identify it as the capital city of Buddha’s father, King Suddhodhana of the Shakya tribe. Kapilavastu was part of the thriving urban network in that region of India during the fifth century B.C.E.

Kapu

Traditional Indian society was modeled as a collection of endogamous, or intermarried, subgroups known as jatis (“birth”). These jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group’s hereditary occupation, over which each group held a monopoly. In traditional society, the Kapus were farmers. In much of modern Andhra Pradesh, particularly the region bordering modern Tamil Nadu, the Kapus are the dominant landholding group.
Karana
In Indian philosophy, the name for an instrumental cause, or the cause by which another thing is accomplished. An example often given by the Nyaya philosophical school states that when a potter connects two pot-halves using a stick, the stick is the instrumental cause for the creation of the pot. In Sanskrit grammar, the word karana has a parallel sense; it designates the word in a sentence that shows how the action is accomplished.

Karandamakuta

Karka Sankranti
Date on the Indian calendar marking the sun's transition into the zodiacal sign of Cancer, and thus, the beginning of the dakshinayana, the six months in which the sun is traveling toward the south. In Western astrology this happens during the summer solstice (around June 21), but in Indian reckoning it occurs around July 14. The discrepancy arises due to the different ways in which the two systems mark the beginning of the astrological year. In Western astrology the beginning of the year is based on the sun's position in relation to the earth and occurs during the vernal equinox (around March 21). In Indian reckoning the starting point of the zodiac comes when the sun intersects the midpoint of a group of stars named Ashvini, and is based on the position of the sun with regard to fixed stars. Karka Sankranti is not marked by significant observances, unlike Makara Sankranti, which occurs six months earlier, marking the beginning of the sun's northward journey (uttarayana). The southern direction is associated with the god Yama, who is death personified. Thus, this southward movement is considered less auspicious than its northward counterpart.

Karma
("action") The notion of karma and its connection with reincarnation (samsara) are perhaps the most fundamental concepts in Indian thought and are ideas shared by all Indian religions: Hindu, Buddhist, Jain, and Sikh. Although the literal meaning of karma is “action,” it is believed to encompass words and thoughts as well as deeds. The basic assumption behind the notion of karma is that of a dynamic universe, in which any action that one takes will have consequences that will eventually affect oneself. In the simplest explanation, good actions will have good consequences, and evil actions will have evil consequences, in an extended chain of cause and effect. Since thoughts are considered actions, this determination of “good” and “evil” actions also takes into account one's motives—a laudable action performed for an ignoble motive is still a laudable action, but will not generate as much merit as the same action performed for a pure motive.

Karma is seen as a purely physical process, much like the law of gravity. It does not require a divine overseer, although in devotional Hinduism, God is generally seen as having the power to nullify one's past karma. The effects of one's actions may come either in this life or in future lives. The former case is easy to believe, since most people accept that their actions have consequences, but the latter case is much more difficult to support with concrete evidence. Since the general tone of one's life is seen as more important than a few isolated acts, one might compare the idea of karma with the notion of a person's “character.” Both are determined by one's habitual...

Karmamarga

(“path of action”) One of Hinduism’s three generally accepted paths to gain final liberation of the soul (moksha), along with the Path of Devotion (bhaktimarga) and the Path of Wisdom (jnanamarga). Bhaktimarga stresses devotion to God, and the jnanamarga stresses the realization of the ultimate identity of one’s individual Self (atman) and Ultimate Reality (Brahman). Karmamarga emphasizes selfless action performed for the benefit of others.

Karmendriya

(“organ of action”) In Indian philosophy, any of the five organs through which human beings act on their environment, traditionally considered to be: voice, hands, feet, and the organs of elimination and generation.

Karna

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Karna is the eldest of the Pandava brothers, although he is not aware of his true identity until a few days before his death. He is born when his mother, Kunti, in a moment of youthful impulsiveness, looks upon the sun while reciting a mantra, giving her the power to have a son by any of the gods. She is immediately visited by a shining figure, who leaves her with an equally shining son. Distraught and desperate at the birth of this child, which as an unmarried woman she feels she cannot keep, she puts him in a box and abandons him in the Ganges.

The child is adopted by the charioteer, Adhiratha, who raises Karna as his own son. Karna later comes to the court of King Dhrtarashtra, where he becomes friends with the king’s son, Duryodhana, the epic's antagonist. While at court, Karna begins a lifelong conflict with Arjuna, one of the five Pandava brothers. Arjuna's comments about Karna's unknown parentage are meant to deny Karna the recognition he deserves as Arjuna's equal. As do all the princes, Karna studies with Drona, the archery master. When Drona refuses to teach Karna the secret of the Brahma weapon Karna wants to use to kill Arjuna, Karna goes to the sage Parashuram avatar for this instruction. He presents himself as a brahmin, since Parashuram hates the kshatriya (ruling) class and refuses to accept any of them as students.

Parashuram teaches Karna all that he wants to know. During this period, however, Karna receives two curses that ultimately determine his fate. Karna kills a brahmin's cow, so the brahmin curses him to have his chariot wheel stick in the mud and be killed upon it by his enemy. The second curse comes from Parashuram. One day as Parashuram sleeps with his head in Karna's lap, a beetle bores into Karna's thigh, which in the epic is a euphemism for the genitals. Despite the pain and blood, Karna remains still so he will not disturb his sleeping guru. When Parashuram awakens, he realizes that Karna's tolerance for pain means that he is a kshatriya, thus Karna has gained instruction under false pretenses. Parashuram curses Karna that at the critical moment, he will forget everything he has learned. Both of these curses eventually come true; despite fighting with great valor in the Mahabharata war, Karna is killed by Arjuna when the wheel of his chariot is stuck in the mud.

On the eve of the great war, Karna's mother, Kunti, comes to him and reveals his true identity and implores him to return and fight alongside his brothers. Karna refuses, saying that things have gone too far for such measures, but promises Kunti that he will not harm any of his brothers except for Arjuna, whom he has sworn to kill. In his decision Karna is also bound by his loyalty to Duryodhana, whose friendship and support for many years overrides any obligation to a family he has just discovered. As a man willing to stand by his friends and his principles, even in a cause he knows to be flawed, Karna endures as one of the tragic heroes of the Mahabharata.

Karnaprayag
Himalayan town and sacred site (tirtha) at the confluence of the Alakananda and Pindara rivers, in the Chamoli district of the state of Uttar Pradesh. As with all the other river junctions in the Garhwal region, this is considered an especially holy place. Local tradition ascribes the site's name to the Mahabharata hero Karna, who is believed to have worshiped the sun at this place. In return he received a suit of armor that could not be pierced and a quiver of arrows that could never be exhausted.

Karnataka
Southern Indian brahmins who make up one of the five southern brahmin communities (Pancha Dravida); the other four are Gujarati, Maharashtri, Andhra, and Dravida. The core region for the Karnataka brahmins is the modern state of Karnataka.

Karnataka
One of the four southern Indian states, whose inhabitants speak a Dravidian language, in this case Kannada. Karnataka is one of the "linguistic" states formed after India's independence in 1947, intended to unite people with a common language and culture under one state government. The state was largely formed from the former kingdom of Mysore. In medieval times, Karnataka was the seat of important Hindu kingdoms, particularly the Hoysala and Vijayanagar dynasties; these dynasties built cities at Belur, Halebid, and Hampi, which are now important archaeological sites. Karnataka is also the home of the Lingayats, devotees (bhakta) of Shiva, whose missionary work eventually squeezed out the thriving Jain community.
Karnavedha ("ear-piercing") Samskara

Jain monuments, such as the massive statue at Shravanabelgola, still stand. Karnataka also contains important Hindu holy places, such as Shrirangapatnam and Shringeri math. Even though much of the state's economy is still highly agricultural, Karnataka's capital, Bangalore, is a worldwide center for computer software development. For general information about Karnataka and other regions of India, see Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.

Karnavedha

(“ear-piercing”) Samskara

The ninth of the sixteen traditional life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras), in which an infant's ears were pierced. This rite was done not only for ornamentation but also for protective purposes. According to Sushruta, the author of one of the oldest Indian medical texts, piercing the ears protected children against certain ailments. Although in modern times most young girls have pierced ears, this practice is far less common for boys, suggesting that ornamentation has taken precedence over protection.

Karni Mata

Presiding deity of the temple by the same name in the village of Deshnok in the state of Rajasthan. Karni Mata is a local form of the Mother Goddess; her name refers to the place where an ear (karni) of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth. The temple is unusual in that it is inhabited by thousands of rats, which are considered Karni Mata's sons. According to the local tradition, Karni Mata's son drowned in a local pond. When she tried to influence Yama, the god of death, to give her son a favorable rebirth, she was told that he had already been reborn as a rat. At her request, Yama allowed all of her male descendants to be born as rats in the temple at Deshnok. Yama agreed that in the next life the rats would be reborn as family members of the temple's servants. According to this myth, the rats and the temple priests are all members of one extended family.

Karpatri Maharaj, Swami

A modern-day ascetic noted for the strictness of his ascetic practices. His name comes from his habit of using his hands...
(kara) as the vessel (patra) in which he received the food he took as alms. This is considered one of the strictest ascetic practices, since the amount of food one can receive in this way is fairly small. The lack of an eating vessel indicates complete renunciation of material possessions. Swami Karpatri was also known for his conservative political views. After Indian independence in 1947, he was one of the founders of the political party Ram Rajya Parishad ("Organization for Ram's Reign"). The party's basic assertion was that people had to follow the division of status and labor found in the traditional caste system in order to have a smoothly working society. Aside from this conservative social platform, the party also backed Hindu causes such as the demand for a total ban on cow slaughter. Despite being a Sanyasi who had renounced the world, Swami Karpatri still maintained some residual attitudes from his former life. He had been born a brahmin; even after renouncing the world, he would only take food from brahmin houses. Swami Karpatri exemplifies how many ascetics still retain connections with the "everyday" world—both in retaining some concern for their former status and in taking organized political action to promote causes reflecting deeply entrenched Hindu values.

Kartigai
Eighth month in the Tamil year, corresponding to the northern Indian solar month of Vrschika (the zodiacal sign of Scorpio), which usually falls within November and December. The existence of several different calendars is one clear sign of the continuing importance of regional cultural patterns. One way that the Tamils retain their culture is by preserving their traditional calendar. Tamil is one of the few regional languages in India with an ancient, well-established literary tradition. See also Tamil months, Tamil Nadu, and Tamil language.

Karva Chauth
Religious vow (vrat) observed on the fourth (chauth) day of the dark, waning half of the lunar month of Kartik (October–November). Karva Chauth is taken by married women to ensure their husbands' health, prosperity, and long life. There are many such vows in which women's observances and sacrifices are determined, Kartik is the eighth month in the lunar year, usually falling within October and November. In northern India, Kartik coincides with the harvest when the weather is quite pleasant. Kartik is one of the most ritually important months of the year; its major festivals include Karva Chauth, Rambha Ekadashi, Narak Chaturdashi, Diwali, Govardhan Puja (Annakut), Devotthayan Ekadashi, Tulsi Vivah, and Kartik Purnima.

Kartik Purnima
Festival during the full moon in the lunar month of Kartik (October–November), celebrated as a bathing (snana) festival. During the festival, an early morning bath in the Ganges or any other sacred river is believed to provide the bather with exceptional religious merit. People often journey to sacred rivers to take advantage of this opportunity. Also on this day, Sikhs celebrate the birthday of their religious leader, Guru Nanak, born in 1469.

Karttikeya
("son of the Krttikas") Epithet of the god Skanda, considered the son of Shiva. Skanda is not born in the usual manner but develops when Shiva's semen falls into the Ganges River. The name Karttikeya comes from the six minor goddesses known as the Krttikas, who are the deified form of the constellation Pleiades. After Skanda is born, these goddesses become his foster mothers and nurse him, which in Indian culture is believed to create a mother-child bond. So that none of the goddesses will feel slighted, Skanda sprouts six heads, allowing him to nurse from all of them at the same time.

Kartik
According to the lunar calendar, by which most Hindu religious festivals are deter-channeled into maintaining the welfare and prosperity of the family. Although such vows are voluntary in the strictest sense, there is great social pressure for women to perform them, thus fulfilling their expected role as "good" wives. Karva Chauth is a very strict vow; women observing it neither eat nor drink until they see the moon rising that evening. When the moon appears, the women offer water to it and then are permitted to drink. On this evening, women may also worship the deities Shiva and Parvati (the divine example of a happily married couple) and Karttikeya, their son. Women also give each other small pots (karva) filled with sweets, hence the festival’s name.

The charter myth for this observance tells how a young bride, while performing this fast at the home of her birth, grows faint and nearly lifeless. Her brothers are so worried about her health that one of them climbs into a tree with a lantern, while the others convince her that the light is coming from the rising moon. The young woman is greatly relieved, but as soon as she drinks water her husband falls down dead. Her brothers eventually have to confess what they have done. As the woman lays lamenting her newly gained widowhood, she is discovered by the goddess Parvati, who assures her that her husband will be restored to life if she faithfully observes Karva Chauth the following year. The young woman does as she is told and regains her husband.

This tale contains significant cultural information, particularly on people’s differing obligations. A brother’s duty is to protect his sister. A wife’s primary duty is to her husband, and her efforts should be devoted to his welfare. As in many such tales, the consequences of failing to keep a religious observance are swift and severe, and the rewards from faithfully performing it are equally grand.

Kashi

("shining") One of the traditional names for the city of Benares. Benares is mentioned in the list of the Seven Sacred Cities, where death brings final liberation of the soul. In a more strict local sense, the name Kashi designates the largest of the three traditional sacred zones in Benares. It includes everything within the Panchakroshi Yatra road, a circuit around the city that marks the outer limit of the region. The name Kashi refers to the mythic story of the jyotirlinga, the “pillar of light” in which the god Shiva is said to have first appeared. According to tradition, the pillar of light did not just land in Kashi but was itself a form of Kashi, thus indicating the city’s sanctity over all other places on earth.

Kashmir

One of the three distinct cultural areas, along with Jammu and Ladakh, in the modern Indian state of Jammu and Kashmir. Jammu and Kashmir is a former princely state, in which the Hindu Dogra kings also ruled over the minority populations of the mostly Muslim Kashmiris and the mostly Buddhist Ladakhis. Since Indian independence in 1947, this ethnic and religious division continues to be a source of trouble, and nowhere more than in Kashmir. At independence, Pakistan attempted to take the region by force and claimed a section of Kashmir. In the time since then, India and Pakistan have fought several wars over it; Pakistan claims it by virtue of their shared religion of Islam; India claims it by virtue of a document signed by the last of its kings, Maharaja Hari Singh. The Kashmiris themselves have been caught in this regional clash, and their demands for greater self-determination have been largely ignored. After the 1986 state elections, which were widely regarded as rigged, tensions in Kashmir came to a boil. Since 1990 the tension has turned into an open rebellion, assisted by covert aid from Pakistan.

Most Kashmiris became Muslims during medieval times. Before that time the region was a Hindu cultural area. Kashmir still has some stunning examples of early Hindu architecture, such as the sun temple at Martand, a temple to the god Shiva at Pandrenthan, and the shrine to Shiva at Amarnath cave which
Kashyapa
In Hindu mythology, Kashyapa is the chief of the Prajapatis (a class of semi-divine beings) and the father of Garuda, the divine eagle who serves as the animal “vehicle” for the god Vishnu. Kashyapa is also one of the Seven Sages whose names mark exogamous clan “lineages” (gotra); the others are Gautama, Bharadvaja, Vasishtha, Bhrgu, Atri, and Vishvamitra. All brahmans are believed to be descended from these seven sages, with each family taking the name of its progenitor as its gotra name. In modern times, gotras are still important, since marriage within the gotra is forbidden. After her marriage, the new bride adopts her husband’s gotra as part of her new identity. See also marriage prohibitions.

Kataka Hasta
In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, a particular hand gesture (hasta), in which the tips of the fingers are loosely joined to the thumb, to create a ring (the word kataka literally means “bracelet”). This hasta is common in the images of Hindu goddesses, but also serves a useful purpose: a fresh flower may be inserted in her hand every day.

Kataragama
Sacred site (tirtha) located in the extreme southeastern part of Sri Lanka that is dedicated to the god Skanda in his southern Indian manifestation as Murugan. The site is notable for being outside of the Indian mainland and as an important place of worship for both Hindus and Buddhists. According to mythic tradition, the site was established when Skanda went hunting in the jungles of Sri Lanka, fell in love with a tribal woman named Valli, and vowed to remain forever in her home. As the son of the god Shiva, Skanda is a powerful deity in the Hindu pantheon. His relationship with Valli shows his accessibility and his love for his devotees (bhakta).

The annual Kataragama pilgrimage in July–August is a theater to demonstrate these qualities: Many people come seeking healing from physical ailments or deliverance from distress, while others come to fulfill vows for benefits already received. Such vows often take the form of extreme self-mortification—by carrying the kavadi, a yoke held in place by hooks piercing the flesh; by piercing the tongue or cheeks with tiny arrows, one of the symbols of Skanda; or by hanging from hooks embedded in the back and thighs. These ardent devotees are reportedly rewarded for their suffering with a state of ecstasy in which they feel no pain and suffer no bleeding. In this state of ecstasy, the devotees are also believed to be mouthpieces for the god Skanda. Other pilgrims seek their advice for every conceivable kind of problem, under the assumption that Skanda will give them the most appropriate answer. For further information see Paul Wirz, Kataragama: the Holiest Place in Ceylon, 1966; and Bryan Pfaffenberger, “The Kataragama Pilgrimage,” in Journal of Asian Studies, Vol. 28, No. 2, 1979.

Katha

(“conversation”) Genre of public religious address based on recitation and exposition of a religious text. Katha is most often associated with the Ramcharitmanas, a version of the epic Ramayana written by the poet-saint Tulsidas, but may be used to explain other religious texts as well. Kathas may be delivered in a number of ways: The speaker may go through large parts of the text, give detailed analysis and commentary on a very small portion of the text, select passages from throughout the text to illustrate a particular theme, or present a completely spontaneous and free-floating exposition. For listeners, attending such events is not only aesthetically satisfying but also considered to be a form of satsang or religious association. Such gatherings were (and are) one of the major ways in which illiterate people memorize large parts of these primary texts. For further information see Philip Lutgendorf, The Life of a Text, 1991.

Kathak

One of the classical dance forms of India; some of the others are Bharatanatyam, Orissi, Kuchipudi, Kathakali, and Manipuri. Like much of traditional Indian culture, classical dances are identified with certain regions; Kathak is primarily found in northern India. Traditionally, Kathak descended from the ras lilas of Braj, devotional dances illustrating events from the life of Krishna. This claim has little historical support and may simply reflect the desire to root all of the Indian arts in religion. It is not disputed, however, that Kathak developed as an art form in the courts of the northern Indian princes, where it was performed for the entertainment of the monarch and his guests. In time, two major Kathak centers developed: Jaipur, famous for spectacular footwork; and Lucknow, known for its attention to acting. Stylistically, Kathak is marked by an upright posture, with the legs kept straight. The dance emphasizes rapid, rhythmic foot patterns, rhythms accentuated by strings of bells worn on the dancer’s ankles and complemented by multiple turns; the torso is kept fairly immobile. As with all forms of Indian dance, Kathak includes a well-developed “vocabulary” of facial expressions and gestures of the arms and hands that allow the dancer to convey a great range of emotions to the audience. For further information see Mohan Khokar, Traditions of Indian Classical Dance, 1984.

Kathakali

One of the classical dance forms of India; some of the others are Bharatanatyam, Orissi, Kuchipudi, Kathak, and Manipuri. Like much of traditional Indian culture, classical dances are identified with certain regions; Kathakali is primarily found in Kerala. Unlike many of the other classical forms, Kathakali did not develop in a temple setting. It appeared as a developed style in the seventeenth century, although it is rooted in folk and religious dramas dating from centuries before. Kathakali has traditionally been danced only by men—the women's form in Kerala is Mohini Attam. A Kathakali performance is one of the most dramatic spectacles in the Indian arts. Part of this drama comes from the dancers' training, stressing controlled facial mobility to facilitate ease and power of expression. The dancers wear flamboyant costumes and headdresses. The most striking feature of all is elaborate makeup—the heroes' faces are painted a vivid green, with fluted ridges made of rice paste attached to their cheeks, while villains are painted in green and red and have knobs of pith attached to their chins and foreheads. Stylistically, the dance moves between athletic jumps and majestic turns, with religious texts forming the dominant source for stories. As with all Indian dances, Kathakali has a well-developed "vocabulary" of gesture and facial expression, which makes it possible for the dancers to engage in complex storytelling. As with all other classical dances, Kathakali has undergone certain changes in the past generation, spurred by a shift in the venue from temple courtyards to stage performance. For example, a planned stage performance requires a well-organized "program" and a designated time frame, whereas in earlier times Kathakali performances would often last all night long. For further information see Mohan Khokar, Traditions of Indian Classical Dance, 1984.

Katha Upanishad

One of the later and more developed Upanishads, the speculative religious texts that form the latest stratum of the oldest Hindu sacred texts, the Vedas. As with most of the Upanishads, the Katha Upanishad investigates profound questions, in particular the nature of the Self (atman). The text tells the story of a boy, Nachiketas, whose father sends him to Death in a fit of anger. Nachiketas goes to Death’s abode, but finds no one. He waits for three days before Death returns. To make amends for ignoring a brahmin guest—which the text describes as a serious sin—Death gives Nachiketas three boons, or wishes. Nachiketas uses the first boon to be restored to his father's house and the second to receive instruction in performing a sacrificial fire. With the final boon, he asks what happens to a person after the death of the body. Death first tries to evade the question, then tries to bribe Nachiketas with other gifts. When the boy insists on an answer, Death begins to reveal his secrets; these revelations make up the bulk of the text. Death's secrets focus mainly on the reality of the Self, its eternal and indestructible nature, its subtle qualities, and the difficulties in realizing it. The Self is the ultimate truth, and to know it is to know the only thing that really matters.

Katyavalambita Hasta

In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, the name of a particular hand gesture (hasta) in which the arm hangs down beside the body and the hand rests on the hip in a relaxed manner.
Katyayana Smrti

One of the smrtis or “remembered” texts, a class of literature deemed important but less authoritative than the other textual category, the shrutis or “heard” texts. This smrti is attributed to the sage Katyayana and is an example of one of the Dharma Shastras, manuals prescribing rules for correct human behavior and ideal social life. Unlike the Dharma Sutras, which are ascribed to recognizable individuals, the Dharma Shastras are usually credited to mythic sages as a strategy to reinforce the authority of these texts. Katyayana’s complete text has not survived, although more than one thousand verses have been compiled from later works. Katyayana’s text was the first to focus on the rights of women: he gave particular attention to women’s personal property (stridhan), both to explain their powers and to prescribe rules for its inheritance when a woman died.

Kausalya

In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Kausalya is the first wife of King Dasharatha and the mother of the god-king Rama.

Kaustubha

In Hindu mythology, the gem that the god Vishnu wears on his chest. The Kaustubha jewel is one of the precious things produced by churning the ocean of milk. Other products include the goddess Lakshmi, the Kamadhenu or wishing-cow, and the nectar of immortality (amrta). Vishnu’s possession of the Kaustubha jewel is a symbol of his power and his mastery over the universe. See also Tortoise avatar.

Kauṭilya

According to tradition, Kautilya was the author of the Arthashastra (“Treatise on Power”), a text which is a handbook on the exercise of royal power. The ruler portrayed in the Arthashastra cares little for ideals or dreams, but rather is willing to do whatever is necessary to remain in power. Aside from his authorship of the Arthashastra, Kautilya is also identified as the Machiavellian brahmin minister who orchestrated Chandragupta Maurya’s rise to power, but there are serious doubts that these Kautilyas are the same person.

Kaurava

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, the Kauravas are the hundred sons of King Dhrtarashtra and the epic’s antagonists to the Pandava protagonists. The Kauravas receive their name as descendants of Kuru, an ancestor of King Shantanu. As in many cases in Hindu mythology, the Kaurava sons are born in an unusual manner. Their mother, Gandhari, receives a blessing (ashirvad) from the sage Vyasa that she will give birth to one hundred sons. Her pregnancy lasts for over two years. When she grows impatient and tries to hasten the delivery, she gives birth to a great lump of flesh. Vyasa advises Gandhari to divide the lump and place each piece in a pot of clarified butter (ghee). In due time, each of the 101 pots break open to reveal one hundred handsome boys, as well as a single daughter, Dussala. Of these hundred sons, the most important are the two eldest, Duryodhana and Duhshasana.

Kavadi

A bamboo yoke topped with semicircular splints of bamboo that is carried on a devotee’s (bhakta) shoulders during certain festivals devoted to the god Murugan. A kavadi is usually decorated with flowers, pictures, ribbons, and other ornaments. A devotee carrying a kavadi is inviting Murugan to descend and rest upon it, bestowing his grace through divine possession. Carrying a kavadi is usually done to fulfill a vow often made when asking Murugan for some favor, such as healing or deliverance from other distress. This can be an extremely strenuous rite: Fully loaded kavadis sometimes weigh one hundred pounds. The carriers sometimes secure the kavadis by using metal hooks stuck into the flesh of their backs and chests. Carrying the kavadi is seen as an act of devotion and can be found wherever the worship of Murugan is popular: in southern India, at Kataragama in Sri Lanka, in Malaysia, and in South Africa.

Kavi
A word that most literally means “wise man,” but more commonly refers to a “poet” or “bard.” This secondary meaning comes from the pan-Indian assumption that the purpose of such poetic writers was not merely to entertain but to educate and to uplift.

Kavikarnapura
(mid-16th c.) Author of one version of the Chaitanya-Charitramrta (“Nectar of Chaitanya's Deeds”), an account of the life of the Bengali saint Chaitanya. Kavikarnapura’s text was written in 1542, nine years after Chaitanya’s death, when the effort to declare Chaitanya a saint had already begun. Kavikarnapura freely acknowledges his debt to an earlier biography of Chaitanya, written by Murari Gupta. He diverges from the earlier text by portraying Chaitanya as an incarnation of Krishna, descending to earth to bestow grace on ordinary mortals. As with the other traditional accounts of Chaitanya’s life, the author does not claim this to be an “objective” biography but instead a hagiography written by a passionate devotee (bhakta).

Kavitavali
(“series of poems”) The final poetic work of the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?). In the Kavitavali, Tulsidas gives a condensed version of the epic Ramayana as well as poems in which he clearly speaks in his own voice. Evidence in the text indicates that it was completed after 1615. The poems are written in the savaiya and kavitt meters, which are longer, more complex, and less accessible than the meters used in most of Tulsidas’s earlier works. The Kavitavali is divided into seven sections, paralleling the internal structure of the Ramayana, but the bulk of the Kavitavali’s poems are in the last two sections. One of these is the “Lankakhand,” which describes the climactic battle symbolizing the struggle between good and evil; in this section the kavitt meter is used to render vivid battle scenes. The final book is the “Uttarakhand,” comprising more than half of the entire work. In this last section, Tulsidas has written some autobiographical verses and reiterates themes found throughout much of his work: the degeneracy of the present age (Kali Yuga), a stress on devotion as the only means of salvation, and the power inherent in God’s name, through which any obstacles can be overcome. Parts of this latter section sound pessimistic, perhaps reflecting the trials of advancing age, but through it all comes a note of hope that the author’s trust in God’s saving power will not ultimately be in vain.

Kavitt
A particular meter, or rhythm pattern, in Hindi poetry. Verses composed in the Kavitt meter have four lines of thirty-one syllables each, with the break in each individual line often coming after the sixteenth syllable. This is an unusually long meter, thus lending itself well to extended descriptions employing alliteration; in his Kavitavali, the poet-saint Tulsidas uses this meter with great affect to describe battle scenes.
Kavya

("related to kavis") The most general name for courtly poetry or poetic prose, most often composed in the Sanskrit language. Such kavya was usually written and performed in a court setting, where innovative reworking of traditional forms was valued more highly than originality or self-revelation. The primary building block in such poetry

At an altitude of almost 12,000 feet in the Himalaya Mountains, pilgrims traveling to the sacred site of Kedarnath must climb a steep path and contend with unpredictable weather.
was the two-line verse, which was a self-contained unit with regard to meaning. Verses were composed in meters ranging from four to twenty-six syllables per half-line, and were ornamented with various alamkaras (“figures of speech”) in an effort to convey the mood (rasa) appropriate to the subject matter. Poetic forms range from single-verse epigrams, such as those of Bhartrhari, to extended epic poems (mahakavyas), most notably those of Kalidasa. Although such poetry contains frequent references to religious life, it was primarily intended for entertainment rather than moral encouragement, an emphasis which reflects the court atmosphere in which it was composed. The singular exception to this trend is the Gitagovinda of Jayadeva, a text said to have been composed at the Jagannath temple in Puri, which focuses on devotion to the god Krishna as lord of the universe.

Kayasth
Traditional Indian society was modeled as a collection of endogamous, or intermarrying, subgroups known as jatis (“birth”). The jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group’s hereditary occupation, over which each group held a monopoly. The Kayasths worked as scribes and recorders. They were mostly associated with maintaining business and mercantile records, accounting, and keeping businesses running smoothly and profitably.

Kedarnath
Village and sacred site (tirtha) in the Himalayas at the headwaters of the Mandakini River, one of the tributaries of the Ganges. The village is named for its presiding deity, who is the god Shiva in his manifestation as the “Lord of Kedar.” Shiva is present at Kedarnath in the form of a linga, a pillar-shaped image. The Kedarnath linga is deemed one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites deemed especially sacred to Shiva. Kedarnath’s sanctity is only matched by the difficulty in getting to it. Its high altitude—close to 12,000 feet—means that it is only accessible between late April and October, a characteristic also of Yamunotri, Gangotri, and Badrinath, the three other major Himalayan pilgrim sites. A trip to Kedarnath preserves some of the difficulty formerly associated with Himalayan pilgrimage. Pilgrims travel the last ten miles on foot or horseback, during which the path climbs five thousand feet. Those braving the trek must contend with the unpredictable mountain weather, but may also be rewarded with spectacular vistas. The temple of Kedarnath is surrounded by mountain meadows and shaded by mountains capped with snow year-round.

The Kedarnath linga is a natural ridge of stone considered to be a self-manifestation (svayambhu) of Shiva, and is considered to be unusually powerful. The particular shape of this linga is tied to Kedarnath’s charter myth. One version of this story is connected to the five Pandava brothers, who are the protagonists in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics. The Pandavas make their final journey into the Himalayas, searching for a vision of Shiva. They finally see him at a distance, but when they try to get closer, Shiva takes the form of a bull and begins running through the snow. The bull burrows into a snow bank. When the Pandavas follow, they find the body of the bull in the snow. The ridge of rock that forms the Kedarnath linga is considered to be the hump of this bull. The bull’s head continues traveling over the hills, eventually stopping in Nepal, where it takes form as Pashupatinath.

A completely different charter myth draws on the traditional belief that Shiva makes his home high in the mountains. This myth identifies the Panchkedar (a network of five Shiva shrines in the Garhwal region) with five parts of Shiva’s body, thus connecting the deity with the land itself and making the land.
holy. Of these five, Kedarnath is identified as Shiva’s back, Madmaheshvar his navel, Tungnath his arm, Rudranath his face, and Kalpeshvar his matted locks (jata).

Kena (“By Whom?”) Upanishad
One of the shorter of the early speculative texts known as the Upanishads, whose name comes from the first word of the text itself. The Kena Upanishad is unusual in that the first two sections are written in verse, and the third and fourth in prose. This change gives the text a somewhat disjointed feel, despite its brevity, and raises the possibility that it is a compilation of two earlier texts. As with many of the later upanishads, the Kena Upanishad propounds that the ultimate source of all reality is ascribed to a single power that can only be discovered through a flash of mystic insight. The verse sections describe this power: “It is conceived of by one who does not conceive of it, it is not conceived by one who conceives, it is not known by those who think they know it, it is known by those who think they do not know it” (verse 2.3). The prose sections are very different, narrating an encounter between a mysterious being (Brahman personified) and several of the primary gods in the earlier Vedic literature—Indra, Agni, and Vayu. Despite all their efforts, the gods are unable to exercise their respective powers of storm, fire, and wind, showing that their divine power is not independently theirs, but is derived from Brahman.

Kerala
One of the four southern Indian states, whose inhabitants speak a Dravidian language, in this case Malayalam. Kerala occupies the narrow strip of land between the Western Ghats and the Arabian sea, in the region formerly known as the Malabar coast. Kerala is one of the “linguistic” states formed after Indian independence in 1947, to unite people with a common language and culture under one state government. It was created from the Malayalam-speaking regions of the former Madras state, plus the princely states of Travancore and Cochin. Kerala has always been important as a trading center. The desire for its spices and sandalwood have brought merchants from the Middle East for thousands of years. In modern times it has had India’s first elected communist government, and is the only Indian state to have 100 percent adult literacy. Kerala’s most famous sacred site is the temple of Aiyappa at Shabar Malai. By custom the annual pilgrimage to the site is restricted to men as well as women past child-bearing age. For general information about Kerala and other regions of India, see Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.

Keshanta (“shaving the beard”) Samskara
The thirteenth of the sixteen traditional life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras). The ceremony was performed by a young man in the brahmacharin (celibate student) stage of life and marked the first time he shaved his beard. According to tradition, this rite was followed by giving a gift to the teacher, ideally a cow. By ritualizing his first shave, the keshanta samskara was a way to mark the young man’s changing status. After this he was responsible for remaining clean-shaven, as one more of the rules for maintaining ritual purity. In modern times this rite is no longer observed. See also shaving.

Keshava ([One with] “Flowing Hair”) Epithet of the god Krishna. See Krishna.

Keshi
In Hindu mythology, Keshi is one of the assassins sent by Kamsa, the demon-king of Mathura, in an attempt to kill his nephew, the child-god Krishna. In the form of a savage horse, Keshi attacks Krishna. Krishna easily fends him off and kills him, earning himself the name of Keshimanthana, “destroyer of Keshi.”

Keshimanthana
("destroyer of Keshi") Epithet of the god Krishna. Keshi is one of the demon assassins sent by Krishna's uncle Kamsa to kill the child Krishna. Keshi appears in the form of a horse, but Krishna easily destroys him, as he does all the other demons.

Keshini
In Hindu mythology, one of the wives of King Sagar. Through a sage's boon, Keshini and her co-wife Sumati are given a choice in the number of children they will bear—one will bear a single son through whom the lineage will continue, whereas the other will bear sixty thousand sons who will die before they have any offspring. Keshini chooses the former, and through her son Asamanjasa the line of King Sagar is preserved. Her descendants are particularly important, since her great-great-grandson is the sage Bhagirath, who succeeds in bringing the river Ganges from heaven to earth.

Ketu
A malevolent “planet” in Hindu astrology (jyotisha), and was originally the body of a demon. According to the story, the gods and the demons join forces to churn the ocean of milk to obtain the nectar of immortality. The gods manage to trick the demons out of their share. While the gods drink the nectar, the demon Sainhikeya slips into their midst in disguise. As the demon begins to drink, the sun and moon alert Vishnu, who uses his discus to cut off the demon's head. Sainhikeya's two halves become immortal, since they have come into contact with the nectar. The severed body becomes Ketu, and the severed head becomes another malevolent planet, Rahu. Ketu is not regarded as a physical planet, but as the descending node of the moon, or the place where it intersects the ecliptic while passing southward. Ketu is also associated with comets and fiery meteors, generally considered signs of ill omen. See Tortoise avatar.

Khadga
("sword") In Hindu iconography, the sword is an object associated with a variety of deities. It carries strong associations with Kali, symbolizing the cutting off of her devotees’ (bhakta) ignorance. Sometimes it is literally used to cut off heads of the animals sacrificed to her. The sword is also carried by other images of the Goddess, including Durga and Santoshi Ma, as well as certain images of Shiva and Vishnu.

Khajuraho
Small village in the Chattarpur district of the northern state of Madhya Pradesh, renowned for a magnificent collection of temples built about a thousand years ago by the Chandella dynasty. It is unclear why these temples were built in such an inaccessible place, although its remote location is believed to have spared the temples from iconoclasm during Muslim incursions. The most famous Hindu temples at the site are the Kandariya Mahadev, Lakshmana, and Vishvanath. There are many smaller temples to other Hindu deities and several Jain temples as well.

The temples at Khajuraho were built in the northern Indian Nagara style. The building replicates a sacred mountain with the highest point directly over the primary image. The outside of the temples were decorated with sculptural images, and the most famous of these depict women in various explicit sexual encounters. The significance of the erotic sculptures is much debated. Some claim that the sculptures sanction carnal pleasure as a religious path, while some interpret them to represent human union with the divine. Still others view them as teaching that the desire for pleasure must be transcended to attain the divine. For further information see Benjamin Rowland, The Art and Architecture of India, 1971.

Khandava Forest

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, the Khandava forest is consumed by Agni, a god whose material form is fire itself. According to the story, Agni becomes sick and is advised that he can only be healed by eating the creatures in the Khandava forest, many of whom are enemies of the gods. Agni makes seven attempts to “eat” the forest, but is always thwarted by the storm-god Indra, who rescues the forest by dousing it with rain. Agni is perplexed and solicits the help of the god Krishna and his companion Arjuna, the world’s greatest archer. To help Agni, Arjuna is given the Gandiva bow and an inexhaustible quiver of arrows. When Agni again begins to burn the forest, Arjuna keeps off the rain by shooting a flight of arrows so thick that it forms a canopy over the forest. In this way Agni is cured of his illness.

Khandoba

Regional deity worshiped in the central Indian Deccan region, particularly in the states of Maharashtra and Karnataka. Originally believed to be a local deity, Khandoba is now considered to be an avatar, or incarnation, of the god Shiva; he takes this form to destroy two demons named Mani and Malla. After killing the demons he is persuaded to reside at a temple in Jejuri, Maharashtra, from where his worship spread throughout the region. Khandoba is an important popular deity because he is believed to grant people’s wishes, particularly in response to vows. For further information see John M. Stanley, “Special Time, Special Power: The Fluidity of Power in a Popular Hindu Festival,” in Journal of Asian Studies, Vol. 37, No. 1, 1977.

Khara

In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Khara is one of the brothers of the demon-king Ravana. With his brother Dushana, Khara tries to avenge the honor of their sister Shurpanakha, whose ears and nose have been cut off by Rama’s brother Lakshmana. In a fierce battle, Rama destroys the demon army, killing Khara and Dushana. Seeing the failure of her two brothers, Shurpanakha goes to their brother Ravana to demand vengeance. Ravana realizes he cannot kill Rama in battle, but resolves to avenge his sister by kidnapping Sita, an action which drives the plot for the latter part of the epic.

Kharoshthi

Khatvanga

A club or staff topped with a human skull, it is one of the characteristic objects in Hindu iconography. At times the shaft of the staff was made from another human bone, such as a thigh or an arm bone. This symbol is most closely associated with the god Shiva. Its use reflects his marginal, uncontrolled nature and his utter disconnection with the conventional values of ordinary society. It is still sometimes carried by ascetics, for whom Shiva is the model ascetic, and a paradigm for emulation.

Khetaka
("shield") In Hindu iconography, the shield is associated with a variety of deities, including the Goddess, Shiva, and Vishnu. The shield is often found in images in which the figure carries a sword (khadga).

Kichaka
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Kichaka is the brother-in-law of King Virata. King Virata is host to the five Pandava brothers (the epic’s protagonists) during the year that they go incognito after twelve years of forest exile. During this time, Kichaka becomes attracted to Draupadi, the Pandavas’ common wife, who serves as an attendant to one of the royal ladies. Kichaka continues his advances despite her protests and strikes her when she tries to escape. One of Draupadi’s husbands, Bhima, is livid when he discovers what has happened. He tells Draupadi to arrange a secret meeting with Kichaka, on the pretense of surrendering to his desires. Bhima disguises himself as Draupadi and when Kichaka arrives, Bhima kills him with his bare hands.

Kindama
In the Mahabharata, Kindama is a forest-dwelling sage, whose curse on King Pandu advances the epic’s plot. Although celibate in his human form, Kindama occasionally uses his magic powers to transform himself and his wife into animals, so that they can experience sexual pleasure. On one occasion, as Kindama and his wife are in the form of deer, King Pandu shoots the copulating pair with an arrow. In their dying moments the sage and his wife revert to their human forms. The sage curses the horrified Pandu to die the moment he takes his wife in an amorous embrace.

Since Pandu is childless, he abdicates the throne in favor of his blind brother Dhrtarashtra and becomes a celibate renunciant. Pandu’s wives, Kunti and Madri, eventually bear children through magical means. The struggle for power between their children and Duryodhana, Dhrtarashtra's son, is the epic’s pivotal conflict.

Kirtan
("repeating") A type of devotional singing or chanting of short verses which are usually different renditions of the divine name. This is often done in a call and response fashion—the leader sings one line, and the listeners repeat it. The primary emphasis in this rite is the repetition of the divine name. As the identifying mark of the divinity, the Name is believed to contain the divine power, benefiting those who hear it as well as those who speak it. Kirtan is especially popular among the devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, who historically have put greater stress on the theology of the Name. Kirtan is a common activity during congregational meetings known as satsang, the “company of good people,” believed to have beneficial spiritual effects on those who take part in them.

Kirtimukha
(“mask of glory”) In Indian architecture, a kirtimukha is a decorative motif in the form of a devouring leonine monster. It often appears as the main decorative element on a temple tower or as a protective element over doorways.

Kishkindha
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Kishkindha is a forest-kingdom ruled by monkeys. The monkey-king, Bali, rules when Rama (the epic’s protagonist) first comes to Kishkindha with his brother, Lakshmana, searching for Rama’s kidnapped wife Sita. Bali is killed by Rama, and is succeeded by his brother Sugriva, Rama’s ally. Sugriva sends his subjects on a wide-ranging search for Sita. One of them, Hanuman, eventually discovers her being held prisoner on Lanka.

Kitawara
One of four major organizational groups of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva; the other three divisions are Bhuriwara, Bhogawara, and Anandawara. Each of these groups has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by philosopher Shankaracharya. Each of the groups are associated with one of the four Vedas, one of the “great utterances” (mahavakyas) expressing the ultimate truth, a particular ascetic quality, and several of the ten Dashanami divisions. The Kitawara group is affiliated with the Sharada math in Dwaraka, and is thus Ruins of the Sun Temple in Konarak. Built during the Ganga dynasty, the temple was designed in the shape of the chariot believed to carry the sun.

connected with the western quarter of India. The Kitawara's Veda is the Sama Veda. Their mahavakya is “tattvamasi” (“That thou art”) and their ascetic quality is to eat very little. The Dashanami divisions associated with this group are Tirtha and Ashrama.

Koil
(Also known as Koyal) One of the names for the Indian cuckoo. See cuckoo.

Kokila
One of the names for the Indian cuckoo. See cuckoo.

Konarak
Village on the Bay of Bengal in the state of Orissa, about forty miles east of the state capital, Bhubaneshwar. Konarak is famous for its Sun Temple. Now in ruins, the temple was built by king Narasimhadeva (r. 1238–1264), a monarch in the Ganga dynasty. The entire temple was intended to be a likeness of the sun's chariot. Twelve great wheels were carved on the sides at the temple's lowest level; in front of the temple are statues of several colossal horses. As at Khajuraho, the temple's lower levels are covered with erotic carvings, giving rise to diverse interpretations: Some claim the carvings sanction carnal pleasure as a religious path, while some interpret them allegorically as representing human union with the divine. Others view them as teaching that the desire for pleasure must ultimately be transcended to attain the divine.

The temple was built on a massive scale. According to one estimate, the massive central spire would have been over 200 feet high. It is uncertain whether this spire was ever completed, since the sandy soil at its base would have been unable to support the weight of such an enormous structure. This unstable soil has been the greatest contributor to the temple's increasing deterioration. The primary structure left at the site is the jagamohan (assembly hall). During the nineteenth century, the hall was filled with sand in an effort to prevent further collapse. For further information see Roy Craven, Indian Art, 1997.

Konkanastha
Another name for the brahmin community of the Chitpavan, a name that signifies their historical home on the Konkan coastline in the states of Goa and Maharashtra. See Chitpavan.

Korravai
Fierce form of the Goddess, worshiped in southern India and originally believed to have been an autochthonous (“of the land”) deity. Korravai is associated with the hunt and the battlefield, and thus with blood, death, and carnage. Perhaps because of these associations, she was later identified with other fierce manifestations of the Mother Goddess, particularly the goddess Kali.

Koshala
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, this is the name of the region along the banks of the river Sarayu in which Rama's father, King Dasharatha rules.

Kota
City on the Chambal River in the modern state of Rajasthan, about 100 miles south of Jaipur. Before India's independence, Kota was the capital of a small kingdom with the same name. Kota was one of the centers of the Rajasthani style of miniature painting, a genre used to depict Hindu religious themes, particularly incidents in the life of Krishna. The Kota style is considered a derivative of the Bundi style because Kota was ruled by a junior member of the Bundi royal family. Both styles are marked by their attention to nature, shown by detailed depictions of trees surrounding the paintings' subjects. The Kota style is marked by elements of the landscape looming out of proportion, giving the pictures a lush feel. For further information see W. G. Archer, Indian Painting, 1957; and Indian Painting in Bundi and Kotah, 1959.

Kratu
In Hindu mythology, one of the six sons of Brahma, all of whom become great sages. All are “mind-born,” meaning that Brahma’s thoughts are enough to bring them into being. The other five sages are Marichi, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, and Atri.

Krauncha (“Curlew”) Dvipa
In traditional mythic geography, Krauncha is the fifth of the seven concentric landmasses (dvipas) making up the visible world. See also cosmology.

Kraunchanishadana
(“curlew-sitting”) One of the sitting postures (asanas) described in commentaries to the Yoga Sutras. The Yoga Sutras are attributed to the sage Patanjali and give the earliest instruction of yoga. The Kraunchanishadana posture begins in dandasana or “stick-posture,” in which one sits with the upper body erect, the arms straight with the hands flat on the ground and pointing forward, and the legs outstretched. From this posture one of the legs is folded back to the outside, with the heel pressed against the outer thigh. The other leg is raised straight up and pressed against the torso, with the hands clasped at the bottom of the foot.

Krishna
Hindu deity usually considered as the eighth avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu; in certain religious contexts, however, as in the Gitagovinda, he is described as the ultimate deity and the source of all the avatars. In either case, Krishna is one of the major deities in the modern Hindu pantheon. Part of his popularity may stem from the extraordinary breadth of his manifestations, allowing his devotees (bhakta) to worship him in many different ways. His earliest appearance comes in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, where he is a friend and adviser to the five Pandava brothers who are the epic’s protagonists. His epic portrayal is highly complex, and his character is not always truthful or good. He is a regal king and heroic warrior, a cunning opponent, and a Machiavellian politician with his own underlying agenda. Here Krishna plays the role of a trickster, although late in the story, in the section of the epic known as the Bhagavad Gita, he eventually drops the mask to reveal himself as the supreme deity.

The later sectarian literature, particularly the Harivamsha and the Bhagavata Purana, virtually ignore this exalted, royal figure, preferring to concentrate on Krishna’s birth, childhood, and adolescence. This latter stratum of Krishna’s mythology has been clearly imposed on the earlier, heroic image, rendering Krishna a character with unusual mythic depth. Religiously speaking, the image of Krishna as child and lover has been far more important than the stern and somewhat amoral hero.

The characters in the story of Krishna’s life, including his parents, friends, and companions, are not aware of his divinity, and throughout the story they confront many surprises and bewildering events. However, none of these plot twists surprise the readers, since they are aware that all of the characters are taking part in Krishna’s divine play (lila). According to tradition, Krishna is the eighth son of Devaki and Vasudeva. He is born in a prison in the city of Mathura, where his parents have been confined by his uncle, the wicked king Kamsa. On Devaki’s wedding day, a divine voice warns Kamsa that her eighth child will eventually kill him. In an effort to forestall this prophecy, he puts the couple in prison, and kills all of Devaki’s children as soon as they are born. Kamsa intends to do the same with Krishna, but when Krishna is born, a deep sleep falls on all the jailers, the locked prison doors are miraculously opened, and Vasudeva is able to spirit the infant out of the prison to the home of his foster parents, Nanda and Yashoda. Vasudeva returns that night, bearing Yashoda’s newborn baby girl, who is really Bhadrakali, the Goddess, in disguise. The next morning Kamsa kills the child by dashing it against a stone. From the body arises the Goddess, who taunts Kamsa, telling him that the person who will slay him has escaped.

Krishna lives happily at Nanda and Yashoda’s home. His mythic images from that early time stress either his persona as the adorable child or unexpected feats of strength and heroism. As an infant he is placed under a cart, which he strikes with his foot and kicks into the air; he also slays a variety of demon assassins sent by his uncle Kamsa, most notably Putana, Keshi, and Trnavarta. During all these feats his companions are amazed but never realize that divinity is in their midst. Nor, for that matter, do his foster parents. In one story Yashoda looks in Krishna’s mouth when he has been eating some dirt and sees the entire universe inside it. Through the workings of Krishna’s power of illusion (maya), she immediately forgets the whole incident. The themes of forgetfulness and hidden divinity are central to Krishna’s childhood mythology. The people in Braj treat Krishna with easy familiarity, because they are unaware of his true identity. Krishna is said to prefer this sort of natural interaction over all other worship.

As a boy Krishna becomes known for his mischief, particularly his penchant for stealing butter from the gopis (milkmaids), although when he is caught he can usually manage to charm his way out of punishment. His adolescence is marked by two heroic episodes—driving off the serpent Kaliya, and defeating the storm-god Indra by holding up Mt. Govardhan—and by the development of his persona as a lover. On moonlit, autumn nights, he plays his flute Murali on the banks of the Yamuna River. Hearing its irresistible call, the village women rush to meet him, whiling away the night in the circle dance known as the ras lila. Although she is not mentioned in the earliest texts, Radha appears as Krishna’s special companion and consort, symbolizing the relationship between deity and devotee using the imagery of lover and beloved.

Some parts of Krishna’s mythology relate episodes from later in his life, including his return to Mathura, the slaying of Kamsa, taking his rightful place as ruler, and marrying Rukmini and a host of other wives. The earlier strands of his mythic identity—the king, hero, and cunning diplomat portrayed in the Mahabharata—can be tied in here, to make it seem like the account of a single life. Some of the most poignant devotional (bhakti) poetry details the exchange between Krishna’s female devotees, the gopis, and Uddhava, Krishna’s companion sent back from Mathura. Uddhava reassures them that Krishna is the indwelling God and is omnipresent. For the gopis, this abstract concept is a poor substitute for the sweet boy they know so well. Their attention remains focused on the charming child of Braj, who never grows up, never grows old, and who invites his devotees to share his world.

The worship of Krishna emphasizes relationship and communion, both with the deity and one another. In the most elaborate forms of worship, Krishna’s devotees envision themselves as entering Krishna’s world and spending the day doing the ordinary activities of a village cowhand, such as getting up, eating, taking the cows to pasture, and bringing home the cows. Some devotional manuals give detailed daily calendars, for which the devotees can visualize themselves going to particular places and doing particular things at certain times—building a relationship with God through sharing the mundane parts of everyday life. Another common practice is communal singing, usually collections of the divine names known as kirtans, as a way to build relationships and communion among the devotees.

Another feature of Krishna’s character and worship is the notion of lila or “play.” As David R. Kinsley points out, the infant Krishna dispatches the demon assassins as a form of play, and they never pose any serious threat. His relationship with the people of Braj is also a sort of play. He comes as the divine presence in their midst, but keeps them completely unaware of this, occasionally hinting at it through his wondrous deeds, but unwilling to ruin their natural interactions with him by revealing their difference in status. In the same way, he is believed to be active in the lives of his devotees, always present, but dropping only teasing hints of his presence. Finally, lila is the name for a series of dramas performed during the monsoon season in the town of Brindavan. These productions, known as the ras lila, are not mere drama but combine both liturgy and drama. Krishna and his companions are played by local brahmin boys. While in costume, the boys are believed to have become the characters they portray. Part of the program is worship. The players, known as svarups (“own-forms”), gather on stage to give darshan to the audience. The most common religious act in modern popular Hinduism, darshan allows direct eye contact between the devotee and the image of a deity, which is considered to be a conscious, perceiving being. The second part of the program is the lila, a rendition of some episode in Krishna’s mythology. The audience participates by virtue of its presence, making Krishna’s lila part of present-day experience by performing or attending these productions. Given his stature as a Hindu deity, there are many works on Krishna. For further information see Milton Singer (ed.), Krishna, 1966; David R. Kinsley, The Sword and the Flute, 1975; Barbara Stoller Miller, The Love Song of the Dark Lord, 1977; and John Stratton Hawley, Krishna: The Butter Thief, 1983. See also Vaishnavism.

Krishnadas
(early 16th c.) One of the ashtachap, a group of eight northern Indian bhakti (devotional) poets. The compositions of these eight poets were used for liturgical purposes by the Pushti Marg, a religious community of devotees (bhakta) of Krishna. In the Pushti Marg’s sectarian literature, all eight are also named as members of the community and as associates of either the community’s founder, Vallabhacharya, or his successor Vitthalnath. Traditionally, Krishnadas is associated with Vallabhacharya. Little is known about Krishnadas, although traditional accounts hold that he was born in 1497. His poetry describes the physical beauty of Krishna as an object of aesthetic enjoyment. Within the Pushti Marg, he is remembered as a capable administrator and a defender of the sect’s interests in Brindavan, Krishna’s childhood home, against the followers of Chaitanya.

Krishnadas Kaviraj
Author of the most influential version of the Chaitanya-Charitramrta (“Nectar of Chaitanya’s Deeds”), an account of the life of the Bengali poet-saint Chaitanya, written about ninety years after Chaitanya’s death. Krishnadas’s text is the latest and most developed biography of Chaitanya and focuses mainly on Chaitanya’s later life, particularly his visit to Brindavan, the northern Indian village where the god Krishna is supposed to have spent his childhood. This text is marked by the philosophical influence of the three Goswamis—Rupa, Sanatana, and Jiva—whose ideas played a major role in shaping Chaitanya’s religious followers, the Gaudiya Vaishnavas. As with the other traditional accounts of Chaitanya’s life, this text does not purport to give an “objective” biography, it is rather a hagiography (an idealizing and idolizing portrait) written by a passionate devotee (bhakta).

Krishna Deva Raya
(r. 1509–1530) Most important ruler in the Vijayanagar dynasty, the last of the great southern Hindu kingdoms. During his rule, Vijayanagar reached its zenith. Krishna Deva Raya defeated the Deccani sultans to the north, although he reinstituted them as vassals. He conquered the eastern coast all the way to Orissa and maintained good trading relationships with the newly-arrived Portuguese, although he refused to become involved in their politics. His reign was a time of artistic achievement and general prosperity, evident in the artifacts of the time. His successors were not as successful, however. Less than forty years after his death, the coalition of the Deccani sultans defeated Rama Raja at the battle of Talikota. The Vijayanagar kingdom was completely destroyed.

Krishna Janam Bhumi
Site in the city of Mathura believed to mark the spot where the god Krishna was born. The present temple was completed in the 1960s, but the site itself is very old. One of the most religiously volatile sites in all of India, the new temple abuts the Shahi Idgah, a mosque built on the base of an earlier Krishna temple. According to one tradition, Muslim iconoclasts destroyed four successive temples at the spot now occupied by the mosque, marking the exact location of Krishna’s birth. This claim seems doubtful since the mosque was built in 1661, and the temple it is said to have replaced was destroyed by the Moghul emperor Aurangzeb in 1669. In the 1980s the Krishna Janam Bhumi was one of the three sites selected by the activist Vishva Hindu Parishad to be reclaimed as a Hindu holy place, along with the Vishvanath temple in Benares, and Ayodhya’s Ram Janam Bhumi. In all of these places, mosques were claimed to have been built on the site of an important Hindu temple, although only the first two have historical evidence that this occurred. During the 1990s there have been several campaigns to reclaim the Krishna Janam Bhumi, but to this point the campaigns have generated little support. Given the popular backlash after the 1992 destruction of the Babri Masjid in Ayodhya, the government has been far more restrictive on the activities it allows at such disputed sites. For further information see Christophe Jaffrelot, The Hindu Nationalist Movement in India, 1996. See also Moghul dynasty.

Krishnamishra
(late 11th c.) Author of the Sanskrit drama Prabodhachandrodaya (“Rising of the moon of wisdom”), an allegory celebrating the triumph of Vaishnava piety. The play is noted for the third act, in which four representatives of non-Vaishnava sects appear: a materialist; a Jain monk; a Buddhist monk; and a Kapalika, a member of an ascetic community who worshiped the god Shiva. The last is portrayed as depraved, indulging in meat, wine, and sexual gratification, as well as having a penchant for violence. Although the reader may safely assume that this is a biased perspective, it is instructive in the attitudes it reveals toward ascetics and all non-Vaishnava religious groups.

Krishnamurti, Jiddu
(1895–1986) Modern Indian thinker whose teachings centered on the necessity for personal realization through critical self-awareness. His teaching had strong roots in his own life experience. When he was fourteen years old, one of the leaders of the Theosophical Society, Annie Besant, proclaimed him to be an incarnation of the future Buddha Maitreya. He later repudiated these claims, and for the rest of his life stressed the need to examine and question all authority, including himself. Much of his life was spent in Europe and the United States, where his books and lectures found their primary audience. For further information see Pupul Jayakar, Krishnamurti: A Biography, 1986.

Krishna Paksha
The dark or waning half of a lunar month.

Krishna River
River running from west to east in south central India. Its headwaters lie in Maharashtra on the inland side of the Western Ghats. It meanders through Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh, fortified by the Bhima River and the Tungabhadra River, before entering the sea in the Bay of Bengal. The temple of the god Vithoba in the town of Pandharpur, considered the most important sacred site (tirtha) on the whole river, lies on the Bhima River.

Krittikas
In Hindu mythology, the Krittikas are a group of six minor goddesses who are the personification of the constellation Pleiades. Their important mythic appearance is as the foster mothers of the god Skanda. Skanda is considered the son of the god Shiva, but is born in an unusual way. When Shiva and Parvati are disturbed while making love, Shiva inadvertently spills his semen on the ground. In Indian culture semen is seen as a man's concentrated essence. Because he is a deity, Shiva's semen is inordinately powerful, capable of destroying the earth. The semen is first held by the god Agni, who is fire personified, but it proves too powerful for him. Agni puts the semen in the river Ganges. After 10,000 years, a shining child is discovered in the reeds along the riverbank. The child is discovered by the Krittikas, each of whom wants to nurse him. To oblige them, the child Skanda grows five extra heads. As a mark of their care, one of his epithets is Karttikeya.

Krpacharya
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Krpacarya is a famous archer who teaches both the Pandavas and the Kauravas, the two competing families in the epic. Krpacarya is a supporter of the Kaurava leader Duryodhana. During the year the Pandavas spend in hiding, he sends spies to try to find them. In the Mahabharata war he fights on the side of the Kauravas. His most important act is setting fire to the Pandava camp during the night attack following the Pandava victory. All those trying to flee the flames are killed. After the war he stays for some time at the court of Yudhishtira, the eldest Pandava brother, but later renounces the world to live in the forest.
Krta Yuga
A particular age of the world in one of the reckonings of cosmic time. According to traditional belief, time has neither beginning nor end, but alternates between cycles of creation and activity, followed by cessation and quietude. Each of these cycles lasts for 4.32 billion years; the active phase is known as the Day of Brahma, and the quiet phase as the Night of Brahma. In one reckoning of cosmic time, the Day of Brahma is divided into one thousand mahayugas (“great cosmic ages”), each of which lasts for 4.32 million years. Each mahayuga is composed of four constituent yugas, named the Krta Yuga, Treta Yuga, Dvapara Yuga, and Kali Yuga. Each of these four yugas is shorter than its predecessor and ushers in an era more degenerate and depraved than the preceding one. By the end of the Kali Yuga, things have gotten so bad that the only solution is the destruction and recreation of the earth, at which time the next Krta era begins.

The Krta Yuga is the first of the four yugas, and at 1,728,000 years, it is by far the longest. It is also considered to be the best of all the yugas, symbolized by gold, the most valuable of all metals. In a dice game played in ancient India, the side designated Krta was the one for the winning throw, representing the best possible option. In the mythic descriptions of the Krta Yuga, people live extremely long times, are of tremendous physical stature, and by nature, are completely virtuous.

Kshanika (“momentary”) Linga
A type of linga, the pillar-shaped object symbolizing the god Shiva. A kshanika linga is temporarily made for immediate worship, from whatever materials are at hand—whether earth, sand, grain, butter, or any other substance that can be heaped and molded. This use of temporary images reveals an important aspect of Hindu religious life—that although God is everywhere, many human beings tend to work better when they have a concrete focus for their religious attention. This being so, God deigns to come into the humblest objects, if they are created with him (or her) in mind.

Kshatriya
In traditional Hindu social theory, the kshatriyas were the second most influential of the four major social groups (varnas). The kshatriyas’ function was ruling, protecting, and creating social order so that the other varnas could carry out their tasks. This image is reflected in the creation story known as the Purusha Sukta. The kshatriyas are described as being created from the Primeval Man’s shoulders and associated with strength and power. In actual practice, the kshatriya varna may have been the most permeable of all, since any person with the power to rule was usually given de facto kshatriya status, which could be solidified by a fictitious genealogy in the following generations. Perhaps the best example of this phenomenon is the subgroup known as the Rajputs (“king’s sons”), who at varying times ruled large sections of northern and western India, but whose origins are unclear and obscure.

Kshemaraja
(11th c.) Kshemaraja was the primary disciple of Abhinavagupta, the Kashmiri writer famous for his works on poetics and aesthetics, and a pivotal figure in the development of Trika Shaivism. Based on a tantric philosophy, Trika Shaivism states that the sole true reality is the god Shiva, who is both supreme god and the source of the emanations that constitute the material of the universe. Final liberation of the soul (moksha) comes through a process of “recognition” (pratyabhijNA) in which one realizes that the entire universe is all a manifestation of Shiva alone. Here one “recognizes” something that has always been true, but until that time has been obscured by a mistaken understanding. Kshemaraja continued the development of the Trika school. His most famous work is the Svachchandatantra. See also tantra.

Kubera
In Hindu mythology, a minor deity who is one of the eight Guardians of the Directions, serving as guardian over the northern quarter. Kubera is said to live in the Himalaya mountains, where he is served by mythical creatures such as yakshas, nagas, and kinnaras. He is enormously fat, and because of all the mineral wealth contained in the mountains, he is enormously wealthy. Kubera is the half-brother of the demon-king of Lanka, Ravana, and Kumbhakarna and Vibhishana. All four are sons of the demigod Vishravas, but Kubera has a different mother. Despite their relationship, Ravana steals Kubera's aerial chariot, the Pushpak Viman. Because of Ravana's notorious misdeeds, Kubera supports the god-king Rama's efforts to conquer Ravana.

Kubja
(“hunchback”) In the mythology of the god Krishna, Kubja is a hunchbacked woman whom Krishna meets while journeying to the city of Mathura to reclaim his kingdom. Kubja carries a jar of expensive salve that is meant for the king, but when Krishna asks her for some, she willingly gives it to him. As a reward for her generosity and devotion, Krishna straightens her spine, turning her into a gorgeous young woman.

Kuchela

Kuchipudi
One of the classical dance forms of India; some of the others are Bharatanatyam, Kathak, Orissi, Kathakali, and Manipuri. Like much of traditional Indian culture, classical dance shows strong regional identification; Kuchipudi is primarily found in Andhra Pradesh. As with much of Indian dance, Kuchipudi has its roots in religious life. It was developed in the village of Kuchipudi as part of a religious festival. The Maharaja of Golconda was so pleased with the dance that he awarded the village as a gift to the brahmin families there, with the condition that they continue to nurture the art, which their descendants have done. Stylistically, the dance shows the influence of Bharatanatyam, and like all Indian dance, it shows the well-developed vocabulary of gesture that is drawn from the classical manuals. At the same time, the form is softer and less geometric than Bharatanatyam, showing the influence of folk traditions. The language for the dance-dramas is Telegu, reflecting the local culture. As with all classical dances, Kuchipudi has undergone certain changes in the past generation, spurred by the shift to stage performance as the dance's primary venue. One of the most significant changes has been to open the dance to women. For further information see Mohan Khokar, Traditions of Indian Classical Dance, 1984.

Kulachara

(“family practice”) Any religious practice restricted to a family, either a group of blood relatives or people sharing a common religious or sectarian lineage. The authority given to kulachara allows for almost infinite variation in religious practice, particularly in the absence of any established religious hierarchy which has the authority to render judgments on such practices. For most Hindus, such family practice is the predominant influence shaping their individual religious lives.

Kuladevata

(“family deity”) The particular deity worshiped by a family, whether this “family” be blood relatives, or people who share the same religious lineage, sect, or region. In most cases, the kuladevata will be one’s primary deity.

Kulashekhara

(9th c.) One of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, emphasizing passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language. According to tradition, Kulashekhara was the king of the Travancore region in modern Kerala. His religious commitment grew so strong that he eventually abdicated his throne. For further information see Kamil Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975; and John Stirling Morley Hooper, Hymns of the Alvars, 1929.

Kulu

The most important city in the Kulu Valley in the state of Himachal Pradesh. The city of Kulu is famous for its Dussehra festival. Dussehra celebrates the victory of the god Rama over the demon-king Ravana; it is a celebration of the victory of good over evil. Kulu’s festival centers around the figure of Rama from the Raghunathji temple in the nearby village of Dhalpur. When Rama is brought to the festival site in his temple car, he is celebrated by hundreds of deities who have come from temples up and down the Kulu Valley, as well as the people who have gathered to see the deities and the spectacle of their procession. The deities’ actions are carefully choreographed according to well-established rituals.

Kumara

(“youth”) Epithet of the god Skanda, who is usually portrayed in the form of a young boy. See Skanda.

Kumara Gupta I

(r. 415–454) The fourth important ruler of the Gupta dynasty, who managed to keep his northern Indian empire intact for most of his reign. At the end of his reign, he had to contend with incursions in the west by the central Asians, known as the Hunas. While in battle with them, he was killed. Pressure from the Hunas continued in the years following Kumara Gupta’s death and was one of the important factors causing the eventual collapse of the Gupta empire several generations later.

Kumarapala

(r. 1143–1172) Jaina king of the Chalukya dynasty in Gujarat, who was so committed to nonviolence that he imposed heavy fines on people who killed fleas and other vermin.

Kumarasambhava

(“Birth of the Prince”) One of the finest poetic works written by Kalidasa, who is generally considered the greatest classical Sanskrit poet. The Kumarasambhava is an epic poem based on a mythological theme. It begins by describing the ascendancy of a demon named Taraka, who receives a divine boon that he can only be killed by a son of Shiva. The poem describes the extended courtship of Shiva and Parvati, their marriage, and ends with an account of their lovemaking. The text ends before the birth of the god Skanda, who in other mythical accounts of this tale kills Taraka. This abrupt ending has led some interpreters to consider the play unfinished. Others simply view these later events as a foregone conclusion, by which the poet does not waste his hearers’ time.

Kumarila
In Indian philosophy, one of the two great seventh-century commentators of the Mimamsa philosophy, one of the six schools of Hindu philosophy; the other great commentator was Prabhakara. The Mimamsa school was most concerned with the examination and pursuit of dharma ("righteous action"), for which members believed all necessary instructions were contained in the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. Consequently, much of Mimamsa thought is concerned with principles and methods of textual interpretation to uncover and interpret the Vedic instructions. Although both Kumarila and Prabhakara were committed to discovering the boundaries of dharma by interpreting the Vedas, there are significant differences in their philosophical positions, which show up most clearly in their theories of error.

Prabhakara begins with the assumption, similar to the Nyaya concept of inherence (samavaya), that there is a relatively weak correspondence between an object and its attributes. An example of this would be the relation of the color red to a particular ball, such that the ball is said to be red. According to Prabhakara, false beliefs result from akhyati ("nondiscrimination"). This occurs when a person observes two different things with the same attributes and concludes that they are the same. Kumarila is closer to the bhedabhada ("identity and difference") philosophical position, which holds that all things have both identity and difference with all other things. Kumarila explains error as viparitakhyati ("contrary perception"), in which one mistakenly pairs up the similarities between two things, rather than noting their differences. For example, a person mistakenly believes that a shell with a silvery color is actually a piece of silver because he or she chooses to focus on the similarities between the shell and silver rather than the differences. People are impelled to make these choices by karmic formations, such as greed for silver.

Kumbhadas
(early 16th c.) One of the ashtachap, a group of eight northern Indian bhakti (devotional) poets. The compositions of these poets were used for liturgical purposes by the Pushti Marg, a religious community whose members are devotees (bhakta) of Krishna. In the Pushti Marg’s sectarian literature, all eight poets are named as members of the community and as associates of either the community’s founder, Vallabhacharya, or his successor, Vitthalnath. Kumbhadas is traditionally associated with Vallabhacharya. Little is known about Kumbhadas, although it is believed that he was born in 1469. His poetry describes the five modes of devotion described by Rupa Goswami, particularly the mode known as madhurya ("honeyed"). Madhurya describes the relationship between deity and devotee, using the language of lover and beloved, in which each has passionate love for the other.

Kumbhakarna
gatekeeper, who has been cursed to be reborn three times as a demon, killed by the god Vishnu each time. Kumbhakarna and his brothers have performed harsh asceticism (tapas) in their youth to gain boons from the gods. When the god Brahma finally comes to give him boons, Kumbhakarna means to demand "nirdevatvam" (that he cannot be conquered by any of the gods). At the critical moment he is foiled by the goddess Saraswati, who has power over speech. She dances on his tongue and confuses his speech, causing him to request "nidravatvam" (sleepiness). Because of this slip of his tongue, Kumbhakarna will sleep for six months at a time, wake up to gorge himself with food and drink for a short time, and then fall asleep again. Some of the dramatic tension in the battle portions of the Ramayana pertains to the violent efforts to rouse Kumbhakarna, so that he can take part in the battle. Once awakened he fights valiantly, but is eventually killed by Rama.

As is true for all the demons, Kumbhakarna is not wholly evil. Before engaging in battle with Rama's army, he rebukes Ravana for kidnapping Rama's wife, Sita. He also notes that as the younger brother it is his duty to uphold the family honor. Here we find the demon Kumbhakarna upholding idealized Indian family values—the younger brother is supposed to support and defend his elder brother's interests as a way to keep the family intact. This same virtue is in Rama's younger brothers, Lakshmana and Bharata. Despite their enmity, the epic's "heroes" and "villains" have significant shared values.

Kumbhakonam

One of the many temple-towns in the Tanjore district of the state of Tamil Nadu, reflecting the district's importance as the home of the Chola dynasty kings. Kumbhakonam has several large temples. Built in the Dravida architectural style, the temple buildings are of modest height, cover an immensely large area, and are surrounded by a boundary wall with massive towers (gopurams) over each wall's central gateway. Kumbhakonam's most famous site is not a temple, but a temple bathing (snana) tank. A festival is held at the tank every twelve years, at which time the water in the tank is believed to become the Ganges. An estimated 400,000 people attended this event in 1992; tragically, forty-eight people were killed in a stampede. Outside the town is the Swami Malai temple, one of the six temples to the god Skanda.

Kumbha Mela

("Festival of the Pot") A religious festival celebrated in four different locations: Haridwar, Allahabad, Ujjain, and Nasik. The first two sites are by far the most important, with Allahabad considered the holiest of all. Attendance at these festivals is great. In 1998, ten million people were in Haridwar on the climactic day. Both of these sites also host an Ardha ("half") Kumbha Mela, generally six years after the full Kumbha Mela, which are smaller in scale, but can still draw millions of pilgrims. At Ujjain and Nasik, the full Kumbha Melas are not as well attended than at the other two sites.

The Kumbha Mela is a bathing (snana) festival; it is for this reason that all the Mela sites are found near rivers. The Kumbha Mela's primary actors are ascetics from all over South Asia who come to bathe in the sacred waters. According to tradition, the Kumbha Mela was organized by the great philosopher Shankaracharya to promote regular gatherings of learned and holy men, as a means to strengthen, sustain, and spread Hindu religious beliefs. The Kumbha Mela is also a time for these ascetics to display their status vis-à-vis one another. At each site, the order in which the different ascetic sects bathe is strictly enforced—the most important sects bathe first. In more recent times, this order has been enforced by the government. In earlier times, it was the subject of much dispute, often degenerating into armed conflict as different ascetic sects vied with one another for the place of pride.

The time for each Kumbha Mela festival is determined astrologically, based on the positions of the planet Jupiter, the sun, and the moon. The Mela is held at Haridwar when Jupiter is in Aquarius (Kumbha) and the sun enters Aries; at Allahabad when Jupiter is in Taurus and the sun and moon are in Capricorn; at Ujjain when Jupiter is in Leo and the full moon appears in the lunar month of Baisakh; and at Nasik when Jupiter is in Leo during the lunar month of Shravan. These alignments occur about every twelve years.

The charter myth for the Kumbha Mela is taken from the story of Churning the Ocean of Milk. After the ocean has been churned and the nectar of immortality (amrta) has been extracted, the gods and their demon opponents begin to quarrel over the pot of nectar. The gods snatch the pot and make off with it, but the person carrying the pot grows tired, and in twelve days of carrying it sets it on the ground four times—namely, at the four sites where the Mela is held. In each place a bit of the nectar splashes on the ground, sanctifying the site. According to popular belief, at each Kumbha Mela’s most propitious moment, the waters in which people are bathing become the nectar of immortality, and all those who bathe in these waters gain immeasurable religious merit.

Kumbha Mela is considered the largest religious festival in the world. Arrangements for the Melas at Haridwar and Allahabad are made by the government of Uttar Pradesh, coordinating transportation, drinking water, and sanitation for millions of pilgrims, as well as building temporary cities for the visitors. Ascetics come from all over the subcontinent, some staying for months. Many religious organizations set up booths in an effort to publicize their message.

Recently the government has begun using the Mela to promote ideas such as family planning and cleaning up the Ganges, as well as promoting the Mela as tourism, spurring economic development. This combination of business and religion has roots in the past; in the early nineteenth century, the annual spring bathing fair at Haridwar was also a trading fair, particularly for horses. For many people, the opportunity to view the spectacle of the Mela is at least as strong an inducement as the promise of bathing away their sins. See also Tortoise avatar.

Kumhar
Traditional Indian society was as a collection of endogamous subgroups (in which marriage is decreed by law to occur only between members of the same group) known as jatis ("birth"). Jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group's hereditary occupation, over which each group held a monopoly. The Kumhars' hereditary occupation was making pottery.

Kunbi
Traditional Indian society was as a collection of endogamous subgroups (in which marriage is decreed by law to occur only between members of the same group) known as jatis ("birth"). Jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group's hereditary occupation, over which each group held a monopoly. The Kunbis' traditional occupation was farming. They were the dominant landholding community in Gujarat.

Kundalini
("spiral") Kundalini, the latent spiritual power that exists in every person, is one of the most fundamental concepts in tantra. It is the most vital element in the subtle body, an alternate physiological system believed to occupy a different plane of existence than gross matter, but which has certain correspondences to the material body. The subtle body is a set of six psychic centers (chakras), visualized as multi-petaled lotus flowers running along the spine and connected by three vertical channels. Each of the chakras symbolize human capacities, subtle elements (tanmatras), and sacred sounds. Above and below the chakras are the bodily abodes of the god Shiva (awareness) and the goddess Shakti (power), the two divine principles through which the entire universe has come into being. The underlying assumption behind this concept is the homology (or the similarity based on the common origin) of macrocosm and microcosm, an essential Hindu belief documented in the texts of the Upanishads.

The kundalini is an aspect of the universal Shakti present in all human beings; it is visualized as a snake coiled three times around the muladhara chakra, the lowest of the psychic centers. Although kundalini can be found in all people, it is usually dormant, symbolized by its coiled state. The object of the religious disciplines (yogas) involving the subtle body is to awaken and uncoil the kundalini, drawing it up through the subtle body's central channel (sushumna), piercing through the chakras on its way. Kundalini's ascent represents the awakening of spiritual energy. This awakening must be carried out under a guru's supervision to prevent the aspirant from unknowingly arousing uncontrollable forces. As each chakra is pierced, it is believed to bring either the destruction of obstructions or the awakening of new capacities. When fully extended, the kundalini rises to the microcosmic realm of Shiva, the sahasradalapadma at the crown of the head, to unite with Shiva in perpetual bliss. Kunti

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Kunti is the elder wife of King Pandu, and the mother of Yudhishthira, Arjuna, and Bhima. None of these children are actually Pandu’s sons; they have been magically conceived through the effect of a mantra given to Kunti by the sage Durvasas. The mantra gives the woman who recites it the power to call down any of the gods and conceive a son equal in power to the god himself.

Kunti receives this mantra before her marriage. In a moment of youthful impulsiveness, she recites it while looking at the sun. She is immediately visited by a shining figure who leaves her with an equally shining son. Distraught and desperate at the birth of this illegitimate child, she puts him in a box and abandons him in the Ganges River. The child is adopted by the charioteer Adhiratha and grows up to be the heroic Karna.

Kunti’s other three sons are born after her marriage, with Pandu’s blessing: Yudhishthira from the god Dharma, who is righteousness personified; Arjuna from the storm-god Indra; and Bhima from the wind-god Vayu. Although these three grow up to be heroic and kingly figures, they develop a violent hatred for Karna because of his unknown parentage. One of the Mahabharata’s tragic themes is this bitter rivalry between men who do not know they are brothers. Their hostility is especially difficult for Kunti, aware of Karna’s identity. She knows that the problems are rooted in her impulsiveness and cowardice. On the eve of the great Mahabharata war she goes to Karna, reveals his identity to him, imploring him to return and fight with his brothers. Karna refuses, saying that he has taken a vow to kill Arjuna, but he will not harm her other sons. After the war Kunti becomes a recluse, living in the forest with several other people of her generation. After living there for some years, she is killed in a forest fire.

Kurma Avatar

The Kurma avatar is considered the second avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu. Taking the form of a tortoise, he helps the gods churn the Ocean of Milk so that they can obtain the nectar of immortality (amrita). See Tortoise avatar.

Kurmasana

(“tortoise-posture”) One of the sitting postures (asanas) used in yoga; also a posture in which images of the deities are portrayed in Hindu iconography. As described in commentaries on the Yoga Sutras, this posture has the legs crossed with the feet tucked under the thighs, and the crossed heels forming a cavity around the scrotum. In Indian iconography, the Kurmasana is sometimes represented at the base of a statue by an actual carving of a tortoise, forming the base on which the image is placed. In modern yoga manuals this posture is described as a sitting position in which the upper body is bent forward, with the arms extended sideways under the outstretched legs, so that person looks vaguely... like a tortoise, with a head, "shell" (the trunk), and four outstretched limbs.

Kurukshetra

City and sacred site (tirtha) in the northern part of the state of Haryana, about ninety miles due north of Delhi. In Hindu mythology, Kurukshetra is the site of the climactic battle in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics. This battle is still discussed as if it was a recent event. Kurukshetra is also famous as a bathing (snana) place. A bathing pool attracts hundreds of thousands of pilgrims during eclipses, at which time it is believed to contain all the sacred waters of India.

Kusha

In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Kusha is one of the twin sons of Rama, the epic's protagonist. After their mother, Sita, has been cast into exile at the ashram of the sage Valmiki, Kusha is born in an unusual fashion. One day when Sita takes her son Lava to bathe in the river, Valmiki notices that the child is gone and fears that it has been seized by a wild animal. To spare Sita's motherly feelings, he creates an identical child out of kusha grass. When Sita returns with Lava, his twin is given the name Kusha. Later, Lava and Kusha go with Valmiki to Rama's court in Ayodhya. It is in Rama's court that they first recite the epic poem composed by Valmiki, the Ramayana. After Rama gives up his throne, he divides his kingdom between Lava and Kusha.

Kusha ("Kusha Grass") Dvipa

In traditional mythic geography, Kusha or “Kusha grass,” is the fourth of the seven concentric landmasses (dvipas) making up the visible world. See also cosmology.
Laghava

(“simplicity”) In Indian logic, one of the general principles in constructing and pursuing an argument. According to the principle of “simplicity,” when one is presented with two equally plausible theories, one should choose the theory that is easier to understand and makes the fewest assumptions. The primary criterion in evaluating an argument is the validity of the argument itself. Only after this has been satisfied may one raise objections based on complexity or simplicity.

Laghima

(“lightness”) One of eight superhuman powers (siddhi) believed to be conferred by high spiritual attainment. This particular power gives one the ability to become as light as one desires, bestowing the ability to fly.

Lajpat Rai, Lala

(1865–1928) Lawyer, reformer, and militant Hindu nationalist. Born to a humble Punjabi family, Lajpat Rai became wealthy from his legal work. By the age of thirty-five, he was able to devote all of his earnings to public work. He joined the Arya Samaj while still in his teens and supported Lahore’s Dayanand Anglo-Vedic College, which was founded in 1889. At the turn of the century he was active in a variety of social and educational endeavors. He eventually entered politics. He actively resisted British rule, which brought him several prison terms. Unlike many of his contemporaries, he refused to advocate violence. His commitment to politics ultimately cost him his life; he died from injuries sustained in a beating by the police while leading a demonstration in Lahore.

Lakshmana

In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Lakshmana is one of King Dasharatha’s sons by his wife Sumitra, and the younger half-brother of Rama, the epic’s protagonist. Throughout the Ramayana Lakshmana is the model younger brother, existing only to serve and support Rama. When Rama is banished to the forest for fourteen years, Lakshmana follows him like a shadow for the entire time: first living as a forest ascetic, searching for Rama’s kidnapped wife Sita, then fighting heroically in the battle with Ravana’s army; finally he returns to serve Rama at his court in Ayodhya.

Many of the characters in the Ramayana are paradigms for Indian cultural values. Lakshmana (as with his brother Bharata) symbolizes the ideal younger brother. In northern India, brothers are the heart of the joint family. They remain at home, whereas after marriage, sisters live in their marital families. The eldest brother in every generation eventually becomes the head of the joint family. Carrying primary authority and responsibility for the family as a whole, the eldest cannot succeed without the cooperation of his younger brothers who must acknowledge and support his authority. In his service to Rama and his complete disregard for his own needs, Lakshmana is a dutiful younger brother.

Despite his bravery, valor, and total loyalty to Rama, Lakshmana is far from perfect. He lacks Rama’s judgment and forbearance, and tends to act before he thinks. For example, when Bharata pursues the two brothers after they have gone into exile, Lakshmana leaps to the conclusion that Bharata is seizing the opportunity to kill them, to clear his own way to the throne. Lakshmana prepares to attack Bharata, but Rama’s reasoning forestalls a potential tragedy.
Lakshmana’s most serious lapse of judgment is with Shurpanakha, a demon princess and sister to Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka. When she makes amorous advances toward Lakshmana, he first ridicules her and then mutilates her. Ravana kidnaps Rama’s wife, Sita, to gain a measure of revenge against the brothers. Like all of the characters in the Ramayana, Lakshmana is neither good nor evil—he has many virtues, but also some very real flaws.

Lakshman Jhula
Sacred site (tirtha) along the Ganges in the Tehri district of the state of Uttar Pradesh, roughly five miles upriver from the city of Rishikesh. The site takes its present name from a swinging footbridge (jhula) that spans the Ganges. The local charter myth describes Lakshman Jhula as the place where Rama and Lakshmana live as ascetics late in their lives, atoning for the sin of brahminicide, which they incurred by killing Ravana and his brothers (who are considered brahmin demons). Today, the area is famous for the Svargashrama of Swami Shivananda, part of a network of ashrams along its banks.

Lakshmi
(“good fortune,” “prosperity”) Hindu goddess and wife of the god Vishnu. According to tradition, Lakshmi is created when the ocean of milk is churned to yield the nectar of immortality. Just as butter is the refined essence of milk, so Lakshmi is the refined essence of the primordial ocean, representing all the best things that come from it. Lakshmi is associated with wealth, good fortune, and prosperity, and is considered the embodiment of all these things. Images of Lakshmi usually depict her with the lotus and the elephant, both of which are associated with good fortune. Many images show gold coins falling from her hands, symbolizing wealth.

These potent associations make Lakshmi an extremely important force in Hindu life. Lakshmi exercises her power by her mere presence—when she comes, she brings prosperity and good fortune; when she leaves, these benefits leave with her. Given Lakshmi’s power, people are understandably eager to please her, especially since she has the reputation for being capricious and fickle in her relationships with human beings—a reputation that reflects a realistic appraisal of life’s vicissitudes. Lakshmi’s capriciousness and her reputation for being somewhat spiteful make people extremely careful in their dealings with her, to avoid insulting her, even if unintentionally.

Lakshmi’s primary annual festival is Diwali, when she is believed to roam the earth. People spend the days before Diwali cleaning, repairing, and whitewashing their homes, making them...
suitable for welcoming the goddess. On the evening of Diwali, people open all their doors and windows (to facilitate her entry) and place lights on their windowsills and balcony ledges to invite her in. Gambling is a common practice during Diwali. Gambling is usually condemned as a pernicious habit, but during Diwali it reaffirms the connection between money and Lakshmi—here in her guise as Lady Luck.

Despite her capricious relationships with human beings, Lakshmi is considered to be the model wife, particularly in her devotion and subordination to her husband. When Lakshmi and Vishnu appear together, she is significantly smaller, signifying her subordinate status. Another common image of the couple shows Lakshmi massaging Vishnu’s feet, and thus her wifely subordination. Lakshmi is not only the model for human wives but is also believed to be incarnate in each of them. Married women are believed to embody the good fortune of the household. It is generally accepted that households in which they are not honored will never be prosperous. For more information on Lakshmi and all the goddesses of Hinduism, see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986. See also Tortoise avatar and ocean, churning of the.

Lakshmibai
(d. 1858) Queen of the small kingdom of Jhansi in the southern part of the state of Uttar Pradesh and a leader in the 1857 struggle against the British, known as the “Mutiny” or the “First War of Indian Independence.” Lakshmibai’s kingdom was the victim of expanding British power. The British colonial government had pronounced the “doctrine of lapse” edict, annexing any kingdom in which the ruler had died heirless. Lakshmibai’s husband died in 1853. Although he had adopted a son just before his death, the British refused to recognize the adoption and sought to annex the kingdom. Lakshmibai was one of the leaders during the 1857 rebellion; she died in battle. She was eulogized as a patriot and proponent of Indian independence, and because of her power and martial ability, she is considered a manifestation of the powerful goddess Durga.

Lakshmihara
(ca. mid-12th c.) Scholar, commentator, and author of the Kalpataru, one of the earliest examples of commentary literature known as nibandhas (“collections”). The nibandhas were compendia of Hindu lore, compiling themes from the Vedas, dharma literature, puranas, and other authoritative religious texts, into a single volume. Each of the Kalpataru’s fourteen volumes is devoted to a particular aspect of Hindu life, such as daily practice, worship, gift-giving, vows, pilgrimage, penances (prayashchitta), purification, and liberation (moksha). As one of the earliest nibandhas, the Kalpataru served as a model for later writers. Lakshmihara’s work is unusual in that he uses very few sources for his work—primarily the epic Mahabharata, and a few of the sectarian compendia known as puranas. Unlike later commentators, he does not cite the Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious texts, or the prescriptions found in the dharma literature. His text consists almost solely of excerpted passages, with very little commentary of his own, whereas later nibandha writers often give voluminous explanations.

Lakshmi-Narayan Temple
A modern temple in Delhi just west of Connaught Place. It was built in 1938 by Ghanshyamdas Birla, the patriarch of a prominent industrialist family. Although the temple is dedicated to the god Vishnu and his consort Lakshmi, it is more commonly called the “Birla temple” after its patron. Since Lakshmi is considered the bestower of wealth, and the temple was built by a businessman, this dedication is hardly surprising. Aside from his religious endowments, Ghanshyamdas Birla was also the major... financial support behind the Indian National Congress, the political party led by Mohandas Gandhi which struggled to gain Indian independence. Since the day it was built the temple has been open to people of all castes and communities, upholding the denial of untouchability that was one of Gandhi's most important crusades.

Lakulisha
(2nd c.?) Legendary founder of the Pashupata religious community, a group of renunciant ascetics whose patron deity was the god Shiva. Lakulisha appears to have been an important influence in the development of other Shaivite ascetics, such as the Kapalikas and the Kalamukhas. He has been identified as an incarnation of Shiva. Many statues have been identified as Lakulisha's image; he is portrayed as a naked yogi with a staff in one hand and a citron in the other, with penis erect, either standing or sitting in the lotus posture (padmasana). For further information see David Lorenzen, The Kapalikas and the Kalamukhas, 1972.

Lal Ded
Another name for the Kashmiri poet-saint Lalleshvari. See Lalleshvari.

Lalitaditya
(8th c.) One of the few kings of the Kashmir region who was able to affect the politics of the northern Indian plain, partially due to the fragmented state of the Hindu kingdoms there. Lalitaditya's armies pushed into the Ganges River valley, successfully halting the advance of the Arab forces in the Punjab region. His successors were unable to retain these gains.

Lallavakyani
("Lalla's Sayings") Corpus of poetry ascribed to the Kashmiri poet-saint Lalleshvari, a devotee (bhakta) of the god Shiva. The poems in this collection allude to the difficult circumstances of her early life, and the domestic problems that induced her to leave her marital home. They also describe her encompassing devotion to Shiva, whom she describes as the only true source of happiness. These poems have been translated into English, but all the editions are quite old: see Sir George Grierson and Lionel D. Barnett, Lalla Vakyani, 1920; and R. C. Temple, The Word of Lalla, the Prophetess, 1924.

Lalleshvari
(14th c.) Devotional (bhakti) poet-saint also known as Lal Ded, who is one of the most popular poets in Kashmir. Lalleshvari was a devotee (bhakta) of the god Shiva; her songs focus on her devotion to him. Like many other female devotional exemplars, she had a difficult time integrating her marriage with her commitment to her chosen deity. According to tradition, her mother-in-law treated her quite cruelly. Her husband is described as an unfeeling man who neither objected to the abuse nor comforted his wife. After about twelve years of suffering she left home to wander as a religious seeker. To symbolize her renunciation of all attachments and earthly values, including feminine modesty, Lalleshvari wandered nude. During her wanderings she composed and sang songs of devotion to Shiva, which are still popular today.

Lanka
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Lanka is the kingdom of the demon-king Ravana. Although Lanka is sometimes identified with the modern island of Sri Lanka, and though southern Indian sites such as Rameshvaram have been identified with events in the Ramayana, the epic's descriptions should be read as mythic and narrative accounts, rather than a geographical primer. The divine architect Vishvakarma had originally built Lanka for Kubera the minor deity, but...
Kubera had been dispossessed by Ravana and his brothers.

Lankalakshmi
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Lankalakshmi is the name of the guardian deity of Lanka, the demon-king Ravana’s capital city. Lankalakshmi is also the rebirth of the goddess Vijayalakshmi, who has been cursed by the god Brahma to serve as Lanka’s guardian deity. The curse will last until an intruder to the city manages to defeat her, foretelling the fall of Ravana. This defeat comes with the arrival of the monkey-god Hanuman, who leaps across the ocean in search of the goddess Sita, whom Ravana has kidnapped. Lankalakshmi recognizes Hanuman as an intruder and attacks him, fulfilling her duty as a guardian deity. Hanuman knocks her flat with a powerful blow, breaking the curse and signalling Ravana’s fall.

Lasya
One of two general categories in Indian dance, which is soft, lyrical, and conveys a mood of love. Its contrasting form, tandava, is athletic, dramatic, and conveys violence and power.

Lava
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Lava is one of the twin sons of Rama, the epic’s protagonist. After their mother, Sita, has been cast into exile at the ashram of the sage Valmiki, Lava is born in the usual manner. His brother, Kusha, is magically created by Valmiki out of kusha grass. Later, Lava and Kusha go with Valmiki to Rama’s court in Ayodhya. It is in Rama’s court that they first recite the epic poem composed by Valmiki, the Ramayana. After Rama gives up his throne, he divides his kingdom between Lava and Kusha.

Leap Philosophy
(“ajativada”) Leap philosophy affirms that one can attain complete freedom from bondage—which in the Indian context is identified as the end of reincarnation (samsara) and final liberation of the soul (moksha)—but such freedom cannot be gained by a precisely specified sequence of causes and effects. Since gaining freedom is not a matter of cause and effect, there is no way to stimulate or influence this process through one’s actions. Leap philosophers tend to denigrate the effectiveness of ritual action as a way to gain final liberation, except as a preparatory phase, stressing that liberation comes only through gaining inner realization. Sureshvara and Shankaracharya, members of the Advaita Vedanta school, dismiss ritual action, except as preparation for wisdom. Both philosophers believe that release from bondage comes through insight gained in a moment of realization, which radically and permanently shifts one’s perspective on the world.

Leather
Considered an impure substance by many traditional Hindus, because it is the product of a dead animal. They believe that leather is an appropriate material for shoes, however, because the feet are deemed the lowest and most impure part of the body. For this reason, many people put on their shoes by slipping their feet into them without using their hands, thus avoiding touching the leather with a higher part of the body. Leather’s associations with ritual impurity (ashaucha) make it inappropriate for other sorts of clothing—clothing which the hot Indian climate would render problematic—although now it is sometimes used for handbags and briefcases. In earlier times people who wished to avoid leather would wear wooden clogs instead; in modern times, footwear options also include plastic, rubber, and canvas.
Left Hand Tantra
A variation of the tantra; the rituals for this “left hand” variety include consciously violating taboos on nonvegetarian food, intoxicating drinks, and illicit sexuality. See Vamachara.

Levirate
An ancient practice, long condemned, in which a childless widow would have intercourse with her deceased husband's brother in an attempt to perpetuate his line. See Niyoga.

Lila
(“play”) A word whose broad literal meaning denotes any sort of play, game, or sport, but which in a theological context conveys a fundamental assumption about how God interacts with the world. According to this notion, the supreme deity engages in creation not from any sense of need, but for the sheer enjoyment and entertainment gained from creating and taking part in the world. This is particularly true for the god Vishnu, especially in his manifestations as Rama and Krishna. In this understanding, all divine interactions between God and his devotees (bhakta) are undertaken in this spirit of play, although in their ignorance human beings may not recognize the true nature of this encounter. Final liberation of the soul (moksha) comes when the devotee recognizes the true nature of this encounter, since after that moment of realization one's entire life is a series of playful interactions with God himself. One of the ways that contemporary devotees strive to enter Rama's and Krishna's divine world is through dramas that are themselves known as lillas. These lillas can be attended for entertainment, but viewing them can also be a deeply serious religious act. When child actors portraying the deities are in costume and in character, they are considered manifestations of the deities themselves. For ardent devotees, viewing these lillas is an avenue for gaining God's grace, and an entry-point into a privileged, divine world. For an excellent consideration of how Krishna's entire life is considered as play, see David R. Kinsley, The Sword and the Flute, 1975; for a description of the Krishna lillas, see John Stratton Hawley, At Play with Krishna, 1981; and Anaradha Kapur, Actors, Pilgrims, Kings, and Gods, 1990. See also Ram Lila.

Limitationism
Theory explaining diversity used by later branches of the Advaita Vedanta philosophical school, one of the “six schools” of classical Hindu philosophy. This school of thought upholds monism—the belief that a single Ultimate Reality known as Brahman lies behind all things, and that all things are merely differing forms of that reality. Proponents claim that reality is non-dual (advaita), that is, all things are nothing but the formless, unqualified Brahman, despite the appearance of difference and diversity. For the Advaitins, the assumption of diversity is a fundamental misunderstanding of the ultimate nature of things, and therefore is a manifestation of avidya. Although often translated as “ignorance,” avidya is better understood as the lack of genuine understanding, ultimately causing human beings to be trapped in karmic bondage, reincarnation (samsara), and suffering.

Theoretically, if avidya is a defect that resides within an individual, and if many individuals can be afflicted with avidya at once, is there one avidya that affects everyone, or are there many separate avidyas? Limitationism asserts that there is a single avidya, afflicting many people at once. The theory proposes that avidya, in a person, is like the quality of color in an object. The color blue may be a single property of two coexisting objects; each instance of the color blue does not use up a finite “blue-ness” in the world. In the same way, many people may possess the single property of avidya.
Linga

(“mark,” “sign”) Aside from the word’s literal meaning as any emblematic sign, linga is also the name for the pillar-shaped form of the god Shiva. Representing Shiva as the power of generation itself, from which men and women derive their procreative force, the linga is sometimes simplistically called a “phallic” symbol. An equally important part of the linga’s image is the base (pitha) in which the shaft is placed, a base which represents the female organs of generation. The Gudimallam linga, the oldest known image of Shiva in this form, shows him as male and female, transcending the most basic defining factor of human identity.

Lingaraja Temple

Largest and most important of the temples in the city of Bhubaneshvar, dedicated to the god Shiva in his aspect as Tribhuvaneswar, the “Lord of the Three Worlds.” The temple was built in the eleventh century C.E., representing the high point of the Orissan branch of the Nagara architectural style. The temple building culminates in one single, highest point over the image of the temple’s primary deity, with shorter subsidiary buildings leading up to it. The Lingaraja temple shows all the elements of the Orissan style: a beehive-shaped tower (deul) soaring 120 feet high, fronted by a dance hall (natamandira), traditionally used for performances, an entrance hall (jagamohan), and an outer entrance hall (bhogamandapa).

Lingayat

Kannada-speaking religious community whose members are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, and who mainly live in the southern Indian state of Karnataka. Lingayat roots began in the seventh century with the Nayanar poet-saints in Tamil Nadu state, migrating northward. The community’s founder was the poet-saint Basavanna; others included...
Allama Prabhu and Mahadeviyakka. The community’s founding members were driven by the hunger for God and were impatient with anything that got in its way—worship of images, caste distinctions, or the demands of family life. These early influences have continued to shape Lingayat culture. Lingayats do not use images in their worship. The only symbol they use is the linga of Shiva, which all Lingayats wear as a sign of membership in the community. The Lingayats have also largely retained their founders’ egalitarian principles. Although the community eschews caste distinctions, there are higher-status priestly families known as jangamas, from whom the celibate monks known as viraktas are often drawn. In practice, this egalitarian emphasis has made the entire Lingayat community a jati, one of the endogamous social subgroups that make up larger Indian society; the difference is that the Lingayats are not marked by their occupation, but by their membership in a particular religious community. The Lingayats are the dominant community in modern Karnataka, both in terms of traditional landholding patterns and in their control over regional politics. For further information see A. K. Ramanujan, Speaking of Siva, 1973; and Sivalingayya Channabasavayya Nandimath, A Handbook of Virasaivism, 1979.

Lion
In Hindu mythology, a lion or a tiger is the animal vehicle of the Mother Goddess, as in her manifestation as the goddess Durga. Modern iconography shows the Goddess riding either of these animals, with no seeming difference between them, perhaps reflecting the fact that the Hindi word “sher” can refer to either the lion or the tiger. The fact that the Goddess rides such a dangerous animal is clearly a symbol of her power and capacity. In her mythology these animals are often described as her allies, engaging in battle at her command.

Liquor
Condemned by the traditional Hindus, although attitudes differ based on the type of liquor consumed. Consuming beer, wine, and distilled spirits (“foreign liquor”) carries the stigma of adopting “foreign” Western values; whereas consuming undistilled, fermented beverages such as “country liquor” and toddy carry the taint of low-class behavior. Patterns of drinking tend to reflect and reinforce these negative attitudes. Since liquor is taboo in polite society, people who drink will often finish the bottle in one sitting and become intoxicated, thus “proving” that there is no such thing as responsible drinking.

Despite the general cultural disapproval, there are a few Hindu temples where liquor is the everyday offering to the deity. The worshipers also receive liquor as prasad, the sanctified food or drink that carries the deity’s blessing. Alcohol has also been incorporated into religious rituals in certain types of tantric religious practice. Tantra is a secret ritual-based religious tradition, based on the belief that there is an ultimate unity of everything that exists. From a tantric perspective, to affirm that the entire universe is one principle means that the adept must reject all concepts based on dualistic thinking. One way to do this is to partake of the “Five Forbidden Things” (panchamakara), consciously breaking societal norms forbidding consumption of intoxicants, nonvegetarian food, and illicit sexuality. This is always done within a carefully defined ritual setting, in a conscious effort to sacralize what is normally forbidden.

Lohar
Traditional Indian society was modeled as a collection of endogamous subgroups (in which marriage is decreed by law to occur only between members of the same group) known as jatis (“birth”). The jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group’s hereditary occupation, over which each group had a monopoly. The Lohars’ hereditary occupation was blacksmithing and iron working.

Lohari

Festival falling on the night before Makara Sankranti, the day when the sun moves into the zodiological sign of Capricorn, which almost always falls on January 14. The central focus of this festival is a large bonfire. Celebrants collect fuel for weeks beforehand, lighting the fire on the evening of the festival. People dance, sing, and walk around the fire, giving the fire offerings of sweets, fried snacks, and peanuts; these same items are also given to those present as prasad or sanctified food.

Lohari is a seasonal festival, marking the passing of the coldest period of the winter and anticipating the return of warmer weather, symbolized by the fire. This festival is celebrated in the Punjab and in northern India where Punjabis have settled. This festival also serves as a public display recognizing some change within the family. Families that have recorded marriages or births in the past year celebrate with particular fervor, whereas families in which a person has died usually refrain.

Lokacharya

(ca. early 14th c.) Religious leader also known as Pillai Lokacharya, the founder of the Tengalai branch of the Shrivaishnava religious community. The Shrivaishnavas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. The Tengalais have no faith in human capacities, emphasizing the need for the devotee’s absolute surrender to the grace of God, which alone will save the devotee.

Lokayata

One of the traditional names for the materialist school of philosophy. See materialist.

Lopamudra

In Hindu mythology, the wife of the sage Agastya.

Lost Wax Casting

A method of metal-casting used to create the southern Indian bronzes during the Chola dynasty (9th–14th c.). The artisan makes a wax image of the statue, then covers the wax with layers of clay. The clay is fired and the wax vaporizes, leaving a clay mold into which molten metal is poured. Once the metal cools, the clay mold is broken, revealing the statue. Small imperfections are removed by hand, and the statue is polished to a high gloss. This casting method produces exquisite detail and subtlety of expression, but is extremely time-consuming because each wax image and clay mold can only be used once.

Lota

A vessel for holding water that usually narrows near the top (so that the vessel can be carried in one hand) with a flared opening to facilitate accurate pouring. The lota is used for drinking. Water can be poured directly into one’s mouth without touching the vessel to one’s lips, which would render the vessel and its contents impure. A lota is also often used in bathing (snana), to pour water over one’s body, or for any other uses for which holding and pouring water are necessary.

Lothal
Ancient city and archeological site located near the Gulf of Cambay in the modern state of Gujarat. Lothal was one of the cities of the Indus Valley civilization, a highly developed urban culture that flourished in the Indus Valley region between the fourth and third millennia B.C.E. Lothal was a port city, although because of silting, the present site is now well inland. The size of the harbor indicates that it was a prominent port. Archaeological evidence suggests that Lothal continued to flourish for nearly 500 years after the decline of Harappa and Mohenjo-Daro, the two largest cities of the Indus Valley civilization.

Lotus
Flower with significant symbolism in Hindu culture. See Padma.

Lotus Position
See padmasana.

Love Marriage
In modern India, the name given to a marriage fixed by the bride and groom themselves, rather than an arranged marriage fixed by parents or guardians. Although Western romantic notions consider a love marriage the preferred method, many Hindus consider love marriages suspect. Love marriages carry the stigma of rebellion—children usurping the role traditionally played by their parents. It is sometimes thought to present the danger of inter-caste marriage and the likelihood that the marriage will be rooted in lust or infatuation, thus rendering it potentially unstable. The family is considered the foundation of society; anything undermining its stability is viewed quite dimly. Love marriages are becoming more common and accepted among modern Hindus, especially in the larger urban areas. Arranged marriages, however, remain far more common.

Lunar Line
One of the two great mythic lineages in Hindu mythology, the other being the Solar Line. Kings in the Lunar Line traced their descent from Soma, the moon, who married the daughter of King Ikshvaku of the Solar Line. Soma and his wife begat an illustrious group of progeny, including most of the principal characters in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics.

Lunar Month, Structure of
Hindu festivals are determined according to a lunar calendar, in which a year is made of twelve lunar months. The lunar month is divided into two halves, each of which has fifteen days. In northern India the lunar month begins with the dark (krishna) half—when the moon is waning. This phase lasts fifteen days, ending with the new moon. This is followed by the light (shukla) half of the month—when the moon is waxing. This phase lasts fifteen days, ending with the full moon. The day after the full moon is the first day of the next lunar month, and so on. Any given lunar day is designated by the name of the month, the half (light or dark), and the lunar day (1 to 15). In southern India the pattern is reversed, with the lunar month starting with the light half and ending on the new moon.

The lunar month, as with all Hindu conceptions of time, represents changing times of auspiciousness and inauspiciousness, peaks and valleys marking times that are more or less propitious. The full moon, with its associations of fullness, abundance, and light, is always auspicious. It is believed that religious rites performed on this day generate as much merit as those performed for an entire month. The new moon, with its associations of darkness and emptiness, is a more ambiguous time. At times the new moon can be highly auspicious, as on the occasion of a Somavati Amavasya (new moon falling on Monday). Several major festivals (such as Diwali) fall on the new moon. Despite this, the new moon is less auspicious than the full moon. Within each fortnight various days are also associated with particular deities, and their devotees (bhakta) often do particular rites on those days: The eleventh day (ekadashi) is dedicated to the god Vishnu, the eighth day (ashtami) to the Goddess, the evening of the thirteenth day (trayodashi) and the fourteenth to the god Shiva, and the fourth day (chaturthi) to the god Ganesha.

As mentioned earlier, the lunar calendar is the basis for almost all Hindu holidays. To correct the discrepancy between the lunar and solar year (about eleven days), and thus keep these festivals at about the same time every year, an intercalary month is inserted every $2\frac{1}{2}$ years. Although this extra month keeps the calendar in balance, it is considered highly inauspicious, perhaps because it is an unusual occurrence. During this month people take normal precautions to protect themselves during inauspicious times—basically putting off any new activities until the month is over, and propitiating protective deities until the end of the month.
Madhava
(from madhu “sweet”) Epithet of the god Krishna, signifying the sweetness that he brings to the lives of his devotees (bhakta). See Krishna.

Madhava
(2) (14th c.) Author of the Sarvadarshanasangraha, a philosophical encyclopedia composed in the late fourteenth century. In this text, Madhava compiles the views of all existing philosophical schools, placing them in hierarchical order, based on his judgment of their value. According to the text, the materialist school is ranked the lowest and least reliable, since its proponents completely deny the virtue of any religious life. The Advaita Vedanta school, Madhava’s own, is judged as the highest and most perfect expression of the truth. Although the Sarvadarshanasangraha is biased, it is one of the few extant sources which considers the perspectives of all the existing schools.

Madhima
(“greatness”) One of the eight superhuman powers (siddhi) traditionally believed to be conferred by high spiritual attainment. This particular power gives one the ability to become as large as one desires.

Madhu
In Hindu mythology, one of the two demons who attempt to kill the god Brahma; the other demon is Kaitabha. The story is recounted in several mythic sources with some marked differences between stories. All versions agree that Madhu and Kaitabha are born from the god Vishnu’s ear wax during the period of cosmic dissolution (pralaya). As the creation of the world begins anew, a lotus sprouts from Vishnu’s navel. It opens to reveal the creator-god Brahma, who is immediately menaced by Madhu and Kaitabha. In all versions of the myth, Brahma appeals for help, and Vishnu tricks the demons and slays them. The difference in the stories pertains to the deity to whom Brahma appeals for help. The story first appears in the mythology of Vishnu; here Brahma invokes Vishnu. Yet this same story also appears in the Devimahatmya, the earliest source in which the Mother Goddess appears as the supreme divine power. In this version, Brahma’s hymn of praise is to the Goddess, who in her form as Yoganidra (“sleep of yoga”) has lullled Vishnu into a cosmic stupor, rendering him unable to come to Brahma’s aid. Pleased by Brahma’s praise, the Goddess withdraws her influence over Vishnu; he awakens, and slays the demons.

Madhurya (“Honeyed”) Bhava
The second of the five modes of devotion to God that were articulated by Rupa Goswami, a devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna and a follower of the Bengali saint Chaitanya. Rupa used human relationships to describe the connection between devotee and deity. The five modes showed growing emotional intensity, from the peaceful (shanta) sense that comes from realizing one’s complete identity with Brahma or Ultimate Reality, to conceiving of God as one’s master, friend, child, or lover. The Madhurya Bhava is the last and most intense of the five modes of devotion. In this mode, devotees consider the relationship between themselves and the deity as that of lover and beloved. This mode appeared most prominently with regard to the god Krishna (in which the model devotees were the cowherd women of Braj), and Radha (who is a symbol for the human soul.) This particular mode is seen as the most intense and demanding because of its emotional closeness. For that same reason, it is also seen as the sweetest.

Madhusudana Saraswati
(16th c.) A renowned member of the Sanyasi community, a group of renunciant ascetics who were devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. His last name reveals that he was a member of the Saraswati sect, one of the most prestigious of the ten Dashanami divisions; he is said to have lived most of his life in Benares, the greatest religious center of his time. According to ascetic legend, Madhusudana was responsible for the creation of a class of fighting ascetics, the Naga Sanyasis. According to tradition, Madhusudana created these fighters because he was distressed at the depredations the Sanyasis suffered at the hands of hostile Muslim faqirs. After consulting with Birbal, adviser to Moghul emperor Akbar, Madhusudana decided to form a fighting ascetic order dedicated to protecting other ascetics. Recruits came from the ranks of the shudras.

Madhva
(1197–1276) Philosopher and founder of the Dvaita Vedanta philosophical school, whose long life was largely spent in Udupi, a small town near the Malabar coast in the state of Karnataka. Madhva's basic philosophy was the utter transcendence of God. This conviction led him to develop the theory of dualism, which posits a qualitative difference between God in his transcendence and the corruptions of material things. According to Madhva, God is completely different from humans and the material world, even though both came from God and depend on Him for their continuing existence. Madhva differed sharply from the major school, Advaita Vedanta, which upheld the theory of monism—the belief that a single Ultimate Reality (called Brahman) lies behind all things, which are merely differing forms of this single reality. Whereas Advaita collapses all things into one thing, Madhva firmly insists on maintaining differences.

Madhva's emphasis on dualism led him to articulate these differences, known as the “fivefold difference”: the difference between God and Self, between God and the world, between individual Selves, between Selves and matter, and between individual material things. Even though each Self contains an aspect of God, fundamental difference gives the Self only limited capacity for religious life. This limited power means that final liberation of the soul comes solely through the grace of God, who alone has the power to effect it. Final liberation was conceived both as freedom from rebirth and as the soul's opportunity to remain in the divine presence forever.

Madhya Pradesh
("middle state") Modern Indian state located in the geographical center of the subcontinent. Madhya Pradesh was formed after Indian independence in 1947 from the former Central Provinces, Berar State, and several princely states. Large parts of the state are inaccessible and relatively undeveloped, particularly in the Vindhya Mountain and Satpura ranges. Madhya Pradesh also has a large percentage of adivasis (indigenous tribal people), many of whom are very poor. Madhya Pradesh contains many important archaeological sites, including the Chandella temples at Khajuraho and the caves at Udayagiri. Sacred sites (tirthas) include the Narmada River, one of the seven sacred rivers of India, and the holy city of Ujjain. For general information about Madhya Pradesh and other regions of India, see Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.
Madmaheshvar
Temple and sacred site (tirtha) in the Garhwal region of the Himalayas, about twenty miles north of the village of Ukhimath. The temple's presiding deity is the god Shiva in his manifestation as Madmaheshvar. Madmaheshvar is one of the Panchkedar, a network of five sacred sites in the Garhwal region; the other four sites are Kedarnath, Rudranath, Tungnath, and Kalpeshvar. This network of five sites is seen as a symbolic representation of Shiva's body; Madmaheshvar is believed to be Shiva's navel.

Madri
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Madri is the junior wife of King Pandu and the mother of Nakula and Sahadeva. Neither of these children are actually Pandu's sons, since he has been cursed to die the moment he holds his wife in amorous embrace. Rather, they have been magically conceived through the effect of a mantra given to Pandu's other wife, Kunti, by the sage Durvasas. The mantra gives the woman who recites it the power to call down any of the gods and to have a son equal in power to that god himself. With Pandu's blessing, Kunti teaches the mantra to Madri, who recites it to the twin gods known as the Ashvins. Thus she bears twins. They live happily until springtime comes to the forest. Under the intoxicating influence of spring, Pandu embraces Madri; the curse takes effect, and Pandu falls down dead. Because of her role in Pandu's death, Madri consigns her children to Kunti's care, and ends her life on Pandu's funeral pyre.

Madurai
Temple-town and sacred site (tirtha) on the Vygai River, in the state of Tamil Nadu in southern India. Madurai is most famous for the large temple dedicated to Minakshi, the goddess, and her consort Sundareshvara. Minakshi is a local deity who has become a major regional goddess, whereas Sundareshvara is considered a form of the god Shiva. After the fall of the Vijayanagar empire late in the sixteenth century, southern India was ruled by the Nayak dynasty, with the capital at Madurai. Much of the Minakshi temple was built by Tirumalai Nayak (r. 1623-1659); his palace is another of the city’s attractions. The streets around the temple form four concentric processional circuits, with the temple directly in the middle. The town was planned as a lotus with layers of petals, with the image of Minakshi at the center, around which all things revolved. Symbolically, the Minakshi temple was not only the center of the city, but the center of the earth. See also Vijayanagar dynasty.

Madya

(“wine”) In the secret ritually-based religious practice known as tantra, wine is the first of the Five Forbidden Things (panchamakara). Since “respectable” Hindu society strongly condemns the consumption of alcoholic beverages, its ritual use in tantra must be understood in the larger tantric context. One of the most basic tantric assumptions is the ultimate unity of everything that exists. From a tantric perspective, to affirm that the entire universe is one principle means that the adept must reject all concepts based on dualistic thinking. One way to do this is to partake of the “Five Forbidden Things,” consciously breaking the societal norms forbidding the consumption of intoxicants, non-vegetarian food, and illicit sexuality—making sacred that which is normally forbidden. Tantric adepts cite such ritual use of forbidden things as proof that their practice involves a more exclusive qualification (adhikara), and is thus superior to common practice. In its ritual use—which is usually in very small quantities—the intoxication produced by wine is an approximation of the bliss of realization. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1977; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Magh

According to the lunar calendar, by which most Hindu religious festivals are determined, Magh is the eleventh month in the lunar year, usually falling within January and February. During Magh there is a month-long bathing (snana) festival, the Magh Mela, at the confluence of the Ganges and Yamuna rivers in Allahabad. The other major festivals in Magh are Sakata Chauth, Shattila Ekadashi, Mauni Amavasya, Vasant Panchami, Bhishma Ashtami, Jaya Ekadashi, Ravidas Jayanti, Makara Sankranti. In southern India, Pongal and the Float Festival are celebrated during Magh.

Magha

(7th c.) Sanskrit writer whose best-known work, the drama Shishupalavadha, describes the death of Shishupala at the hands of the god Krishna. In Hindu mythology, Shishupala is a form of Jaya, Vishnu’s gatekeeper, who has been cursed to be born as a demon three times and killed each time by Vishnu. Shishupala is the last of these births, after which the curse is broken. Aside from its mythic theme, the play is noted for a number of unusual verses, designed to show the poet’s skill. These include verses that are perfect palindromes and ones that use only one or two consonants.

Magh Mela

Religious festival celebrated every year during the entire lunar month of Magh (January–February) in the city of Allahabad. According to the Hindu festival calendar, Magh is one of the months in which bathing (snana) in sacred rivers is highly praised. This is particularly significant because Allahabad lies at the confluence of two sacred rivers, the Ganges and the Yamuna River. During this month, pilgrims set up an encampment at the confluence, which becomes a bustling religious center. During their stay, pilgrims live a strict and disciplined religious life. This includes a morning bath, followed by gift-giving (dana) and worship; eating a restricted diet, and evenings spent singing hymns (kirtan) and listening to religious discourses. Some pilgrims even take a strict vow, known as kalpavas, to remain there for the entire month, a vow which also entails a strict ascetic lifestyle. More than a million pilgrims attend this festival. Every twelfth year, when the Magh Mela becomes the Allahabad Kumbha Mela, attendance increases. In 1989 an estimated fifteen million pilgrims came for a single day, with millions more coming during the rest of the month.

Magic
In Hindu tradition there are many different powers in the universe, and many ways of influencing them, both seen and unseen. The emphasis on magic goes back to the Atharva Veda, one of the oldest Hindu religious texts, which is mostly a collection of spells. Even today many Hindus accept that certain powerful religious adepts have the power to command unseen forces, as well as the power to counteract the spells levied by others. People who have gained high levels of religious attainments are also believed to have superhuman powers (siddhi), allowing them to do things that ordinary people cannot. These superhuman powers are not seen as magical, but rather as the normal exercise of a level of understanding higher than most people have attained. Indian culture also has a long tradition of illusion, sleight of hand, and other sorts of trickery, baffling and entertaining onlookers for centuries. For an extensive account of these powers, see Lee Siegel, Net of Magic, 1991.

Mahabalipuram
Village on the Bay of Bengal in Tamil Nadu, about thirty miles south of Madras. Although famous as a beach resort today, during the Pallava dynasty (6th–9th c.) Mahabalipuram was a major port, second in importance only to the capital at Kanchipuram. Mahabalipuram has several impressive religious monuments, erected during the reigns of Narasimhavarman I (630–668 C.E.) and Narasimhavarman II (700–728 C.E.). One of the monuments is a rock-cut sculpture depicting the myth of the Descent of the Ganges, using a natural vertical fissure to lay out the river's path. Other notable constructions are the “Rathas,” a series of free-standing temples carved from one giant boulder, dedicated to the Pandavas, the protagonists in the epic Mahabharata. The most recent attraction is the temple along the shore, built during the reign of Rajasimhavarman (early 8th c.). The temple's major deity is the god Shiva; a smaller shrine also holds an image of the god Vishnu. Although all of these have been weathered by time and the elements, they remain some of the most visited sites in southern India.

Mahabharata
One of the two great Sanskrit epics, traditionally ascribed to the mythical sage Vyasa. The Mahabharata is much longer than the other great epic, the Ramayana. At almost 100,000 stanzas, the Mahabharata is the world's longest epic poem. If the Ramayana can be characterized as the tale of the “good” family, in which brothers cooperate to support and preserve their family, the Mahabharata describes the “bad” family, in which hard-heartedness and the lust for power in an extended royal family ultimately cause its destruction. The epic is set in the region west of modern Delhi and describes a fratricidal civil war. A greatly abridged account can be given as follows:

Shantanu is the king of the Kurus. He dies an untimely, heirless death. In a desperate attempt to preserve the royal line, Shantanu's wife, Satyavati, calls upon her elder son, the sage Vyasa, who fathers children by Shantanu's two wives. The elder son, Dhrtarashtra, is born blind, and thus the rights to the throne fall to his younger brother Pandu. Pandu later abdicates his throne because of a curse, and goes to live in the forest with his two wives, Kunti and Madri, leaving his elder brother to rule in his place. In time Dhrtarashtra's wife, Gandhari, magically gives birth to one hundred sons, of whom the eldest is Duryodhana; the hundred sons are called the Kauravas, and are the epic's antagonists. In the forest Kunti has three sons, Yudhisthira, Bhima, and Arjuna, while Madri has the twins Nakula and Sahadeva. These five sons are the Pandavas, the epic's protagonists. None of these children are actually Pandu's sons, since he has been cursed to die the moment he holds his wife in amorous embrace. Rather, they have been magically conceived using a mantra given to Kunti by the sage Durvasas, giving the woman reciting it the power to call down any of the gods and have a son equal in power to that god himself. When Kunti first receives the mantra, long before her marriage, she impulsively recites it while gazing upon the sun, and gives birth to a shining child. Distraught and desperate, Kunti puts him in a box and abandons him in the Ganges River. The child is adopted by the charioteer Adhiratha, and grows up to be the heroic Karna.

As the result of his curse, Pandu dies an early death, and Kunti (his wife) and his sons (the Pandavas) return to the court at Hastinapur, where the boys are raised as princes. From the beginning there are bad feelings between Duryodhana (the eldest of the Kauravas) and his cousins, largely because Duryodhana desires the throne, which rightly belongs to Yudhishthira (one of the Pandavas). After foiling several attempts to kill them, the Pandava brothers leave the kingdom to become mercenaries. On one of their journeys, Arjuna wins the hand of the princess Draupadi, who becomes their common wife (their mother commands that Arjuna share whatever he wins with his brothers). After some time Dhrtarashtra (father of the Kauravas) renounces the throne and divides his kingdom. The Pandavas build a new capital at Indraprastha, identified near modern Delhi.

For a little while things are quiet, but Duryodhana is not content to share his kingdom. He invites Yudhishthira for a game of dice, matching Yudhishthira against Shakuni, the most skillful gambler alive. Although Yudhishthira is a model for truthfulness and virtue, his fatal flaw is his love of gambling. In the match Yudishthira loses his kingdom, all his possessions, his brothers, himself, and finally his wife. In one of the epic's most powerful scenes, Duryodhana's brother, Duhshasana, drags Draupadi by her hair into the assembly hall, her clothes stained with her menstrual blood. Draupadi's humiliation moves Dhrtarashtra to set them free, but also sparks the enmity that helps drive the rest of the plot. After some bargaining, the parties agree that the Pandavas will spend twelve years in exile and a thirteenth incognito. If they can remain undiscovered during the thirteenth year they will regain their kingdom. If they are discovered, however, the cycle of exile will begin again.

After thirteen years, Yudhishthira and his brothers approach Duryodhana for their rightful share, but are haughtily rebuffed. All efforts at conciliation fail; Duryodhana claims that he will not give them enough land in which to stick the point of a needle. Pushed to the wall, the Pandavas prepare for battle. On one side are Yudhishthira and his brothers, aided by their counselor Krishna. On the other are Duryodhana and many respected figures, such as Drona, Bhishma, and Karna. For eighteen days the battle rages, until most of the important people are dead. Yudhishthira and his brothers survive. Yudhishthira is crowned king and rules righteously for many years. Late in life he installs his grandson, King Parikshit, on the throne. With his siblings he takes a final journey into the Himalayas. During the journey his brothers fall dead, one by one;
Yudhishthira eventually enters the divine realm.

The complete epic is more complex than this summary. One of the features of the epic is that it contains many unrelated tales, for which the main story acts as a frame. Aside from being a tale of a dysfunctional family, the Mahabharata also contains a great deal of cultural wisdom, making the names of characters symbolic even today. A televised serial of the text, which ran for more than a year in 1989–90, was wildly popular throughout India. It is also interesting to note that many traditional Indian families will not keep a copy of the text in the house, since it is believed that to do this will foster discord in the family.

Mahabhashya

("Great commentary") A commentary on the Ashtadhyayi of Panini, written by Patanjali, the grammarian, in the second century B.C.E. Panini’s text gives a complete and accurate description of all the forms of the Sanskrit language and set the standard for the language after his time. Although the Ashtadhyayi is considered a masterpiece, it appears to invite more detailed commentary because it is written in a series of aphorisms or sutra. Each of these aphorisms provides the basis for those which follow. Panini’s ultimate purpose is to give a complete account of the language in the briefest possible space. Aside from expanding and expounding Panini’s grammar, Patanjali also gives some useful information of his own. The Mahabhashya contains the earliest known reference to the Greeks.

Mahabrahman

(“Great Brahman”) In traditional Indian society, a debased class of brahmins who officiate at rites for the dead, especially at the rites performed immediately after death. In many of these rites the Mahabrahman is identified with the deceased person and is fed and given gifts that are intended to help satisfy the soul of the deceased. These acts are seen as transferring the inauspiciousness of death from the family to the Mahabrahman. Such constant association with death and its inauspicious qualities is seen as a highly undesirable way to make a living; Mahabrahmans have extremely low social status, despite being brahmins by birth. As compensation for taking on such inauspiciousness, Mahabrahmans usually demand high payment from a family. For further information see Jonathan Parry, “Ghosts, Greed and Sin: The Occupational Identity of the Benares Funeral Priests,” in Man, Vol. 15, 1980.

Mahadeva

(“great God”) Epithet of the god Shiva.

See Shiva.

Mahadeviyakka

(12th c.) Poet-saint and religious leader in the Lingayat religious community, a bhakti (devotional) community centered on both the worship of Shiva as the single supreme god and on the rejection of all caste regulations. The Lingayats were formed in the southern Indian state of Karnataka, where they still have a considerable presence. The collections of poetry that form their most important religious texts are composed in the Kannada language. Mahadeviyakka was a contemporary of Basavanna and Allama Prabhu; her status in the community is marked by the suffix akka (“elder sister”). According to tradition, she was devoted to Shiva at a very young age and considered him to be her true husband. This caused great problems during a brief, unhappy marriage, a mismatch between a carnally inclined man and a woman who would have no human lover. She eventually left her husband, wandering naked as a sign that she had cast away all attachments. She later became associated with the Lingayats, known as the “Lord’s men.” The theme running through most of her poetry is love for Shiva, sometimes as her husband and sometimes as her adulterous lover, both portraying her struggles with the world. For further information see A. K. Ramanujan, Speaking of Shiva, 1973.

Mahakaleshvar

Temple and sacred site (tithra) in the sacred city of Ujjain in the state of Madhya Pradesh. The temple is named for its presiding deity, the god Shiva in his manifestation as the “Lord of Death.” Shiva is present at Mahakaleshvar in the form of a linga, a pillar-shaped image. The Mahakaleshvar linga is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites at which Shiva is uniquely present. The linga is in an underground room, reached only by traversing a long, dark passageway. This passage may symbolize the darkness and terror of death. Worship at Mahakaleshvar is believed to protect one from an early or untimely death, and at death, bring liberation of the soul (moksha).

The city of Ujjain has a long history as a sacred, economic, and political center. One of the Seven Sacred Cities (Saptapuri), it also has other important religious sites. Historically, Ujjain is said to have been the capital of King Vikramaditya, founder of the Vikram Era. Trade routes that passed through it made it economically prosperous.

Mahakali

In the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most important source for the mythology of the Goddess, the three parts of this text describe the goddess in three different manifestations: Mahasaraswati, Mahalakshmi, and Mahakali. All of these manifestations are extremely powerful, but Mahakali is the most ferocious of all. She is said to have sprung from the forehead of the Goddess, as a physical manifestation of the deity's rage when insulted by the demon generals Chanda and Munda, who denigrate her fighting ability because she was a woman. According to the story, Mahakali is black in color, thin, and haggard, with long teeth and nails, and utters terrifying cries. She defeats the demon armies by picking them up and stuffing them into her mouth, consuming them whole. She later kills Chanda and Munda by cutting off their heads. Her final adversary is Raktabija, who has received the boon that any drop of his blood falling to the earth will instantly turn into a copy of him, rendering him practically unconquerable. Kali defeats this demon by drinking his blood as it is shed, until finally it is completely gone. For more information on Mahakali and all the goddesses of Hinduism, see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Mahakavya

An epic poem in Sanskrit literature. According to tradition, there are six such mahakavyas: the Kumarasambhava, Meghaduta, and Raghuvaras by the poet Kalidasa; the Shishupala-vadha by the poet Magha; the Kiratarjuniya by the poet Bharavi, and the Naishadacharitra by the poet-king Harsha.

Mahalakshmi

In the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most important source for the mythology of the Goddess, the three parts of this text describe this goddess in three different manifestations: Mahasaraswati, Mahalakshmi, and Mahakali. Unlike the goddess Lakshmi, who is a sedate and propitious married goddess, Mahalakshmi is seen as a powerful warrior goddess, the premier divine power on the earth. She is formed from the collected radiance (tejas) of all the gods, in order to kill a demon named Mahishasura, against whom the gods have been unable to prevail. Her climactic act in the Devimahatmya is killing Mahishasura, despite his desperate attempts first to defeat and then to elude her. For more information on Mahalakshmi and all the goddesses of Hinduism, see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Mahamandaleshvar

(“Great Lord of the Region”) Term of respect given to a Mandaleshvar when one of his disciples is chosen a Mandaleshvar while the preceptor is still living. Mandaleshvars are the learned ascetics who lead the Naga akharas of the Dashanami Sanyasis, a practice that began in the nineteenth century. The Dashanami Nagas are renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva and who formerly made their living as traders and mercenary soldiers. Their rough-and-ready qualities made them effective soldiers, but gave them little preparation for formal argument with Christian missionaries. Mandaleshvars were chosen from among the more learned Paramahamsa ascetics, so that the latter could provide a more coherent and telling opposition; he also serves as the Nagas’ teacher and spiritual adviser. The enshrinement of a Mandaleshvar’s disciple is thus seen as boosting his teacher’s prestige to an even more rarefied state.

Mahamandapa

The mahamandapa is an architectural feature found in the Khajuraho variation of the Nagara architectural style. Usually found in northern India, the Nagara style emphasizes verticality, with the whole temple building culminating in a single highest point; in the Khajuraho variant, the entire structure gradually leads up to the central tower, as foothills lead up to the mountains, with the peak of this central tower directly over the temple’s primary image. In this style, the mahamandapa is the name for the temple’s main... entrance-hall, which was separated from the main sanctuary (garbhagrha) by a short vestibule named the antarala.

Mahamantra
A thirty-two syllable mantra, or sacred formula, the recitation of which is the primary religious act for devotees (bhakta) belonging to ISKCON (International Society for Krishna Consciousness), a group more popularly known as the Hare Krishnas. The mantra itself is “Hare Krishna, Hare Krishna, Krishna Krishna, Hare Hare; Hare Rama, Hare Rama, Rama Rama, Hare Hare.”

Mahamaya
(“[she whose] power of illusion is great”) Epithet of the Goddess in the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most important textual source for the notion that God is female. This epithet reflects her position as the sole and supreme power in the universe, wielding the power of illusion that obscures this fact from human awareness. See Goddess.

Mahanirvani Akhara
The name of a group of the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, a type of renunciant ascetic. The Dashanami Nagas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, organized into different akharas or regiments on the model of an army. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Nagas’ primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers or traders; both of these have largely disappeared in contemporary times. This akhara is described as taking part in a battle with the forces of the Moghul emperor Aurangzeb in 1664, and are credited with saving the city of Benares from being sacked.

The Mahanirvani Akhara is one of the seven main Dashanami Naga akharas and remains one of most influential. The principal center of the Mahanirvani Akhara is in Allahabad, site of the largest and most important bathing (snana) festivals, known as the Kumbha Mela. Their strength in Allahabad has allowed them to assume the most desirable spot at the head of the bathing procession during the Kumbha Mela. Each of the akharas has a (guardian) deity who defines their organizational identity; the tutelary deity of the Mahanirvani Akhara is the great sage Kapila.

Mahant
(“great”) Honorific title given to an ascetic who is the leader of a monastery. Mahants are chosen by their predecessors and designate their successors. While they are living, they have virtually total control over the monastery and its assets, even though they do not own them. In any given ascetic establishment, the mahant has very high status, since he is the absolute ruler of his small domain.

Mahanubhav
(“Great Experience”) A regional religious community, whose members are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and who are found mainly in the central regions of the state of Maharashtra. The Mahanubhavs were founded by Chakradhar in the thirteenth century. Under his influence the community has rejected many aspects of “mainstream” Hindu religious life: social distinctions based on caste, the worship of images, and the religious authority of brahmins. The community is also noted for espousing an ascetic way of life. Although the Mahanubhavs are considered Vaishnavas, they acknowledge only one God, whom they call Parameshvar (“Great Lord”), and whom they conceive as having had five incarnations. Two of these incarnations are established figures in the Hindu pantheon, the god Krishna and the deified ascetic Dattatreya. The other three are sectarian figures: their founder Chakradhar, Chakradhar’s guru, and his guru’s guru. Their modern practice stresses pilgrimage, vows, and almsgiving. Nevertheless, through much of Maharashtra there is a legacy of suspicion and mistrust of the Mahanubhavs, perhaps rooted in their anti-authoritarian history. For further information see Anne Feldhaus, The Religious System of the Mahanubhav Sect, 1983.

Mahapataka

(“Great Sinner”) In the dharma literature, a person who has committed one of the Four Great Crimes, namely murdering a brahmin (brahmahatya), stealing a brahmin’s gold (steya), drinking liquor (surapana), or committing adultery with the wife of one’s guru (gurutalpaga). These crimes were considered so heinous that the performer became an outcast from society. Another indication of the gravity of these acts was that their expiations (prayashchitta) were so severe that they normally ended in death; in some cases this outcome was specifically prescribed. Aside from prescribing such punishments for the actual offenders, the dharma literature also prescribed similar outcaste status for anyone who knowingly associated with such people for more than one year.

Mahapatra

(“great vessel”) In parts of northern India, the name of a debased brahmin group whose members gain their livelihood primarily through receiving gifts, particularly those given following a death. Such brahmins do not actually perform the rites for the dead, although they are seen as symbolically representing the dead person. Their low status stems from this connection with the dead; the gifts they accept transfer the inauspiciousness of death from the family to the Mahapatra. This latter assumption is reflected in the group’s name—they are “vessels” into which one can deposit such inauspiciousness, and thus be rid of it. Such constant association with death and its inauspicious qualities is seen as a highly undesirable way to make a living, giving this group extremely low social status, despite being brahmins by birth. Despite their debased status, they are a necessary part of traditional society, in that they serve as the means through which such inauspiciousness can be removed.

The state of Maharashtra is home to the sculpted caves of Ellora.
Mahar

Traditional Indian society was a collection of endogamous subgroups (in which marriage is decreed by law to occur only between members of the same group) known as jatis (“birth”). These jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group’s hereditary occupation, over which each group held a monopoly. The Mahars were an untouchable jati in Maharashtrian society, performing various services and labor for the landlord communities. The Mahars are famous for two figures: the medieval bhakti poet Chokamela, and the modern jurist and social reformer Dr. B. R. Ambedkar.

Maharashtra

Modern Indian state along the Arabian Sea, stretching east over the Western Ghats to encompass the northern part of the Deccan Plateau. Maharashtra is one of the “linguistic” states formed after Indian independence in 1947; these states were created to unite people with a common language and culture (in this case, Marathi) under one state government. It was formed in 1960 by splitting the former state of Bombay into the present states of Gujarat and Maharashtra. Bombay, the capital, is the financial and industrial center of modern India. The western regions are heavily industrialized; the eastern regions are more agricultural, dominated by sugar plantations. Historically, Maharashtra is the homeland of the Marathas, a group whose eighteenth-century empire stretched across much of northern India. The Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh and the Shiv Sena, two Hindu nationalist organizations that have both tried to influence Indian politics, were founded in Maharashtra. Along with its economic and political importance, the state contains many important historical, cultural, and religious sites. Historical and cultural sites include the rock-cut caves of Ellora, a UNESCO World Heritage Site; the Buddhist caves at Ajanta; and the cave temple at Elephanta in the Bombay harbor. Places of religious importance include the Godavari and Bhima rivers and their attendant sacred sites (tirthas); the sites associated with the saints of the Varkari Panth religious community, particularly the temple to the god Vithoba at Pandharpur; and three of the jyotirlingas, which are sites particularly holy to the god Shiva: Bhimashankar, Ghreneshvar, and Tryambakeshvar. For general information about Maharashtra and other regions of India, see Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.

Maharashtra

Southern Indian brahmins who make up one of the five southern brahmin communities (Pancha Dravida); the other four are Gujarati, Karnata, Andhra, and Dravida. As their name would indicate, the core region for Maharashtri brahmins is the modern state of Maharashtra. The Maharashtri brahmins are themselves divided into two subgroups: the Chitpavan, or Konkanastha brahmins, who live in the coastal regions, and the Deshasta brahmins, who live further inland in the Deccan.

Maharishi Mahesh Yogi

(b. Mahesh Prasad Verma, 1911) Hindu teacher and founder of the religious technique known as Transcendental Meditation (TM). The Maharishi (“Great Sage”) was trained as an engineer, but eventually renounced the world after meeting one of the Shankaracharyas, a name given to the most important modern Hindu religious leaders. He stayed with Shankaracharya for the next twelve years, in pursuit of spiritual knowledge. He established an ashram at Rishikesh but was relatively unknown until his association with the Beatles, the British musical group who came to India with him on pilgrimage. In the early 1970s, TM instructors traveled throughout American college campuses, touting the physiological and spiritual benefits of meditation and providing people (for a fee) with a mantra or sacred sound that would bring them these benefits. According to TM proponents, meditation is also supposed to have pacific effects on the larger environment, and result in reduced crime, tension, and hatred. During this period Maharishi International University was established at the former Parsons College in Fairfield, Iowa, as a center to teach TM. In the late 1970s, Maharishi University instituted a program training people to develop the six classical superhuman powers (siddhis). Since then several disappointed patrons have won lawsuits against the organization.

Mahasaraswati

In the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most important source for the mythology of the Goddess, the text describes this goddess in three different manifestations: Mahasaraswati, Mahalakshmi, and Mahakali. The opening story begins at the creation of the cosmos. As the god Brahma emerges from the lotus sprouting from the god Vishnu’s navel, he is beset by two demons named Madhu and Kaitabha, who try to kill him. Brahma tries to elude the demons, but because Vishnu is fast asleep, overcome by the power of the Goddess, he cannot give Brahma any help. It is only when Brahma praises the Goddess that she leaves Vishnu, letting him awake. She then clouds the demons’ minds so that they can be tricked (and killed) by Vishnu. In the pantheon, Saraswati is the goddess associated with art, learning, and culture—anything involving the life and activity of the intellectual and aesthetic faculties. Mahasaraswati is also connected with intellect, emphasizing her ability to control people’s perceptions. For more information on Mahasaraswati and the goddesses of Hinduism, see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Mahat

(“great one”) In the account of evolution found in the Samkhya philosophical school, mahat is the first evolutionary stage. It consists of the initial disturbance of prakrti (primal matter) transforming from its original state of equilibrium. Mahat is called the “great one” because prakrti remains unchanged. Mahat is also known as buddhi, the mental faculty for awareness, apperception, and decision making that is believed to be at the root of mental processes. The mental processes facilitated by buddhi spur the development of the next stage in the evolution, ahamkara or subjective consciousness, after which the division of the world into subjective and objective spheres proceeds.

Mahavakya

(“great utterance”) Short statements from the speculative texts known as the Upanishads, called “great” because they reveal the true nature of reality and of the Self. One of the most famous mahavakya is tat tvam asi (“that thou art”), expressing the unity of the Self with Brahman. Other well known utterances are ayamatma Brahman (“This Self is Brahman”), sarvam idam khalu Brahman (“Truly, this universe is Brahman”), aham brahmasmi (“I am Brahman”), and prajnanam Brahman (“Knowledge is Brahman”). These great utterances are most important in the leap philosophy propounded by the philosopher Sureshvara. Leap philosophers believe that complete freedom is possible, but out of our immediate control, in that it cannot be gained by a precisely specified sequence of causes and effects. According to Sureshvara’s understanding, when a person whose understanding has been purified hears one of these mahavakyas, the profound truth in the utterance brings the flash of insight that brings final liberation of the soul (moksha).
Mahavidyas
A collective name for ten fierce and powerful manifestations of the Goddess. According to tradition, the goddess Sati assumes these forms one after another, in an attempt to persuade her husband, the god Shiva, to allow her to attend a sacrifice given by her father Daksha. These ten forms are all frightful and fearsome, even to Shiva, showing the ultimate superiority of the Goddess over Shiva. These ten forms are Kali, Tara, Chinnamasta, Bhuvaneshvari, Bagala, Dhumavati, Kamala, Matangi, Shodashi, and Bhairavi. Some of these forms, particularly Kali, have become important deities in their own right. For further information see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Mahayuga
A unit of cosmic time. According to traditional Hindu reckoning, time has neither beginning nor end, but alternates between cycles of creation and activity, followed by cessation and quietude. Each of these cycles lasts for 4.32 billion years, with the active phase known as the Day of Brahma, and the quiet phase as the Night of Brahma. In one reckoning of cosmic time, the Day of Brahma is divided into one thousand mahayugas ("great cosmic ages"), each of which lasts for 4.32 million years. Each mahayuga is composed of four eras, named the Kṛta Yuga, Treta Yuga, Dvapara Yuga, and Kali Yuga. Each is shorter and more evil than its predecessor; by the end of the Kali Yuga, things have gotten so bad that the only solution is the destruction and recreation of the earth, at which time the next Kṛta Yuga begins.

Mahendravarman
(r. 600–630) Ruler in southern India during the Pallava dynasty, when it was a stronghold of Tamil culture. According to tradition, Mahendravarman was born a Jain, but became a devotee (bhakta) of the god Shiva under the influence of the poet-saint Appar. Mahendravarman was a cultured man and a patron of the arts, as well as the author of the play Mattuvilasa ("Sport of Drunkards"), which was popular throughout southern India. The rock-cut temples at Mahabalipuram were built during his reign. He fought with the surrounding monarchs, especially the Chalukya king Pulakeshin II; it was in battle with Pulakeshin's forces that Mahendravarman met his death.

Mahesh
("Great Lord") Epithet of the god Shiva. See Shiva.

Maheshvar
("Great Lord") Epithet of the god Shiva. See Shiva.

Mahipati
(1715–1790) Writer and hagiographer of the devotional (bhakti) poet-saints, particularly those saints connected with the Varkari Panth, to which Mahipati himself belonged. The Varkari Panth is a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba, whose temple at Pandharpur is in the modern state of Maharashtra. According to tradition, Mahipati was a civil servant in his home town. One day he was summoned to his job without being able to finish his daily worship. Mahipati did the business at hand, but then resigned his position, vowing never to use his pen except in the service of the saints. Mahipati freely admitted that much of his material on the saints was drawn from earlier works, particularly the Bhaktamal written by the poet-saint Nabhadas. As with Nabhadas, he presents each of his subjects as a paradigm of devotion; the stories reinforce and validate the power of devotion to overcome all obstacles. His major works are the Bhaktavijaya and the Bhaktillamrta; the former has been translated by Justin E. Abbott and Narhar R. Godbole as Stories of Indian
Mahishasura

In the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most important source for the mythology of the Goddess, Mahishasura is the buffalo-demon who is responsible for the birth of the Goddess. Mahishasura receives the boon that he cannot be killed by any male and is able to vanquish the gods. They are driven from their heavenly realm and take shelter in the mountains. While they are there, the assembly of the gods let forth their collected radiance (tejas), coalescing into the figure of the Goddess, who represents all their collected power. The Goddess rides off on a lion to challenge Mahishasura. He falls in love with her, but when he proposes marriage, she declares she will only marry the man who can defeat her in battle. A fierce battle ensues; Mahishasura is defeated. He tries to elude the Goddess by changing his form several times, but she keeps striking each one with her sword, finally killing him by cutting off his head.

Mahishmati

Ancient city on the Narmada River in central India. During the fifth century B.C.E., Mahishmati was the outer boundary for the expansion of the Aryan.

Mahmud of Ghazni

(998–1030) Turkish ruler whose capital was at Ghazni (now in modern Afghanistan). Between 1001 and 1027, Mahmud made seventeen raids into India, lured by the tales of India’s fabulous wealth. His plundering was aided by the fragmented political life in northern India, which prevented Hindus from forming any effective opposition. Mahmud struck at many of the centers in northern India, particularly pilgrimage centers, which were renowned for their wealth: Multan, Mathura, Thanesar, Kanauj (which never recovered after being sacked in 1018), and finally Somnath, from which he reportedly took tremendous booty. Although these raids often entailed iconoclasm (the destruction of religious imagery), as at the Shiva temple in Somnath, Mahmud’s fundamental motives were economic—replenishing his coffers with as much plunder as possible, and returning to Ghazni before the advent of the hot season. As such he is different from some of the later Muslim kings, such the Moghuls, who actually exercised political sway over much of India. Aside from his pillaging raids, Mahmud is associated with the scholar Alberuni. Alberuni accompanied Mahmud on one of these expeditions, later using his observations to write an account of Hindu life and culture. See also Moghul dynasty.

Maithila

Northern Indian brahmins who make up Pancha Gauda, one of the five northern brahmin communities; the other four communities are Kanaujia, Gauda, Utkala, and Saraswat. Maithila brahmins are a small community, found only in the Mithila region in the northern part of modern Bihar. Despite the community’s size, Maithila brahmins are well known for their commitment to learning and culture, as exemplified by their most famous member, the poet Vidyapati.

Maithuna
("copulation") In the secret ritual-based religious practice known as tantra, sexual intercourse is the fifth and last of the Five Forbidden Things (panchamakara); the panchamakara are used in their actual forms in "left hand" (vamachara) tantric ritual, whereas they are represented by symbolic substitutes in "right hand" (daksinachara) tantric ritual. Many traditions in Hindu tantra describe ritualized sexual intercourse as a symbol of the ultimate union of the god Shiva and his wife Shakti. Ritual sexuality must be seen in the larger tantric context. One of the most pervasive tantric assumptions is the ultimate unity of everything that exists. From a tantric perspective, to affirm that the entire universe is one principle means that the adept must reject all concepts based on dualistic thinking. The "Five Forbidden Things" provide a ritual means for breaking down duality; in this ritual the adept breaks societal norms forbidding consumption of intoxicants, nonvegetarian food, and illicit sexuality in a conscious effort to sacralize what is normally forbidden. Tantric adepts cite such ritual use of forbidden things as proof that their practice involves a more exclusive qualification (adhikara), and is thus superior to common practice. In some forms of this ritual the woman is the initiate's wife, who is worshiped before intercourse as a manifestation of the Goddess. In other cases this ritual intercourse is portrayed as adulterous, usually with a woman of very low status, to magnify the social boundaries being transgressed. This latter practice is uncommon now, at least in southern India, where Brooks describes it as virtually unknown. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1972; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Makarasana
("crocodile seat") In Indian iconography, a base on which an image may be placed. The base is a figure of a crocodile, with a flat part on its back for the image.

Makara Sankranti
Religious festival that falls on the day the sun makes the transition (sankranti) into the zodiacal sign of Capricorn (makara). According to Western astrology, this occurs around December 20, but in Indian astrology (jyotisha), this occurs on January 14. This is one of the few celebrations in the festival year marked by the solar rather than the lunar calendar. On Makara Sankranti, the sun is reckoned as beginning its "northward journey" (uttarayana). This will continue until Karka Sankranti six months later, when the sun enters Cancer, and begins its "southward journey" (dakshinayana). Since the uttarayana is believed to be more auspicious than its counterpart, the day marking this transition is deemed particularly auspicious. Makara Sankranti is primarily a bathing (snana) festival; great numbers of people come to bathe in rivers on that day, especially the Ganges. The largest bathing festival on the Ganges is at Sagar Island in state of West Bengal (also known as Ganga Sagar), celebrated as the place where the Ganges empties into the sea at the Bay of Bengal.

Mala
("garland") This word denotes any sort of necklace. Garlands made of flowers are ubiquitous throughout India, both as offerings to a deity—around whose neck they are placed as adornment—or given in the same way to any honored guest as a sign of welcome and respect. Garlands or necklaces made from more permanent materials are important pieces of religious paraphernalia, and in some cases carry clear sectarian associations. Many Shaivas wear malas made from rudraksha beads, an aniconic form of their patron deity, Shiva. In the same way, many Vaishnavas will wear a mala made from the wood of the Tulsi plant, since this plant is said to be a form of the goddess Lakshmi, the spouse of their patron deity Vishnu. Although these materials serve as sectarian markers, malas used for ritual purposes can be made from virtually any material. Most favored are substances such as amber, rock crystal, coral, semiprecious stones, and gemstones—materials which are durable, valuable, and not formed by human hands.

For ritual purposes, malas are used to keep count during mantra recitation (japa), by moving one bead through the finger and thumb with each recitation. Such malas are usually strung with 108 pieces. Each mala has one bead set apart from the others; mantra recitation always begins with this bead. This bead symbolizes Mount Meru, the mythical mountain that is the cosmic pivot supporting the entire created order. According to established practice, when one has reached the end of the mala and has come back to the Meru bead, one should reverse directions. By virtue of never passing over the Meru bead, one is thus symbolically circling Mount Meru as the center of the universe.

This connection with daily religious practice makes malas powerful religious objects, believed to be charged by their owners' spiritual energy. For this reason, malas are almost never exchanged—except for a mala given by a guru to a disciple. Most malas are touched only by the owner. People doing recitation will often keep the hand and mala concealed in a cloth bag (known as a gomukh or "cow's mouth"), as a barrier to potentially corrupting outside forces. The conviction that a mala absorbs its owner's spiritual energy also lies behind the taboo on repairing and reusing a broken mala. According to popular belief, a mala breaks because it gradually draws off its owner's negative spiritual forces. Once broken, a mala should therefore be discarded, to prevent the owner from coming back into contact with this potentially damaging energy.

Malabar
Traditional name for the southern Indian coastal region bordering the Arabian sea, in the modern states of Kerala and Karnataka.

Malamasa
("Impure month") An intercalary month inserted into the lunar calendar about every 2½ years, to correct the discrepancy between the lunar and the solar calendars. Although this month is necessary to maintain the correspondence between the two calendars—and thus, for example, to keep the spring festivals in the spring—it is considered an unusual event, impure and ritually dangerous.

Malatimadhava

Play written by the Sanskrit dramatist Bhavabhuti (early 8th c.), who was particularly noted for his ability to express and transmit the play of emotions through language. The play's general plot is the triumphant love between Malati and her beloved Madhava (an epithet of the god Krishna), despite numerous obstacles along the way. The drama is noted as an exquisite poetic work, but also because the primary villain is an evil ascetic, generally believed to be a member of the extinct ascetic sect known as Kapalikas. The Kapalikas were devotees (bhakta) of Shiva, emulating him in his wrathful form as Bhairava: wearing the hair long and matted, smearing the body with ash (preferably from the cremation ground), and bearing a club and a skull-bowl (kapala). The Kapalikas are cited as indulging in forbidden behavior—drinking wine, eating meat, using cannabis and other drugs, performing human sacrifice, and orgiastic sexuality—which made them feared. Bhavabhuti's description is one of the earliest references to Shaiva asceticism, and thus historically significant. The play has been translated into English by Michael Coulson and published in an anthology titled Three Sanskrit Plays, 1981.

Mali

Traditional Indian society was a collection of endogamous subgroups (in which marriage is decreed by law to occur only between members of the same group) known as jatis ("birth"). The jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group's hereditary occupation, over which each group held a monopoly. In traditional northern Indian society, the Malis' hereditary occupation was tending gardens, growing flowers, and making flower garlands (mala).

Mallikarjuna

Temple and sacred site (tirtha) on the holy mountain Shrishaila in Andhra Pradesh. The temple is named for its presiding deity, the god Shiva in his manifestation as the "[Lord] White as Jasmine." Shiva is present at Mallikarjuna in the form of a linga, a pillar-shaped image. The Mallikarjuna linga is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites at which Shiva is uniquely present. Mallikarjuna's charter myth is based on a competition between Shiva's two sons, Ganesh and Skanda, who agree that the first one to circle the earth will be the first one to be married. Skanda mounts his peacock and takes off, sure that he is faster. Ganesh, however, simply walks around Shiva and his wife Parvati, as a symbol that they are the entire universe. When Skanda returns, he is very angry to discover that he has been beaten. He leaves Kailas, the Himalayan mountain believed to be Shiva's abode, and goes to southern India. Parvati is very upset at the absence of her son, but none of the envoys they send can persuade Skanda to return. Finally, Shiva and Parvati go themselves, landing on Shrishaila mountain. Skanda has already departed for a nearby mountain. Before following after him, his parents consecrate the first site as Mallikarjuna.

As with all the jyotirlingas, Mallikarjuna is deemed a very powerful site. Worshipping this jyotirlinga is said to bring the increase of wealth, freedom from disease, well-being, and any other desired end. The site itself is a difficult place to reach, deep in the jungle on the top of Shrishaila mountain. For this reason, the major festival celebrated here is Shivaratri, the most important festival to Shiva during the entire year, when devotees (bhakta) come and stay for several days.
Mallinatha
(14th c.) Sanskrit scholar and commentator noted for his commentaries on the plays written by the poet Kalidasa (5th c.); these commentaries have become sources for interpreting the texts. Although the subject of his commentary was largely “secular” poetry, Mallinatha himself was a Jain, and may have been a monk. His work illustrates the important role that the Jains played in the preservation of Indian literary culture. In addition to their commentaries, they copied and recopied the manuscripts, a never-ending task due to the fragile nature of the palm leaves on which they were written.

Malviya, Madan Mohan
(1861–1946) Hindu activist and founder of Benares Hindu University. Malviya belonged to the first generation of Hindus seeking to reclaim India from British rule; these men were well educated, politically active, and passionately committed to traditional Hindu culture. Benares Hindu University was founded in 1916 to uphold Hindu cultural and philosophical traditions, as well as to educate students in the sciences, preparing them for the modern world. Aside from his work in education, Malviya organized and supported Hindu religious causes, in particular a ban on cow slaughter and opposition to a proposed dam on the Ganges River at the pilgrimage city of Haridwar. The dam would have restricted the free flow of the Ganges, so in 1914 and 1916, he spent considerable energy organizing opposition so that a compromise with the government could be found. For a glowing account of his life, see M. A. Parmanand, Mahamana Madan Mohan Malviya, 1985.

Malwa
Traditional name for the plateau in Madhya Pradesh centered around the city of Ujjain, the region’s traditional capital. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the Malwa region was one of the centers for the Rajasthani school of miniature painting. The Rajasthani style is generally characterized by a flat perspective. Visual power is derived from bands of vivid colors that often serve as a backdrop to the painting.

Mamsa
(“meat”) In the secret ritual-based religious practice known as tantra, meat is the third of the Five Forbidden Things (panchamakara); the panchamakara are used in their actual forms in “left hand” (vamachara) tantric ritual, whereas they are represented by symbolic substitutes in “right hand” (daksinachara) tantric ritual. “Respectable” Hindu society strongly condemns the consumption of nonvegetarian food; its ritual use therefore must be seen in the larger tantric context. One of the most pervasive tantric assumptions is the ultimate unity of everything that exists. From a tantric perspective, to affirm that the entire universe is one principle means that the adept must reject all concepts based on dualistic thinking. The “Five Forbidden Things” provide a ritual means for breaking down duality; in this ritual the adept breaks societal norms forbidding consumption of intoxicants, nonvegetarian food, and illicit sexuality in a conscious effort to sacralize what is normally forbidden. Tantric adepts cite such ritual use of forbidden things as proof that their practice involves a more exclusive qualification (adhikara), and is thus superior to common practice. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe) Shakti and Shakta, 1978; Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1977; and Douglas R. Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Manas
of Hindu philosophy, manas is one of the stages in the devolution of prakrti (primal matter), resulting in the world that we see around us, in which human souls are subject to reincarnation (samsara). Manas evolves from the step known as ahamkar—the stage marked by the first sense of Self and subjectivity. The mind (manas) develops as the source of intellectual activity which, colored by this feeling of subjectivity, creates the notion of an individual identity. According to the Samkhya, concurrent with this mental identity comes the development of the individual’s sense organs (jnanendriyas) and the organs of action (karmendriyas), as well as the subtle elements (tanmatras) that are the source for the world’s material objects. Although later philosophical schools largely rejected Samkhya cosmology, manas became generally accepted as one of the five human sense organs. As the eye perceives sight and the ears perceive sound, the manas perceives mental objects (ideas), allowing the subject to experience them.

Manasa
Manasa is a regional goddess considered to be a form of the Goddess. She is worshiped mainly in eastern India, and is primarily associated with snakes and snakebites. As with Shitala, the goddess, whose divine presence was considered to be revealed by infection with smallpox, Manasa’s divine presence comes violently with snakebites, considered a form of divine possession. This conception shows the ambivalent nature of many regional goddesses who are both powerful and dangerous. When Manasa appears, it is always traumatic, and sometimes tragic; such is the nature of human interactions with divinity. Manasa is worshiped both to keep people free from snakebites—a very real concern in an agricultural country with highly venomous snakes—or for the recovery of a person who has been bitten. Her worship is marked by annual festivals at which people sing songs in her honor, and which are often marked by divine possession and snake-handling.

Manasarovar
Lake and sacred site (tirtha) close to the base of Mount Kailas in Tibet. Pilgrims walking around Mt. Kailas traditionally begin their circuit with a bath in the lake before proceeding to the mountain. The lake is traditionally thought to be one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites.
sacred to the Goddess that spreads throughout the subcontinent. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess, Sati, fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess; Manasarovar was the palm of Sati’s right hand. See also pitha.

Manava Dharma Shastra
Another name for the text on religious duty (dharma) and social order ascribed to the mythical sage Manu. See Manu Smrti.

Mandakini River
Himalayan tributary of the Ganges River, which joins with the Alakananda River at the hill town of Rudraprayag in the state of Uttar Pradesh. As with all the Himalayan tributaries of the Ganges, the Mandakini is considered sacred. Important pilgrimage places (tirtha) along it include Kedarnath, which is at its headwaters, Guptakashi, and Rudraprayag.

Mandala
(“circle”) As with many Sanskrit terms, a word with different meanings in different contexts. In the context of geography it can imply a region, as in the case of the Braj region, known as the Braj Mandala. In the context of the ras lila, the circle dance between the god Krishna and his devotees (bhakta), mandala refers to the group of devotees as well as to the shape of the dance itself. By extension, mandala can refer to any group of people, although it carries the connotation of people who have gathered for some serious religious purpose. In the context of the secret ritually-based religious practice known as tantra, mandala refers to a symbolic diagram used as an aid to meditation, as a ritual accessory, or as a symbolic road map of the spiritual quest. In this context, mandala is more characteristic of Buddhist tantra, with Hindu tantrikas more frequently using the terms yantra and chakra.
Mandaleshvar
("Lord of the Region") Term of respect for the ascetics chosen to head the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis in their disputations with Christian missionaries. The Dashanami Nagas are groups of renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva and who formerly made their living as traders and mercenary soldiers. Their rough-and-ready qualities made them effective soldiers but gave them little preparation for formal argument. The Mandaleshvars were chosen by the Nagas from among the more learned Paramahamsa ascetics, providing a more coherent and telling opposition to Christian missionaries. An ascetic who becomes a Mandaleshvar becomes the spiritual adviser and the teacher of the Dashanami Naga members of the akhara, who deem him a spiritual preceptor as much as their own gurus.

Mandana Mishra
(early 9th c.) Founder of the Bhamati school of Advaita Vedanta, who is traditionally held to be a contemporary of Shankaracharya, the Advaita school's greatest figure. The Advaita school upholds a philosophical theory known as monism—the belief that a single Ultimate Reality lies behind all things, which are merely differing forms of that reality. Advaita proponents claim that reality is non-dual (advaita)—all things are nothing but the formless, unqualified Brahman (the highest reality in the universe), despite the appearance of difference and diversity. For the Advaitins, the assumption of diversity is a fundamental misunderstanding of the ultimate nature of things, a manifestation of avidya. Although often translated as "ignorance," avidya is better understood as the lack of genuine understanding that ultimately causes human beings to be trapped in karmic bondage, reincarnation (samsara), and suffering.

Mandana suggests the vivarta ("illusory manifestation") causal relationship to show how the unchanging Brahman is connected with the world as it is perceived. The concept of superimposition (adhyasa) shows how humans project a mistaken understanding onto the correct understanding. For example, a piece of rope is mistaken for a snake. Although this judgment is erroneous, one is actually perceiving something real, in this case the rope, but "superimposing" a different and mistaken identity on it, thus "transforming" it into something it is not. In the same way, it is argued, human consciousness begins with the existent reality (Brahman), which is actually there, but superimposes onto it something which is not (the judgment of a diverse world).

Mandana also differed from Shankaracharya on several points, posing problems for his later followers. One of these judgments was that the locus of ignorance was in the Self, since it was absurd to conceive of Brahman as subject to ignorance; another was that there were multiple Selves, since the liberation of one person did not cause the liberation of all. Mandana's comments presuppose the existence of a common (if illusory) world, upon which he felt called to render a judgment; he ended up describing it as anirvachaniya—"that which cannot be described." In his analysis, Mandana also distinguished between two kinds of ignorance—a primal "covering" that keeps one from perceiving the truth, and a "projective" ignorance through which human beings actively obscure things.

Mandapa
("pavilion") The mandapa is an architectural feature found in the Khajuraho variation of the Nagara architectural style. Usually found in northern India, the Nagara style emphasizes verticality, with the whole temple building culminating in a single highest point. In the Khajuraho style, the entire structure gradually leads up to the central tower, as foothills lead up to the mountains, with the peak of this central tower directly over the temple's primary image. In this style, the mandapa is the name for a hall of the temple that is usually between the entrance hall (ardhamandapa) and the main hall (mahamandapa).

Mandara
In Hindu mythology, the name of a sacred mountain where the minor god Kubera and his court reside. In the myth of the Tortoise avatar, Mount Mandara is identified as the churning-stick used to churn the ocean of milk (the mountain's tremendous size makes it an effective churn).

Mandir
("home") In northern India, the most common name for a temple in which the image of a deity has been installed and consecrated for worship. Although such temples often have facilities for congregational worship, social life, or cultural events, the building's primary function is to serve as the home for the deities assembled there and considered the temple's real owners.

Mandodari
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Mandodari is the wife of the demon-king Ravana, and the mother of Indrajit, Atikaya and Akshakumara. Despite being a loving and loyal wife to Ravana, Mandodari continually advises him that he has done wrong in kidnapping Rama's wife Sita. She pleads with him to come to terms with Rama before it becomes necessary to fight. Ravana refuses to do so, because of his pride and his determination to avenge the insult to his sister Shurpanakha, who has been mutilated by Rama's brother Lakshmana. In the end, this stubbornness costs Ravana his life.

Mandu
Hilltop fort in southwestern Madhya Pradesh, about seventy miles south of Indore. Although Mandu is deserted today, it was the capital of a small kingdom until the sixteenth century, and was eventually assimilated into the Moghul empire as a vassal state. During the early seventeenth century Mandu was one of the important centers for the Rajasthani style of miniature painting. The Rajasthani style is generally characterized by a flat perspective. Visual power is derived from bands of vivid colors that serve as a backdrop to the painting. See also Moghul dynasty.

Mandukya Upanishad

One of the speculative religious texts known as the Upanishads, which form the latest stratum of the Vedas, the oldest Hindu sacred texts. The Mandukya Upanishad's underlying concern is to investigate ultimate questions, in particular the nature of the Self (atman). The Mandukya Upanishad is generally considered one of the latest upanishads, based on its brevity—a mere twelve verses—and on its concise articulation of philosophical monism. The first verse praises the sound Om, calling it the essence of the entire universe. The second verse identifies the world with Brahman, the Self (atman) with Brahman, and characterizes the Self as having four quarters. The succeeding verses describe the four quarters of the Self, each of which removes another layer of egoism: The first layer is described as waking consciousness, characterized by perceptions of subject and object; the next is dream sleep, which is sheer subjectivity; then deep sleep, which has neither subject nor object; and finally a mysterious state simply called “the fourth” (turiya), which is the Self itself.

Further verses identify these first three states as corresponding to the three parts of the sound Om: the vowels “a” and “u” (which combine to form the vowel “o”), and the letter “m.” The fourth state is said to be “beyond all letters” and without duality. The upanishad explicitly states that to know this brings one final liberation, in which one spontaneously merges with the Self.

Mangalam

(“auspicious”) Term whose root meaning can be applied to anything believed to bring good fortune: a benedictory formula, a favorable omen or portent, an auspicious ceremony such as marriage. It may apply to an object, such as the mangal sutra, a necklace worn by married women primarily in southern India as a sign that they are married and that their husbands are still living.

Mangal Sutra

(“auspicious thread”) Symbol worn by married women primarily in southern India indicating their married status. Married women are considered to be inherently auspicious, since their potential generative power can be expressed through socially sanctioned procreation. Accounts from several centuries ago describe this symbol as a simple thread, often colored yellow with turmeric; in contemporary times the mangal sutra is often an elaborate necklace. Wearing a mangal sutra indicates that a woman has a living husband, thus she is a vessel of auspicious qualities. For these reasons, a woman must remove her mangal sutra upon being widowed, as she must remove all the other symbols of marriage.

Manikarnika

(“Jeweled earring”) Sacred site (tirtha) in the city of Benares on the Ganges River in the state of Uttar Pradesh. The site takes its name from the Manikarnika Kund, a bathing (snana) tank supposedly dug by the god Vishnu, and into which fell an earring of the god Shiva, thus sanctifying the tank by its presence. In modern times the site is better known for the cremation ground at Manikarnika Ghat. In most Indian cities the cremation ground lies at the margin of the settlement, since its association with death makes it an inauspicious place. However, the Manikarnika cremation ground is in the center of Benares. Despite the normal human desire to ignore and to deny the reality of death, in Benares it is paraded in full view—not to distress or depress people, but to make them confront this reality. Awareness of death has traditionally been considered a great spur to religious life. Since Benares is also one of the Seven Sacred Cities, death within the city also carries the hope of ultimate liberation.

Manikkavachakar
(9th c.) Tamil poet-saint who was a devotee (bhakta) of the god Shiva and the author of the Tiruvachakam (“holy utterances”). He is considered the fourth great figure in the Tamil Shaivite tradition, along with the Nayanar poets-saints, Appar, Sambandar, and Sundaramurtti. Manikkavachakar's hymns bear witness to the intensity of his individual religious experience and are seen as the culmination of the earlier devotional (bhakti) tradition. These hymns are also the basis for the development of the Shaiva Siddhanta philosophical school, making him a pivotal figure in southern Indian Shaivism. For further information see Glenn Yocum, Hymns to the Dancing Siva, 1982.

Manimegalai
Tamil epic poem which was written as a sequel to “The Jeweled Anklet” (Shilappadigaram), connecting its characters with those of the earlier play. The story focuses on a young woman named Manimegalai who, although wooed by the local prince, becomes a Buddhist nun. Manimegalai has numerous debates with people from competing religious traditions, thus giving a picture of sixth century southern Indian religious life.

Manipuri Chakra
In many schools of yoga, and in the secret ritually-based religious practice known as tantra, the manipura chakra is one of the six psychic centers (chakras) believed to exist in the subtle body. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system, existing on a different plane of reality than gross matter, but corresponding to the material body. The six psychic centers are visualized as multi-petaled lotus flowers running roughly along the spine, connected by three vertical channels. Each of the chakras has symbolic associations with various human capacities, different subtle elements (tanmatras), and different seed syllables (bijaksharas) formed from the letters of the Sanskrit alphabet, encompassing all sacred sound. Above and below these centers are the bodily abodes of Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power), the two divine principles through which the entire universe has come into being. The underlying assumption behind the concept of the subtle body is the homology of macrocosm and microcosm, an essential Hindu idea since the time of the mystical texts known as the Upanishads.

The six chakras are traditionally enumerated starting from the bottom; the manipura chakra is the third. It is visualized as a ten-petaled lotus, located in the region of the navel. The petals each contain a seed, in this case the consonants from retroflex “dha” to “pha.” The manipura chakra is identified as the bodily seat for the subtle element of fire, the power of which is believed to bring about digestion. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; and Philip S. Rawson, The Art of Tantra, 1973.

Manipuri
One of the classical dance forms of India; some of the others are Bharatanatyam, Orissi, Kuchipudi, Kathak, and Kathakali. Like much of traditional Indian culture, classical dance shows strong regional identification; Manipuri is found only in the state of Manipur, nestled between Burma and Assam in eastern India. Developed in the eighteenth century, Manipuri reflects the importance of Vaishnava devotionalism. One of the principal dance genres involves acting out episodes from the life of the god Krishna, especially the Ras lila and his dalliance with his lover Radha. In other genres dancers play a two-headed drum or cymbals, leaping dramatically during the performance. This form has roots in devotional Vaishnavism, particularly the ecstatic singing and dancing associated with the Gaudiya Vaishnava community in Bengal. For further information see Mohan Khokar, Traditions of Indian Classical Dance, 1984.

Man Lila
A divine play (lila) between Krishna and his devotees (bhakta). In this lila, one of Krishna's female companions feigns wounded pride (man), usually because he makes some sort of error, such as calling her by another woman's name. For some time she pretends to be angry, but is eventually won over by his charm and undivided attention. This motif of a woman feigning anger—to make her lover flatter and fawn over her, and to sweeten the joy of the eventual reconciliation—has a venerable history in Sanskrit poetry. In modern times, this lila is often presented in devotional theatrical presentations, which are themselves known as lilas (“plays”), since their function is to reveal the work of the divine.

Man-Lion Avatar
Fourth avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu; the man-lion's form is usually rendered as the head and shoulders of a lion, and the torso and legs of a man. As with all the avatars of Vishnu, the Man-Lion avatar comes to restore the cosmic balance, which has been thrown out of equilibrium by the disproportionate power of some individual. In this case the source of trouble is the demon-king Hiranyakashipu, who by the power of his asceticism (tapas) has gained three boons from the gods: that he cannot be killed by man nor beast, by day or by night, and neither inside nor outdoors.

These boons render him virtually invulnerable; Hiranyakashipu proceeds to conquer the earth and drive the gods from heaven. He oppresses his son Prahlada, who despite his father's power remains a sincere devotee (bhakta) of Vishnu. The more devotion Prahlada shows to Vishnu the more abuse his father gives him, until finally Hiranyakashipu, maddened at the thought that someone refuses to worship him, is at the point of killing Prahlada.

Prahlada calls on Vishnu for help, and the Man-Lion, a being which is neither man nor beast, bursts forth from a pillar in the palace. The Man-Lion seizes Hiranyakashipu in the palace doorway, which is neither inside nor out, at twilight, which is neither day nor night, and uses his sharp claws to tear out the demon's entrails, killing him. Once Hiranyakashipu has been killed, Vishnu installs the righteous Prahlada as the king of the realm. This action reveals an important truth about the Hindu view of reality. Although Prahlada is a “demon” (asura), he is not inherently evil, nor is he simply a being to be exterminated. All kinds of beings have their rightful place in the Hindu cosmos—problems come when they gain disproportionate power and use it to their own ends.

Manmatha
("churning the mind") Epithet of the Krishna, reflecting his ability to bewitch and beguile his devotees (bhakta). See Krishna.

Mansa Devi
Presiding deity in the village of Manimajara, located in the Shiwalik Hills, a short distance from Chandigarh, and one of the nine Shiwalik goddesses. According to local tradition, this is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the Goddess that spreads throughout the subcontinent. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess; Mansa Devi was Sati’s head. The word mansa means “wish,” and it is claimed that Mansa Devi will grant whatever wish the devotee (bhakta) brings to her. There is another temple of Mansa Devi on the hill above the bathing (snana) ghats in the sacred city of Haridwar; here, too, the officiants claim that the presiding deity will fulfill all one’s wishes.

The charter myth for the Manimajara Mansa Devi, set in the time of the Moghul emperor Akbar, illustrates her power and concern for her devotees. Akbar appoints a Rajput chieftain to manage the land around Manimajara. One year the chieftain is unable to pay his taxes because bad weather has ruined the crops. The chieftain is put in prison, but his plight moves one of Mansa Devi’s devotees, who implores her to intervene in his behalf. The chieftain is released and the taxes waived; when the chieftain discovers how this has happened, he is so grateful that he erects a temple in honor of the goddess. See also pitha and Moghul dynasty.

Manthara
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Manthara is the hunchbacked maid of King Dasharatha’s wife, Kaikeyi. Manthara’s whisperings against Dasharatha’s son Rama, the god-king who is the epic’s protagonist, slowly poisons Kaikeyi’s mind. She succeeds in convincing the queen that after Rama has been crowned Dasharatha’s heir, she and her son Bharata will be little better than slaves, if they are allowed to live at all. Goaded by Manthara, Kaikeyi decides to demand two boons Dasharatha gave her years before. With the first boon she dictates that Rama be sent in exile to the forest for fourteen years, and with the second she stipulates that her son Bharata be crowned heir in Rama’s place.

The epic’s oldest version, the Ramayana of Valmiki, paints Manthara as a genuine villain. There is little explanation for her actions, although given the belief in karma, her physical disabilities would have been seen as revealing moral and spiritual deformity as well. In the Ramayana, written by the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?), Manthara’s behavior is ultimately attributed to the gods who send the goddess Saraswati to confound Manthara’s mind, setting in motion the chain of events leading to the demon Ravana’s death. In typical fashion, Tulsidas puts a more charitable spin on the event, relating it to Rama’s ultimate purpose for being born on earth.

Mantra
In its most basic sense, sacred sound. A mantra is a collection of phonemes that may or may not have syntactic meaning as actual words, since their importance comes not from the meaning of the utterances, but from the very sounds themselves. Mantras are believed to confer power and varying spiritual capacities on those who have been given the qualification (adhidharma) to use them. The qualification comes from
Manu

In Hindu mythology, the Manus are fourteen semidivine kings, perceived as the progenitors of the human race and rulers over the universe. According to traditional belief, time has neither beginning nor end but alternates between cycles of creation and activity, followed by cessation and quietude. Each of these cycles lasts for 4.32 billion years; the active phase is known as the Day of Brahma; the quiet phase is known as the Night of Brahma. In one instance of cosmic time, each Day of Brahma is divided into fourteen equal periods, each ruled by one of the fourteen Manus.

Manu Smrti

(“Laws of Manu”) One of the smritis or “remembered” texts, a class of literature deemed important, but less authoritative than the shrutis or “heard” texts. This smrti is ascribed to the sage Manu and is an example of one of the Dharma Shastras—manuals prescribing rules for correct human behavior and ideal social life. The Dharma Shastras are usually ascribed to mythic sages, reinforcing the authority of these texts. Manu’s text is by far the most influential of the Dharma Shastras and is believed to have been composed just before the beginning of the common era.

Manu’s text shows the break between the Dharma Sutras and the Dharma Shastras, for it is plainly intended as a blueprint for an entire society, rather than a set of rules for a particular brahmin group. The introductory chapter details the creation of the world and the consequent social order; the chapter ends by summarizing the rest of the volume’s contents. The next five chapters focus on the four major social groups (varnas) and the four stages of life (ashramas), using material from the Dharma Sutras.

Manu’s themes in chapters seven through nine sharply diverge from earlier sources. Chapter seven defines the duties of a king. Chapters eight and nine...
treat various legal matters that might come before the king for adjudication. Manu attempts to put all of these under eighteen thematic headings. The material in these chapters encompasses all manner of criminal and civil law, from assault and theft to contract law and marital duties laying down a legal framework for the stable governance of society.

The remaining chapters are less original. The tenth chapter discusses occupations that members of the different varnas may follow in times of distress (apaddharma), when normal social rules no longer apply. The eleventh chapter talks about gifts to brahmins and rites of expiation (prayashchitta), remaining faithful to the Dharma Sutras. Manu’s final chapter has a more abstract and speculative nature, focusing on the workings of karma and describing the consequences of various good and evil acts. The text has been translated numerous times; see Wendy Doniger O’Flaherty and Brian K. Smith, The Laws of Manu, 1991.

Manvantara

Manvantara is the name of an era in one instance of cosmic time. According to traditional belief, time has neither beginning nor end but alternates between cycles of creation and activity, followed by cessation and quietude. Each of these cycles lasts for 4.32 billion years; the active phase is known as the Day of Brahma and the quiet phase is known as the Night of Brahma. In one instance of cosmic time, each Day of Brahma is divided into fourteen equal periods, each ruled by one of the fourteen Manus. Manus are celebrated as the sovereigns of the earth and are perceived as semidivine beings who are the progenitors of the human race. Currently we are living in the seventh age, with seven yet to come. The Manu of this present age, Vaivasvata, was saved from pralaya (universal destruction) by Vishnu in his form as the Fish avatar. Vaivasvata is regarded as the progenitor of the Solar Line of Kings.

Maranashaucha

The ritual impurity (ashaucha) caused by death (marana). All bodily effluvia (hair, spittle, pus, blood, etc.) are considered to be sources of impurity, but a corpse is the most impure thing of all. Any death immediately causes the most violent impurity, affecting the entire family. For the family’s safety, this impurity must be carefully contained and managed through the funeral rites (antyeshti samskara). Here one sees the significant ritual difference between birth and death. Although birth also brings impurity (sutakashaucha) on the family, because of the bodily products attending it, this impurity is considered less violent, because the birth of a child is an auspicious, life-affirming event. Death, on the other hand, is seen as bringing bad fortune, and thus the family must not only take care of this impurity, but must also get rid of the inauspiciousness caused by the death.

Maratha

Traditional Indian society was a collection of endogamous subgroups (in which marriage is decreed by law to occur only between members of the same group) known as jatis. Jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group’s hereditary occupation, over which each group held a monopoly. The Maratha jati was one of the dominant landholding communities in the Maharashtra region, along with the Kunbis. They were most concentrated on the Konkan coast and the inland region around the city of Pune. The Marathas were tough peasant farmers who by the middle of the eighteenth century had forged a large but short-lived empire, the Maratha confederacy, extending over much of northern and central India. By the latter part of the eighteenth century, the confederacy had fragmented into various smaller states.
Maratha Dynasty
(17th–19th c.) Central Indian dynasty in the region of the western state of Maharashtra, particularly along the Konkan coast of the Arabian Sea. The dynasty was founded by the Maratha chieftain Shivaji, who spent most of his life locked in a bitter struggle with the Moghul empire. At Shivaji’s death in 1680, the Marathas controlled only a small strip of land in western Maharashtra. After the death of the Moghul emperor Aurangzeb in 1707, the Moghul empire began to disintegrate; the Marathas filled the political vacuum. At its peak in the mid-1700s, the Maratha Confederacy controlled northern and central India from coast to coast, stretching as far north as Delhi and the Ganges River basin. Expansionism was halted in 1761, when the Maratha army was defeated by the Afghans at Panipat in the state of Haryana, a short distance north of Delhi. Both groups of combatants sustained major losses in the battle, rendering them unable to contest the arrival of the British. A little more than a decade later, the Maratha Confederacy had fragmented into constituent states, each with its own capital. Of these, the Bhonsle dynasty had its capital in the city of Nagpur, the Holkar dynasty had its capital in the city of Indore, the Gaikwad dynasty had its capital in the city of Baroda. The Scindia dynasty had capitals in Gwalior and Ujjain, while the Peshwa dynasty had its capital in Pune. All except for the last survived as princely states until Indian independence in 1947. See also Moghul dynasty.

Margali
Ninth month in the Tamil solar year, corresponding to the northern Indian solar month of Dhanush (the zodiacal sign of Sagittarius), usually falling within December and January. The existence of several different calendars is one clear sign of the continuing importance of regional cultural patterns. One way that the Tamils retain their culture is by preserving their traditional calendar. Tamil is one of the few regional languages in India with an ancient, well-established literary tradition. See also Tamil months, Tamil Nadu, and Tamil language.

Margashirsha
According to the lunar calendar, by which most Hindu religious festivals are determined, Margashirsha is the ninth month in the lunar year, usually falling within November and December. Margashirsha is generally considered an inauspicious month; the only major festivals in Margashirsha are Bhairava Jayanti, Utpanna Ekadashi, and Mokshada Ekadashi.

Maricha
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Maricha is the uncle of Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka who is the epic’s antagonist. After Ravana’s sister Shurpanakha has been insulted and mutilated by Rama and Lakshmana, the epic’s protagonists, Ravana decides to take revenge by abducting Rama’s wife, Sita. He enlists Maricha’s help to kidnap Sita. Maricha takes the form of a golden deer. When Sita sees the deer, she asks Rama to kill it for her. Rama pursues the deer into the forest, giving Lakshmana strict instructions to stay with Sita no matter what happens. Rama pursues the deer some distance from their home and finally gets close enough to shoot it.

With his dying breath, Maricha cries out Lakshmana’s name in a voice that sounds like Rama’s, intending to draw Lakshmana away and leave Sita unprotected. Given his orders, Lakshmana is at first unwilling to leave. He finally leaves when Sita, in an uncharacteristic display of suspicion and anger, accuses Lakshmana of withholding help to Rama because he wants to have her to himself. At this unjust allegation, Lakshmana is spurred into action. Before he leaves he draws a magical protective circle around Sita, instructing her that no harm can befall her as long as she stays in the circle. Ravana, in the form of an old ascetic, approaches Sita, begging for alms. Out of respect for an ascetic, Sita steps out of the circle to offer the alms. Ravana reveals his true form and carries her away.

Marichi
In Hindu mythology, one of the six sons of Brahma, all of whom become great sages. All are “mind-born,” meaning that Brahma’s thoughts are enough to bring them into being. The others are Kratu, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, and Atri.

Mariyammai
Originally a local goddess in southern India, whose cult has become a regional phenomenon. Mariyammai embodies many of the contradictions and tensions associated with Hindu conceptions of the Goddess in general. According to her charter myth, Mariyammai is originally a brahmin woman, who is beheaded because of her husband’s jealousy. She is brought back to life, but not before her body has become switched with that of another woman, this one an untouchable. Mariyammai’s brahmin head and untouchable body symbolize the imperfect joining of brahminical Hindu and southern Indian culture, as well as the nebulous status of brahmins as the “head” of southern Indian society.

Markandeya
A sage in Hindu mythology. Markandeya is best-known for two mythic exploits, one of which is associated with the god Shiva and the other with the god Vishnu. According to tradition, Markandeya is a very intelligent and religious boy who is devoted to Shiva and proficient in all the branches of learning. This seemingly unlimited potential is even more poignant because he learns that he is fated to die at sixteen. Shortly before his sixteenth birthday, Markandeya begins to worship Shiva with even greater fervor. Because of the boy’s accumulated religious merits, the servants of Yama, the god of death, cannot get near him. So Yama himself has to go for Markandeya. When Yama throws his noose over Markandeya to draw out the boy’s soul, it also loops over the statue of Shiva to which Markandeya is clinging. Shiva arises from the image and kills Yama, although he later relents and brings him back to life.

Markandeya’s other mythic exploit is a vision of pralaya, the universal dissolution of the cosmos. One evening as he is meditating, the sky grows dark, the wind rises, and rain falls until the earth is inundated with water. Markandeya is swept this way and that, until he comes to an enormous banyan tree with an infant sitting in it. Markandeya is drawn to the child and sees that the entire universe is inside this infant boy. He wanders inside the child for some time until he falls out of the child’s mouth; then he sees the infant and the banyan tree again. Markandeya realizes that the infant is Vishnu, but before he can reach him again, the child has disappeared.

Markandeya Purana
One of the eighteen traditional puranas, the sectarian compendia of mythic stories and sacred lore that are among the most important sources for modern Hinduism. Markandeya is said to have been an ancient sage, but he was not intimately connected with any particular deity. In this respect, the Markandeya Purana is different from most of the others, which have a clear sectarian bias. This purana is noted for one of its subsections, the Devimahatmya. Describing the ultimate power behind all things as female, the Devimahatmya is the earliest and most important textual source for the mythology of the Goddess. Scholars contend that although this text is the first place that this theological conviction appears, it must have existed earlier, since it appears in this text fully developed.

Marriage, Eight Classical Forms

Dharma literature (texts prescribing rules for correct human behavior and ideal social life) recognizes eight forms of marriage: Brahma, Daiva, Arsha, Prajapatiya, Asura, Gandharva, Rakshasa, and Paishacha. The first four forms were approved (prashasta). In each case, the father of the bride was responsible for arranging the marriage: in the Brahma form, he gave his daughter as a gift without conditions; in the Daiva form, she was given as a sacrificial fee; in the Arsha form, in exchange for a pair of cattle for sacrifice; and in the Prajapatiya form, with the condition that the husband and wife perform their duties together.

The other four forms were considered reprehensible forms of marriage (aprashasta). Two of these four were tolerated: the Asura form, in which the bride was exchanged for money, and the Gandharva form, in which bride and groom plighted their troth by mutual consent—that is, through consensual sexual intercourse. The final two forms were strictly forbidden: Rakshasa, in which the bride was forcibly abducted; and Paishacha, in which a man took sexual advantage of a woman who was insentient—the result of drunkenness, a deep sleep, or drugging. It is interesting to note that all of these forms were deemed to create a valid marriage—even the two that were forbidden. The aim in sanctioning such forbidden marriages was not to encourage such actions, but to give the woman the legal status of a wife. In contemporary times most of these forms of marriage are no longer practiced except for the Brahma marriage, which carries the highest status, and the Asura marriage. For further information see Pandurang Vaman Kane (trans.), A History of Dharmasastra, 1968; and Raj Bali Pandey, Hindu Samskaras, 1969. Despite their age, they remain the best sources for traditional Hindu religious rites.

Marriage Ceremonies

In India, virtually everybody gets married. Marriage is a religious duty for twice-born men, satisfying one of their Three Debts, in this case the debt to their ancestors. Twice-born men are householders born into one of the three “twice-born” groups in Indian society, brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya. Such men are eligible to receive the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” For most Hindu women, being wives and mothers defines their identity. Marriage is also the event by which families are formed and grow. Since the family is considered the bedrock of Hindu society, for most people, marriage is the single most important event in their lives.

The great significance of marriage in Hindu culture means that this life-changing event is attended with potential peril because there is no certainty of success. Other potential dangers come from the inauspicious nature of certain times, people, and the belief that this inauspiciousness may bring bad fortune for the future. Finally, given that the bride and groom are the center of attention in the days before the marriage, there is the danger that other people’s ill will and envy may unleash malevolent and unseen forces. As with many of the other life transitions, Hindu marriages are attended with considerable attention to discerning the unseen forces that could have a negative affect on the couple’s future life and protecting the bride and groom from them. The wedding is always performed at an astrologically auspicious time, to start the marriage on the best possible note. In the days before the wedding, the bride is often secluded, keeping her from coming in contact with people or things deemed inauspicious. On their wedding day both the bride and groom are anointed and adorned similar to the deities in a temple—according to popular belief, on their wedding day, the couple become Lakshmi and Vishnu, god and goddess. This heightened status puts them in ritual danger when they are outside in the world, both from the legion of sources for ritual impurity (ashaucha), and because they are believed to be more susceptible to the evil eye (nazar) and other forms of witchcraft. These dangers are countered by amulets and various rites of protection when the bride or groom must be in the public eye, such as when the groom and his group of friends travel in triumphal procession to the wedding hall, as is common in northern India. Once inside, the danger is less pressing, since they are in a closed and ritually structured environment, surrounded by family and friends.

There is no single Hindu marriage ceremony, as is clear from the eight classical forms of marriage recognized in the dharma literature. Of these eight, the two forms generally practiced today are the Asura form, in which the groom’s family gives money as a brideprice to obtain the bride; and the Brahma form, in which the bride’s family gives their daughter to the groom, without making any conditions on him at all (although in contemporary times the groom’s family can usually expect a dowry with the bride). The Brahma marriage carries much higher social status and is the most popular form. Although in such a marriage the wedding ceremonies have regional and sectarian variation, certain common rites reveal important cultural assumptions.

The two major themes in a Hindu marriage are the transfer of the bride from her family to her husband’s family, and the indissoluble merging of bride and groom into a new entity, the married couple. The transfer of the bride is done in the kanyadan ritual, the “gift of the virgin” performed by the bride’s father. The bride and groom’s marital union is symbolized by several common rites, including pani-grahana, in which the groom takes the bride’s hand as a sign of their union. Another such rite, considered the defining point of the marriage, is the saptapadi, the “seven steps” which the bride and groom take together. The seventh step completes the bride’s transfer to the groom’s family; it is at this point that the marriage becomes indissoluble. In modern times the saptapadi is often performed in conjunction with another ceremony, the agnipradakshepanam (“circumambulating the fire”). Instead of taking seven steps, the bride and groom make seven revolutions around a small fire. On one hand, the presence of fire shows that marriage is a yajna or Vedic sacrifice. On the other, since the fire is considered to be the Vedic god Agni, he becomes the divine witness to the marriage. During the circumambulations the bride and groom are often physically joined by tying part of his turban to the edge of her sari. This visible bond between them is yet another sign of the inner union that has just been formed.

As described, in marriage the wife’s identity is “assimilated” to her husband’s, rather than some sort of mutual transformation. In northern India, the bride lives with her husband’s family after the marriage; her new identity stems solely from her relationship with her husband, whereas his identity remains essentially unchanged, although augmented by marriage. Marriage Prohibitions

As in other cultures, Hindus have well-defined rules and prohibitions regarding whom one should and should not marry—marriages should be endogamous, that is, between members of the same social subgroup (in this case, the jati). Within this larger community, it is generally accepted that the bride and groom should not come from the same gotra or the same pravara—both mythic lineages detailing relationships with ancient sages. The other strong prohibition was on marrying those with whom one had a sapinda relationship—common ancestry. According to one well-known code of law, the Mitakshara, the sapinda relationship ceases after the seventh generation on the father's side, and the fifth generation on the mother's. People with common ancestors beyond those boundaries may contract a valid marriage.

This sapinda formula was routinely ignored, particularly in parts of southern India, where marrying one's maternal uncle's daughter was not only permitted, but considered commendable. While some of the texts in the dharma literature condemn the practice as an abomination, others note that this is a practice peculiar to the south, where it is permitted only as part of the family's customary practice (kulachara).

There is a long history for cross-cousin marriage in southern India; it is a common practice even today. Among southern Indian brahmins, there is some speculation that their relatively small population—about four percent of the total—made it impossible to find brahmin spouses under the strict criteria. Given the competing imperatives to marry other brahmins and to observe the lineage restrictions, this custom was deemed less important.

Mars

In Hindu astrology (jyotisha), a planet associated with activity, war, and misfortune. Due to these associations, Mars is considered a strong yet malignant planetary force. Tuesday, the day of the week ruled by Mars, is considered an inauspicious day, a day on which people often perform rites of protection to safeguard themselves from Mars's baleful influence.

Marshall, Sir John

Director General of the Archeological Survey of India (ASI) from 1901 until his retirement in 1931. During his tenure as director, Marshall discovered then excavated the cities of the Indus Valley civilization, for which he received his British knighthood. He also carried on the work of his predecessors at the ASI, particularly Sir Alexander Cunningham, documenting and cataloging India's archeological artifacts.

Martand

Village in the state of Jammu and Kashmir about forty miles southeast of Shrinagar, the capital. Martand is noted as an architectural history site, best known for its temple to the sun god, built during the eighth century. The temple ruins are in a mountain meadow, offering spectacular views of the surrounding mountains.

Marut

Class of minor deities considered to be the companions of Indra, god of the storm. The Maruts are described as having a flashing color, armed with golden weapons symbolic of lightning, and roaring like lions.

Marwari

Northern Indian trading community named after its place of origin, the Marwar region surrounding Jodhpur in Rajasthan. The Marwaris have spread all over northern India; many of them have become extremely wealthy. The Marwaris are stereotyped as ruthless and cutthroat in their business practices, yet at the same time, they are munificent in donations to religious causes, reflecting traditional religious piety. The most successful Marwari families, such as the Birlas, still control large parts of the Indian economy. Marwari support and patronage is an important consideration for all northern Indian political parties.

Masi

Eleventh month in the Tamil year, corresponding to the northern Indian month of Kumbha (the zodiacal sign of Aquarius), usually falling within February and March. The existence of several different calendars is a sign of the continuing importance of regional cultural patterns. One way that the Tamils retain their culture is by preserving their traditional calendar. Tamil is one of the few regional languages in India with an ancient, well-established literary tradition. See also Tamil months, Tamil Nadu, and Tamil language.

Materialist

The name for a philosophical school espousing the belief that the individual and the physical body are identical. The body is composed of certain physical elements, so with the death of the body, the individual ceases to exist. Since the materialists believed there is no life after death, they also believed there is no reason to engage in religious activities in the hope of a better afterlife. The materialist believes that one should live well, enjoy life to the fullest, and then die. This viewpoint was first espoused by Ajita Keshakambalin, who was a contemporary of the Buddha. Its later adherents were called both Lokayata (“worldly”) and Charvaka (after the supposed founder). The materialists were universally reviled by the other philosophical schools, all of whom considered their rejection of religious life dangerous. One of their philosophical theories, and a sign of their rootedness in concrete experience, was their position on the pramanas, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge. Most schools admitted at least three such pramanas—perception (pratyaksha), inference (anumana), and authoritative testimony (shabda). In contrast, the materialists accepted only perception, denying the validity of the other two. Emphasis is placed on experience and the belief that what is directly before one’s eyes is indisputable.

Math

(often translated as “monastery”) A dwelling place for ascetics; usually a large, well-settled dwelling for a number of ascetics belonging to an established order. The four most famous maths are believed to have been established by the philosopher Shankaracharya: the Jyotir Math in the Himalayan town of Joshimath; the Govardhan Math in the city of Puri, on the Bay of Bengal; the...
Sharada Math in the city of Dwaraka on the Arabian Sea; and the Shringeri Math in the town of Shringeri in southern India. These maths are the headquarters for the four major groups in the Dashanami sect Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. Although most maths do not have the status of these four, they all serve as ascetic and religious centers.

Mathura
City and sacred site (tirtha) in the Braj region of the state of Uttar Pradesh, about ninety miles south of Delhi. Mathura is known as the town in which the god Krishna was born. The Krishna Janam Bhumi, purportedly the site of his birth, can still be seen today. Krishna was spirited out of Mathura on that same night because his wicked uncle Kansa, who was king of Mathura, had killed all of Krishna's older siblings at birth. When Krishna came of age he returned to Mathura, killed Kansa, and claimed his patrimony. As with sites in the Braj region, Mathura is full of associations with Krishna's earthly life; these allow his devotees (bhakta) access to him, in that they can visualize the places he visited, and thus through imagination take part in his mythic deeds themselves.

Mathurakavi
(10th c.) The last of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their emphasis on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. According to tradition, Mathurakavi was the disciple of Nammalvar, to whom he was led from northern India by a great light in the southern sky. By asking a question about the supreme spirit, Mathurakavi was able to rouse Nammalvar from a yogic trance in which the latter had spent much of his life. From that point Mathurakavi served Nammalvar as his guru. Whereas the other Alvars were quite prolific, Mathurakavi wrote only ten songs, all in praise of his master. For further information see Kamil Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975; John Stirling Morley Hooper, Hymns of the Alvars, 1929; and A. K. Ramanujan (trans.), Hymns for the Drowning, 1981.

Matrilinear Succession
(Marumakkatayam) Most of Hindu society is overwhelmingly patrilineal (organized around the father's familial line). However, the Nayars of the state of Kerala in southern India base society on matrilineal succession (the mother's familial line). Matrilineal succession was practiced from very early times, although it had largely disappeared by the middle of the twentieth century. Under a matrilineal system, both descent and inheritance are passed on through the mother's line, which is center of the family. The woman's husband lives in her family home, but has no claim upon their children, and no claim on any of their marital property. A man has a certain amount of control over his own family's ancestral property—which he is often called to manage—but the property ultimately is inherited by his sister's children, rather than his own. In many cases the woman's "official" husband never actually consummates the marriage, and the woman is free to form long-term liaisons with other men, according to her choice.

Matsya
("fish") In the secret ritually-based religious practice known as tantra, fish is the second of the "Five Forbidden Things" (panchamakara), which, in "left hand" (vamachara) tantric ritual, are used in their actual forms, but are... represented by symbolic substitutes in “right hand” (dakshinachara) tantric ritual. “Respectable” Hindu society strongly condemns the consumption of nonvegetarian food, so this ritual use must be seen in the larger tantric context. One of the underlying tantric assumptions is the ultimate unity of everything that exists. From a tantric perspective, to affirm that the entire universe is one principle means that the adept must reject all concepts based on dualistic thinking. The “Five Forbidden Things” provide a ritual means for breaking down duality. In this ritual the adept breaks societal norms forbidding consumption of intoxicants, nonvegetarian food, and illicit sexuality in a conscious effort to sacralize what is normally forbidden. Tantric adepts cite such ritual use of forbidden things as proof that their practice involves a more exclusive qualification (adhikara), and is thus superior to common practice. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1977; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Matsya Avatar

The first of the ten avatars or incarnations of the god Vishnu, which all took place at moments of crisis in the cosmos. See Fish avatar.

Matsyagandhi

(“[she whose] smell is fish”) In Hindu mythology, another name for queen Satyavati. Matsyagandhi is a fisher-girl who stinks of fish. She attracts the eye of a powerful sage, who later uses his magic powers to give her a pleasant scent. See Satyavati.

Matsyendranath

According to tradition, the guru of the sage Gorakhnath and the founder of the Nathpanthis, a group of renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. He is also known as Minanath. According to the Nathpanthi tradition, Matsyendranath received his teaching from Shiva himself, by taking the form of a fish (in Sanskrit, the words matsya and mina both mean “fish”), and eavesdropping while Shiva was teaching his wife Parvati. For further information about Gorakhnath and the Nath tradition, see George Weston Briggs, Gorakhnath and the Kanphata Yogis, 1973. See also tantra.

Matter, Primeval

The general translation given to the Sanskrit word prakrti, one of the two first principles in the Samkhya philosophical school. See prakrti.

Mauni

Derived from the word muni (“sage”), mauni designates a person who is observing a vow of silence as a religious act. Just as members of certain Christian monastic orders observe a vow of silence to turn their thoughts inward and enrich their inner lives, in the same way Hindu ascetics have taken vows of silence as a tool for spiritual development. At times these vows may be for a finite period of time (a week, a month, and so on), but even now there are ascetics who have not spoken in decades, communicating through expression, gesture, and writing on a piece of paper or a slate.

Mauni Amavasya

This festival falls on the day of the new moon (amavasya) in the lunar month of Magh (January–February). Those observing this holiday pass the day in silence. The word mauni (speechless) is derived from the word muni (sage); silence is seen as one of the religious practices helping to promote spiritual awareness. During the entire month of Magh, bathing (snana) in the Ganges (or another sacred river) is seen as meritorious. Bathing on the day of the new moon offers greater sanctity. A well-known spot for this rite is at the city of Allahabad, at the confluence of the Ganges and the Yamuna Rivers.

Mauritius
Island nation in the Indian Ocean, 1,200 miles east of the African coast. Mauritius has a significant Hindu diaspora population. As in many other cases, Indians were first brought to Mauritius as indentured agricultural laborers, in this case as workers on the sugar plantations. Currently, they comprise nearly 75 percent of the island's population, running the nation's political system. The Hindus on Mauritius have transferred India's sacred geography to their new land: A southern lake named Grand Bassin is claimed to have an underground connection to the River Ganges, and the lake has become a significant pilgrimage site.

Maurya Dynasty
The earliest of the great Indian empires. At its zenith, the Maurya dynasty ruled over most of the Indian subcontinent, except in the deep south. The dynasty was founded by Chandragupta Maurya in the fourth century B.C.E., but reached its peak under his grandson Ashoka, who reigned from 269–232 B.C.E. The kingdom was centered in the lower Ganges basin, with its capital at Pataliputra, near the modern city of Patna in the state of Bihar. The Mauryan empire is the first historically documented centralized Indian empire; it was operated and maintained by a large governmental bureaucracy. Despite its size and organization, the empire was short-lived. It began to disintegrate on Ashoka's death; fifty years later it had virtually disappeared.

Maya Devi
Local goddess considered to be a form of Durga, whose home is in the northern Indian town and sacred city of Haridwar. According to local tradition, the site where her temple is built is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the Goddess which spreads throughout the subcontinent. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess; Maya Devi was Sati's navel. Although this claim is not attested in other literature on the Shakti Pithas, the site itself is believed to be very old. One of the oldest names for the Haridwar region is Mayapur, the “city of Maya.” See also pitha.

Mayapur
City in West Bengal on the western side of the Hugli River across from the holy city of Navadvi, about sixty-five miles north of Calcutta. Although both cities claim to be the birthplace of the Bengali saint Chaitanya, Navadvi’s claim is older. However, the claim that Mayapur was the birthplace of Chaitanya is supported by the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), more popularly known as the Hare Krishnas, who have built a magnificent temple complex at Mayapur as the headquarters of the organization. For extensive information about this site, see E. Alan Morinis, Pilgrimage in the Hindu Tradition, 1984.

Mayashiva
(“illusionary Shiva”) In Hindu mythology, a demon named Jalandhara assumes the form of the god Shiva in an attempt to trick Parvati, the goddess, into having sexual relations with him. Jalandhara has been unable to conquer Shiva on the battlefield, so he hopes that he can diminish Shiva’s power by compromising the faithfulness of his wife. Jalandhara comes to Parvati in Shiva’s form, but she is so suspicious that Jalandhara is unable to fulfill his desires. Jalandhara’s power is eventually broken in the same way, when Vishnu (in the form of Jalandhara) manages to seduce Jalandhara’s wife, Vrnda.

Meat Eating
An accepted part of the diet for most Hindus. A 1996 poll of urban Hindus found that only a quarter of the respondents were vegetarians. However, this figure may be higher in villages, where people tend to be more traditional and conservative. As the product of a dead animal, meat is seen as impure, and those who are concerned about religious purity (particularly brahmins) will generally avoid it for that reason. Even nonvegetarians recognize a hierarchy of animal foods. Some people will eat only eggs; others will also eat chicken and/or fish, whereas others will also eat mutton. Pork is generally avoided by all but the lowest-status people; pigs are considered scavengers and deemed unclean. Beef is taboo for religious reasons, except for a very small Hindu community in southern India. Even those who eat meat generally do not eat it in large quantities. Because of its relatively high cost, it is generally prepared as one dish among many, rather than the central part of the meal.

Medhatithi
(mid-9th c.) Author of the most authoritative commentary on the Manu Smrti, also known as the “Laws of Manu.” Medhatithi was schooled in the techniques of textual interpretation developed by the Purva Mimamsa school, one of the six schools of Hindu philosophy. Due to his interpretive abilities, his commentary quickly became the accepted standard.

Medicine
See ayurveda, Charaka Samhita, and Sushruta Samhita.

Megasthenes
(3rd c. B.C.E.) Ambassador sent to the court of Chandragupta Maurya by Seleucus Nicator, a general in Alexander the Great’s army who ruled the eastern part of the empire after Alexander’s death. Megasthenes lived for many years in the Mauryan capital, Pataliputra. His reports of life there are the first European accounts of India. His original account no longer exists, but the fact of its existence is attested to by the many references to it in the works of later Greek writers; these writers, however, often voice doubts about his credibility and veracity. See also Maurya dynasty.

Meghaduta
(“Cloud-Messenger”) One of the great poetic works by Kalidasa (5th c.?), generally considered to be the greatest classical Sanskrit poet. The Meghaduta is a short poem consisting of one hundred verses, written entirely in an extremely long meter called mandakranta—seventeen syllables to each quarter verse. The poem tells the story of a yaksha (nature sprite) who has been temporarily banished to the southern part of India. Separated from his beloved wife, who is at their home in the kingdom of Kubera in the Himalayas, the yaksha sees a monsoon rain cloud moving northward in its annual journey. He implores it to carry a message of love to his beloved. The yaksha describes the regions through which the cloud travels. This description gives a vivid picture of everyday life and the cultural centers of Kalidasa’s time. In some sources the poem is called Meghasandesha, “The Message (carried by) a Cloud.”

Meghanada
(“roaring like thunder”) In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Meghanada is one of the epithets of Indrajit, son of the demon-king Ravana. See Indrajit.

Meher Baba
(b. Merwan Sheriar Irani, 1894–1969) Modern religious figure who was born a Parsi, but whose teachings draw on Islamic mystical thought and Hindu devotional (bhakti) teachings. Meher Baba (“Divine Father”) claimed to be an avatar or “incarnation” of the divine, and his followers accept him as such. In 1925 he took a vow of silence, which he kept for the rest of his life, communicating through gestures and an alphabet board. Despite his silence, he compiled his teachings in a five-volume set of discourses titled God Speaks. Like many contemporary Hindu missionary figures, Meher Baba emphasized the need for devotion to one’s guru or religious preceptor, through which the disciple would gain all things. For further information from a devotee’s (bhakta) perspective, see Jean Adriel, Avatar, 1947.

Mehndipur
Village in the state of Rajasthan in the southern region between the cities of Agra and Jaipur. The village is best known for the temple to the god Balaji, considered to be a form of the monkey-god Hanuman. People possessed by malevolent spirits come to Balaji to be cured through his power. For a thorough discussion of the language of possession and exorcism, see Sudhir Kakar, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1991

Mela
(“meeting”) In the widest sense, the word mela can refer to any type of large gathering, usually for some specific purpose. In a religious context, the word mela is generally translated as “festival” or fair. Melas include commercial interests, religious activity, and entertainment. Melas are usually attended by vast numbers of religious pilgrims, traveling to the site of the festival. By far the largest of these melas is the Kumbha

Pilgrims in Allahabad gather in a mela tent to listen to a guru.
Mela at Allahabad. In 1989, the Kumbha Mela drew 15 million people on a single day, and millions more during the month of the festival.

Mena
In Hindu mythology, the wife of the minor deity Himalaya, and the mother of Parvati, the goddess. Mena christens her daughter, Uma, through her exclamation “U Ma!” (“Oh, don't!”) when Parvati announces her desire to make the god Shiva her husband. The Shiva Purana details Mena's initial discomfort with her unconventional son-in-law, yet later suggests Shiva as the paradigm for the ideal husband, since he is completely devoted to his wife.

Menaka
In Hindu mythology, a beautiful celestial maiden (apsara), who is a minion of Indra, the king of the gods. Menaka's primary function is to seduce sages threatening to replace Indra as the ruler of heaven. In traditional Indian culture, semen is seen as the concentrated essence of a man's vital energies; celibacy is a means to conserve and retain these energies. Menaka's powers of attraction are used to seduce these ascetics, diminishing their accumulated spiritual powers. Her most notable partner is the sage Vishvamitra, who is twice smitten by her charms. Their first liaison results in the birth of the maiden Shakuntala, celebrated in the drama Abhijnanashakuntala, written by the poet Kalidasa. During their second liaison, Vishvamitra lives with Menaka for ten years, before leaving her for renunciant life in the forest.

Menstruation
In traditional Hindu culture all bodily discharges are considered to be a source of ritual impurity (ashaucha). Women are considered ritually unclean during their menstrual periods; menstrual fluid is considered a source of impurity. However, menstruation is also considered a sign of auspiciousness or good fortune, since it indicates women's reproductive capacities. The ritual observances and taboos for menstruating women vary widely between differing social groups. In some groups, women are subject to only a few restrictions, such as a ban on entering temples during that time. In other groups, women are expected to confine themselves to certain parts of the house and to refrain from everyday activities such as cooking. Although such strict practice sounds oppressive, for many women this interval was prized as a monthly respite from their everyday duties, which would be performed by the other women in the household.

Mercury
In Hindu astrology (jyotisha), a planet associated with mental quickness, memory, and education, based on its short orbit around the sun. Despite these generally positive features, Mercury is considered a weak planet, easily influenced toward benevolence and malevolence by other planets, or by its position in the natal horoscope (janampatrika). Mercury's association with the mind suggests that the mind's powers can be harnessed for either good or evil ends. During the week, Mercury is said to rule over Wednesday; this day is not heavily marked as auspicious or inauspicious, reflecting the planet's light powers.

Mercury
(2) Elemental mercury is a pivotal substance in Indian alchemy. Hindu alchemy analyzes the world as a series of bipolar opposites in tension with one another. Unifying these opposing forces brings spiritual progress and end of reincarnation (samsara). This model of uniting or transcending opposing forces is shared with Hindu tantra, a secret, ritually-based religious practice. This theme is shared with hatha yoga, which is based on a series of physical exercises that are also believed to affect the subtle body. The governing metaphor for this combination of opposites is the union of sun and moon. Both the sun and the moon are connected to other opposing principles through an elaborate series of associations. In keeping with this bipolar symbolism, mercury is conceived as the semen of the god Shiva and thus full of healing power. It is also identified with the moon (perhaps through its bright silvery hue), with healing and restorative power, and with the nectar of immortality. Elemental sulfur is identified with the goddess Shakti's uterine blood. When mercury and sulfur are mixed and consumed, the aspirant's body is purified and refined, eventually rendering it immortal. Modern descriptions of this practice warn that it should only be carried out under the direction of one's guru (spiritual teacher); otherwise these combinations will be harmful, since by itself mercury is a deadly poison. For further information see Shashibhushan B. Dasgupta, Obscure Religious Cults, 1962; and David Gordon White, The Alchemical Body, 1996.

Meru
Mythical mountain in the center of the continent of Jambudvipa, the innermost of the concentric landmasses that make up the visible world in traditional Hindu cosmology; Mount Meru is the center of the entire world, the pivot of the entire created order. It is said to extend far up into the heavens and have its roots far beneath the earth, and on its crest is a divine city which is the home of the gods. The mythical Meru is often identified with the Himalayan mountain known as Kailas. For this reason Kailas has been an important pilgrimage place (tirtha), despite its inaccessible location.

Meter, Poetic
Indian poetry has well-developed metrical forms, basically following two dominant patterns. The first metric pattern is based simply on the number of syllables in a line. In the second pattern, each line contains a certain number of metric beats, based on the distinction between “heavy” and “light” syllables. A heavy syllable is any syllable with a long vowel or a consonant cluster and is given two metric beats; all other syllables are considered light and counted as one beat.

Sanskrit poetry tends to stress the former pattern, and has codified meters ranging from four to twenty-six syllables per half-line, yet even within these syllabic constraints each meter usually has a prescribed sequence of light and heavy syllables as well. Two different Sanskrit poetic meters may thus have the same number of syllables, but vary in their syllabic patterns. Although such subtle differences could generate vast numbers of meters, in practice there were only about a hundred. The vast majority of Sanskrit texts are written in a single meter, the anushtubh, which has eight syllables per half-line.

Later devotional (bhakti) poetry, particularly in northern India, tend to favor poetic forms based on the number of metric beats. The most popular forms are the doha, which has twenty-four metric beats in two lines, and the chauhpai, which has four lines of sixteen beats each. Although there are several poetic forms based on the number of syllables in each line, particularly the savaiya and the kavitt, these were used less often.

Mewar
In the time before Indian independence in 1947, Mewar was a princely state in southern Rajasthan, the capital of which was in the city of Udaipur. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Mewar was one of the important centers for the Rajasthani style of miniature painting. The Rajasthani style is characterized by a flat perspective. Visual power is derived from vivid bands of colors that often serve as a backdrop to the painting.
Mimamsa Sutras
The founding text of the Purva Mimamsa school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy. The Mimamsa Sutras are traditionally attributed to the sage Jaimini, who is believed to have lived in the fourth century B.C.E. The Mimamsa school was most concerned with the investigation of dharma ("righteous action"), believed to be revealed in the Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious texts. Much of Mimamsa thought is concerned with principles and methods for textual interpretation, to discover and interpret the instructions contained in the Vedas. The Mimamsa Sutras were elaborated in numerous commentaries, the most famous of which were written by Kumarila and Prabhakara in the seventh century. For further information and text, see Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Minakshi
("fish-eyed") Presiding deity of the Minakshi temple in the city of Madurai in the state of Tamil Nadu. Her name refers both to the shape of her eyes (long and oval), and to their fluttering movement, both of which are considered marks of feminine beauty in classical India. Minakshi was originally a local deity, the guardian for the city of Madurai. As Madurai became important, by virtue of being the Pandya dynasty capital, so did Minakshi. According to her charter myth, Minakshi is born with three breasts—already a sign that she is unusual—and is raised by her parents as a man. As she accedes to the throne in Madurai, she vows that she will only marry a man who can defeat her in battle. She fights and conquers all the kings of the earth, but when she approaches the god Shiva, she is suddenly stricken with modesty and transformed from a powerful warrior to a shy and bashful girl. At this moment her third breast disappears, further signifying the loss of her special status. Minakshi and Shiva (in his manifestation as Sundareshvara) are married. Their wedding is celebrated every year in Madurai during the Chittirai festival.

Despite her transformation in the charter myth, Minakshi is still an unusual goddess. The wedding of a goddess usually marks her domestication and implies subordination to her husband. Minakshi, however, remains the more important deity in Madurai, perhaps reflecting her previous status as the city’s guardian deity. For more information see Dean David Shulman, Tamil Temple Myths, 1980.

Minanath
Another epithet for Matsyendranath, traditionally cited as the spiritual teacher (guru) of Gorakhnath, the great yogi. See Matsyendranath.
Miniature Painting

The origins of Hindu miniature painting lie in the royal art of the Moghul court, where miniature painting and portraiture were well-established genres. In the seventeenth century other centers for miniature painting began to arise, perhaps spurred by Moghul artists seeking patronage in Hindu vassal kingdoms. Although portraiture and court scenes continued to be important, the miniature genre expanded to include other themes such as the illustration of the musical modes known as ragas, which are associated with particular times and/or seasons. Another prominent theme was Hindu religious imagery, reflecting the influence of the devotional (bhakti) movement, which was in full flower in northern India. Religious themes first concentrated mainly on the mythic exploits of the god Krishna and portrayals of the god Shiva. At times, these two major themes were combined. Miniature paintings were also used to illustrate manuscripts, thus integrating literature, art, music, and religious images.

The development of Hindu miniature painting can be broadly divided into three schools, each corresponding to a geographical area: Rajasthani, Deccani, and Pahari. The earliest developed school was the Rajasthani, which flourished in seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in the Malwa region of the state of Madhya Pradesh and the small kingdoms that surrounded the region. The Rajasthani style is characterized by a flat perspective; visual power is derived from vivid bands of colors that often serve as a backdrop to the painting. The Deccani style was established in central India and showed little variation from Moghul court art. The Pahari (“mountain”) style flourished in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries in the small kingdoms in the Shiwalik Hills north and west of Delhi. The Pahari style first appeared in Basohli, where the influence of the Rajasthani school is evident, and later developed in Jammu, Guler, Garhwal, and Kangra. The developed Pahari style differs from the Rajasthani style in its emphasis on more linear drawing—perhaps influenced by European art—and a more restrained use of color, giving the paintings a more lyrical feel. For further information see W. G. Archer, Indian Painting, 1957. See also Moghul dynasty.

Minorities

In any society, minority groups are defined according to a particular social context. In India the two most prominent minority groups are Muslims and Christians. Muslims—about twelve percent of the population—are viewed with suspicion, due to India’s troubled relations with Pakistan. Christians and Muslims are viewed as having religious loyalties that lie outside of India—Mecca for Muslims, and Rome or Jerusalem for Christians. These two communities have been perceived very differently from other religious communities, such as the Sikhs and the Jains, who are part of the Indian cultural tradition. Cultural and political organizations espousing forms of Hindu nationalism (Hindutva), particularly the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh and its affiliates, have often stressed the “otherness” of these communities. Such organizations have as their express purpose the unification of Hindus from all regions, castes, and backgrounds, but do so through criteria that exclude these minorities.

Mirabai

(early 16th c.?) A poet-saint who was a devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna. Although little is known about her, Mirabai’s songs remain some of the best-known devotional (bhakti) poetry. According to tradition, Mirabai was born into a royal family in a small kingdom in Rajasthan. From her earliest days, she was passionately devoted to Krishna. Although her parents arranged a marriage with the scion of another ruler, she considered Krishna to be her true husband. After extended conflict with her in-laws—in which they reportedly attempted to poison her—her release came with the death of her husband, after which she was allowed to leave her marital home. She spent her later years visiting places associated with Krishna and sharing in the “good company” (satsang) of other devotees. She went to Dwaraka, the city over which Krishna is said to have ruled, and met her end by being absorbed into the image of Krishna at his temple there.

Mirabai’s poetry is marked by her expressions of longing for Krishna. She often speaks of herself either as his wife or his waiting lover, seeking physical and mystical union with him. Her poetry is an intensely personal expression of her religious fervor; the power of this longing has made her a symbol of religious devotion. For scholars, Mirabai’s poetry raises perplexing questions of authorship, for the earliest manuscripts are several hundred years older than when she is supposed to have lived, and met her end by being absorbed into the image of Krishna at his temple there.

Mitakshara
A voluminous commentary on the Yajnavalkya Smrti, written early in the twelfth century by the scholar Vijnaneshvara. This particular commentary played a pivotal role in the British colonial administration of India. The British were content to have their Indian subjects governed by their traditional religious laws, but to do so they needed to know what these laws were. For large sections of British India, the Mitakshara was given the status of traditional law, functioning as a legal code.

The only major part of India in which the Mitakshara did not hold sway was in Bengal, where the legal authority was the Dayabhaga. One of the major differences between the two was in matters of inheritance. The Mitakshara stresses inheritance by survivorship, in which only living males can inherit property, whereas the Dayabhaga stresses inheritance by succession, in which a dead man’s heirs can inherit in his name.

Mithila
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Mithila is the kingdom ruled by King Janaka, foster father of Sita, the goddess. The region is known for its wealth, as well as for the righteousness of its rulers; it is identified with the Mithila region in the northern part of the state of modern Bihar.

Mithuna
(“pair”) In architecture, the name for what has been described as a “loving couple.” A more candid characterization is that of sculptures of men and women engaged in sexual activity, either as a pair or a larger group, with the occasional animal thrown in for variety. The most famous examples of such sculptures are at the temples at Konarak in the state of Orissa, and at Khajuraho in the state of Madhya Pradesh. The meaning behind such explicit sculptures has been variously interpreted. Some people claim that they sanction carnal pleasure as a religious path, some interpret them as representing human union with the divine, and still others view them as teaching that the desire for pleasure must ultimately be transcended to attain the divine. Any of these may be true, or the sculptures may simply reflect an affirmation of life on all its levels.

Mitra Mishra
(early 17th c.) Author of the Viramitrodaya, a compendium of Hindu lore. The Viramitrodaya is an example of a class of commentarial literature known as nibandhas ("collections"). The compilers of the nibandhas culled references on a particular theme from the Vedas, dharma literature, puranas, and other authoritative religious texts, placing these excerpts into a single volume. Each of the Viramitrodaya's twenty-two sections is devoted to a particular aspect of Hindu life, such as daily practice, worship, gift-giving (dana), vows, pilgrimage, penances (prayashchitta), purification, death rites (antyeshthi samskara), and law; the final section is devoted to final liberation of the soul (moksha). In addition to citing the relevant scriptural passages, Mitra Mishra also provides extensive commentary of his own. His work became an important source for later legal interpretation, particularly in eastern India.

Mleccha

Sanskrit word traditionally used to designate a foreigner or a non-Aryan. The word mleccha is also used to indicate a person who has become an outcaste and thus has no place in established society. The verb from which the word mleccha is derived means "to speak confusedly or indistinctly," indicating someone who has not yet mastered the language.

Mnemonics

The best-known example of a mnemonic system comes in the study of the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. Traditionally, the power of the Vedas is not derived from the meaning of the words, but in the very sounds themselves. It was imperative for the text to be conveyed without error. This posed a significant challenge. The Vedas have been orally transmitted by an elaborate system of learning strategies, keeping the text unchanged for over three thousand years, identical in all parts of India. This remarkable feat was achieved by memorizing the text in differing patterns: as verses, as the individual words, as pairs of words in sequential succession (ab, bc, cd, and so forth), and according to some reports, backwards. The ultimate aim of all of these patterns was to render the text into sheer sound, rather than phrases with definite syntactic meaning, since the latter could be subject to substitutions. Although this effort has succeeded in preserving the sacred sounds, in many cases the meanings of these words have become unclear, especially for words which appear only once. This problem was evident as early as the fifth century B.C.E., when Yaska, the grammarian, wrote the Nirukta, explaining the meaning of many of these words.

Modes of Devotion

Devotion to God (bhakti) has been the most important force in Hindu religion for more than the past millennium. However, the form and tone of this devotion have varied considerably in different times and places. The most thorough articulation of different possible modes of devotion was done by Rupa Goswami, who lived in the mid-sixteenth century. Rupa was a devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna and a member of the Gaudiya Vaishnava religious community founded by the Bengali saint Chaitanya. Devotion to Krishna is characterized by the emphasis on relationship, particularly the visualization of mythic incidents from Krishna's life, through which one can enter his divine world, and thus take part in his divine "play" (lila) with the world.

Rupa distinguished five such modes, which were characterized by growing emotional intensity. The first was the "peaceful mode" (shanta bhava), in which the devotee found mental peace through the realization of complete identity with Brahman. This was seen as an inferior mode, since the deity was seen impersonally, and the devotee had no personal relationship with God. The other four modes were based on human relationships, from the most distant to the most intimate and loving: master and servant (dasa bhava), friend and friend (sakha bhava), parent and child (vatsalya bhava), and lover and beloved (madhurya bhava). Although all of these modes were legitimate forms of relationship with the divine, the last was considered the highest because it generated the most intense emotions.

Moghul Dynasty
(1525–1857) Muslim dynasty that ruled large parts of India for almost 200 years. The dynasty was established by Babar (r. 1625–1630), a central Asian monarch who had been displaced from his own homeland in Afghanistan and defeated the Lodi dynasty rulers at Panipat in 1625. Babar's son Humayan (1508–1556) acceded to his father's throne but spent much of his life fighting an Afghan threat. He finally recovered his kingdom, but within six months died from injuries sustained in a fall. Humayan was succeeded by his son Akbar (1542–1605), considered the greatest of the Moghul emperors, both for his long reign of forty-nine years and for his efforts to include his Hindu subjects as equal citizens, not simply as conquered infidels. Akbar was succeeded by Jahangir (1569–1627), and Jahangir by Shah Jahan (1592–1666). The last of the great Moghuls was Aurangzeb (1618–1707), who added parts of the Deccan region to the Moghul empire. During Aurangzeb's reign, the Krishna Janam Bhumi in the city of Mathura and the Vishvanath temple in the city of Benares were destroyed. Such incidents have caused much speculation as to whether the destruction was the result of anti-Hindu religious sentiments (the Moghuls were Muslims) or an expression of Moghul political dominance. After Aurangzeb's death the Moghul empire broke apart, but the dynasty continued to wield diminishing influence until the 1857 rebellion against the British, when it was definitively removed.

Mohan
("beguiling," “bewildering”) Epithet of the god Krishna, which may refer either to his overwhelming attractiveness, which is believed to beguile the mind, or to his ability to wield maya or the power of illusion, and thus cloud people's minds. See Krishna.

Mohenjo-Daro
Archeological site on the Indus River in modern Pakistan, about two hundred miles north of Karachi. Mohenjo-Daro is one of the cities of the Indus Valley civilization, a highly developed urban culture that flourished in the Indus Valley region between the fourth and third millennia B.C.E. Harappa and Mohenjo-Daro have been the most extensively excavated of these cities, although archeological work is proceeding at others. Similarities at these different sites reveal insights into this civilization's material culture. One of the features at Mohenjo-Daro is the “Great Bath,” a large water-tank built of brick and sealed with pitch. Scholars speculate that it was connected with ritual purity. See also bath, Mohenjo-Daro.

Mohini
(“bewitching”) In Hindu mythology, a rapturously beautiful, divine enchantress, seen as a manifestation of the god Vishnu. Vishnu takes this form to trick the demons into giving her their share of the amrta, the nectar of immortality, which has been churned from the Ocean of Milk. Through her charms, Mohini succeeds in getting the amrta from the demons; she gives it to the gods, thus depriving the demons of their chance at immortality.

In most versions, the story ends here, but the charter myth for the southern Indian god Aiyappa adds an interesting twist. According to the story, when Shiva sees the enchanting figure of Mohini, he cannot resist her. The product of this union is Aiyappa, who is considered the son of Shiva and Vishnu. Yet Aiyappa's unusual parentage occurs with good reason, as with most such stories in Hindu mythology. Aiyappa is born to kill a demon named Mahishi, who has received the boon that she can only be killed by a person not born from the union of male and female. Mohini's “true” identity (Vishnu) satisfies this condition, and when Aiyappa comes of age he kills the demon. See also Tortoise avatar.

Mohini Attam
The youngest form of classical Indian dance, found mainly in the modern state of Kerala. Mohini Attam was developed in the early eighteenth century at the royal court in Travancore in Kerala. This style of dance shows traits of both Bharatanatyam and Kathakali, a Keralan dance form. The dance is named after the mythical enchantress Mohini and projects a coquettish sensuality. Some of the dance's physical poses are taken from Bharatanatyam, whereas the stylized hand gestures (mudras) come largely from Kathakali. For further information see Mohan Khokar, Traditions of Indian Classical Dance, 1984.

Mohini Ekadashi
Festival falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the bright, waxing half of the lunar month of Baisakh (April–May). The festival is dedicated to the worship of Vishnu in his avatar as Rama. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites usually involving fasting (upavasa) and worship, promising specific benefits for faithful performance; observing this festival frees one from the results of one's evil acts.

Moksha
In Indian philosophy moksha is one of the four purusharthas, or aims of life; the others are artha (wealth, power, and prosperity), kama (desire), and dharma (righteousness). Moksha literally means “release”—the human soul's (atman) final liberation from the cycle of reincarnation (samsara). The quest for liberation involves questioning and ultimately detaching oneself from pursuits of normal social life. Although all four purusharthas are legitimate and sanctioned, liberation is usually seen as the ultimate goal, the last goal to be pursued after fulfilling the pleasures and pains stemming from the other three. Moksha is also unchanging, bringing one complete and absolute freedom, whereas the other three are ultimately transient, for they are pursued within the ever-changing world of desires.

Mokshada Ekadashi
Festival falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the bright half of Margashirsha (November–December). As for all the eleventh-day observances, this is dedicated to Vishnu. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites usually involving fasting (upavasa) and worship, and often promising specific benefits for faithful performance. Faithfully observing this festival is believed to bestow final liberation (moksha) of the soul.

Moneylending
An important element in the economic activity of the traditional and modern Indian merchant families. Since farmers have profits only after the harvest, they must be able to borrow during the other times of the year. In modern times many farmers borrow from banks, but in earlier times their only resource was these merchant families. Their interest rates usually reflected the borrower’s credit worthiness: unsecured loans might have interest rates as high as 30 to 50 percent per year because there was a good chance for default, whereas the interest on loans secured by collateral might be as low as seven percent. To some extent, these moneylending merchants were economically bound to their farmer-creditors, with one providing the capital and the other providing the labor. Moneylenders could not refuse credit to farmers after a bad year, since this would have removed any hope of future repayment. For further information see Christopher Alan Bayly, Rulers, Townsmen and Bazaars, 1983.

Monsoon
A season of torrential rains, whose name comes from an Arabic word meaning “season” (mausam). The monsoon is preceded by a period of intense heat; daily temperatures go over one hundred degrees Fahrenheit. As the hot air rises, it draws in a vast current of moisture-laden air from the coastal regions of southern India. The monsoon is one of the year’s three major seasons and is a vital part of people’s daily lives. Because much of India’s farmland is not irrigated, the monsoon rains are vital to agriculture. The coming of the monsoon is much awaited in real life; it also has a prominent place in Indian culture. One image of the monsoon comes from love poetry, in which a woman is anxiously scanning the sky, watching the clouds roll up as she awaits her returning beloved. In earlier times the rains made travel almost impossible, making it a bitter time for separated lovers but a sweet and happy time for united couples. The poet Kalidasa's epic Meghaduta describes a man exiled in southern India, who addresses one of the monsoon clouds, giving it a message to convey to his beloved. The monsoon rains are also associated with the god Krishna. His dark skin color is compared to a rain cloud. Also, his birthday is celebrated at the end of the rainy season, and his divine persona appropriates the image of the lover associated with the rains.

Moon
In Hindu astrology (jyotisha), a planet associated with fecundity (fertility), although its aspect can be either benevolent or malevolent—benevolent with the waxing moon, and malevolent with the waning moon. During the lunar month, the full moon is considered the most auspicious time of all. The new moon, however, is considered a ritually ambiguous time, and thus potentially dangerous. During the week the moon presides over Monday, generally considered an auspicious day and one that is sacred to Shiva as Somnath, the Lord of the Moon.

Morari Bapu
(b. Muraridas Prabhudas 1946) Modern commentator and expositor (kathavyak) on the Ramcharitmanas. Written by the poet-saint Tulsidas, the Ramcharitmanas is a vernacular version of the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Sanskrit epics. As with all vernacular renditions of the Ramayana, Tulsidas did not simply translate Valmiki's Sanskrit epic, but adapted it to address his own religious concerns, particularly the importance of devotion (bhakti) to God, one of the text's central themes. Morari Bapu claims no supernatural powers or ability; his religious fame rests solely on his commitment to the text, and his power in expounding it. At times he speaks to audiences of more than 100,000 people, giving katha (discourse) to the Hindu diaspora populations in Europe and North America, as well as in India.

Mrchchakatika
(“The Little Clay Cart”) Drama written by the playwright Shudraka, probably in the early fifth century. The play describes the flowering of love between a poor but noble brahmin, Charudatta, and a wealthy and virtuous courtesan, Vasantasena, set in the context of a complicated political intrigue. The play is noted for its portrayal of everyday urban life, exemplified by the little clay cart—a child's toy. It has been translated into several languages and is periodically performed for modern American audiences.

Mrtyunjaya
(“Conqueror of Death”) Epithet of the god Shiva. The mythic charter behind this particular name comes from the story of the sage Markandeya. Devoted to Shiva, Markandeya is an intelligent and religious boy who is proficient in all branches of learning. His story is poignant because he is fated to die at sixteen. When Markandeya learns of this, shortly before his sixteenth birthday, he begins to worship Shiva with even greater fervor. On the appointed day, Yama, the god of death, comes to claim Markandeya. When Yama throws his noose over Markandeya to draw out the boy's soul, it catches the statue of Shiva to which Markandeya is clinging. Shiva arises from the image and kills Yama, saving Markandeya's life. Although Shiva relents and restores Yama to life, this particular form of Shiva illustrates his power to protect his devotees (bhakta) from all things, including death.

Mudra
(“seal”) In Indian dance, theater, and iconography, a mudra is a stylized hand gesture that conveys a specific meaning, ranging from concrete things such as... animals, everyday objects, and the Hindu deities, to abstract things such as emotions. In the context of the performing arts, particularly dance, performers tell detailed stories through gesture alone. In the context of iconography, many of these gestures are traits associated with particular deities. There is some syntactic overlap between the terms mudra and hasta ("hand"); one of the distinctions between them is that some of the hastas simply describe the position of the hand, and others have symbolic meaning, whereas mudras always have very specific symbolic meanings.

Mudra

(2) Fermented or parched grain. In the secret ritually-based religious practice known as tantra, fermented grain is the fourth of the "Five Forbidden Things" (panchamakara), which, in "left hand" (vamachara) tantric ritual, are used in their actual forms, whereas in "right hand" (dakshinachara) tantric ritual they are represented by symbolic substitutes. Fermented grain may have intoxicating effects, but it is also reputed to be an aphrodisiac. "Respectable" Hindu society strongly condemns the use of intoxicants and/or sexual license. Thus the ritual use of this substance must be seen in the larger tantric context. One of the most pervasive tantric assumptions is the ultimate unity of everything that exists. From a tantric perspective, to affirm that the entire universe is one principle means that the adept must reject all concepts based on dualistic thinking. The "Five Forbidden Things" provide a ritual means for breaking down duality. In this ritual the adept breaks societal norms forbidding consumption of intoxicants, nonvegetarian food, and illicit sexuality in a conscious effort to sacralize what is normally forbidden. Tantric adepts cite such ritual use of forbidden things as proof that their practice involves a more exclusive qualification (adhiyaka), and is thus superior to common practice. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe) Shakti and Shakta, 1978; Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1977; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Mudrarakshasa

("Rakshasa's Ring") The only surviving Sanskrit drama written by the playwright Vishakhadatta, who is believed to have lived in the sixth century. The play chronicles the rise of Chandragupta Maurya, founder of the Maurya dynasty, and the machinations of his cunning brahmin minister, Chanakya. The drama's plot is highly complex, as with many Sanskrit plays, but its climax comes when the principal characters are dramatically rescued from execution at the last moment. Although the play is based on actual events, historians feel that the portrayal of Chandragupta Maurya as a weak king is inaccurate. The play has been translated into English by Michael Coulson and published in an anthology titled Three Sanskrit Plays, 1981.

Mueller, F. Max

(1823–1900) Linguist, translator, editor, and ardent student of comparative religion and mythology. Mueller was an important figure in nineteenth-century intellectual history. His primary contribution was introducing Indian ideas to Western audiences by translating primary texts into the Sacred Books of the East series. His work allowed Hindu and other Asian religious traditions to show the sophisticated thought often concealed by popular religious practice. Mueller began developing a "science of religion"—a field of knowledge that could be pursued as any other. As a professor at Oxford, he helped to change scholarly views on Hinduism and other Asian religions, moving Western minds from simply dismissing them as polytheistic "idolatry" to taking them seriously. as coherent and compelling pictures of the world.

Muhurta
In traditional timekeeping, a muhurta is a period of forty-eight minutes, of which there are thirty during each day. The Brahma Muhurta is the most auspicious time period, coming directly before dawn. The time before the Brahma Muhurta is considered the least auspicious in the day. This cycle exemplifies a pattern in the Indian view of time. A period of inauspiciousness is typically followed by a sudden regeneration of fortune.

Mukhalilinga
A form of the linga, the pillar-shaped object symbolizing the god Shiva. A mukhalilinga has one or more faces (mukha) sculpted on the shaft of the linga. According to the manuals detailing the form and construction of Hindu images, the number of faces on the linga should not exceed the number of doorways in the temple. Thus, a temple with one doorway should have a mukhalilinga with one face, and so on, up to four. The manuals also specify that these faces should be placed facing the entrances. For further information see T. A. Gopinatha Rao, Elements of Hindu Iconography, 1981.

Muktananda
(1908–1982) Modern Hindu teacher, proponent of a religious path named siddha yoga (“discipline of the adepts”), and founder of the organization named SYDA (Siddha Yoga Dham America). Muktananda left his family at age fifteen to search for spiritual enlightenment. His spiritual master (guru) was an ascetic named Nityananda, who was widely believed to be an avadhuta (a person who has shaken off all attachments). Siddha Yoga's metaphysics are a modified form of Kashmir Shaivism. The organization's signature teaching is that the guru's spiritual power can immediately awaken the disciple's latent kundalini, hastening the process of spiritual development. This doctrine emphasizes the importance of the guru, reinforced by Muktananda's charismatic presence. Although his home base was an ashram just outside of Bombay, Muktananda traveled throughout the world, establishing ashrams and meditation centers in North America, Europe, and Australia. He was succeeded by Swami Chidvilasananda. For further information on Muktananda's teaching, see his autobiography, Play of Consciousness, 2000.

Muktibai
(1279–1297?) Poet and saint in the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba, at his temple at Pandharpur in the modern state of Maharashtra. According to tradition, Muktibai was the sister of the great Varkari teacher Jnaneshvar.

Muktinath
Temple and sacred site (tirtha) at the headwaters of the Kali Gandaki River in Nepal; the temple sits at nearly 13,000 feet at the foot of Annapurna, one of the highest mountains in Nepal. Muktinath is a sacred site to both Hindus and Buddhists; each has a temple there. The Buddhist temple is built over a vent of natural gas, which produces a flame when lit. The Hindu temple, dedicated to the god Vishnu, is built over a natural spring that is channelled outside the temple through 108 spouts shaped like heads of cows. The Kali Gandaki River is also religiously important because the river bed is one of the major sites of fossilized black ammonite. Known as the shalagram, this ammonite is considered a self-manifestation (svayambhu) form of Vishnu.

Muktiyoga
In the Dvaita Vedanta philosophical school propounded by Madhva, a muktiyoga is a person who is predestined to attain liberation. See also Dvaita Vedanta.

Muladhara Chakra
In many schools of yoga, and in the secret ritually-based religious practice known as tantra, the muladhara chakra is one of the six psychic centers (chakras) believed to exist in the subtle body. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system existing on a different plane of reality than matter, but corresponding to the material body. The six psychic centers are visualized as multipetaled lotus flowers running roughly along the spine, connected by three vertical channels. Each of the chakras has symbolic associations with various human capacities, various subtle elements (tanmatras), and different seed syllables (bijaksharas) formed from the letters of the Sanskrit alphabet, encompassing all sacred sound. Above and below these centers are the bodily abodes of Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power), the two divine principles through which the entire universe has come into being. The underlying assumption behind the concept of the subtle body is the homology of macrocosm and microcosm, an essential Hindu idea since the time of the mystical texts known as the Upanishads.

The six chakras are traditionally enumerated starting from the bottom; the muladhara chakra is the first. It is visualized as a four-petaled lotus, located in the region at the base of the spine. The petals each contain a seed syllable, in this case the consonants from “va” to “sa.” The muladhara chakra is associated as the bodily seat for the subtle element of earth, to which excretions are compared. The muladhara chakra is also considered the locus for the kundalini, the latent spiritual energy present in all human beings, visualized as a serpent wound three times around the muladhara chakra. Despite its associations with the most mundane element and the most impure bodily function, the muladhara is also the source of potential for religious attainment. For further information

Mulamantra
("root mantra") A mulamantra is a sacred sound or sounds (mantra) that are considered to be the most subtle form of a deity. Every Hindu deity has a mulamantra. Different manifestations of the deity usually have different mantras, which are associated with them alone. The mulamantra is usually considered to be the highest and truest form of the deity, since it is nothing but sacred sound.

Munda
A demon general killed by the Goddess in the Devimahatmya, a Sanskrit text which is the earliest and most important mythic source for the cult of the Goddess. This text describes the Goddess in several different manifestations. The seventh book tells how the goddess Ambika's anger takes form as the terrifying goddess Kali. Kali attacks the demon armies commanded by Munda and his companion Chanda. After destroying the armies, Kali beheads the two generals. As a memorial of this mythic deed, the Goddess is worshiped by the name Chamunda, the slayer of Chanda and Munda.

Mundan
("shaving") In general terms, mundan refers to any type of haircutting or shaving done for religious purposes, such as the head-shaving traditionally done at certain pilgrimage places (tirtha). In Tirupati in southern India, the hair is given as an offering to the presiding deity; shaving is also a means of ritual purification, as in the rites for the dead. In a more specific sense, mundan is often used as a synonym for the chudakarana samskara, a life-cycle rite in which a young child's head is shaved, removing the last residual impurities from birth. See also hair.

Muni
A term of ancient provenance, dating back to the Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious text. In the Vedas this term is used to denote an ascetic, sage, or seer, particularly one keeping a vow of silence.

Murali
In Hindu mythology, murali is the god Krishna's flute. As recounted in sectarian texts such as the Bhagavata Purana, and countless vernacular devotional (bhakti) poems, the sound of this flute has an enticing quality that is irresistible to Krishna's devotees (bhakta). When they hear its melody, they rush to Krishna's presence. The flute and its siren song are seen as an extension of Krishna's own enticing presence.

Murali
Sanskrit literature contains numerous references to mural painting. In early medieval times, these were common forms of decorating both temples and the homes of the wealthy. The heat and moisture of the Indian climate have not been kind to such artwork; few examples remain today. The most famous murals are at Buddhist sites—Ajanta in central India and Sigiriya in Sri Lanka. These murals convey themes about everyday life. There are also traces of painting in the caves at Ellora. Paintings from the Chola era were recently discovered at the Rajrajeshvar temple in Tanjore; they are being restored. See also Chola dynasty.

Murari
("Mura's enemy") Epithet of the god Krishna. Mura is an extremely powerful demon who conquers all of the gods. He is eventually killed in battle by Krishna. See Krishna.

Murari Gupta
(16th c.) Author of the earliest version of the Chaitanya-Charitramrta ("Nectar of Chaitanya’s Deeds”), an account describing the life of the Bengali saint Chaitanya (1486–1533). Murari Gupta’s text focuses on Chaitanya’s early life up to his southern Indian pilgrimage ending in 1513. The last part of the text briefly mentions his pilgrimage to Brindavan in 1514 and his final return to Puri, where he lived for the rest of his life. Like the other traditional accounts of Chaitanya’s life, this does not purport to be an “objective” biography; it is rather a hagiography (idealized portrait) written by a passionate devotee (bhakta). Nevertheless, Murari Gupta was a contemporary and companion of Chaitanya; his text reflects first-hand experience and is the most reliable of these traditional sources.

Murti

(“shape,” “form”) The most common name for a sculptural image of a Hindu deity fashioned by human beings, rather than those that are self-manifested (svayambhu images) forms of the deity.

Murugan

(“fragrant, beautiful”) Hindu deity primarily worshiped in southern India. Murugan originally appears in the Tamil Sangam literature, where he is a hill deity associated with the hunt and wild, unsettled places. One of Murugan’s characteristic objects is the lance, symbolizing the hunt. As brahminical Hindu culture gradually came to southern India, Murugan was drawn into the established pantheon as a form of the god Skanda, who is the son of the god Shiva. By the tenth century Murugan’s identity had evolved as that of a philosopher and exponent of the Shaiva Siddhanta philosophical school and as the patron deity of Tamil language and literature. For southern Indians, especially in the state of Tamil Nadu, worshiping Murugan becomes a vehicle to affirm their traditional culture. This has been particularly true since Indian independence in 1947, when the attempt to impose Hindi as the national language was seen as northern Indian cultural imperialism and was met with incredible resistance. The cult of Murugan has five major pilgrimage centers—Palani, Tiruchendur, Tiruttani, Tirrupparankunram, and Swami Malai. All of these sites are located in different parts of Tamil Nadu. This network of sacred sites (tirthas) is a way in which the cult of Murugan has come to symbolize Tamil identity. For further information see Fred Clothey, “Pilgrimage Centers in the Tamil Cultus of Murukan,” in Journal of the American Academy of Religion, Vol. 40, No. 1, 1972.

Musala

(“pestle”) A musala is a grinding pestle, used with a mortar to husk and grind grain. Miniature versions were used to grind spices. Aside from its utilitarian use, the musala’s long, club-like shape could easily serve as a weapon. It is one of the characteristic objects in Hindu iconography, appearing with images of various deities—the Goddess, Shiva, and Vishnu.

Nabhadas
(c. 1600) Author of the Bhaktamal ("Garland of Devotees"). In this hagiographic text, he gives short (six line) accounts of the lives of more than two hundred contemporary bhakti (devotional) figures, some from personal experience. Although Nabhadas identifies himself as a Ramanandi—a devotee (bhakta) of the god Rama—his work includes devotees of all sectarian persuasions. The text is notably free of marvelous and miraculous events, and Nabhadas emphasizes the devotee's personal qualities, to serve as a model of devotion for others. In many cases the Bhaktamal gives the earliest reliable account for these figures, making it an important source for northern Indian literary and religious history. Despite its importance the text cannot be definitively dated, although internal evidence suggests that it was completed early in the seventeenth century.

Nacciyar Tirumoli
One of two collections of poetry composed by the poet-saint Andal (9th c.), the other being the Tirruppavai. Andal was the only woman among the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. Their emphasis on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. Andal's chosen deity was Ranganatha, the form of Vishnu presiding at the temple of Shrirangam. Yet both collections of her poetry are dedicated to Krishna, a different form of Vishnu. This seeming divergence may reflect her conviction that all manifestations of Vishnu are ultimately the same or indicate the difference between personal devotion and literary expression.

The thirty poems in the Nacciyar Tirumoli are told by a group of unmarried girls, who have taken a vow to bathe in the river at dawn during the coldest month of the year. This vow has a long history in southern India, where young girls would take the oath to gain a good husband and a happy married life. In the poem, the girls have taken the vow to gain Krishna as their husband. The poems in the cycle describe various features of the natural world at dawn, the girls' hopes in performing the vow, and their return to Krishna's house to awaken him and beg for his grace. The final poem in the series describes the benefits gained by one who chants the text.

Nachiketas
A primary character in the Katha Upanishad, a speculative philosophical text considered one of the later upanishads. In the text, the boy Nachiketas is the seeker of ultimate wisdom. In a fit of anger his father curses him to be given to Death; Nachiketas obediently goes to the house of Death to give himself up. He waits for three days at Death's door, but receives none of the hospitality due to a brahmin guest. When Death returns he is disturbed to discover that his guest has been neglected. To atone for the lapse, Death offers Nachiketas three boons. With his first two, Nachiketas wishes to return to his father and to understand the meaning of a particular sacrificial ritual. With the final boon he asks what happens to a person after the death of the body. Death first tries to evade the question, then tries to bribe Nachiketas with other gifts. When the boy holds firm in his resolve, Death begins to reveal his secrets. This discourse makes up the bulk of the text. Death's secrets focus mainly on the reality of the Self (atman), its eternal and indestructible nature, and the difficulties in truly knowing it. The Self is portrayed as the ultimate truth, and to know it is to know the only thing that really matters.

Nadi
(‘tube’). In general, the word nadi may be applied to any pipe or tube, whether in plumbing or the human circulatory system. A nadi has a more specialized meaning with regard to the Hindu conception of the subtle body. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system, existing on a different plane than gross matter, but corresponding to the material body. It consists of six psychic centers (chakras), visualized as multipetaled lotus flowers running roughly along the spine, connected by three vertical channels known as nadis. Of these, the ida nadi is on the left side, the pingala nadi on the right, and the sushumna in the center.

Naga
(‘naked’). The general term for any fighting or militant ascetic. Ascetic orders traditionally chartered companies of fighting ascetics to protect the members and their resources. The Naga orders of the Dashanami Sanyasis were devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, whereas the Bairagi orders were devotees of the god Vishnu. In northern India during the eighteenth century these Naga ascetics developed into dynamic military and mercantile powerhouses. In several instances, Naga ascetics managed to carve out petty kingdoms of their own. In many other instances, they had significant influence in the northern Indian economy and politics, whether in their own right or as mercenary soldiers in the service of a reigning monarch. Their name was a literal description of their practices, since many of these ascetics would go into battle bearing only their weapons. Their ash-smeared bodies and flying matted hair presented a fearsome sight. As Indian social and political circumstances have changed, their military importance has faded. However, these organizations (akhara) of Naga ascetics still exist, although they are most important now in determining the order for bathing (snana) at the Kumbha Mela. The accounts of the ascetics themselves are full of tales of strife along sectarian lines (Shaivas versus Vaishnavas); a good indication that the Shaivas gained superiority is that they have priority in the bathing at the Kumbha Melas. For further information see Jadunath Sarkar, A History of the Dasanami Naga Sanyasis, 1958; David Lorenzen, “Warrior Ascetics in Indian History,” in Journal of the American Oriental Society, Vol. 98, No. 1, 1978; and James G. Lochtefeld, “The Vishva Hindu Parishad and the Roots of Hindu Militancy,” in Journal of the American Academy of Religion, Vol. LXII, No. 2, 1994.

Naga
(2) In Hindu mythology, the Nagas are a class of minor divinities who have the form of serpents. Their king is Vasuki. In popular Hinduism, Nagas are often considered to be the gods of a specific place. Often associated with fertility and fecundity, Nagas are usually believed to live in springs, ponds, and other small bodies of water. In Buddhist and Jain iconography the Nagas often play the role of minor protective deities. It is common to see a seated figure shadowed by an “umbrella” of Nagas. Although this is unusual in Hindu iconography, there may be remnants of this in the iconography of the god Shiva, who is often depicted wearing snakes for both his ornaments and his sacred thread.

Nagara
One of the three developed styles in medieval Hindu temple architecture, along with the Dravida and the Veshara.
The Nagara style is found throughout northern and eastern India. One of its prominent features is a shikhara or tower. The shikhara is often surrounded by smaller towers that lead the eye up to the highest point, which is directly over the image of the temple's primary deity. Within this general pattern there are two variants, exemplified by the temples at Khajuraho and Orissa.

In Khajuraho the series of shikharas are connected, forming a continuous rising swell that draws the eye upward, similar to a series of hills leading to a distant peak. This verticality is accentuated through the use of turrets (urushingas) on the sides of the towers, which replicate the shape of the final peak. The entire temple is set on a raised base (adhishthana). Within the temple there are usually several different zones: an entrance porch (ardhamandapa), a hall (mandapa), an intermediate area (antarala), and a central shrine (garbhagrha) surrounded by a processional path.
(pradakshina). Despite their different parts, temples built in the Khajuraho style convey the artistic impression of an integrated, unified whole.

The Orissan style emphasizes the contrast between the temple’s constituent parts. The two central components are the entrance hall (jagamohan) and the beehive-shaped temple tower (deul). The tower is often three or four times taller than the entrance hall, a difference that tends to heighten the contrast between the two. Other sections include a dance-hall (natamandira), traditionally used for performances, and a “food pavilion” (bhogamandapa), where the prasad was cooked. These architectural elements are connected like beads on a string, as seemingly separable parts lined up with one another.

The most important temples in the Orissan style are the Lingaraja Temple in Bhubaneshvar, the Jagannath temple in Puri, and the Sun Temple at Konarak.

Nageshvar
Temple and sacred site (tirtha) about fifteen miles northeast of the holy city of Dwaraka, in the eastern state of Gujarat. The temple is named after its presiding deity, the god Shiva in his manifestation as the “Lord of Serpents.” Shiva is present at Nageshvar in the form of a linga, a pillar-shaped image. The Nageshvar linga is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites at which Shiva is uniquely present. Nageshvar’s charter myth is based on the story of the demon Daruk and his wife Daruka. Daruka is a fervent devotee (bhakta) of Shiva’s wife Parvati; through Parvati’s grace Daruka gains protection for all the other demons. The demons use this power to oppress the righteous. As the demons are about to kill one of Shiva’s devotees, Shiva appears and slays them. Parvati has come along with Shiva to protect Daruka, her devotee. Daruka persuades Shiva and Parvati to remain in Nageshvar as a sign of their grace. Since the city of Dwaraka is also connected with the god Krishna, some scholars believe the Nageshvar linga may have been promoted to maintain a Shaivite presence in an important Vaishnava area.

Nag Panchami
Festival falling on the fifth day (panchami) of the bright, waxing half of the lunar month of Shravan (July–August). This day is devoted to the worship of serpents, whether as Nagas—the minor deities who take the form of snakes—or actual cobras and other snakes. On this day the images of the Naga deities are bathed and given offerings. Offerings are also made to real serpents. On this day people refrain from digging in the earth, since snakes live there.

This rite occurs on the fifth day because in astrology (jyotisha), the guardian deity for this day is Shesha, the god Vishnu’s serpent couch. This festival falls at the beginning of the rainy season, when the rising waters caused by the monsoon rains often drive snakes out of their dens, and at times into peoples’ homes and gardens. The rainy season is also the time for growing crops; snakes pose a real danger for people working in the fields. According to one estimate, 10,000 Indians die from snakebites every year. According to popular belief, observing this rite will protect one from snakebites for the entire year. This observance is a protective ritual, marking the advent of a dangerous time for many villagers.

Nagpur
City in the eastern state of Maharashtra. Nagpur is the birthplace of the Hindu nationalist organization known as the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh. The organization was formed in 1925 by Dr. K. B. Hedgewar and still maintains its headquarters in Nagpur.

Nahusha
In Hindu mythology, a king of the lunar dynasty, and a paradigm for a person afflicted with self-pride. Through amassing religious merits, Nahusha succeeds to the throne of Indra, the king of the gods, who has gone into hiding because of an evil deed. Nahusha is filled with lust for Indra's wife, Indrani. He tries to act on it despite the obvious improprieties of approaching another man's wife and a mortal making a claim on a goddess. Nahusha sets off for Indrani's palace in a palanquin. In his impatience, he whips the palanquin bearers, saying "Sarpa, sarpa" ("Move! Move!"). Unfortunately for Nahusha, one of the bearers is Agastya, the sage. For Nahusha's lust and disrespect, Agastya curses him to become a snake (sarpa). Nahusha remains a serpent for many years but is released from the curse by the sight of the Pandava brothers.

Nai
Traditional Indian society was modeled as a collection of endogamous, or intermarried, subgroups known as jatis ("birth"). Jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group's hereditary occupation, over which the group held a monopoly. The Nai jati's occupation was barbering, a low status job because it required continual contact with cut human hair, considered a source of impurity (ashaucha). In many instances the Nais also served as messengers.

Naimisha
City and sacred site (tirtha) in the state of Uttar Pradesh, about fifty miles northwest of the city of Lucknow. In the later sectarian literature known as the puranas, Naimisha is described as a forest. Today the city's major attraction is a spring-fed bathing (snana) pool named Chakra Tirtha. According to tradition, this bathing pool contains water from all the holy places of India, and thus is the best place for pious Hindus to take a holy bath.

Naimittika Karma
(“occasional [ritual] action”) One of three general types of ritual action, the others being nitya karma and kamyakarma. Naimittika karma rites follow a particular cause (naimittika); when particular circumstances arise, one is required to perform the ritual. For example, when a child is born, certain rites must be performed. However, the ritual is not required unless a birth has taken place.

Naina Devi
Presiding deity of the Naina Devi temple in the Shiwalik Hills in the state of Himachal Pradesh, and one of the nine Shiwalik goddesses. Naina Devi's temple is located on a mountaintop close to the border of Punjab. It is nine miles from Anandpur Sahib, a famous Sikh place of pilgrimage, and about one mile from Nangal village. The greatest pilgrimage traffic occurs during festivals held on the eighth day in each half of the lunar month of Shravan, and also during the first nine days of the month of Ashvin, when the Navaratri festival takes place.

According to the temple's charter myth, Naina Devi is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the Goddess which spreads throughout the subcontinent. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess; Naina Devi was Sati's eyes (naina). As with many of the other Shiwalik goddesses, the images in Naina Devi's temple are self-manifested (svayambhu images) outcrops of stone. In a different version of the myth, the images were discovered by a herdsman named Naina, who heeded the command of the Goddess to build a temple for her. For further information see Kathleen Erndl, Victory to the Mother, 1993. See also pitha.
Naisthika
(“fixed”) A person who takes a vow to remain a perpetual religious student (brahmacharin), keeping lifelong vows of celibacy, austerity, study, and service to his or her religious preceptor (guru).

Naivedya
(“to be presented”) The thirteenth of the sixteen traditional upacharas (“offerings”) given to a deity as part of worship. To treat the deity as an honored guest, a person may offer food. The food is often returned to the worshipers as prasad, the sanctified food bearing the deity’s grace. The offering may be done in various ways, but the underlying motive for all the upacharas is to show one’s love for the deity and attend to the deity’s needs.

Naiyayika
Term for a follower of the Nyaya and Vaisheshika philosophical schools, two of the six schools in Hindu philosophy. After the early centuries of the common era, the Nyaya and Vaisheshika schools merged, as did the Samkhya and Yoga schools and the Mimamsa and Vedanta schools. The term Naiyayika is used to denote a follower of the combined Nyaya-Vaisheshika school of philosophy.

Nakshatra
In Indian astrology (jyotisha), a nakshatra is one of the twenty-seven signs in the lunar zodiac. In a single lunar month the moon moves through each of the twenty-seven lunar houses. The territory for these lunar houses is divided equally throughout the solar zodiac—with 2.25 lunar houses for each of the twelve solar signs. The nakshatras are important in Indian astrology, partly because they change quite rapidly, but also because the character and qualities associated with each nakshatra are believed to color the time period in which they fall. One group of five nakshatras, the Panchak Nakshatra, is considered extremely inauspicious; many activities will be curtailed until this period has passed. Certain nakshatras are judged to be incompatible with certain everyday activities, which should be avoided during that time. Hindus who pay attention to astrology are keenly aware of the passage of time and the quality of each moment.

Nakula
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Nakula is the fourth of the five Pandava brothers, the epic’s antagonists. Nakula’s mother, Madri, is the younger wife of King Pandu. None of the Pandava brothers are actually Pandu’s sons, since he has been cursed to die the moment he holds his wife in amorous embrace. Instead, they are magically created through the effect of a mantra given to Madri’s co-wife, Kunti, by the sage Durvasas. The mantra gives the woman who recites it the power to call down any of the gods to conceive a son who will be as powerful as the god himself. With Pandu’s blessing Kunti teaches the mantra to Madri. She meditates on the Ashvins, the divine twins who are the physicians of the gods. Thus, she bears twins. As the sons of the physicians of the gods, both Nakula and Sahadeva are skilled healers of animals and human beings. Although Nakula and Sahadeva are among the five Pandava brothers, they are less important to the Mahabharata than their three elder siblings.

Nala
In Hindu mythology, the King of Nishadas and the husband of Damayanti. The story of Nala and Damayanti appears as a story within the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics. It is recounted to the five Pandava brothers, the epic’s protagonists, during their twelve year exile in the forest, as a way to keep up their spirits by telling how others have transcended misfortune. When Damayanti is old enough to marry, her father sends invitations to the kings of the earth, announcing her svayamvara, a rite in which Damayanti will choose her husband. The kings of the earth come to the svayamvara to seek her hand, as do the gods (devas).
themselves. Yet Damayanti has already decided to choose Nala after being advised by a swan who praises him. The gods try to foil this by taking on the physical appearance of Nala, so that Damayanti will not be able to tell the difference between them. As a last resort, Damayanti makes an act of truth, a ritual action whose efficacy is based on the power of truth. In her act of truth, Damayanti declares that she has never loved anyone but Nala. To prove that this statement is true, she directs the gods to resume their true forms. Compelled by the power of truth, the gods immediately do as she commands. Nala and Damayanti are married, and as a reward for her fidelity, the gods give Nala various divine gifts. Hearing of the marriage, two of the rejected suitors curse Nala to lose his kingdom. Because of the curse, Nala and Damayanti are separated and suffer long tribulations, which include Nala having his body magically changed so that no one is able to recognize him. In the end Damayanti recognizes him by his divine powers, which cannot be hidden, and the lovers are happily reunited. See also truth, power of.

Naladiyar
One of the most important pieces of early Tamil literature, along with its predecessor, the Tirukkural. The Naladiyar is a collection of four hundred verses that date from the fifth or sixth century. Mainly concerned with moral and ethical life, the verses were written by a group of Jain monks who found shelter with a pious king in time of famine. In gratitude each monk wrote one verse. Despite the Naladiyar's sectarian origin, it has become the cultural property of Tamils from all religious communities; many of the verses have come into the language as proverbial sayings.

Nalayira Divyaprabandham
("The Four Thousand Divine Compositions") Title for the collected hymns of the Alvars, compiled in the tenth century by Nathamuni. The Alvars were a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu and emphasized passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language. Their collected hymns were popularly known as the “Tamil Veda.” They carry Vedic authority for many southern Indian Vaishnavas, particularly the Shrivaishnava school, which applied more developed philosophical articulation to these devotional ideas. See also Veda.

Namakarana
("name-giving") Samskara
The fifth of the traditional life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras), during which the newborn child is given a name. Although some commentators believe... that this rite should be done on the day of birth, many others insist that it should be on the tenth day, indicating a difference between birth and the social ritual of name-giving. Some believe that the child's name should begin with the first letter of the nakshatra (sign in the lunar zodiac) in which the child is born; this practice is still widespread in northern India. Although the classical form of this rite has largely fallen into disuse, naming ceremonies are still an important part of the birth of a child.

Namarupa

Literally, this word means “name [and physical] form,” two of the most identifiable and enduring aspects of a person. In philosophical discourse, the term namarupa is often used pejoratively to designate all aspects of personality that are ultimately ephemeral but help reinforce the illusion of a diverse world and a Self with an independent identity. These notions of independence are thought to be ultimately false since one's name and form will be different in one's next birth. In this context, namarupa designates all that is provisionally real.

Namaskara

(“reverential salutation”) Both a phrase and a gesture used to greet another person respectfully. The gesture is done by joining both palms, pointing the fingers up, with the base of the thumbs touching the chest. Namaskara is the fourteenth of sixteen traditional upcharas (“offerings”) given to a deity as part of worship, treating the deity as an honored guest. In this action, the deity is given a gesture of respect, which can take a variety of forms: joining the palms with the fingers pointing upward (anjali hasta), kneeling and touching one's head to the floor, or a full prostration (dandavat pranam). The underlying motive for all the upcharas is to show one's respect and love for the deity by ministering to the deity's needs.

Nambudiri

Southern Indian brahmin community, which is a sub-division of the Dravida brahmins, one of five southern Indian brahmin communities (Pancha Dravida). The Nambudiris' traditional homeland is in the region that is now the modern state of Kerala. The Nambudiris are noted throughout India for their learning and piety. According to tradition, the great philosopher Shankaracharya was a Nambudiri brahmin. In his desire to revitalize Hindu religion, Shankaracharya reportedly chose one Hindu sacred center in each corner of the subcontinent, and at each established a Dashanami Sanyasi monastic center (math) to train learned monks. One of these sacred centers was at Badrinath in the Himalayas. According to the Badrinath temple records, for several hundred years the temple worship was performed by the Dandi Sanyasis, who were also Nambudiri brahmins. When the last of these died without a successor in 1776, the local king, who served as the protector of the shrine, invited a non-ascetic Nambudiri brahmin to serve as the temple's priest. This priest was given the title rawal (“deputy”), and his extended family has maintained the shrine since then. The rawal was the only person allowed to touch the image of the presiding deity. As a consequence he was required to remain a bachelor, lest the ritual impurity arising from the birth of a child (sutakashaucha) render him unable to attend to his duties. For a long time the rawals had sole rights to the offerings given at the shrine, but since 1939 the temple has been managed by a committee, and the rawal has been restricted to ritual duties.
Namdev
(1270–1350?) Poet-saint who is one of the great figures in the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba, at his temple in Pandharpur in the modern state of Maharashtra. According to tradition, Namdev was a cotton-printer, considered a low-status occupation, but the strength of his devotion rendered his worldly status irrelevant. He is said to have been an associate of Jnanesvar and Chokamela, two other Varkari poet-saints. His songs have been preserved in several different collections, including the Adigranth (compiled by the Sikh community) and the Panchvani (a collection of songs by five poets compiled by the Dadupanth). For traditional information about his life, see G. A. Deleury, The Cult of Vithoba, 1960; and Justin E. Abbott and Narhar R. Godbole (trans.), Stories of Indian Saints, 1982. For a more critical look at his Hindu songs and the difficulties using them as biographical sources, see Winand Callewaert and Mukund Lath, The Hindi Padavali of Namdev, 1989.

Nammalvar
(10th c.) The most prolific composer of all the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. They emphasized passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, which transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. According to tradition, Nammalvar was born into a princely family, but was completely disinterested with life in the world. His distraught parents eventually abandoned him. Nammalvar crawled into the hollow of a giant tamarind tree, where he sat in silent meditation. He remained there until the arrival of his disciple Mathurakavi, who managed to rouse him by posing a question on the nature of the Self. Nammalvar immediately poured forth more than one thousand hymns to Vishnu, each beginning with the last word of the previous hymn. These hymns are known as the Tiruvaymoli (“holy words”). This collection of 1,102 stanzas is the concluding section of the Nalayira Divyaprabandham, the collected hymns of the Alvars. For further information see Kamil Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975; John Stirling Morley Hooper, Hymns of the Alvars, 1929; A. Shrinivasa Raghavan, Nammalvar, 1975; and A. K. Ramanujan, Hymns for the Drowning, 1981.

Nanak Jayanti
Celebration falling on the full moon in the lunar month of Kartik (October–November). This day is celebrated as the birthday of the first Sikh guru, Guru Nanak, and is celebrated largely by members of the Sikh community.

Nanda
In Hindu mythology, the god Krishna's foster father, who cares for Krishna as his own child after Krishna is placed in his care. Nanda is described as the headman of the village. Under his care Krishna lives a comfortable, if simple, life. In Krishna's mythology, Nanda is a less important figure than Krishna's foster mother, Yashoda.

Nanda Devi
Nanda Devi is the name for one of the tallest mountains in India, rising over 25,000 feet, in the Kumaon region of the Himalayas. Nanda Devi is also a form of the Goddess who is identified with that mountain. With Nanda Devi, as for many of the other goddesses of India, divinity and the natural landscape are inextricably connected. Nanda Devi is a local Himalayan goddess who presides over the Garhwal and Kumaon regions. People in the region consider her to be a “daughter” of the region, who had to change her residence when she married the god Shiva. Nanda Devi's songs and rites show strong connections with the Nanddas (late 16th c.) One of the ashtachap, a group of eight northern Indian bhakti (devotional) poets. The compositions of these eight poets were used for liturgical purposes by the Pushti Marg, a religious community whose members are devotees (bhakta) of Krishna. In the Pushti Marg’s sectarian literature, all eight are also named as members of the community, and as associates of either the community’s founder, Vallabhacharya, or his successor, Vitthalnath. Very little is known about his life, but he is mentioned in the Bhaktamal, a collection of lives of the saints written by Nabhadas in the seventeenth century. Like all the poetry associated with the Pushti Marg, Nanddas’s poetry focused on devotion to Krishna. His two most important works, written in elegant poetry, are extended poems on the ras lila and Uddhava’s message. Both of these themes date back to the Bhagavata Purana (10th c.?), the most important text for Krishna devotionalism. These have been translated by R. S. McGregor, The Round Dance of Krishna and Uddhav’s Message, 1973.

Nandi (“joy,” “delight”) Epithet of the animal vehicle of the god Shiva, which takes the form of a bull. Like all of the animal vehicles, it symbolizes the deity. Nandi is not only Shiva’s vehicle, but his devotee (bhakta). Statues of Nandi are often sculpted outside Shiva temples (usually facing the image) as a way of marking the site as sacred to Shiva. He appears in many places in Shiva’s mythology, but usually as a devoted underling advancing Shiva’s purposes, rather than an independent agent with a purpose and ends of his own.

Nandigrama In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics, Nandigrama is a village outside the city of Ayodhya, where Prince Bharata sets up the royal court life-cycle journeys of Himalayan women. Songs associated with Nanda Devi describe the difficulty of going from her natal home to her marital home, a reality for many Himalayan women. In the same way, Nanda Devi’s pilgrimages, which emphasize journeys through the hills surrounding the mountain, imitate the women’s periodic journeys back to their own natal villages. A major part of Nanda Devi’s mythology is the adoption of an abandoned buffalo calf, which is later discovered to be a demon in buffalo form. The buffalo demon grows large and troublesome, and is eventually slain by Nanda Devi. This myth parallels the narrative in the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most important source for the mythology of the Goddess; this is the most influential text used in Nanda Devi’s worship. For further information on Nanda Devi, her rites, and her connection with Himalayan society, see William Sax, Mountain Goddess, 1991.

during his brother Rama's absence. Bharata's mother Kaikeyi uses her influence to banish Rama for fourteen years, putting Bharata on the throne in his place. At Rama's command, Bharata agrees to act as the temporary king, but with two symbolic adjustments. The first is that Bharata moves the royal court from the capital city of Ayodhya to the village of Nandigrama, as a symbol of Rama's exile; the second is that throughout his regency, Bharata sits at the foot of the royal throne, upon which is placed a pair of Rama's sandals, symbolizing that Rama is the rightful ruler. Thus, Nandigrama is a symbol of Bharata's righteousness.

Narada

A famous sage in Hindu mythology, equally renowned for his qualities as a musician and as a gossip. Narada plays a stringed instrument known as the vina, serving as the bard to the gods. His ambition as a musician apparently exceeds his actual skill, since several of his mythic stories describe him being humbled. In his capacity as wandering musician, he also conveys news and gossip. In many cases Narada's news-bearing is the vehicle advancing the plot in a story. According to one famous story, he requests that Vishnu give a demonstration of his magic (maya). Vishnu sends him to a nearby farmhouse for some water, where Narada meets an enchantingly beautiful woman. Forgetting all about his errand, the two fall in love, are married, and have several children. After several years of wedded bliss, severe floods wash away his home and drown his family. As he mourns his loss, he finds himself back on the side of road with Vishnu, who is still asking him to go to the farmhouse to get some water.

Narada Smriti

One of the smritis or “remembered” texts, a class of literature deemed important, but less authoritative than the other textual category, the shrutis or “heard” texts. This smriti is ascribed to the sage Narada, and is an example of one of the Dharma Shastras, which were manuals prescribing rules for correct human behavior and ideal social life. Unlike the Dharma Sutras, which are ascribed to recognizable individuals, the Dharma Shastras are usually ascribed to mythic sages, a strategy used to reinforce the authority of these texts. The Narada Smriti exists in several versions, one of which is much longer than the others. All of the versions were written later than the Manu Smriti (1st c. B.C.E.), since this text is mentioned in the preface. Narada's text deals exclusively with the administration of justice (vyavahara), and treats this in exhaustive detail, with a strong emphasis on clarity and precision.

Narak Chaturdashi

Religious observance falling on the fourteenth day (chaturdashi) of the dark, waning half of the lunar month of Kartik (October–November). People who observe this day worship and make offerings to the god Yama. In the evening they light a lamp in his name. Yama is the lord of the underworld and the judge of the dead; he reviews the deeds of the dead and inflicts punishment upon people for their misdeeds. Those who faithfully observe Narak Chaturdashi are believed to be spared from the torments of hell.

Nara-Narayana

In Hindu mythology, two of the sons of the god Dharma; through their ascetic practices (tapas) these two boys became sages. The place where they performed their asceticism is believed to have been in the region of Badrinath. The duo are still associated with the charter myths for that place.

Narasimha (“Man-Lion”) Avatar

Fourth avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu, in which he appears as a figure... with the head and shoulders of a lion, but the torso and lower body of a man. As with all of Vishnu's avatars, this appearance comes at a moment when the cosmos is in crisis, and decisive divine action is needed to restore cosmic equilibrium. See Man-Lion avatar.

Narasimha Jayanti
Religious observance falling on the fourteenth day of the bright, waxing half of the lunar month of Baisakh (April–May). This day is celebrated as the birthday of Vishnu's fourth avatar, Narasimha, although his birthday is different from those of Vishnu's human avatars. Narasimha is not human, but a creature with the head and shoulders of a lion, and the torso and lower body of a man. He is not born in the usual sense, but bursts forth fully formed from a pillar, to destroy the demon Hiranyakashipu and to protect his devotee (bhakta) Prahlada. See also Man-Lion avatar.

Narasimhavarman I
(r. 630–668) Pallava dynasty ruler during its most vibrant era, when it was a stronghold of Tamil culture. Narasimhavarman succeeded his father Mahendravarman, who had been killed in a battle with the forces of the Chalukya king Pulakeshin II. Narasimhavarman avenged his father's death by conquering the Chalukya kingdom and killing Pulakeshin II in battle, but the two kingdoms were so evenly matched that neither could retain control over the other. Like his father, Narasimhavarman was a great patron of the arts. It was during his reign that construction commenced on the great sculptures at Mahabalipuram in the state of Tamil Nadu. The most famous of these is a rock-cut sculpture depicting the myth of the Descent of the Ganges, in which a natural vertical fissure is used to lay out the river's path.

Narasimhavarman II
(r. 700–728) Pallava dynasty ruler during the dynasty's most vibrant era, when it was a stronghold of Tamil culture. Like all the great Pallava monarchs, Narasimhavarman II was a great patron of the arts. During his reign there was continued construction of the monuments at Mahabalipuram in the state of Tamil Nadu.

Narayana
Epithet of the god Vishnu. The name is traditionally interpreted as meaning "resting on the waters," based on the claim that the word nara, which usually means "man," in this case means "waters." Narayana is the image of Vishnu in the time of cosmic dissolution (pralaya). He is reclining on his serpent couch, Shesha, in the midst of the cosmic sea, with his wife, Lakshmi, seated at his feet, and his vehicle, Garuda, standing by. Vishnu is the sole remaining agent in the cosmos, as its beginning and end. When the time for a new creation arrives, a lotus sprouts forth from Narayana's navel, which opens to reveal the creator-god Brahma. The cycle of creation begins anew.

Narayana Bhatta
(1513–1570?) The most celebrated scholar and commentator on the dharma literature of his time, and the patriarch of a scholarly family. Narayana's father had migrated from the city of Paithan, in central India, to Benares, a center of Sanskrit learning. Narayana's work fell mainly in the class of commentarial literature known as nibandhas ("collections"), which were compilations of Hindu lore. Nibandha compilers collected references on a particular theme from the Vedas, dharma literature, puranas, and other authoritative religious texts, and then compiled these excerpts into a single volume. Aside from his unparalleled command of these traditional texts, Narayana was also noted for his learned interpretation and commentary; to these texts, he applied the rules that the Purva Mimamsa philosophical school had originally developed to interpret the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. According to tradition, he was a man whose personal holiness was equal to his great learning. He is reported to have performed a miracle by causing rain to fall out of season, convincing the Muslim officials ruling Benares to allow the Vishvanath temple to be rebuilt.

Narmada River
Central Indian river that has its source at the sacred site (tirtha) of Amarkantak in the state of Madhya Pradesh, and flows almost directly west through the state of Gujarat, then to the Arabian Sea. The Narmada is one of the few central Indian rivers flowing from east to west; rivers further south are channeled east by the upthrust of the highlands known as the Western Ghats. It is traditionally considered one of the seven sacred rivers of India, along with the Ganges, Yamuna, Godavari, Saraswati, Indus, and Cauvery. An important site on the Narmada is Omkareshvar, one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites sacred to the god Shiva. During the 1990s the Narmada has become a rallying point for environmentalists who have opposed construction of several massive dams, on the grounds that these dams have displaced too many people and destroyed too much prime farmland. Although work on these dams has continued, the pace has slowed. In 1997 a minor earthquake in the Narmada basin prompted the call for further consideration of this project’s environmental dangers.

Narsi Mehta
(16th c.) Gujarati poet-saint who was a well-known figure in northern Indian devotional life. Narsi was a devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna. His poetry describes the love affair between Krishna and his consort Radha. According to tradition, Narsi’s poetry was rooted in a vision of Krishna’s ras lila, or great circle dance, in which Narsi was privileged to stand as attendant holding a torch to light the lila. Narsi is one of the devotees profiled in the Bhaktamal, a text that gives short biographical profiles of more than 200 devotional (bhakti) saints; in the text Narsi is portrayed as a paradigm of generosity, an earthly imitation of Krishna himself. For further information see John Stratton Hawley, “Morality Beyond Morality in the Lives of Three Hindu Saints,” in John Stratton Hawley (ed.), Saints and Virtues, 1987.

Nasik
City and sacred site (tirtha) near the headwaters of the Godavari River in the state of Maharashtra, about 100 miles northeast of Bombay. Nasik is one of the four sites for the Kumbha Mela, a religious bathing (snana) festival. Nasik hosts this festival every twelve years. Nasik is an important bathing place and is a center of pilgrimage, piety, and learning. According to tradition the god-king Rama, his wife, Sita, and his brother, Lakshmana lived during much of their twelve years in exile in the nearby village of Panchavati. Rama, Sita, and Lakshmana are central characters in the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics. Although claims of them living near Nasik are impossible to prove or disprove, the legend adds one more layer of sanctity to the site.

Nasik Mela
The Nasik Mela is the celebration of the Kumbha Mela at Nasik. The Kumbha Mela is a religious festival celebrated in four different locations: Haridwar, Allahabad, Ujjain, and Nasik. The festival’s focus is bathing (snana) in the sacred rivers during particularly holy moments. The Kumbha Mela’s primary participants are ascetics, who come from all over southern Asia to bathe in the sacred waters. According to tradition, the Kumbha Mela was organized by the great philosopher Shankaracharya to promote regular gatherings of learned and holy men, as a means to strengthen, sustain, and spread the Hindu religion. The timing for each of these festivals is determined by the position of the sun and the planet Jupiter; the twelve years between these festivals correspond to Jupiter’s orbit. The Nasik Mela is celebrated during the lunar month of Shravan (July–August), when the planet Jupiter is in the sign of Leo. This is the least important of all four Kumbha Melas, attended mostly by ascetics.

Nastika
(“nihilists”) In Hindu philosophical discourse, this was a pejorative term to denigrate certain other religious and philosophical schools. The name Nastika was applied to groups who denied the three most basic principles of religion: the authority of the Vedas as religious texts, the eternal existence of the soul (atman), and the value of religious life in general. In context this term could be applied to the Jains (who denied the first of these three) to the Buddhists (who denied the first and the second) or to the materialist philosophical school (which denied all three).

Natal Horoscope
In Indian culture, a person’s natal horoscope or janampatrika (“birth-paper”) is believed to reveal a great deal about a person. One’s previous karma is thought to determine the moment when one is born. Thus, a natal horoscope provides a karmic “itinerary,” indicating where one has been and what he or she might expect in the future. Natal horoscopes still play a role in decision-making, particularly in arranging marriages. Natal horoscopes are exchanged before fixing an engagement in order to determine the couple’s compatibility. Sometimes this process takes place merely because the claim that the horoscopes are incompatible can provide an acceptable excuse to refuse an inappropriate or unacceptable match. Natal horoscopes are believed to reveal important things about a person’s future. A person whose horoscope indicates an early death—or the early death of a spouse—may find it difficult to marry unless he or she performs certain rituals to remove these problems.

Natamandira
In the temple architecture of Orissa, one of the major forms of the northern Indian Nagar style. The natamandira is the section of the temple found between the bhogamandapa (“food-pavilion”) and the jagamohan, or entrance hall leading to the main image. Natamandira literally means “dance-house.” In many Orissan temples the natamandira was used for performance, in particular for the Orissi dance style that was developed and sustained in these temples. The performances were partly for the aesthetic appreciation of the spectators, but mainly as an offering of entertainment to the deity himself. Although dances are still performed at the natamandiras as a part of worship, they are primarily staged for entertainment.

Nataraja
Form of the god Shiva as the “Lord of the Dance.” The most famous Nataraja image is in the temple-town of Chidambaram in the state of Tamil Nadu. The temple was erected during the reign of Vira Raja (927–997 C.E.), with Nataraja as its primary deity. However, the image of Nataraja is well known, particularly from the southern Indian bronzes of the Chola dynasty (9th–13th c).

As a divinity, one of Shiva’s most important characteristics is that he transcends all duality; the Nataraja image symbolizes this concept. Shiva dances within a circle of fire, symbolizing birth and death, but remains untouched by these forces. As Shiva dances, his matted locks swing wildly, showing the force of his activity, yet his face stays impassive and unmoved. One of his four hands holds the drum that beats the rhythm of creation, while a second hand holds the fire of destruction. His third hand is held palm upward in a gesture meaning “fear not.” The fourth points to his upraised foot, the symbol of refuge and divine mercy for the devotee (bhakta). His other foot crushes a demon, displaying his power to destroy the wicked. The image is a well-developed theological statement, able to be “read” by those who can interpret it.

In Nataraja’s charter myth, Shiva and Kali, the goddess, decide to settle their competition with a dance contest. Shiva finally bests Kali by manifesting as Nataraja and doing an athletic (tandava) dance style that Kali’s feminine modesty prevents her from copying. Mythic roots aside, the Nataraja temple at Chidambaram has been an important center for classical Indian dance for well over a thousand years. The temple’s eastern wall bears relief carvings of the 108 basic dance positions (karanas). These positions are central to classical Indian dance, particularly in the Bharatanatyam school, which is the major dance tradition in Tamil Nadu.

Nath (“lord”) Epithet of the god Shiva, based on his power as the ultimate lord. Among the Nathpanthis, a renunciant ascetic community whose members are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva, “Nath” is added to the end of one’s name after final ascetic initiation as a symbol of membership. This practice apparently dates from the Nathpanthis’ earliest days, since according to tradition they were founded by the sage Gorakhnath.

Nathamuni (10th c.) Compiler of the Nalayira Divya Prabandham, the collected hymns of the Alvars that are popularly known as the “Tamil Veda.” Nathamuni is also a pivotal figure in the later development of the Shri Vaishnava religious community, in which the passionate devotion in the Alvar hymns found more systematic philosophical articulation. According to tradition, Nathamuni’s grandson was Yamunacharya, the teacher of Ramanuja, the greatest Shri Vaishnava figure. See also Veda.

Nathdwara City and sacred site (tirtha) about twenty-five miles north of the city of Udaipur in the south-central region of the state of Rajasthan. Nathdwara has a temple housing an image of the god Krishna in his form as Shrinathji. According to tradition, the image was originally hidden on the top of Mount Govardhan, a mountain in the Braj region where Krishna is said to have lived. The location of the image was revealed in a dream to Vallabhacharya, the founder of the religious community known as the Pushti Marg. Vallabhacharya built a temple to house it on Mount Govardhan, and his descendants have remained the image’s hereditary servants since that time. The image was moved to the state of Rajasthan in 1669, prompted by fears that it would be destroyed by the Moghul emperor Aurangzeb. According to tradition Shrinathji revealed his wish to stay in Nathdwara by sinking his wagon’s wheels deep into the earth, so that it could not go further. Nathdwara is a fairly remote location, making it a safe place to keep the image. See also Moghul dynasty.
of the subtle body as the means to final liberation of the soul. The Naths believe that liberation is physical immortality, rather than escape from the cycle of transmigration, which is more commonly accepted. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system, believed to exist on a different plane than gross matter, but corresponding to the material body. It is visualized as a set of six psychic centers (chakras) running roughly along the spine; above and below these centers reside two divine principles, Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power). The aspirant aims to join these two principles at the crown of the head, thus transforming the perishable elements in the gross body into immortality.

Among the Nathpanthis, the dominant metaphor for talking about this process is the union of sun and moon. The sun, identified with Shakti, stands for the processes of change and destruction, whereas the moon, identified with Shiva, symbolizes stability and immortality. In some cases this union of sun and moon is described in very abstract terms; for example, in the definition of hatha yoga “ha” refers to the sun and “tha” refers to the moon. Other abstract descriptions of this process speak of gaining equilibrium of the vital winds (prana), or yogic union in the subtle body. In other cases this union is symbolized in concrete ways, as in the practice of vajroli mudra. This sexual practice uses urethral suction or the “fountain-pen technique,” by which a man, having ejaculated into his female partner, draws his semen back into his body. The semen has been refined through contact with the woman’s uterine blood.

The Nathpanthis have been important both as an ascetic community in their own right, and as an influence on many of the northern Indian bhakti poet-saints, particularly Kabir. Their religious practice has consistently stressed internal religion, in which individual realization has been deemed far more important than performing social duties or established worship. The most complete source on Gorakhnath and his followers is George Weston Briggs, Gorakhnath and the Kanphata Yogi, 1973.

Natya

The word natya refers to the genre in classical Indian dance in which the dancer’s movements convey a story to the audience. Natya is one of the two most basic dance genres. The other genre, nrtya, is “pure” dance, in which the dance conveys nothing more than the dancer’s skill.

Natyashastra

Prescriptive manual (shastra) for the performing arts written during the second century, whose authorship is ascribed to the mythical sage Bharata. The text is divided into thirty-seven sections, detailing every aspect of the three major performance forms: music, drama, and dance (which combines both music and drama). Some sections of the text are devoted to aesthetics and poetics, helping to create and convey the correct atmosphere for the appreciation of the arts. Other parts of the text discuss concrete, practical issues, such as the construction of the stage. The text is still an authority for these three performing arts, but it is particularly important for dance. Many of the positions and gestures found in Indian dance were first codified in this text; the Natyashastra remains the ultimate authority for any dance form that claims to be “classical” dance, rather than “folk” dance.

Navadurga

(“Nine Durgas”) Collective name for nine differing forms of Durga, a powerful and dangerous form of the Goddess. One of the “nine Durgas” is worshiped each of the nine nights during the festival of Navaratri, which usually falls in October or November. Each goddess has her own identity, yet at the same time is a form of Durga. This fluidity is characteristic of the Goddess; all female divinities are ultimately seen as manifestations of some single great Goddess. The nine Durgas, in the order in which they are worshiped, are Mahalakshmi, Mahasaraswati, Yogmaya, Raktadantika, Shakumbhari Devi, Durga, Bhramari, and Chandika.

Navadvip

City and sacred site (tirtha) on the Hugli River, about sixty-five miles north of the city of Calcutta. Navadvip is traditionally regarded as the birthplace of the Bengali saint Chaitanya (1486–1533), although in the twentieth century, the same claim has been made for the city of Mayapur, on the other side of the river. For extensive information about Navadvip, see E. Alan Morinis, Pilgrimage in the Hindu Tradition, 1984.

Navaratri

(“nine nights”) Festival dedicated to the Goddess celebrated twice during the year. The spring Navaratri occurs during the bright, waxing half of the lunar month of Chaitra (March–April), and the fall Navaratri falls during the bright half of the lunar month of Ashvin (September–October). Each Navaratri celebration lasts for the first nine nights.
of these lunar months and concludes with a festival dedicated to the god Rama: Ram Navami in Chaitra and Dussehra in Ashvin. Of the two, the fall Navaratri is far more important. The fall Navaratri is celebrated with fervor in the Bengal region, where the Goddess is the dominant regional deity. The Bengali Navaratri is characterized by large processions featuring elaborately decorated clay images of the Goddess. These images are commissioned by individuals, businesses, trade unions, and neighborhood associations. Having the best image is a sign of great status. During the weeks around Navaratri, Bengali children get a holiday from school, state workers get paid vacation from their jobs, and the electricity supply in Calcutta runs without interruptions—a phenomenon dubbed the Navaratri “miracle,” since during the rest of the year shortages and blackouts are common.

These Navaratri festivals are performed to gain the favor of the Mother Goddess, particularly in her powerful forms such as Durga. During these nine nights devotees (bhakta) perform a variety of different rites. Some fast (upavasa) and worship in their homes, often consecrating temporary images of the Goddess for use during this festival. Devotees may also worship young girls as manifestations of the Goddess, or sponsor readings of the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most important text for the mythology of the Goddess. They may also worship the Goddess in her form as Navadurga, paying homage to a different form on each of the nine nights.

Another common practice is to harvest shoots of barley, which are sometimes worn on the final day of the festival. This practice hints at the festival’s purpose since, among other things, the Goddess represents the female power of fertility and procreation. In northern India, the spring festival comes before the crops are planted. Wearing sprouting grain is an attempt to please the Goddess so the crop may flourish. The fall Navaratri comes after the harvest, when this promise of fruition has been fulfilled, and is seen as a time of thanksgiving for blessings received. The Goddess also represents the triumph of good over evil; the readings of the Devimahatmya on these occasions remind the listeners of the Goddess’ wondrous deeds and assure them of her continued protection.

Navyanyaya

(“new Nyaya”) A later branch of the Nyaya philosophical school. The Nyaya school was one of the six schools in traditional Hindu philosophy, which flourished in the early centuries of the first millennium, but then lost its influence. The Navyanyaya school developed in late medieval times (15th–17th c.), in an attempt to reinvigorate the school and to resolve some of the problems with the earlier Nyaya notion of inheritance (samavaya). The earlier Nyayas perceived inheritance as a weak relational force that connected objects and their qualities—for example, connecting the color red with a particular ball and thus making the ball red. It also connected material objects—the force that held a clay pot together once the two halves had been pressed against each other. Finally, inheritance connected selves and their qualities—one became happy when inheritance connected happiness to one’s self, and unhappy when unhappiness was connected.

This notion of inheritance explained many things in the perceivable world. However, objections were raised against the Nyayas’ insistence that inheritance was a single, universal property at work in different places. According to this criticism, a universal and eternal inheritance could link an object with any property, including ones that contradict—the color brown with the moon or the appearance of a cow with a dog. Other attacks questioned whether inheritance continued to exist after one of the things it had been connecting was destroyed. If it did not, opponents claimed, then inheritance was clearly nothing to begin with, whereas if it did, then the remaining connecting power would exist unconnected to anything, which was clearly absurd. Finally, some attacked the need for inherence at all—which was cited as an example of “needless complexity” (gaurava).

The Navyanyaya school attempted to sidestep these problems by positing a new class of relationship, that of “self-linking connectors.” These connectors were seen as an integral part of all things, by their very nature, and since they were self-linking, this eliminated the need for a separate inherence to connect things together. In this understanding, the relationship and the related objects are one and the same. This notion allowed the Navyanyayas to retain their fundamental assumptions that there are real objects in the world and they are connected to one another. For further information see Karl H. Potter and Sibajiban Bhattacharyya (eds.), Indian Philosophical Analysis, 1992.

Nayachandra Suri
(14th c.) The author of the Hammira-mahakavya, a Sanskrit drama that chronicles the defeat and death of the Rajput king Hammira by the Delhi sultan Alauddin Khilji in 1301. Aside from its historical value, this play is notable because Nayachandra Suri was a Jain monk. Although Jain monks are subject to a strict religious lifestyle that would seem to cut them off from the world, they have a long history of deep involvement with intellectual and literary culture. See also mahakavya.

Nayak Dynasty
Southern Indian dynasty whose capital was in the city of Madurai in the state of Tamil Nadu. The Nayaks came to power in the political vacuum created by the destruction of the Vijayanagar dynasty late in the sixteenth century. The Nayaks ruled the southernmost part of the subcontinent for about the next hundred years. The dynasty’s greatest ruler was Tirumalai Nayak (r. 1623–1659), who constructed large sections of the Minakshi temple, dedicated to Madurai’s patron goddess, Minakshi.

Nayan
Group of sixty-three Shaiva poet-saints, who lived in southern India between the seventh and ninth centuries. In concert with their Vaishnava counterparts the Alvars, the Nayanars spearheaded the revitalization of Hindu religion vis-à-vis the Buddhists and the Jains. Both the Nayanars and the Alvars stressed passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god—Shiva for the Nayanars, Vishnu for the Alvars—and conveyed this devotion through hymns sung in the Tamil language. The Nayanars tended to be more overtly hostile to the Jains. According to legend the Nayanar Sambandar was instrumental in the impalement of eight thousand Jain monks in the city of Madurai. The hymns of the three most important Nayanars—Appar, Sambandar, and Sundaramurtti—comprise the Devaram, the most sacred of the Tamil Shaivite texts. An important later source is the Periya Puranam by Cekkilar, which gives hagiographic accounts for all the Nayanars.

Nayar
The Nayar are a Hindu jati who traditionally were the primary landholding community in traditional Kerala. Jatis are endogamous subgroups of traditional Indian society whose social status is determined by the group’s hereditary occupation. The Nayars were one of the few groups in India to practice matrilinear succession, in which both descent and inheritance were passed on through the mother’s line.

Nazar
(“glance”) The literal meaning of the word nazar is an unobstructed line of sight to a person or a thing. The word nazar is also the term most commonly used to denote the “evil eye,” a malefic influence that is put on people through sight, particularly eye-to-eye contact. The existence of the evil eye is widely accepted among traditional Hindus. It is warded off either by avoiding this sort of gaze, or by performing rites of protection. For further consideration see David F. Pocock, “The Evil Eye,” in T. N. Madan (ed.), Religion in India, 1991.

Nepal

A small Himalayan nation on the northern border of India that is deemed the world’s only Hindu kingdom. One basis for this claim is that almost 90 percent of Nepal’s inhabitants identify themselves as Hindu; the other is that since 1769 Nepal’s ruling house has been a Hindu dynasty, the Shah dynasty. The present monarch, Birendra Bir Bikram Shah (b. 1945), was an uncontested absolute monarch until April 1990, when popular discontent led to a movement seeking the restoration of democracy in Nepal. The king was forced to accede to democratic reforms, and since May 1991 has governed as a constitutional monarch, with the Nepali Parliament wielding the real power.

Although Nepal is a small country, it has great geographical diversity. Its three major geographical regions are the sub-montane lowlands, the Himalayan foothills, and the high mountains. The country’s uneven topography further subdivides each of these regions. This rugged geography has a marked effect on the country’s economy, rendering agriculture impossible at anything more than a subsistence level. However, it provides the attraction for tourism, which is Nepal’s greatest source of foreign exchange.

Such great geographical diversity promotes similar human diversity. The people of Nepal are an amalgam of many different groups, including people whose historical roots lie in India and indigenous hill tribes associated with particular parts of the country. Most Nepalese live in the fertile valleys of the foothills. These are the most habitable regions, as the climate in the mountains is far too harsh for permanent habitation, while the lowland regions are rife with disease, particularly malaria. In general, Nepali culture shows many similarities with the adjoining areas of India, and thus from a cultural perspective is firmly fixed in the Indian cultural orbit. Nepal is also the home to several important Hindu pilgrimage places (tirtha), notably Pashupatinath in the Kathmandu Valley, and Muktinath, at the headwaters of the Kali Gandaki River.

New Moon

(amaavasya) In northern India, the new moon usually marks the midpoint of the lunar month, whereas in southern India it often identifies the end. Unlike the full moon, whose associations with fullness and completion make it always auspicious, the new moon’s associations with darkness and emptiness make it a more ambiguous time. One of the most important festivals in the Hindu religious year, Diwali, falls on the new moon in Kartik (October–November). The new moon can also be highly auspicious on certain other occasions, such as a Somavati Amavasya, a new moon falling on a Monday. In general, however, the new moon is less clearly auspicious than the full moon. Not only are there fewer celebrations during the new moon, but there is also a proportionately greater number of holidays falling in the light, waxing half of the lunar month. The new moon and the dark, waning half are not in themselves inauspicious, they are simply deemed less auspicious than the light half and the full moon.

Nibandha

(“collection”) Genre of thematic commentarial literature that became prominent in medieval northern India. The nibandhas were compendia of Hindu lore, in which the compilers culled excerpts on a particular theme from the Vedas, dharma literature, puranas, and other authoritative religious texts, and then compiled them into a single organized text. Excerpts from these same authoritative texts on a different theme would be compiled into a different volume, and so on. The compilers would often have to reconcile conflicting texts, or judge which passage was preferable to another. Such judgments were generally done using rules for textual interpretation developed by the Purva Mimamsa philosophical school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy. The Purva Mimamsa school had originally developed these rules for interpreting the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts. In many cases the nibandhas had between fifteen and twenty volumes, attempting to provide an exhaustive investigation of Hindu religious life. Among the most influential nibandhas are the Kalpataru, compiled by Lakshmidhara in twelfth century, and the Viramitrodaya, compiled by Mitra Mishra early in the seventeenth century.

Nigantha Nataputta
In early Indian philosophy, a figure whose views are mentioned in the Buddhist scriptures. Nigantha advocated a four-fold self-restraint, although these sources give no further indication of his doctrines. It is generally accepted that Nigantha was the same person as Mahavira. Mahavira is believed to have been the last of the Jain tirthankaras, the founding figures in the Jain religious tradition.

Night, Goddess of
In the Vedas, the earliest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts, the gods and goddesses are associated with phenomena in the natural world. In the Vedas the goddess Ratri (Night) is mentioned both as a goddess and as the night itself. At times she is seen as life-giving, allowing people the opportunity to refresh and renew themselves. At other times she is associated with the dangers of the night, such as wild animals and thieves. Ratri is considered a sister to Ushas, the dawn. As night and day alternate, the two goddesses mark out the regular passage of time that characterizes the cosmic order (rta). For further information on Night and all the goddesses of Hinduism, see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Nilachal Hill
Sacred site (tirtha) overlooking the Brahmaputra River, about six miles outside the city of Guwahati in the modern state of Assam. Nilachal Hill is known for its temple to the goddess Kamakhya, one of the most powerful goddess temples in India. This site is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the Goddess which spreads throughout the subcontinent. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess. The Kamakhya temple is where Sati’s vulva is said to have fallen to earth; the image of the goddess is a natural cleft in the rock around which the temple has been built. Since Kamakhya sprang from the most sexually charged part of the female body, the site is extremely powerful. See also pitha.

Nilakanth
(“blue-throated”) Epithet of the god Shiva; also the name of a manifestation of Shiva who is enshrined at the Nilakanth Mahadev temple outside the city of Rishikesh in the state of Uttar Pradesh. Shiva is present at Nilakanth in the form of a linga, the pillar-shaped object that is his symbolic form. The mythic charter for this epithet (and for the establishment of the temple as well) is drawn from the tale of Churning the Ocean of Milk. The gods and demons churn the ocean to produce amrta, the nectar of immortality thought to be the finest essence of the ocean. Yet their action produces not only the amrta, but also its antithesis, the halahala poison. This is an event of great peril; the poison is so powerful that if left unchecked, it can destroy the earth. When this poison appears, the gods and demons are unable to figure out a way to contain it. Shiva takes care of the poison by holding it in his throat, but the force of the poison is so great that it turns his throat blue. See also Tortoise avatar and ocean, churning of the.

Nilgiri Hills
Range of hills formed by the conjunction of the Western and Eastern Ghats, located at the junction of three southern Indian states—Tamil Nadu, Kerala, and Karnataka. In earlier times the hills were occupied by a tribal people known as the Todas, although only a few thousand Todas are left today. This region is important for its hill stations, such as Ootacamund and Kodaikanal, which are popular spots for vacations, honeymoons, and movie filming.

Nimbarka
(12th c.?) Ascetic, philosopher, devotee (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and attributed as the founder of the Sanaka Sampradaya, one of the four Vaishnava ascetic orders. According to tradition, Nimbarka was a Telegu (southern Indian) brahmin who was born in the city of Paithan in central India, but lived much of his life in the northern Indian Braj region, where the god Krishna is supposed to have lived. Nimbarka’s philosophical position is described as dualism-nondualism (dvaitadvaita), a concept in which God and human beings are both identical and different. While earlier Vaishnavas worshiped Vishnu and Lakshmi as the divine couple, Nimbarka used the same concept, but changed the focus to Krishna and Radha.

Nimbarki
Name for the religious group founded by the Vaishnava figure Nimbarka. It is also used as a variant name for the Sanaka Sampradaya, an ascetic community that traces its spiritual lineage to Nimbarka, as a way to reinforce their religious authority.
Nirakara

(“without form”) Epithet of the divine reality in its ultimate aspect. According to many Hindu traditions, God is ultimately without form, transcending all particularity and superior to any particular image. This belief is first phrased in the Upanishads, the speculative religious texts that are the most recent part of the Vedas, and is advocated by the philosophical traditions based on the Upanishads, such as Advaita Vedanta. This concept is opposed by certain Hindu theistic traditions, such as the Gaudiya Vaishnava religious community, in which a particular deity—in this case, Krishna—is conceived as the Ultimate Reality.

Niranjani Akhara

The name of a subgroup of the Naga class of Dashanami Sanyasis; a particular type of renunciant ascetic. The Dashanami Sanyasis are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, organized into different akharas or regiments on the model of an army. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century the Dashanami Sanyasis’ primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests; both of these have largely disappeared in contemporary times. The Niranjani Akhara is one of the seven main Dashanami Sanyasi akharas and along with the Mahanirvani Akhara is one of the most powerful. This power is clearly shown by their respective positions in the bathing (snana) processions at the Kumbha Mela festivals: in Haridwar the Niranjani Akhara goes first, followed by the Mahanirvani; at Allahabad the order is reversed. In 1962 the Juna Akhara acquired the status of a separate procession, rather than as a subsidiary of the Niranjani Akhara. According to the terms of the 1962 agreement, at Haridwar the Juna Akhara would be first for the other two major bathing days, followed by the Juna and Mahanirvani Akharas. The Niranjani Akhara’s ability to command the premier position is based primarily on their local strength: the Niranjani Akhara was quite powerful in Haridwar, where it still owns significant property. The Mahanirvani Akhara, however, was based in Allahabad. Another sign of the Niranjani Akhara’s status is that it has as a subsidiary group, the Ananda Akhara.

Nirguna

(“without qualities”) Epithet of the divine reality in its ultimate aspect. According to many Hindu traditions, God is ultimately without qualities or attributes, transcending all particularity and superior to any qualified form. This conception is first phrased in the Upanishads, the speculative religious texts that are the most recent part of the Vedas, and in the philosophical traditions based on the Upanishads such as Advaita Vedanta. This belief is opposed by certain Hindu theistic traditions, such as the Gaudiya Vaishnava religious community, in which a particular deity—in this case, Krishna—is conceived as the Ultimate Reality.

Nirikari

Minor Vaishnava sect founded in the late 1700s, by a Ramanandi ascetic named Baba Sarjudasa. The name comes from their greeting, Sat Nirikara (“Truth Is Formless”). Their major areas of influence and operation are in Punjab, Haryana, and northwestern Uttar Pradesh.
Nirjala Ekadashi
Religious observance on the eleventh day (ekadashi) in the bright, waxing half of the lunar month of Jyeshth (May–June). As for all the eleventh-day observances, this is dedicated to the worship of the god Vishnu. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, which usually involve fasting (upavasa) and worship, and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. The regulations for this ekadashi are more strict than all the others. Not only is all food forbidden, but the person performing this rite must not drink water, hence the name nirjala meaning “waterless.” The fast must last from dawn till dusk. This is no easy task, since this ekadashi occurs during the hottest part of the year. The rewards are great: Those who fulfill the vow for this single ekadashi receive the religious merit for all twenty-four ekadashis during the year, whether or not they have done the rites for the others. Carrying out the vow for this ekadashi is also believed to bring one a long life and liberation of the soul after death.

Nirmala
(“free from defilement”) With the Udasis, one of the two Hindu ascetic communities tracing its origins to the Sikh community. According to one tradition, the Nirmala sect was established by the tenth Sikh guru, Gobind Singh. On the whole, the Sikh tradition has not endorsed asceticism, but rather an active life in the world. The Nirmalas have a large ascetic center in the northern Indian sacred city of Haridwar, where they run a primary school. As a community, the Nirmalas are known far more for learning and study than asceticism or yoga. At the Kumbha Melas, the Nirmalas bathe last of all, after the Sanyasis, Bairagis, and Udasis.

Nirmala Devi
(b. 1923) Modern Hindu teacher who claims to be an avatar of the primordial Goddess, and the founder of Vishva Nirmala Dharam, an organization dedicated to spreading her message. Nirmala Devi’s teaching is based on traditional ideas of hatha yoga and the subtle body. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system, existing on a different plane than gross matter, but corresponding to the material body. It is visualized as a set of six psychic centers (chakras) running roughly along the spine; two divine principles, Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power), reside above and below these centers. In practicing this yoga, the aspirant aims to awaken the latent spiritual energy of Shakti known as kundalini, move it into union with the Shiva principle at the crown of the head, and transform the perishable elements in the gross body to become immortal.

Nirmala Devi claims to be able to arouse a devotee's (bhakta) kundalini through an infusion of her own spiritual power, thus dramatically speeding up the path to liberation. Her Indian devotees are mainly middle-class, but she also claims to have a substantial following in Europe, North America, and Australia. For a skeptical account of an encounter with Nirmala Devi, see Sudhir Kakar, “Cooling Breezes,” in Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1991.

Nirmohi (“free from illusion”) Ani

Among the Bairagi Nagas, renunciant ascetics who are devotees of Vishnu, the Nirmohis are one of the three Naga anis (“armies”). The others are the Digambaras and Nirvanis. In earlier times these anis were actual fighting units who made their living as traders and mercenary soldiers, but in modern times they are mainly important for determining the order in the bathing processions at the Kumbha Mela. Of the three Naga anis, the Digambaras are by far the most important and take precedence at the Kumbha Mela.

Nirriti

(“decay, destruction”) In the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts, Nirriti is a goddess personifying all the negative aspects associated with life. Nirriti’s personality is not well-defined, for she is rarely mentioned; the hymns mentioning her usually express the hope that she will stay away and allow the speakers to be free from misfortune. For further information on Nirriti and all the goddesses of Hinduism, see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Nirukta

(“explanation”) One of the six Vedangas. These were the auxiliary branches of knowledge associated with the use of the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. Nirukta is concerned with the etymological explanations of archaic words. This was apparently a serious problem, since almost one-quarter of the words in the Veda occur only once, and with the passage of time their precise meanings became either unclear or unknown. The most famous nirukta text—known simply as the Nirukta—was written by Yaska the grammarian, in about the fifth century B.C.E. His work was immeasurably helpful to later readers, but it is clear that even in Yaska’s time the meanings for many of these words had become uncertain and unclear. Aside from nirukta, the other Vedangas are vyakarana (Sanskrit grammar), chandas (Sanskrit prosody), kalpa (ritual instructions), shiksha (correct pronunciation), and jyotisha (auspicious times for sacrifices).

Nirvani (“liberated”) Ani

Among the Bairagi Nagas, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Vishnu, the Nirvanis are one of the three Naga anis (“armies”). The others are the Nirmohis and Digambaras. In earlier times these anis were actual fighting units who made their living as traders and mercenary soldiers, but in modern times they are mainly important for determining the order at the bathing (snana) processions at the Kumbha Mela. Of the three Naga anis, the Digambaras are the most important and take precedence at the Kumbha Mela.
Nirvikalpaka
In certain schools of Indian philosophy—among them certain Buddhists, the Nyayas, and the Prabhakara school of Mimamsa—nirvikalpaka is the name for a sort of simple non-conceptual awareness, produced solely by the operation of the senses. According to these schools, if the senses producing this awareness have no defect, such an awareness is believed to be true. However, it can be confused or misinterpreted through the action of the mind. This belief had important ramifications for theories of error, which seek to explain how erroneous judgments are possible. The schools that believed in this theory attributed error to the action of the mind.

Nishkramana
("going-out") Samskara
The sixth traditional life-cycle ceremony (samskara), in which the infant is taken for his or her first trip outside the house. Although the traditional texts consider this a minor rite and the traditional textual procedures are seldom performed, a young child's first outing is often still carefully planned. On a symbolic level, it represents the child's first encounter with the larger world, and thus the child's expanding sphere of possibilities. It also shows the continuing importance of rites of protection. Even in modern India many people believe in the power of the evil eye (nazar), and young children are considered particularly susceptible. Thus, a child's first encounter with the chaotic outside world must be carefully structured and carefully supervised.

Nishumbha
In Hindu mythology the name of a demon killed by the goddess Kali in the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most important text for the mythology of the Goddess. Together with his brother Shumbha, Nishumbha is one of the generals in the army of a demon named Mahishasura. Due to a divine boon given to Mahishasura, Shumbha and Nishumbha are able to vanquish the gods and assume control of heaven. However, they are devoured by Kali, who emerges as a manifestation of the Goddess's anger.

Niti Shastra
("instructions on diplomacy") General name for a genre of instruction that taught politically astute behaviors, such as making friends and allegiances, intimidating one's enemies, and knowing who can be trusted. This was a recognized branch of learning in the traditional Hindu sciences, and was taught to influential and royal families, for whom knowing the real workings of the world was considered essential to fulfilling their social functions. The fables of the Panchatantra convey these hard-edged lessons on self-interest and caution through the use of animal characters.

Nitya Karma
("perpetual [ritual] action") One of the three broad types of ritual action, the others being naimittika karma and kamya karma. Nitya karma is ritual action that is prescribed at regular fixed intervals, often on a daily basis; one gains no religious merit from performing them, but omitting them is considered a religious demerit. One example of a nitya karma is the Gayatri Mantra, which must be recited at morning and evening worship (sandhya) by every “twice-born” man who has received the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” Another nitya karma is the Five Great Sacrifices (panchama-hayajna), which are daily religious duties for a “twice-born” householder; they are rarely performed today.

Nityasamsarin
One of the three classes of beings in the Dvaita Vedanta philosophical school, founded by the philosopher Madhva.
(1197–1276). Madhva’s fundamental belief was that God was utterly transcendent, above and beyond the world and human beings. The strength of this conviction led him to stress the importance of grace as the sole means of salvation, since human beings were unable to save themselves. Given this dire view of human capacities, Madhva divided the beings of the world into three classes: The muktiyogas were destined for final liberation, the nityasamsarins were destined for eternal rebirth, and the tamoyogas were predestined for eternal damnation.

Nivedita, Sister
(b. Margaret Noble, 1867–1911) Irish disciple of the modern Hindu teacher Swami Vivekananda. Nivedita devoted much of her life to the service of the Ramakrishna Mission, particularly the education of Indian women. Nivedita was born in Ireland and taught in London, where she met Vivekananda. She accepted him as her spiritual master (guru) and came to India with him, where she founded the Nivedita Girls School in Calcutta. Nivedita was part of the first generation of Europeans who came to India searching for answers to life’s ultimate questions.

Nivrttinath
(1268–1294?) Elder brother of Jnaneshvar, the first great poet-saint of the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba at his temple at Pandharpur in the modern state of Maharashtra. Nivrttinath is traditionally named as Jnaneshvar’s religious teacher (guru), although his younger brother became more influential. According to tradition, Nivrttinath’s guru, Gainanath, was a direct disciple of Gorakhnath, the celebrated ascetic. This relationship is indicated in the Jnaneshvari, in which Jnaneshvar describes himself as a pupil in Gorakhnath’s line. For further information see George Weston Briggs, Gorakhnath and the Kanphata Yogis, 1973.

Niyama
(“observance”) In the ashtanga yoga taught by Patanjali, the second of the eight constituent elements of yoga practice. While the first element lists five injurious actions and dispositions to avoid, Niyama gives five positive instructions, shifting the focus from abstinence to active cultivation. The five observances are: purity, contentment, asceticism, study, and making the lord the motive of all action.

Niyati
(“destiny”) Niyati was the central philosophical assumption for the Ajivikas, an ancient and extinct philosophical school. The Ajivikas were fatalists, who believed that niyati inexorably predetermined all things. Human beings can do nothing to influence destiny, since they can only do what has been preordained. The Ajivikas compared the process of reincarnation (samsara) to a ball of string, which would unroll until it was done, and then go no further. The word niyati still carries this sense of “fate” or “destiny,” but with one important difference: While the Ajivikas conceived niyati as an impersonal and uncontrollable force, in modern times one’s fate is believed to result from past karma.

Niyoga
(“appointment”) Practice by which a childless widow could have intercourse with her dead husband’s brother, or some other “appointed” male, in order to bear a son. The child is considered the son of the dead man and preserves his lineage. There is significant disagreement about the propriety of this practice in the dharma literature. Some of these texts permit it, although hedged with numerous conditions, but others unconditionally condemn it. Niyoga is one of the practices judged to be Kalivarjya, or “forbidden in the Kali [Age].” Kalivarjya, which first appeared in the twelfth century, was a legal strategy used to forbid certain religious practices that were prescribed in the sacred literature, but were no longer acceptable in contemporary times.

Nrtya
In classical Indian dance, the word nrtya refers to the genre of “pure” dance, in which the dance conveys nothing more than the dancer’s skill. Nrtya is one of the two most basic dance genres. The other genre, natya, is an acting dance, in which the dancer’s expressions, movements, and gestures convey a story to the audience.

Nryajana
(“sacrifice to human beings”) One of the Five Great Sacrifices (panchamahayajna) that is prescribed in the dharma literature, which describes religious duty. These Five Great Sacrifices are daily religious observances prescribed for a twice-born householder. This is a person who has been born into one of the three twice-born groups in Indian society—brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya—and who has received the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” Each of the five sacrifices (yajna) is directed toward a different class of beings—from the Ultimate Reality of Brahma down to animals—and is satisfied by different actions. The nryajana is directed toward fellow human beings, and is satisfied by showing hospitality to one’s guests. Although Hindu religious life has undergone significant changes and some of the other rites have fallen into oblivion, this rite is still widely practiced; the ethos of hospitality is still very strong in Hindu society.

Nudity
Nudity is often seen as both inauspicious and forbidden, and is subject to numerous taboos: according to some authorities, one should not bathe (snana) naked (a more understandable taboo in times when people would bathe outdoors) and one should not be naked during sexual intercourse. In some cases there are also taboos on a husband seeing his wife naked, since it is widely believed that this will cause Lakshmi, the goddess, to forsake her, taking away her auspiciousness as a married woman. The exception to this taboo on nudity is that some ascetics believe nakedness symbolizes the renunciation of all possessions and the rejection of all worldly standards, including shame. Few ascetics renounce all clothing; some wear a loincloth in public, rationalizing that one should not mislead or scandalize ordinary people who have limited understanding.

Nyasa

(“laying down”) A characteristic ritual in tantra, a secret religious practice. In the practice of nyasa, the person performing the ritual identifies certain sounds, often in the form of seed syllables (bijaksharas), with parts of the human body, deities, and material objects. This is done to create a series of identifications between the macrocosm of the universe and the microcosm of the body, such that actions in the microcosmic ritual sphere will cause results in its macrocosmic counterpart.

Nyaya

(“method”) One of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy, concerned with the examination and validation of the objects of knowledge. It was the Nyayas who first developed and codified the notion of the pramanas, the means by which human beings may gain true and accurate knowledge. The Nyayas recognized four such pramanas: perception (pratyaksha), inference (anumana), analogy (upamana), and authoritative testimony (shabda). These ideas are accepted by virtually all Indian philosophical schools, and are the Nyayas’ major contribution to Indian philosophy.

As did all schools of Indian philosophy, the Nyayas undertook the examination of knowledge not for mere speculation, but to find a way to release the soul from the bondage of reincarnation (samsara). The Nyaya Sutras, attributed to Gautama, are the traditional basis for the school. The sutras begin by asserting that the means of knowledge and its elements can bring a person supreme happiness. The text’s second sutra describes a five-part causal chain: pain, birth, activity, defect, and wrong notion. Each of these elements is caused by the one succeeding it, and is eliminated with the destruction of its cause. The primary cause for all of this is “wrong notion,” hence the Nyaya were concerned with the investigation of the pramanas.

The Nyayas draw their metaphysics from the Vaisheshika school, with whom they become assimilated in the early centuries of the common era. Their philosophical perspective is sometimes described as the “ordinary person’s conception.” The Nyayas and Vaisheshika are philosophical realists—that is, they believe the world is made up of many different things that exist as perceived, except in cases of perceptual error. All things are composed of nine fundamental substances—the five elements, space, time, mind, and selves—and that whatever exists is both knowable and nameable. The Nyayas subscribe to the causal model known as asatkaryavada, which posits that when a thing is created, it is a new entity, completely different from its constituent parts. This causal model tends to multiply the number of things in the universe, since each act of creation brings a new thing into being. It also admits that human efforts and actions are one of the causes influencing these affects, making it theoretically possible to act in a way that brings final liberation of the soul (moksha).

One of the unique features of the Nyaya school is their belief in inheritance (samavaya), a weak relational force that functions like a glue connecting various things: wholes and their parts, substances and their attributes, motions and the things that move, and general properties and their particular instances. For the Nyayas, the Self (atman) is the locus for all experience. Inherence connects all experiences—pleasure, pain, happiness, sorrow, and so forth—to the Self. The philosophical difficulties with inherence—particularly the notion that it is one single principle and not a collection of things—caused the Nyaya school great difficulty. These assumptions were ultimately responsible for the rise of Navyanyaya school, which attempted to explain these relationships in a more sophisticated way. For further information see Karl H. Potter and Sibajiban Bhattacharyya (eds.), Indian Philosophical Analysis, 1992; and Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Nyaya Sutras

Foundational text for the Nyaya school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy. The Nyaya Sutras are traditionally attributed to the philosopher Gautama; the most significant commentary was written by Vatsyayana in the fourth century. The Nyaya Sutras begin with an exposition of the cause of the human bondage, explained as stemming from a five-part causal chain: pain, birth, activity, defect, and wrong notion. Each of these elements is caused by the one succeeding it, and is eliminated with the destruction of its cause. The root cause for bondage and reincarnation (samsara) is thus wrong notions, which must be corrected to attain final liberation of the soul (moksha). In their quest for correct understanding, the Nyaya Sutras devote great attention to the pramanas, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge, and to the rules and procedures for applying them. The Nyaya Sutras describe four such pramanas: perception (pratyaksha), inference (anumana), analogy (upamana), and authoritative testimony (shabda). These ideas are accepted by virtually all Indian philosophical schools and are the Nyayas’ major contribution to Indian philosophy.
Obscenity

Traditional Hindu culture can be characterized as straightlaced, even prudish, with regard to sexuality; any public mention of sexuality is taboo in polite society. The exception of ritually sanctioned obscenity comes before and during the festival of Holi, which usually occurs in March. Holi is a “festival of reversal,” in which most social taboos are temporarily suspended. Holi comes very close to the end of the lunar year, and symbolizes the end of time, when all norms and standards have been lost. In recent times the license and lawlessness associated with Holi have led many people to stop celebrating it in public, particularly in the cities.

Ocean, Churning of the Famous mythic event in which the gods and demons churned the Ocean of Milk to produce the nectar or immortality. See also Tortoise avatar.

Offerings

One of the pervasive realities in Hindu religious life is the importance of transactions or exchanges—both between human beings, and between humans and superhuman beings. The importance of these exchanges makes various offerings a fundamental part of Hindu worship. One set of sixteen offerings, known as the upacharas, are given to a deity as part of worship; on the model of treating the deity as an honored guest—inviting the deity inside, offering the deity a seat, a drink of water, and so forth. In the naivedya, one offers the deity food, perhaps the most fundamental courtesy of all.

Om

A sacred sound. According to tradition, it should be uttered before and after reading the Vedas (the oldest Hindu religious texts), saying any prayer, or performing any sacred rite. When uttered at the beginning of a rite, it is believed to remove obstacles, and when uttered at the end it is seen as a concluding affirmation. Because of its pervasive ritual use, the sound Om is regarded as the essence of all holy speech. As early as the Mandukya Upanishad, the sound’s phonetic elements (A, U, and M) were interpreted as corresponding to different states of consciousness, and ultimately designating the Self (atman). See also four states of consciousness.

Omens

The notions of auspiciousness and inauspiciousness are deeply rooted in Hindu life, and are based on the assumption that by their very nature certain things bring good fortune, and certain other things bring ill fortune. The notion of omens is an extension of this idea; omens are important not because they cause good or bad fortune in themselves, but because they indicate conditions that are present. According to this belief, auspicious conditions will automatically give rise to favorable omens, and inauspicious conditions to unfavorable omens. Omens serve as indicators to help judge the current state of affairs and make any necessary adjustments. For example, if on leaving the house to do some business one sees a person deemed inauspicious, one should return to the home and begin again, lest the work be fruitless.

Omkareshwar

Temple and sacred site (tirtha) on an island in the Narmada River in the state of Madhya Pradesh, about fifty miles southeast of the city of Indore. The temple is named after its presiding deity, the god Shiva in his manifestation as the “Lord of [the sound] Om,” an utterance claimed to symbolize the entire universe, according to the early speculative texts known as the Upanishads. Omkareshvar is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites at which Shiva is uniquely present. According to the site’s mythic charter, Shiva appears there to reward the sage Mandhata, who has performed harsh asceticism (tapas) to gain a vision of Shiva. The image at the site is a “self-manifested” (svayambhu) form of Shiva—an unshaped, roundish black stone emerging from the earth, while nearby is a white stone considered to be a manifestation of Shiva’s wife, Parvati. Viewing this image is believed to grant all of one’s desires, just as it did for Mandhata. Worship at the site continues all year, but during Kartik Purnima, the full moon in the lunar month of Kartik (October–November), there is a major bathing (snana) festival at the site.

Onam

The festival of Onam, in the southern Indian state of Kerala, is celebrated in the Malayalam month of Chingal, which corresponds to the northern Indian month of Bhadrapada (August–September). Onam is a four-day harvest festival highlighted by races in elaborately carved boats known as “snake boats,” some of which are large enough to carry 100 paddlers. The most famous of these boat races are held in the Keralan town of Aleppey.

Oraon

Northern Indian tribal (adivasi) community. The Oraons are concentrated in the southwestern corner of modern Bihar, in the geologic region known as the Ranchi Plateau. The land is quite poor, and for many life is very difficult. For a discussion of the difficulties of Oraon life, see Sudhir Kakar, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1991.

Ordeal, Trial By

Trial by ordeal was one of the traditional means for establishing a person’s guilt or innocence. Ordeals were considered a “divine” proof, but could only be used in cases when human proofs such as evidence or eyewitness testimony were inadequate or unobtainable. Crimes committed in secret or in lonely places, questions of sexual consent, or money left for deposit were proven by these trials, following a carefully established ritual procedure. The trial could be done in four different ways: fire, water, balance, or poison.

The fire ordeal entailed carrying a red-hot iron ball, licking a red-hot plowshare, or removing a ring or coin from a vessel of boiling oil, with guilt or innocence established by whether or not one was burned. The water ordeal entailed remaining underwater for a specified length of time, with guilt determined by the inability to do so. The balance ordeal entailed removing underwater for a specified length of time, with guilt determined by the inability to do so. The balance ordeal was done by successive weighings, with the conviction that a guilty person would become progressively heavier. The poison ordeal was performed either by consuming poison, or by safely removing a coin from an earthen pot containing a cobra; innocence was established by surviving.

There were fairly strict prescriptions governing which of these ordeals certain people were allowed to perform. Women, the elderly, and the infirm were subjected to the test of balance; brahmins were generally forbidden from undertaking ordeal by poison. In every case the actual ordeal was preceded by the person proclaiming his or her innocence, followed by declarations praising the saving power of truth and the damning force of untruth. Historians speculate that these required declarations helped make the ordeal more reliable. For instance, in the ordeal of licking a red-hot plowshare, a guilty person might be significantly more nervous and thus have less moisture on the tongue. Similarly, the nervousness during the water ordeal may have impeded a person’s ability to hold his breath. Whether or not these speculations have any merit, the most important feature in the original Hindu context was the belief in the power of truth itself.

Organs of Action

See karmendriya.

Orissa

A state in modern India on the eastern coast between the states of Andhra Pradesh and West Bengal. Orissa traces its roots to the kingdom of Kalinga and the bloody conquest by the Mauryan emperor Ashoka (r. 269–232 B.C.E.). During the early medieval period the Kesari and Ganga dynasties built stunning temples, many of which exist today. Modern Orissa is largely undeveloped, and a large percentage of its people are indigenous tribal peoples (adivasis). Historically, Hindu culture has been manifest in the coastal regions, whereas the interior has been tribal land. Orissa’s sacred sites include the Ganga-era temples in the state capital of Bhubaneshvar, the sacred city of Puri, and the temple to the Sun at Konarak. For general information about Orissa and all the regions of India, see Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998. See also Maurya dynasty.

Orissi

One of the classical dance forms of India; some of the others are Kathak, Bharatanatyam, Kuchipudi, Kathakali, and Manipuri. Dance in Orissa dates to the second century B.C.E.; the present Orissi style has its roots in the dance performed at the temple of the god Jagannath in Puri. The temple itself was built in the eleventh century; the subsidiary part, known as the natamandira (“dance-hall”), was built about a century later. The latter period was the era of the poet Jayadeva, whose lyric poem, the Gitagovinda, is the only non-scriptural poem that can be recited in the temple. According to tradition, Jayadeva’s wife, Padmavati, was one of the dancers in the temple, and it was she who first danced parts of the Gitagovinda as an offering to Jagannath. As dance at the temple evolved, two categories of temple dancers emerged: those allowed to dance in the inner sanctum, and those allowed to dance in the natamandira. In the seventeenth century, a third type of dance emerged—boys dressed as dancing girls performed for general entertainment both outside and inside the temple. The latter dance tended to be more athletic and acrobatic, whereas the women's dance was more gentle and lyrical.

The modern Orissi style combines both elements. The most characteristic stance is the chauka ("square"), in which the feet are spread wide and pointed in opposite directions, with the knees bent so that the upper leg is parallel to the ground. The arms are held in a mirroring position, bent at the elbow with the upper arms horizontal, and the lower arms and hands pointing straight down. The dance's stylistic impression is one of roundness and fluidity, created by rippling movements in the upper body during the dance. As in all the Indian dances, Orissi has a well-developed vocabulary of gesture and expression, making complex story-telling possible. The modern Orissi dance form has been shaped by the shift from temple to stage in the twentieth century; this change of venue has been primarily responsible for its "classical" form becoming more rigidly defined than in the past. For further information see Mohan Khokar, Traditions of Indian Classical Dance, 1984.

Osho
The name adopted late in life by Bhagwan Shri Rajneesh. See Bhagwan Shri Rajneesh.

Owl
In Hindu mythology, the owl is the animal vehicle of Lakshmi, the goddess. Just as the owl is popularly believed to have trouble seeing in the daytime, a person pursuing "Lakshmi" (money and prosperity) will be single-minded toward it and unable to "see" anything else, such as deeper wisdom. In modern Hindi, calling someone an "owl" is a mild insult, referring to the other as a "fool."
Pacification of Planets

Indian astrology (jyotisha) recognizes nine “planets”: the sun, moon, Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn; the remaining two are Rahu and Ketu, which do not correspond to any Western astrological features. Each of these planets is considered helpful or harmful by nature. The relative strength of any planet is believed to depend on its position in the horoscope and vis-à-vis the other planets. All are seen as minor divinities rather than as simple material objects, and thus a potentially harmful planet can be “pacified” through rites intended to minimize its disruptive potential. One common means of pacification is to wear the gemstone corresponding to the particular planet, so that the stone can neutralize the planet’s force. More inauspicious cases demand stronger measures, often involving rites in which the planetary inauspiciousness is given away through the medium of gifts (dana). For further consideration see Gloria Goodwin Raheja, The Poison in the Gift, 1988. See also Suryia.

Padma

(“lotus”) One of the richest symbols in Indian philosophy and iconography, both Hindu and Buddhist, and an invariably auspicious object. Its size and colors make it one of the most beautiful Indian flowers, but the lotus is also a potent symbol for spiritual realization. It is rooted in the mud—symbolizing the corrupting world with which all beings must contend—but it blooms above the surface of the water, signifying transcendence. The lotus plant’s underwater stems grow as long as necessary to get the flower bud above the water’s surface—whether three, five, or ten feet—symbolizing the human ability to overcome obstacles to spiritual progress. Finally, lotus leaves are covered with a waxy coating, upon which water beads up and flows off; one religious text, the Bhagavad Gita (5.10), uses this as a simile for the man who renounces all attachment and is untouched by the things of the world.

Aside from its symbolic content, the lotus is also an important element in Hindu iconography. It is one of the four identifying objects carried by the god Vishnu, along with the conch shell (shanka), club (gada), and discus (chakra). It is also commonly carried by the Goddess, both in her forms as Durga and related powerful goddesses, and in her beneficent and benevolent form as Lakshmi, who is usually portrayed as standing on a lotus. The lotus even figures in one of the common Hindu creation myths, in which a lotus sprouts from Vishnu’s navel and opens to reveal Brahma, who proceeds to create the earth. When the universe has run its course and is about to be destroyed, same process happens in reverse.

Padmapada

One of the two attested disciples of Shankaracharya—the other being Sureshvara—and the founder of the Vivarana school of Advaita Vedanta. The Advaita school upholds a philosophical position known as monism, which is the belief that a single Ultimate Reality, Brahman, lies behind all things, and that all things are merely differing forms of that reality. Advaita proponents claim that reality is nondual (advaita)—that is, that, despite the appearance of difference and diversity, all things are nothing but the formless, unqualified Brahman. For the Advaitins, the assumption of diversity is a fundamental misunderstanding of the ultimate nature of things, and a manifestation of avidya (lack of genuine understanding).
The defining characteristic of Padmapada's Vivarana school is that he places the locus of ignorance in Brahman, in contrast to the Bhamati school, which placed it in the individual. To explain how Brahman can be the locus of ignorance the Vivarana Advaitins invoke the theory of Reflectionism: Just as an image appearing in a mirror is based on the original, but different from it, so human selves are identical with Brahman, but appear to be separate. The basis of Padmapada's position is an uncompromising affirmation of Brahman as the sole “reality,” to which anything that exists must belong. For further information see Karl H. Potter (ed.), Advaita Vedanta up to Samkara and His Pupils, 1981; and Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Padmasana
(“lotus posture”) Well-known sitting position (asana) used in yoga and in meditation; the lotus posture is also one of the sitting positions in which deities are portrayed in Hindu iconography. In this position the person sits cross-legged, with each foot placed on the thigh of the opposite leg. One of its benefits is that it is extremely stable and well suited for meditation, since the angle of the lower legs keeps the upper part of the legs flat on the ground, making a wide base to support the body. Done properly, it also keeps the spine quite straight, which is thought essential to keep from constricting the channels in the subtle body. In Indian iconography, the lotus position is sometimes represented at the base of a statue by the sculpture of a lotus, which forms the base on which the image is placed.

Paduka
A wooden sandal used mainly by ascetics. It consists of a wooden sole and a mushroom-shaped front post, which is gripped with first two toes for stability. Padukas are used by ascetics not only because of their cheapness and durability, but because they are completely free of animal products such as leather, which are considered impure. Aside from their functional use as footwear, after death an ascetic's padukas will often be kept by his (or, more rarely, her) disciples, as a sign of their guru’s symbolic presence.

Padya

(“for the feet”) The third of the sixteen traditional upacharas (“offerings”) given to a deity as part of worship, on the model of treating the deity as an honored guest. In this offering, the deity is offered water for washing the feet, which would be a traditional act of hospitality for a guest coming in from outside. The actual act of offering can be performed in various ways and often depends on the worshiper’s inclinations. In some cases the water will simply be presented before the deity’s image with the understanding that the deity has taken it, whereas in other cases the devotee (bhakta) will physically wash the feet of the image. In either case, the underlying motive is to show love for the deity and to minister to the deity’s needs.

Paishacha Marriage

One of the eight ways to perform a marriage recognized in the dharma literature, the treatises on religious duty. Paishachas are a class of demons, so a marriage named after them is already suspect. The Paishacha marriage takes place when a man has intercourse with a woman who is drunk, unconscious, or asleep. Not surprisingly, this is one of the four reprehensible (aprashasta) forms of marriage, and because of the woman’s lack of conscious awareness, this form was forbidden, even though it was deemed a valid marriage. Here the writers’ concern seems to have been to give the “bride” legal status as a wife, rather to legitimate the actions of the “groom.” Although theoretically valid, this form of marriage has always been forbidden, and thus it has never been one of the common forms of marriage. See also marriage, eight classical forms.

Pahari

One of the two influential “schools” of Indian miniature painting, the other being the Rajasthani. The distinctions between schools are geographical and thus somewhat arbitrary, since, for example, the Basohli paintings belong to the Pahari school, but are stylistically closer to those of Rajasthan than to the later Pahari style.

The Pahari style flourished in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries in the small kingdoms in the Shiwalik Hills north and west of Delhi. It first appears in the kingdom of Basohli, where the influence of the Rajasthani school is the clearest, and later developed in the kingdoms of Jammu, Guler, Garhwal, and Kangra. The developed Pahari style differs from the Rajasthani in its emphasis on more linear drawing—perhaps influenced by European art—and a more restrained use of color, both features tending to give the paintings a more lyrical feel. For further information see W. G. Archer, Indian Painting, 1957; and “Pahari Miniatures: A Concise History,” in Marg, Vol. 28, No. 2, 1975.

Paithan

City and sacred site (tirtha) on the Godavari River in the state of Maharashtra, about 175 miles east of Bombay. Although of reduced importance in modern times, it has a long history as a trading city and was an important stopping-point on the central Indian trade route from southern India to Ujjain. Since the sixteenth century, Paithan has been famous as the home of Eknath, one of the important figures in the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba at his temple at Pandharpur in the modern state of Maharashtra. Varkari religious practice primarily consists of two pilgrimages, in which all the participants arrive in Pandharpur on the same day. Eknath still symbolically travels to Pandharpur twice each year; a palanquin (palkhi) bearing his sandals is at the head of the procession bearing his name.

Paksha
One of the parts in the accepted form of an inference (anumana) in Indian philosophy. The accepted form for an inference has three terms: an assertion (pratijna), a reason (hetu), and examples (drshtanta); each of these three has its own constituent parts. The paksha is part of the first term, the assertion, and comprises the class of things about which the assertion is to be proved. For instance, in the stock example, "There is fire on that mountain, because there is smoke on that mountain," the paksha in this case is "that mountain," or the class of things about which the assertion must be proved. The class that forms the paksha must also appear in the second term of the inference, the reason, as the common link between the two parts (as in "this mountain is on fire, because this mountain is smoking"). The paksha thus forms the common link between the assertion and the reason, thereby ensuring that the latter is relevant to the former.

In the context of a lunar month, the word paksha refers to the month's two "parts." The Shukla Paksha is the waxing half, while the Krishna Paksha is the waning half.

Pakudha Kacchayana
An atomistic early Indian philosopher whose views are mentioned in the Buddhist scriptures. As these scriptures portray him, Pakudha believed that seven things were eternal, unmoving, and unchanging—the four elements, ease, pain, and the soul. According to Pakudha, when a sword cuts a person's head in two, no one is deprived of life, rather the sword merely penetrates the interval between two elementary substances (presumably the soul and the material part of the person's body). This example seems to suggest an antisocial ethos, but beyond this, very little is known about him.

Pala Dynasty
(8th–12th c.) Eastern Indian dynasty whose ancestral homeland was in Bihar but whose core territory also spanned most of modern Bengal. The Pala dynasty's zenith came at the turn of the ninth century, when they controlled the entire northern Indian plain all the way into the Punjab region. Their rise to power came as a result of political instability in the Gangetic plain, and the Palas were quickly supplanted by the Gurjara-Pratihara dynasty while retaining sway over Bengal and Bihar for several centuries more. Their territory in Bengal was eventually taken by the Sena dynasty, and the Palas were finally conquered by the Gahadavalas in the middle of the twelfth century. The Palas and Senas are both noted for a particular type of sculpture, in which the images were made from black chlorite schist polished to a mirror finish.

Palani
Town and sacred site (tirtha) in the eastern part of the state of Tamil Nadu, about sixty miles northwest of Madurai. Palani is part of a network of six temples in Tamil Nadu dedicated to Murugan, a hill deity who has been assimilated into the larger pantheon as a form of the god Skanda, the son of Shiva. Five of these temples have been definitively identified, and each is associated with a particular region, a particular ecosystem, and a particular incident in Murugan's mythic career—in the case of Palani, Murugan lived there as a young ascetic. Every other shrine to Murugan in Tamil Nadu can be considered the sixth of these temples. The cult of Murugan is thus a symbolic vehicle for Tamil pride and identity, and since the number six has connotations of completeness—as in the six directions, or the six chakras in the subtle body—it also connotes that nothing external is needed. For

Palanquin

Platform or litter supported by poles on the shoulders of two or more men, and used as a respectful way to carry something or someone in procession. A palanquin can be used to carry the image of a deity in a ritual procession, or an ascetic leader or spiritual teacher (guru) by his (or more rarely, her) disciples, or the sandals (padukas) or other possessions connected with one’s spiritual leader, as in the Varkari Panth’s pilgrimage to Pandharpur.

Pallava Dynasty

(6th–9th c.) Southern Indian dynasty whose capital was at the city of Kanchipuram, and which ruled over much of the southern Indian peninsula between the sixth and ninth centuries. The greatest Pallava rulers were king Mahendravarman and his successors Narasimhavarman I and II. The reign of the Pallava dynasty was marked by the explosion of southern Indian culture: the development of Tamil literature, the devotional (bhakti) religious fervor of the groups known as the Alvars and the Nayanars, and the magnificent religious monuments at Mahabalipuram. Throughout much of its existence the Pallava empire carried on a running battle with the Chalukya and Pandya Dynasties, neither of which could prevail against it, but it was eventually absorbed by the next great southern Indian empire, the Chola dynasty. Palm Leaves

Until commercially produced paper became readily available, palm leaves were the most common writing medium in traditional India. The palm leaves were cut into narrow strips held together by a cord (sutra) running through a hole punched in the middle of the leaf. Palm leaf books usually had a top and bottom made from strips of wood, to protect the leaves, and these covers were often ornately decorated. The fragile nature of these palm leaves made regular copying necessary to preserve manuscripts, even though such frequent copying generally introduced errors. If left untended, the life span of a manuscript was at most fifty years, due to the deteriorations caused by the climate and the damage from a species of termite known as “white ants,” which fed on palm leaves. Pan

See betel.

Pancha Dravida

Collective name for the five main southern Indian brahmin communities, whose names largely correspond to the regions in which they live: the Gujaratis in the state of Gujarat, Maharashtris in the state of Maharashtra, Karnatas in the state of Karnataka, Andhras in the state of Andhra Pradesh, and Dravidas in deep southern India, in the states of Tamil Nadu and Kerala.

Pancha Gauda
Collective name for the five main northern Indian brahmin communities: the Gaudas and Kanaujias, who stretch over most of northern India; the Maithilas in the northern state of Bihar; the Utkalas in the coastal state of Orissa; and the Saraswats, traditionally found in several widely separated locations. One group lived in the coastal region of Sindh in modern Pakistan, although after Partition in 1947 most migrated to Bombay. Another group was located in prepartition Punjab, although here too they have tended to migrate away from the part of Punjab in modern Pakistan. A third branch, known as the Gauda Saraswats, is found on a narrow strip of coastline in the southern Indian state of Karnataka.

Panchagavya
(“five [products of the] cow”) A mixture of cow’s milk, curds, clarified butter (ghee), urine, and dung. Since each of these products comes from the sacred cow, it is considered a ritually purifying substance. Panchagavya is drunk for purification during rituals of expiation (prayashchitta), and it can also be used in other rituals used to purify people, objects, and places.

Panchagni-Tapa
(“five-fires asceticism”) Form of voluntary physical mortification, usually performed in the hot season, in which the person sits surrounded by four fires, the fifth fire being the sun overhead. Although this practice is now uncommon, it is very old and routinely named in the puranas and other religious texts as one of the standard ascetic practices. As with all forms of physical ascetic endurance (tapas), this rite is performed under the assumption that voluntarily enduring pain and/or hardship is a way to gain spiritual, religious, and magical power.

Panchak Nakshatra
A group of five (pancha) consecutive nakshatras (the twenty-seven signs in the lunar zodiac) in Indian astrology (jyotisha). The lunar houses are divided equally throughout the solar zodiac, with 2.25 lunar houses for each solar sign. In a single lunar month the moon moves through each of these lunar houses in turn, spending about a day in each. The Panchak Nakshatra is believed to be a highly inauspicious time, and people who pay attention to astrology will often severely curtail any nonessential activities until this time has passed.

Panchakroshi Yatra
A circular journey (yatra) in which pilgrims circumambulate the outer boundary of Kashi (the largest of the three concentric ritual areas contained in the city of Benares) and visit 108 shrines along the way. The journey’s length is reckoned at five kroshas (roughly ten miles), hence the name. The journey measures out the boundaries of the sacred city, and thus pilgrims symbolically circle the entire world. Although the best known Panchakroshi Yatra is in Benares, and the name is most commonly associated with this place, many other sacred sites (tirthas) have similar pilgrimage routes, and this process of a circular journey around a sacred spot is a common ritual motif.

Panchala
Name of the region corresponding to the middle part of the state of Uttar Pradesh, centered on the Ganges River valley around the city of Kanauj. Panchala is mentioned as a kingdom as early as the sixth century B.C.E., and although it became a tributary to the great empires such as the Mauryas.
Panchamahayajna

(4th–3rd c. B.C.E.), it retained an independent identity until the third century. See also Maurya dynasty.

Panchamahayajna

(“[the] five great sacrifices”) Set of five ritual actions—brahmayajna, pitryajna, devayajna, bhutayajna, and nryajana—that are prescribed in the dharma literature, (texts on religious duty). These five actions are prescribed daily religious observances for a “twice-born” householder, that is, a householder who has been born into one of the three “twice-born” groups in Indian society—brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya—and who has received the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” Each sacrifice (yajna) is directed toward a different class of beings—from the Absolute Reality down to animals—and is satisfied by different actions: to Brahman by teaching and studying the Veda, to the ancestral spirits (pitr) by offerings of water (tarpana), to the gods (deva) by offering clarified butter into the sacred fire, to the animals and social outcasts (bhut) by putting out food for them, and to human beings (nr) by showing hospitality to guests. In the time since the dharma literature was composed, Hindu life has seen significant changes in emphasis, and although some of these are still important in modern Hindu life—particularly the stress on hospitality to guests—in most cases the others have been either elided or replaced by other religious forms.

Panchamakara

“The Five Forbidden Things,” literally, “the five m’s”: A group of five things used for worship in the secret, ritually based religious practice known as tantra. This name arises because the names for all five of these begin with the letter “m”—madya (wine), matsya (fish), mamsa (meat), mudra (fermented or parched grain), and maithuna (copulation). They are used in their actual form in “left hand” (vamachara) tantra, and by substitution in “right hand” (dakshinachara) tantra.

All five are condemned by “respectable” Hindu society (the last because it is characterized as adulterous), and their use in tantric ritual must be seen in a larger context. One of the most pervasive tantric assumptions is the ultimate unity of everything that exists. From a tantric perspective, to affirm that the entire universe is one principle—often conceived as the activity of a particular deity—means that the adept must reject all concepts based on dualistic thinking. The “Five Forbidden Things” provide a ritual means for breaking down duality, since in this ritual the adept violates societal norms forbidding consumption of intoxicants, non-vegetarian food, and illicit sexuality, in a conscious effort to sanctify what is normally forbidden. Tantric adepts cite such ritual use of forbidden things as proof that their practice involves a more exclusive qualification (adhikara) and is thus superior to common practice. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1977; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Panchang

In Indian astrology (jyotisha), an almanac documenting the position of the various celestial bodies during the course of a calendar year, including the days of the moon’s monthly cycle, its progression through the nakshatras, and the position of the planets. Most Hindu religious festivals fall according to a lunar calendar, and thus a panchang is needed to determine when they will arrive. A panchang is also important for helping people to determine auspicious and inauspicious times for the performance of certain activities. The greatest care is taken in fixing marriage times, to avoid any possible inauspiciousness that could affect the marriage, but in many cases a panchang will be consulted before initiating any important activity.

Pancharatra
("five nights," of uncertain meaning)
The name denotes a particular group of Vaishnavas (devotees of the god Vishnu). Although there is plenty of evidence that the Pancharatra community is very old, very little is known about its origins. In the earliest Vaishnava sectarian texts, the Pancharatra community is unfavorably compared to another group, the Bhagavatas, with the former described as marginal and the latter as "Vedic" and respectable. Despite this seeming disapproval, in their earliest appearances Pancharatras do not seem theologically different from the Bhagavatas, although their differences may have been rooted in differing practices. In their later history, the Pancharatras become associated with an elaborate theory of creation, finalized somewhere around the sixth century and based on the successive appearance of four divine emanations: Vishnu-Narayana, Sankarshana, Pradyumna, and Aniruddha. The successive activity of these divine emanations brings the world into being, but each is also associated with a particular facet of spiritual life through which human beings can reverse the process of creation and gain liberation. The Pancharatra school is also important for its theory of primary and secondary avatars, in which the latter can include any properly consecrated image of the deity. The doctrine of secondary avatars has become a pivotal idea in the later Shrivaishnava community, through which Pancharatra ideas have continued to influence modern Hindu life.

Panchatantra
("Five Treatises") A collection of moralistic fables intended to impart practical and worldly wisdom. The fables themselves are framed by the story of a king who is distressed by his sons' lack of learning and good moral character, which gives him grave misgivings about their ability to rule well after his death. He resolves this problem by hiring a person to teach the boys through fables, each of which usually has several shorter fables embedded in it to give moral lessons along the way. These fables are intended to provide pragmatic advice about how to be successful in the real world, particularly in the art of statecraft. This pragmatic focus can lead one to characterize the text's advice as opportunistic, particularly since it encourages caution and self-interest as the keys to success. The Panchatantra exists in several versions, of which the most famous is the Hitopadesha. The text has been translated numerous times; a version found its way to Europe, where it became the basis for the fables of La Fontaine.

Panchavati
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, the place where three of the epic's central characters—the god-king Rama, his wife Sita, and his brother Lakshmana—live during much of their fourteen years of forest exile. It is from here that Sita is kidnapped by Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka. Although the events in the Ramayana cannot be definitively set in any specific place, there is a village named Panchavati, outside the city of Nasik in the state of Maharashtra, which is identified with the mythic site.

Panchayat
In traditional India, a group of five (pancha) elders from a particular community, who were the final authority for the members of that community. Each jati (endogamous subcommunity, often defined by hereditary occupation) was a self-governing body, for which the panchayat would make all the important decisions. In modern India this institution is being hailed as a paradigm for decentralized government, in which the people themselves take responsibility for their communities, but since there are multiple jatis in any traditional Hindu village, this also means that there were multiple centers of authority.

Panchayatana (“five-abode”) Puja

Type of worship (puja) performed by Smarta brahmins, a group of brahmins distinguished, not by region or family, but by the religious texts they hold most authoritative—in this case, those known as the smritis rather than sectarian religious texts. The panchayatana puja is marked by the simultaneous worship of five different deities—usually Vishnu, Shiva, Surya, Ganesh, and the Goddess. Individual Smartas may choose one or another from among these as their primary deity, but all these deities are ritually honored since they are all considered manifestations of the divine.

Panchkedar

(“The Five Kedars”) The collective name for a network of five sites, sacred to the god Shiva, spread throughout the Garhwal region of the Himalayas: Kedarnath, Rudranath, Tungnath, Madmaheshvar, and Kalpeshvar. Each site is identified with a part of Shiva’s body, thus providing a series of connections between the deity’s body and the land itself—understandably so, since Shiva is believed to dwell in the Himalayas. Kedarnath is identified as Shiva’s back, Madmaheshvar his navel, Tungnath his arm, Rudranath his face, and Kalpeshvar his matted locks (jata).

Panchvani

(“Five Voices”) Manuscript collection compiled by the Dadupanth, a religious community founded by the northern Indian poet-saint Dadu (1554–1603). The collection contains the works of five different devotional (bhakti) poet-saints: Dadu, Kabir, Namdev, Ravidas, and Hardas. Rajasthan’s desert climate has helped to preserve these manuscripts, some of which date from the early seventeenth century. The Panchvani manuscripts are among the earliest written sources for these poets, which makes them an important resource for the historical study of northern Indian devotional poetry. For further information on the literary resources of the Dadupanth, see Winand Callewaert (trans.), The Sarvangi of the Dadupanthi Rajab, 1978; and The Sarvangi of Gopaldas, 1993.

Panda

A hereditary priest who assists pilgrims with any rituals they may need or desire to perform, and also with any other needs that the pilgrims may have. Each panda family in any given pilgrimage place (tirtha) has the exclusive rights to serve pilgrims coming from a particular geographical area or areas; pilgrims are supposed to seek out the panda serving their native region, whether or not the pilgrims still live in that place. On every visit, pilgrims will make an entry in the panda’s pilgrim register (bahi), detailing the names of those who visited and the reason that they came. Some of these registers date back hundreds of years, and the documents are the ultimate proof of the hereditary connection between panda and pilgrim families. In earlier times this hereditary relationship was essential for the pilgrims, since their connection with their pandas provided resources while traveling—lodging, food, and other sorts of support. The pandas would minister to their clients, arrange for any needed rites, and even lend them money, if necessary. Pilgrims would usually give the panda a token gift when they departed, along with a pledge for some larger amount, which the pandas would travel to their homes to pick up.

Although pandas are often characterized as greedy and rapacious—based on their tendency to demand what they think a client is able to pay—in its ideal form both parties benefit from the relationship. In recent years, the pandas have become less central figures in many pilgrimage places, and consequently, their status and their income have declined. Many pilgrimage places have been developed as sites for religious tourism, and hotels and facilities that have been built at these places have rendered pilgrims less dependent on their pandas for accommodation. At the same time, recent years have seen a general decline in the performance of ritual acts, except for the most important, particularly those connected with death.

Pandava

("sons of Pandu") A collective name for the five brothers who are the protagonists of the Mahabharata: Yudhishthira, Arjuna, Bhima, Nakula, and Sahadeva. Although they are named after king Pandu, none are actually his son, since Pandu has been cursed to die the moment he holds his wife in amorous embrace. Rather, they are magically conceived through a mantra given by the sage Durvasas to Kunti, Pandu’s senior wife. The mantra gives the woman who recites it the power to call down any god and to have, by that god, a son equal in power to himself. Kunti uses this mantra to bear Yudhishthira by the god Dharma, Arjuna by the storm-god Indra, and Bhima by the wind-god Vayu. With Pandu’s blessing Kunti also teaches the mantra to her co-wife Madri, who meditates on the Ashvins (divine twins who are the physicians to the gods), and delivers the twins Nakula and Sahadeva. The basic theme of the Mahabharata is the story of the struggle for royal power between the Pandavas and their cousins, the Kauravas, which culminates in a war that destroys the entire family.

Pandharpur

City and sacred site (tirtha) on the Bhima River in the state of Maharashtra, about 185 miles east and south of Bombay. Pandharpur is best known for the temple to the god Vithoba, and has been a center of worship for the Varkari Panth religious community for at least seven hundred years. Varkari rituals center around a twice-yearly pilgrimage to Pandharpur, in which the pilgrims all arrive on the same day. Each pilgrim procession starts from a different place and is identified with one of the poet-saints who helped form the community. At the front of each procession is a palanquin (palkhi) bearing the sandals of that group’s particular saint, who is thus symbolically leading them into Pandharpur. For more information see G. A. Deleury, The Cult of Vithoba, 1960; I. B. Karve, “On the Road,” Journal of Asian Studies, Vol. 22, No. 1, 1962; and Digambar Balkrishna Mokashi, Palkhi, 1987.

Pandrenthan
Historical site south of the city of Srinagar in Kashmir. Pandrenthan is famous for one of the few old Hindu temples still standing in Kashmir, a temple dedicated to the god Shiva built in the twelfth century C.E. The shrine itself is fairly small and simple. The floor plan is basically square, with each side 17.5 feet long and an entrance on each side giving the temple an open feel. Each doorway has a gable over it projecting out from a pyramidal roof known to builders as a hip roof. The temple is built entirely of stone but has overlapping courses, in an attempt to mimic wooden construction.

Pandu
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, the son of the sage Vyasa and queen Ambalika. Pandu and his brother Dhrtarashtra are born as the result of a desperate attempt to preserve the royal line of King Shantanu after Shantanu's son Vichitravirya dies without heirs. Upon Vichitravirya's death, his mother Satyavati calls upon her eldest son, Vyasa, to sleep with Vichitravirya's wives, Ambika and her sister Ambalika, in the hope that the women will conceive. According to tradition Vyasa is very ugly, and each woman reacts involuntarily when Vyasa appears in her bed: Ambika covers her eyes, causing her son Dhrtarashtra to be born blind, and Ambalika turns pale, causing her son Pandu to be born with an unnaturally pale complexion. Given Dhrtarashtra's blindness, Pandu is the best suited to rule; he marries Kunti and Madri and lives quite happily as the king.

This idyllic time abruptly ends one day while he is hunting in the forest and shoots a deer while it is mating. To his horror, he discovers that the deer is the sage Kindama, who has taken this form for sport with his wife; with his dying breath, the sage curses Pandu that he will die the moment he touches his wife in an amorous embrace. Since he has no children, and the curse condemns him to die without an heir, Pandu abdicates the throne in favor of his brother Dhrtarashtra and goes with his wives to live as an ascetic in the Himalayas. At this time Kunti tells him about the mantra she has received years before from the sage Durvasas, which gives the woman who recites it the power to call down any of the gods and to have by him a son equal in power to himself. With Pandu's blessing Kunti and Madri bear five heroic sons, the five Pandava brothers. They all live happily together until one day when Pandu, swayed by the intoxicating influence of spring, ignores Madri's warnings and embraces her. The sage's curse takes effect and Pandu falls dead, although, through the power of the mantra, his family line continues.

Pandurang
("pale") Epithet of the god Vithoba, whose primary place of worship is in the holy city of Pandharpur in the state of Maharashtra. See Vithoba.

Pandya Dynasty
(6th–14th c.) Southern Indian dynasty whose capital was in the city of Madurai in the state of Tamil Nadu. The Pandyas existed as a regional power as early as the late sixth century, when they fought the Pallava dynasty of Kanchipuram for control of the peninsula. The Pandyas at one time became vassals to the Chola dynasty when the latter reigned over all of southern India, but with the decline of the Cholas the Pandyas became the dominant regional power, eventually absorbing the Chola kingdom in 1279. At their zenith in the thirteenth century the Pandyas controlled most of the southern part of India, but were in turn conquered and annexed early in the fourteenth century by the Sangama dynasty, also known as the Vijayanagar dynasty after their capital city.

Panguni
Twelfth month in the Tamil solar year, corresponding to the northern Indian solar month of Mina (the zodiacal sign of Pisces), which usually falls within March and April. This name is a modification of Phalgun, the twelfth month of the lunar calendar. The existence of several different calendars is one clear sign of the continuing importance of regional cultural patterns. One way that the Tamils retain their culture is by preserving their traditional calendar. Tamil is one of the few regional languages in India with an ancient, well-established literary tradition. See also Tamil months, Tamil Nadu, and Tamil language.

Pani
A group of northern Indian people mentioned in a hymn in the Rg Veda (10.108), the oldest Hindu religious text. This reference speaks poorly of this group, since it portrays them as cattle thieves. The hymn is spoken as a dialogue between the Panis and Sarama, the divine dog who is the servant of the god Indra and who has been sent by Indra to recover the cattle the Panis have stolen. This hymn may refer to an actual incident and an actual group of people, but it is impossible to say. Certainly the Vedas were not written as a strict historical record, and it is perilous to read them as such. At the same time, as the earliest textual records they preserve references to the culture and to contemporary times that can be found nowhere else.

Panigrahana
A minor rite, performed in many Hindu marriages, in which the groom grasps the bride's right hand as a symbol of their impending marital union. See also marriage customs.

Panini
(4th c. B.C.E.) The greatest Sanskrit grammarian, whose descriptive account of that language in his Ashtadhyayi (“Eight Sections”) became the prescriptive norm for the language in later generations. Panini was not the earliest grammarian, since he names several in his text; his genius lay rather in his skills as an organizer and systematizer. Each of the Ashtadhyayi's eight sections is written as a series of brief aphorisms (sutras), each of which provides the foundation and necessary background for those that follow. Panini's use of this form allowed him to provide a complete account of the language in the briefest possible space, and the text's condensed form made it easier to memorize. As with most sutra texts, the Ashtadhyayi's terseness of expression presupposes a commentary, of which the most famous is the Mahabhashya, written by the grammarian Patanjali in the second century B.C.E.

Panth
General term used for a particular religious community, such as the Dadupanth, Varkari Panth, or the Nanak Panth—an older name for the Sikh community, which has simply been abridged to “Panth” by contemporary Sikhs. The word is derived from the Sanskrit word for “path” and is here used metaphorically to indicate a fixed pattern of belief and behavior, often rooted in a particular individual's teachings. There is a certain amount of semantic overlap between the words panth and sampraday, both of which denote religious communities, and there is no hard-and-fast rule dividing the two. In general, however, the term
Panth is more closely associated with movements in the sant religious tradition, which tended toward rebellion against the prevailing religious establishment, whereas sampraday is more commonly applied to groups that evolved within these established religious communities.

Pap

("evil") A word sometimes used as an adjective to describe people and actions, but most often used as a noun, either to denote a particular deed as evil or to refer to the collective evil one has accumulated through the bad deeds in one's karmic career. Since, according to karma theory, all one's deeds will eventually come to fruition, the evil that one has done is seen as already existing, even if only in a potential state. The opposite of pap is punya, the most general term denoting religious merit.

Papamochani Ekadashi

Religious observance falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Chaitra (March–April). The name Papamochani means "freeing from evil," and the faithful observance of this festival is believed to do exactly that. As with all the eleventh-day observances, it is dedicated to the worship of Vishnu. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, which usually involve fasting (upavasa) and worship (puja), and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. On this day one should worship Vishnu with the full complement of the sixteen upacharas ("offerings").

Papankusha Ekadashi

Religious observance falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Ashvin (September–October). As with all the eleventh-day observances, it is dedicated to the worship of Vishnu. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, which usually involve fasting (upavasa) and worship (puja), and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. This ekadashi's name indicates that it is the goad (ankusha) to drive away all evil (pap), here fancifully conceived as an elephant. Thus, faithfully observing this festival is believed to cleanse one of all one's sins.

Parakiya

("belonging to another") Particular type of relationship between lover and beloved, in which the woman is seen as married to another person. Parakiya is said to generate the most intense passion, since the people pursuing it have nothing to gain but love itself—if caught, they risk ridicule and shame, and in any case their liaison has no real future. This is not the conventional, safe love with one's own spouse (svakiya) that is sanctioned by marriage, carries social approval, and usually entails procreation, but rather a dangerous love pursued solely for pleasure. This type of relationship is a standard image in Sanskrit poetry, and is also the dominant theme for describing the relationship between the god Krishna and his human consort Radha, which is seen as symbolizing the relationship between god and the human soul.

Paramahamsa

("supreme Hamsa") One of four types of Hindu ascetic. The four types were based on their supposed means of livelihood, which in practice has been much less important for ascetic identity than sectarian or organizational affiliation. The Paramahamsa is the most prestigious of the four, the others being (in order of increasing status) Kutichaka, Bahudaka, and Hamsa. Paramahamsas have no fixed abode and always live in an uninhabited place. They are said to have transcended all questions of religious duty (dharma), purity, and impurity (ashaucha), to have broken all attachments to the world, and to be continually immersed in contemplation of the Supreme Brahman.

The word Paramahamsa has a more specialized meaning among the Dashanami Sanyasis, ascetic devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva whose organization is divided into ten sections, each designated by a particular name. Here the name Paramahamsa refers to an ascetic who comes from one of the three twice-born (dvija) varnas—that is, who is a brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya, the three social groups with higher symbolic status—and who has been initiated as a Sanyasi in one of the six divisions that will accept non-brahmins. Paramahamsas have higher status in these divisions than the Naga or fighting ascetics, who will initiate shudras, but lower status than the Dandis, who are invariably brahmins.

Paramatman
(“the highest self”) Term generally used as a synonym for Brahman, the unqualified and undifferentiated reality that is seen as the source of all things, and the sole true power in the universe. This name, through its inclusion of the Self (atman) as part of the term, also emphasizes the identity in kind between Brahman and atman, between Supreme Reality and the individual Self.

Parampara
(“succession”) The general term for the spiritual lineage maintained by the transmission of knowledge and power from guru to disciple. Such lineages form the basis for tracing spiritual descent within religious communities, particularly in secret traditions such as tantra. In a religious context, one's spiritual lineage is an important factor in establishing an identity and connections with others in the school, in the same way a biological lineage places one within a family.

Parashara
In Hindu mythology, a legendary sage who is the grandson of the sage Vasishtha. He is credited with authoring the Parashara Smrti, an important and early work in the dharma literature. Parashara is best known as the father of the sage Vyasa, whom he begets through a maiden named Satyavati. Satyavati makes her living ferrying people across the Ganges River, and although she is a beautiful young woman, she always smells of fish because her mother is a celestial nymph who has been cursed to live as a fish in the Ganges. Struck by Satyavati’s beauty while she is ferrying him across the river, Parashara creates an artificial fog to give them the privacy to have sexual intercourse. As a reward, he gives her the boon that, from that day onward, she will smell of musk instead of fish.

Parashara Smriti
One of the smritis or “remembered” texts, a class of literature deemed important but less authoritative than the other textual category, the shrutis, or “heard” texts. This smrti is ascribed to the sage Parashara, and is an example of one of the Dharma Shastras, which were manuals prescribing rules for correct human behavior and ideal social life. Unlike the Dharma Sutras, which are ascribed to recognizable individuals, the Dharma Shastras are usually ascribed to mythic sages as a strategy to reinforce the authority of these texts. At 592 verses, the Parashara Smriti is relatively short, and it treats only two themes, religious custom (achara) and expiation (prayashchitta). The text is estimated to have been written between the first and fifth centuries, but in the fourteenth century it received an extensive commentary by Madhava, and the resulting work, known as the Parasharamadhava, has continued to be influential since then.
Parashu

("battle-axe") A characteristic object in Hindu iconography, and one that appears in various forms—sometimes with a very light, thin handle and a larger head, at other times with a handle the size of a club (gada) and a very small, thin head. This weapon has the strongest mythic associations with Vishnu’s sixth avatar or incarnation, Parashuram, who uses it in his war of extermination against the ruling kshatriya class when their pride has grown too strong. The battle-axe is also commonly carried by the god Ganesha and signifies his power to cut through obstacles and impediments. It also commonly appears in various images of the deities Shiva, Vishnu, and the Goddess, as one among their galaxy of weapons.

Parashuram Avatar

Sixth avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu. As with all the avatars of Vishnu, the Parashuram avatar comes to restore a cosmic equilibrium that has been thrown out of balance, in this case from the overweening abuse of power by the warrior (kshatriya) class. Parashuram is the son of Jamadagni, a brahmin sage whose most precious possession is Surabhi, a cow that will grant its owner any desired wish. One day when Parashuram is away, the king comes to Jamadagni’s ashram. When he sees the cow, he desires it, and when Jamadagni refuses to give it to him, the king takes it by force.

When Parashuram learns of this, he becomes fiercely angry. Taking up his parashu (or battle-axe, a weapon particularly associated with him), he enters into battle with the king and eventually kills him. When the king’s sons remain rebellious in opposition to him, Parashuram makes twenty-one journeys around India, destroying all of the kshatriyas that he can find, in an effort to wipe them from the face of the earth. The major theme of this story is the conflict between the brahmin and kshatriya classes, and the realities of living in a society in which brahmans had religious authority but kshatriyas had the power of enforcement. This story reveals a strong concern for the sanctity of a brahmin’s possessions and highlights the perils of taking them by force. The writers behind the story were almost certainly brahmans, and their remarks on the perils of taking a brahmin’s possessions doubtless reflect an insecurity about their ability to supersede governmental power.

In addition to the story of exterminating the kshatriyas, Parashuram appears in the epic Mahabharata as the person who teaches the heroic Karna the art of weapons and warfare. The epic portrays Parashuram as powerful and irascible, and as possessing such continuing hatred of kshatriyas that he refuses to take them as students. When Parashuram discovers that Karna is a kshatriya and not a brahmin, as he has claimed to be, he lays a curse on Karna that, in his hour of greatest need, he will forget everything he has learned as his student.

Parashurameshvar Temple
Temple constructed about 750 C.E. in the city of Bhubaneshvar in the state of Orissa, dedicated to the god Shiva in his aspect as the “Lord of Parashuram.” This title refers to Parashuram’s long period of asceticism, in which he worshiped Shiva as his chosen deity and was rewarded with Shiva’s grace. The temple is an early example of the Orissan variant of the northern Indian Nagara temple style. The Nagara style emphasizes verticality, with the whole temple building culminating in a single high point, and the Orissan variant of this style has a single enormous tower (deul) over the image of the temple’s primary deity, with shorter subsidiary buildings leading up to it. The Parashurameshvar temple is the first example of this basic pattern—a low, flat assembly hall (jagamohan), followed by a much taller and narrower tower (deul), in this case about forty feet high. Although later Orissan temples are much larger—some of the deuls tower over 200 feet—and often include additional buildings and structures, they all retain this basic pattern.

Parashuram Jayanti
Festival marking the birthday of Parashuram avatar, Vishnu’s sixth avatar. This takes place on the third day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Baisakh (April–May), the same day as the festival of Akshaya Trtiya.

Parikshit
Mythic king in the Lunar Line, who serves as an example that one’s fate cannot be escaped. Parikshit is the grandson of Arjuna, one of the five Pandava brothers who are the protagonists in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics. Parikshit inherits the throne from Yudhishthira, Arjuna’s elder brother, and according to tradition rules righteously for sixty years, but it is his death that is best remembered. Fond of hunting, Parikshit one day comes across a meditating sage while he is chasing a wounded deer. When the sage refuses to answer to his inquiries about the deer, Parikshit grows angry and, with his bow, drapes a dead cobra around the sage’s neck. The sage remains unaware of this, but his son finds out about it when his playmates jeer at him. Furious, the son lays a curse that the person responsible will be fatally bitten within seven days by the great serpent Takshaka. When he discovers that the king is responsible, the son repents his curse to the King.

Parikshit takes all possible precautions to avoid his fate. He builds a house on a huge pillar, has anything brought into the house carefully searched, and surrounds himself with physicians who can cure snakebite. After six days without incident, the king begins to relax his vigilance. As the seventh day is ending, Takshaka conceals himself as a worm in a piece of fruit, changes into his real shape when the fruit is cut open, and bites the king, killing him.

Parinamavada
(“transformation–relationship”) Philosophical perspective that explains the relationship between the Ultimate Reality or realities and the perceivable world, and describes the world as a genuine transformation of this reality.

This position is espoused by proponents of the Samkhya, Vishishthadvaita Vedanta, and Bhedabhada philosophical schools. All three of these are proponents of a causal model called satkaryavada. The satkaryavada model assumes that effects preexist in their causes, and that, when these effects appear, they are transformations (parinama) of those causes. The classic example for this model is the transformation of milk to curds, butter, and clarified butter: each of these effects was already present in the cause, emerges from it through a natural transformation of that cause, and is causally related to it.

All three schools believe that the world as perceived is real and has some single ultimate source behind it: for the Samkhyas, the first principles are purusha and prakrti, for the Visheshthadvaita school, the god Vishnu, and for the Bhedabhada school, Brahman. All believe that real things come into being because these first principles undergo real transformations. Parinamavada allows for an explanation of the phenomenal world that compromises the transcendence of these first principles by making them part of the world. Philosophically, their difficulties arise in describing how the transcendent can become mundane, and then become transcendent again.

The transformation relationship is vehemently opposed by the Advaita Vedanta philosophical school, which upholds a philosophical position known as monism (the belief that a single Ultimate Reality lies behind all things, and that all things are merely differing forms of that reality). Advaita proponents claim that reality is non-dual (advaita)—that is, that all things are “actually” the formless, unqualified Brahman, despite the appearance of difference and diversity in the world. Since Brahman is the only real thing, and Brahman never changes, the parinama model is a fundamental misunderstanding of the ultimate nature of things, since it assumes real change. The Advaita proponents’ explanation for the nature of the relationship and the world is known as vivartavada (“illusory manifestation”), in which the ultimate appears to become transformed but in reality never changes. For further information see Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957; and Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India’s Philosophies, 1972.

Parivartini Ekadashi

Religious observance falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Bhadrapada (August–September). As are all the eleventh-day observances, this is dedicated to the worship of Vishnu. This day is particularly devoted to the worship of Vishnu’s wife Lakshmi, the goddess presiding over wealth and prosperity. In her form as Mahalakshmi (as told in the Devimahatmya) she is able to kill demons that the gods cannot, and restore to gods the kingdom they have lost. This festival occurs during the time Vishnu is believed to be sleeping on the serpent Shesha, on an ocean of milk, with Lakshmi massaging his feet. The name Parivartini means “turning,” and on this day Vishnu is believed to be stirring in his sleep. See also ocean, churning of the; and cosmology.

Parivrajaka

(from Sanskrit parivraj, “to wander about”) A term that can be used to denote any wandering religious mendicant. Continual wandering is a very old Indian ascetic practice. It shows the conscious renunciation of the fixed and stable world of the householder, particularly in earlier societies, and it prevents the wanderer from forming any sort of attachments, even to places. This exemplifies the fourth and final stage of life found in the dharma literature, the sanyasi, in which a person has renounced all attachments of everyday life to search for spiritual attainment.

Parmananddas

(early 16th c.) One of the ashtachap, a group of eight northern Indian bhakti (devotional) poets. The compositions of these eight poets were used for liturgical purposes by the Pushti Marg, a religious community whose members are devotees (bhakta) of Krishna. In the Pushti Marg’s sectarian literature, all eight are also named as members of the community and as associates of either the community's founder, Vallabhacharya, or his successor Vitthalnath. Little is known about Parmananddas himself, although tradition asserts that he was a Kanaujia brahmin, and the corpus of poetry attributed to him is much larger in later sources, suggesting that his name was used by later writers. The evidence from the earliest sources suggests that he was a devoted follower of Vallabhacharya. Much of his poetry is specifically written for the Pushti Marg, such as hymns in praise of Vallabhacharya, or hymns to be sung for the worship of Krishna throughout the day, a form of piety that came to characterize the Pushti Marg. To date, his works have not been translated, perhaps because of their sectarian character.

Parvana
A particular type of the memorial rites for the dead known as shraddhas. A parvana shraddha can be performed at specific times throughout the year, such as the new moon, but is most commonly performed during the Fortnight of the Fathers (Pitrpaksha), which falls during the waning moon in the lunar month of Bhadrapada. Whereas an ekoddishta shraddha is performed for any particular deceased individual, the parvana shraddha invokes first the paternal father, grandfather, and great-grandfather, then the same ancestors on the mother's side. The rite is performed to give benefits to all of these ancestors, although the father's ancestors are considered the primary recipients.

Parvata Dashanami
One of the ten divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva. The Dashanamis were supposedly established by the ninth century philosopher Shankaracharya, in an effort create a corps of learned men who could help to revitalize Hindu life. Each of the divisions is designated by a different name—in this case, parvata (“mountain”). Upon initiation, new members are given this name as a surname to their new ascetic names, thus allowing for immediate group identification.

Aside from their individual identity, these ten “named” divisions are divided into four larger organizational groups. Each group has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by Shankaracharya. The Parvata Dashanamis belong to the Anandawara group, which is affiliated with the Jyotir math in the Himalayan town of Joshimath.
Parvati by making disparaging remarks about Shiva’s lifestyle and personality, but Parvati, unshaken in her resolve, refuses to listen. Eventually Shiva reveals his true form to her, and they are married.

Although in his devotion to his wife Shiva is the Hindu symbol for the ideal husband, their family life is unusual. Since Shiva is the symbol for the perfect ascetic, the couple has no fixed home or means of support, and occasionally Parvati is portrayed as complaining of being an ascetic’s wife. Symbolically, their marriage represents the domestication of the ascetic and his entrance into social and family life. Their union highlights the cultural tension between the two most important Hindu religious ideals: the householder and the renunciant ascetic. Perhaps to illustrate the contradiction of being a married ascetic, Shiva and Parvati have children but not in the normal way: Skanda develops from Shiva's semen, which falls on the ground during their interrupted love-making, while Ganesh is formed of the enlivened dirt from Parvati's body.

Parvati, as with all married Hindu goddesses, is generally seen as benign and benevolent. In some mythic stories she can be spiteful, but on the whole she projects a nurturing and motherly presence. Her mythology is almost completely connected with that of Shiva, showing her subordination as the model wife, and her worship is generally connected with him as well. She occupies an important position in tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice, since in tantric texts Parvati is usually portrayed as the person questioning Shiva and then as the student receiving his instruction. For more information on Parvati and all the goddesses of Hinduism, see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Paryanka
("bedstead") One of the postures (asanas) described in commentaries to the Yoga Sutras, in which the person is lying down with the arms stretched around the knees.

Pasha
("noose") In Indian iconography, one of the weapons carried by some of the divinities, especially Ganesh and Yama. For Ganesh, as the "Lord of Obstacles," the noose signifies his ability to bind (and release) obstacles, whereas Yama, the god of death, uses the noose to draw the soul from the body at the time of death. In the Shaiva Siddhanta religious community, pasha is also the name given to Shiva's power of illusion (maya), through which he entraps and enthralls unenlightened people (pashu). The triad of pasha, pashu, and Shiva as lord (pati) are the defining features of the Shaiva Siddhanta school.

Pashu
("beast") In the philosophical school known as Shaiva Siddhanta, and in the secret, ritually based religious practice known as tantra, the term for an unenlightened person, who is said to have a human form but to be little better than an animal. This lack of awareness comes not just through inherent dullness, but through the activity of maya, the power of illusion wielded by Shiva as lord (pati). The triad of pasha, pati and the bonds of illusion (pasha) are defining features of the Shaiva Siddhanta school.

Pashupata
An extinct ascetic community, of devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva in his form as Pashupati, "the Lord of Beasts." Although the Pashupatas have now disappeared, according to the Chinese pilgrim Hsuan Tsang they were once the most important ascetic sect in northern India. According to historical reports, its members would engage in strange and antisocial behavior intended to bring disgrace upon themselves, although without lust or malice in their hearts. This practice was in imitation of one of Shiva's mythic tales, in which he exposed himself to the wives of the Sages in the Pine Forest but was without desire for them. For further information see Daniel H. H. Ingalls, "Cynics and Pasupatas: The Seeking of Dishonor," in Harvard Theological Review, 55, 1962.

Pashupati
("Lord of Beasts") Epithet of the god Shiva in his form as the "Lord of Beasts." See Shiva.
The Pashupatinath Temple in Katmandu, Nepal, is dedicated to the god Shiva as "Master of the Lord of the Beasts."

Pashupatinath

Temple and sacred site (tirtha) in Katmandu, Nepal. The temple is named for its presiding deity, who is the god Shiva in his form as Pashupatinath, "the Master of the Lord of Beasts." This is considered an extremely powerful site, and one of its charter myths connects it to Kedarnath, a sacred site high in the Himalayas. According to the story, the five Pandava brothers, who are the protagonists in the epic Mahabharata, are making their final journey into the Himalayas in search of a vision of Shiva. They finally see him at a distance, but when they try to get closer, Shiva takes the form of a bull and begins running through the snow. The bull burrows into a snow bank, and when the Pandavas follow, they find the body of the bull in the snow. The ridge of rock that forms the Kedarnath linga is considered to be the hump of this bull. The bull's head continues traveling over the hills, eventually stopping in Nepal, where it takes form as the deity Pashupatinath.

Patala

A generic name for the realms of the underworld, traditionally numbered at seven to parallel the seven heavens that are believed to exist above the visible world. These underworld realms are not considered to be hells but rather planes of existence other than the visible world, populated by the Nagas and other non-human beings.

Pataliputra

Capital city of the Mauryan empire, identified with modern Patna, the capital of Bihar state. See also Maurya dynasty.

Patanjali

(2nd c. B.C.E.) Sanskrit grammarian and author of the Mahabhashya ("Great Commentary") on Panini's Ashtadhyayi. Panini's text was written as a series of short phrases or aphorisms intended to be a complete description of the language in the briefest possible space. Panini's text was a marvel of economy and was easy to memorize but was so cryptic that it virtually presupposed a commentary, which Patanjali provided. Patanjali’s Mahabhashya is not only important for his explication of Panini’s grammar, but also because his examples often provide useful historical information.

Patanjali is also the person named as the author of the Yoga Sutras, but since these are believed to have been composed several centuries after the Mahabhashya, the authors are believed to be two different people with the same name.

Pati

(“master”) In the philosophical school known as Shaiva Siddhanta, the name given to the god Shiva as the highest being, who wields the noose (pasha) of illusion to enthral and bewilder unenlightened people (pashu). The triad of pashu, pati and pasha are the defining features of the Shaiva Siddhanta school.

Patita

(“fallen one”) In the dharma literature, the term for someone who had committed one of the Four Great Crimes: murdering a brahmin (brahmahatya), stealing a brahmin’s gold (steya), drinking liquor (surapana), and adultery with one’s guru’s wife (gurutalpaga). These crimes were considered so heinous that the performer became an outcast from society. Another indication of the gravity of these acts was that their expiations (prayashchitta) were so severe they normally ended in death, and in some cases this outcome was specifically prescribed. Aside from prescribing such punishments for the actual offenders, the dharma literature also prescribed similar outcast status for anyone who knowingly associated with such people for more than one year.

Pattadakal

Historical site in the state of Karnataka, about twenty miles east of the city of Badami. During the Chalukya dynasty, Pattadakal was an important urban center and a sister city to the Chalukya capital at Badami. Although nearly deserted today, the site is important for a collection of temples built in a variety of architectural styles during that era. The Virupaksha temple, dedicated in 740 C.E. during the reign of King Vikramaditya, clearly shows the influence of the southern Indian Dravida architectural style: a mostly low and extended profile, with a series of terraced roofs over the main sanctuary. It is believed to have been modeled after the temples in the city of Kanchipuram, which had been conquered by Vikramaditya, who brought its architects and builders back to Pattadakal with him. At the same time, there are temples showing the early development of the Nagara style, in which the major architectural feature is a series of upswept towers (shikharas), with the tallest tower directly over the image of the temple’s primary deity. The best example of this is the Galaganatha temple, dedicated to the god Shiva, which has a tall vertical tower perched on a larger, cube-shaped base.

Pattuppattu

(“Ten Songs”) Collective name for a group of ten Tamil poems written in the style of the eight anthologies of the Sangam literature and believed to have been composed later. The dates for the literature are the subject of controversy, but the prevalent scholarly consensus is that it was written in the early centuries of the common era. Like this literature, the Pattuppattu songs fall into two general genres, puram (“the outer part”) and akam (“the inner part”). Puram poetry was “public” verse, describing the deeds of kings, war, death, and other heroic actions, whereas akam poetry was about an individual’s inner experience, especially love and sexuality. See also Tamil language and Tamil epics.
Paush
According to the lunar calendar, by which most Hindu religious festivals are determined, Paush is the tenth month in the lunar year, usually falling within December and January. In northern India, Paush is the coldest month of the year. It is considered inauspicious, and its only holidays are Saphala Ekadashi and Putrada Ekadashi.

Peacock
Indian bird with several divine associations. It is the animal vehicle of the god Skanda, the son of Shiva, who is the leader of the divine armies. The peacock’s quickness and resplendent appearance are felt to mirror these qualities in the young god. The peacock also has strong associations with the god Krishna, who is usually depicted as wearing a decorative crown containing peacock feathers. This association may come from the peacock’s connection with the monsoon, which is the peacock mating season, during which they utter piercing calls in the forests and are believed to dance with delight on the hillsides. Krishna’s dark color often leads to comparisons with rain clouds, and like the peacock he spends his nights dancing in the company of his devotees (bhakta), in the celebration known as the ras lila.

Penance
The dharma literature gave considerable attention to penance and expiation, based on the almost universal Hindu belief in the inexorable workings of karma. According to this notion, all good and bad deeds would eventually have their effect, either in this life or the next. Penances were a way to lessen the future consequences of one’s past misdeeds, by undergoing voluntary suffering and expiation in one’s present life. See prayashchitta.

Perception
In Hindu philosophy, perception (pratyaksha) is universally accepted as one of the pramanas, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge. Perception is the only pramana accepted by all the schools, but most of the others also accept inference (anumana) and authoritative testimony (shabda). See prayaksha.

Periyalvar
(9th c.) One of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. The Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life.

According to tradition, Periyalvar was born into a brahmīn family. From his youth he showed deep piety, and his primary means of devotion was to grow and pick flowers for the image of his chosen deity, Krishna. The most famous story about Periyalvar tells of a dream in which God commanded him to take part in a scholarly debate to be held by one of the Pandya kings. Periyalvar, despite his reservations about his lack of learning, obeyed this command after he woke. When he spoke, the words flowed out under divine inspiration, and the bag containing the prize money flew off the hook and into his hands as a sign of his victory. For further information see Kamil Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975; and John Stirling Morley Hooper, Hymns of the Alvars, 1929. See also Pandya dynasty.

Periya Puranam
Hagiographical account of the lives of the sixty-three Nayanars, written by the twelfth-century figure Cekkilar. The Nayanars were a group of Shaiva poet-saints, who lived in southern India between the seventh and ninth centuries. Together with their Vaishnava counterparts, the Alvars, the Nayanars spearheaded the revitalization of Hindu religion within Tamil Nadu, which was mostly Buddhist and Jain. Both the Nayanars and the Alvars stressed passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god—Shiva for the Nayanars, Vishnu for the Alvars—and conveyed this devotion through hymns sung in the Tamil language. According to tradition, Cekkilar was a minister at the court of the Chola dynasty king Kullottunga II (r. 1130–50). Cekkilar, distressed by the king’s admiration for a Jain epic poem, composed his text in an effort to wean the king away from it. His text portrays these saints as models of devotion to Shiva and as salutary examples to others although at times extreme in their devotion. One example of this intense devotion is Kotpuli Nayanar, who killed his entire family when he discovered that, in order to save their lives in a time of famine, they had eaten rice that belonged to Shiva’s temple. Although this is an extreme case, the message is clearly that devotion to God must eclipse all other loyalties.

Peshwa
Originally, title given to the brahmin ministers who served as advisers to the kings in the Maratha empire. Traditionally, these ministers were Chitpavan brahmins, which gave this small group influence far disproportionate to its numbers. During the resurgence of the Maratha confederacy in the early eighteenth century, the Peshwas became de facto rulers, although they continued to govern in the name of the Maratha kings. At this time, the position of Peshwa became hereditary. After the Maratha confederation split into different royal states around 1770, the Peshwas retained control over the ancestral Maratha homeland in the western part of the state of Maharashtra, where they reigned until it was conquered by the British in 1818.

Pey
(7th c.) With Bhutam and Poygai, one of the first three Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life.

According to tradition, the three men were caught in a torrential storm and one by one took shelter in a small dry spot, with each making room for the next. As they stood next to one another they felt a fourth presence, that of Vishnu. The Alvars were such great devotees that their combined energy was sufficient to provoke Vishnu’s manifestation. Overwhelmed with ecstasy, each burst into song, which formed the first of each of their compositions. For further information see Kamil Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975.

Phalgun
According to the lunar calendar, by which most Hindu religious festivals are determined, Phalgun is the twelfth month in the lunar year, usually falling within February and March. Phalgun concludes with the festival of Holi, which is the unofficial end of the cool season. The other holidays in Phalgun are Janaki Navami, Vijaya Ekadashi, Shivaratri, and Amalaki Ekadashi.

Phallic Emblem
Designation for the linga, the pillar-shaped object that is the symbolic form of the god Shiva. The precise sculptural form of the Gudimallam linga, which dates from at least the second century B.C.E., leaves little doubt that this phallic element is one aspect of the symbol. What is often overlooked is that an equally important part of the linga’s image is the base (pitha) in which the shaft is placed, said to represent the female organs of generation. In his symbolic form Shiva is thus both male and female—an appropriate form for a deity who is famous for transcending any and all duality.

Philosophy
The Euro-American conception that there is a fundamental distinction between philosophy and religion reflects unique historical and cultural circumstances that have no parallel in many other cultures. The Western philosophical tradition is rooted in Greek thought and culture, whereas Western religious traditions primarily have been shaped by ideas coming out of the Jewish tradition. The ideas from these two different sources developed side by side in Western culture, sometimes in an uneasy alliance and sometimes at odds but they were always seen as separate. In many other cultures, this distinction does not exist, and such imported concepts become less helpful in encountering these cultures. Indian and Hindu culture have a long history of critical and speculative thought, which could be called philosophical. Yet such thought is never exercised simply for its own sake, but always with an underlying religious purpose—to enable one to gain the ultimate religious goal, final liberation of the soul (moksha). The different perspectives on how to do this, known as darshans, are usually designated as “philosophical schools.” See also six schools.

Pillar Edicts
Set of inscriptions commissioned by the Mauryan emperor Ashoka (r. 269–32 B.C.E.), containing official pronouncements on royal policy, and advice and instructions to his subjects on a variety of topics, including religious toleration. Although these edicts were found in widely separated places, the text in each edict was fairly consistent throughout the Mauryan empire. The pillar edicts were inscribed on pillars of polished Chunar sandstone and placed on the major roads running through the empire, where they would have been visible to passersby. In this respect they were different from the rock edicts, which were carved into large boulders in places near the borders of the Mauryan empire, thus symbolically defining its boundaries. See also Maurya dynasty.

Pinaka
In Hindu mythology, the name of the archery bow belonging to the god Shiva.

Pinda
(“lump”) A ball of cooked rice or other grain, one of the important objects used in rites for the dead. A pinda is offered to the departed spirit each day for the first ten days after death, in the belief that the ten pindas progressively help form a new body for the dead person (a secondary meaning of the word pinda is “body”). Pindas are also used in the memorial rite known as shraddha, which can be performed years after the actual death; in this rite, the performer offers pindas to his or her ancestors as symbolic nourishment.

Pindadan
(“giving pindas”) In general usage, a synonym for the memorial rite known as shraddha. It is given this name because an important element in shraddha is offering the balls of cooked grain, known as pindas, considered symbolic nourishment for the ancestors.

Pindara River
A Himalayan tributary of the Ganges. The Pindara River flows west from the Pindari glacier and joins the Alakananda River at the town of Karnaprayag. As with all the Himalayan tributaries of the Ganges, the Pindara is considered sacred along its length, but this region is so mountainous and so thinly settled that Karnaprayag is the river’s only noteworthy spot.

Pingala Nadi

One of the vertical channels (nadi) in the traditional conception of the subtle body. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system believed to exist on a different plane than gross matter, but with certain correspondences to the material body. It is visualized as a set of six psychic centers (chakras) running roughly along the course of the spine, connected by three parallel vertical channels. Above and below these centers are the bodily abodes of the two divine principles, Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power), the latter as the latent spiritual energy known as kundalini. In this model of the subtle body, the pingala nadi is the vertical channel on the right side of the body. As with the rest of the subtle body, the pingala nadi has certain symbolic correspondences; in particular, it is identified with the sun and is thus visualized as being a tawny red in color.

Pipa

(15th c.? ) Poet-saint in the Sant religious community. The name Sant is an umbrella term for a group of central and northern Indian poet-saints who share several general tendencies: focus on individualized, interior religion leading to a personal experience of the divine; disdain for external ritual, particularly image worship; faith in the power of repeating one’s patron deity’s name; and the tendency to ignore conventional caste distinctions.

According to tradition, Pipa was born into a Rajput royal family in the Malwa region but eventually renounced his throne and went to Benares to become a disciple of the poet-saint Ramananda. The hagiographer Nabhadas reports that Pipa was a disciple of the powerful goddess Bhavani (an epithet of Parvati), showing the breadth of the Sant tradition. A few of Pipa’s verses have been preserved in the Adigranth, the sacred text of the Sikh community, and in their language and religious thrust the verses are consistent with these traditions.

Pipal

Common name for Ficus religiosa, the fig-tree also known as the asvattha, which has a long history of being considered a sacred tree. See asvattha.

Pippalada

In Hindu traditional lore, one of the ancient sages in the Atharva Veda, one of the oldest Hindu religious texts. Pippalada is also mentioned in the Prashna Upanishad, one of the speculative religious texts that forms the latest part of the Vedas, as a religious teacher who instructs sages such as Sukesha, Kashyapa, and Bhargava. Pippalada supposedly gets his name from his fondness for Pippali fruits, the fruit of the Ficus religiosa, the sacred pipal (asvattha).

Pitambara

(“clothed in yellow”) Epithet of the god Krishna, because of his penchant for wearing yellow garments. See Krishna.

Pitavasana

(“yellow-clad”) Epithet of the god Krishna, because of his penchant for wearing yellow garments. See Krishna.

Pitha

(“bench”) In its widest meaning, the base or foundation of any object. It can denote the material base or foundation upon which the image of a deity is placed. In some cases the foundation becomes an integral part of the image itself, as in the linga, the pillar-shaped object that is the symbol of the god Shiva. The form of the linga, an upright shaft set in a horizontal base, represents, not only the union of male and female, but also their transcendence, since Shiva is both male and female at once. At a more symbolic level, a pitha can be the “seat” or residence of a particular deity, that is, the place at which the deity metaphorically sits. The best example of this is the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the Goddess, spread throughout the subcontinent. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking up residence in each place as a different goddess.

Pitr
(“father”) Any and all ancestral spirits, to whom funerary offerings are due as one of a man’s expected duties. See ancestral spirits.

Pitrpaksha
The fortnight (paksha) dedicated to the worship of the ancestral spirits (pitr), observed in the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Ashvin. This is the period during the year in which Hindus remember and give offerings for their dead: offerings of water and rice-balls (pinda) on each day of the fortnight, and as well as special observances on the day of the fortnight corresponding to the day of the ancestor’s death. These offerings are believed to sustain the dead by symbolically feeding them, and also to placate the dead by demonstrating that the living still remember and care for them.

Because of its strong connection with the dead, this fortnight is generally considered an inauspicious time, and people often restrict their everyday activities in symbolic recognition of it. Many people will not cut their hair, beards, or nails during this time, nor will they wear new clothes. These precautions stem from the conviction that making alterations in one’s appearance during an inauspicious time will have adverse future affects, since it will carry the taint forward. Many people also curtail other normal activities during this.
time, such as buying any article or initiating any new project, unless it is absolutely necessary. The period is also deemed a good time for religious observances, particularly giving gifts (dana) to brahmins. On the one hand this is a way to propitiate the ancestors, whom the brahmins represent, and thus whatever is given to brahmins is given symbolically to the ancestors. On the other hand, giving such gifts is also a rite of protection against misfortune in an inauspicious time, since the receiver is believed to take away the bad luck along with the gift.

Pitryajna
(“sacrifice to the ancestors”) One of the Five Great Sacrifices (panchamahayajna) prescribed in the dharma literature, the texts on religious duty. These Five Great Sacrifices are daily observances for a “twice-born” householder, that is, one who has been born into one of the three “twice-born” groups in Indian society—brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya—and who has received the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” Each of the five sacrifices (yajna) is directed toward a different class of beings—from the Absolute Reality down to animals—and is satisfied by different actions. The pitryajna is directed toward one’s ancestors, and is satisfied by offering them libations of water (tarpana). In the time since the dharma literature was composed Hindu life has undergone significant changes, and some of these five rites have been completely elided. Although in certain contexts pitryajna is still an important rite—particularly at pilgrimage sites and in formal rites for the dead—it is no longer performed on a daily basis.

Pitta
(“bile”) Along with vata (“air”) and kapha (“phlegm”), one of the three humours (tridosha) in ayurveda, or traditional Indian medicine. Every person has all three of these humours, but usually one is predominant, and this marks a person in certain ways, particularly with regard to health, digestion, and metabolism. Pitta is associated with the elements of fire and water, since bile is a liquid involved in digestion, which is believed to take place through interior burning. Pitta is hot, intense, and mobile, and those for whom this is the predominant humor are said to have a strong will, be good leaders, and be blessed with good digestion. At the same time, this inner fire gives them bodily difficulties in hot weather, and to do their best they must also learn how to harness their fiery temperaments.

Plakshadvipa
In traditional mythic geography, the second of the seven concentric landmasses (dvipas) making up the visible world. See also cosmology.

Planets
Indian astrology (jyotisha) recognizes nine planets that affect human beings: the five visible ones (Jupiter, Venus, Mercury, Saturn, and Mars), the Sun and Moon, and two planets not known to Western astrology, Rahu and Ketu. Of these, Jupiter, Venus, and Mercury are, by themselves, always benevolent. The moon is changeable, depending on its position in the lunar cycle, and the others are considered to have malefic tendencies, although only Rahu and Ketu are invariably malevolent. Rahu and Ketu move throughout the zodiac, but the others are all fixed in place. Each of the planets is part of an elaborate series of associations, including parts of the body, family relationships, and personal qualities. The influence of all these planets can be heightened or weakened according to their position in a person’s natal horoscope, or their position vis-à-vis the other planets. The astrological tradition also recognizes a practice known as pacification of planets, through which their good qualities can be heightened, or their malevolent qualities weakened and contained. This can be done either through wearing particular gemstones that are believed to correspond to these planets, or by performing certain protective rituals.

Pole Star
In Hindu mythology, the personified form of the boy Dhruva, who is a symbol for unrelenting pursuit of a goal. Dhruva is a king's son, but for some unknown reason his father favors Dhruva's half-brother over him. Distressed by this insult, Dhruva takes a vow to attain a place above all others and goes off to the forest to perform austerities (tapas). After Dhruva endures many bodily mortifications, the god Vishnu appears and grants him a boon. In response to Dhruva's request for a place above all others, Vishnu promises Dhruva that after his death he will be installed as the Pole Star, the pivot around which all the other stars in the sky will turn.

Pollution
In Hindu religious life, a term designating religious contamination and ritual impurity (ashaucha). This notion of impurity is strictly concerned with the presence or absence of contamination and carries no necessary sense of moral or ethical lapse. See ashaucha.

Polyandry
Having more than one husband. This practice is extremely uncommon in Indian society, either now or in the past. The best-known mythical example comes from the epic Mahabharata, in which Draupadi is married to all five of the Pandava brothers, the epic's protagonists. Textual scholars have argued that this type of marriage was so unusual that it must have been rooted in some ancient practice, but there is no proof for this claim. In contemporary times polyandry can be found only at the outer fringes of Hindu society, such as in the state of Assam and in some of the Himalayan regions, where traditional practices have allowed for one woman to marry several brothers, following Draupadi's example.

Polygamy
Given the overwhelmingly patriarchal character of Hindu society, polygamy has probably existed since very early times. The practice is attested in both the great epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, as well as in the historical record. The dharma literature permits men to marry wives of lower social status, under the condition that their first wife was of equal status. Despite the existence of polygamy, it was probably unusual and restricted to men of high status and financial resources, who would be able to support several families. For "regular" men, one of the few reasons for taking a second wife was when the first wife was unable to bear children, in an attempt to sire the sons needed to preserve the lineage and ensure performance of the ancestral rites.

Pongal
Southern Indian harvest festival marking the change of seasons and the transition of the sun into the zodiacal sign of Capricorn, and thus beginning its northward course (uttarayana). According to Indian astrology this usually takes place on January 14th; in northern India this day is celebrated as Makara Sankranti. Both mark the sun's change in motion from the southerly direction to the northerly, or from the direction considered less auspicious to the one considered more auspicious.

The festivities for Pongal last for three days. The first day is the Pongal of Joy (Bhogi Pongal), on which people visit and exchange sweets and gifts. The second day is dedicated to the Sun (Surya Pongal). On this day married women cook rice in milk, and when the pot comes to a boil they shout "Pongal" ("It has boiled"). The milk-rice is made into sweets, which is first offered to the Sun and to the god Ganesh, and then given to friends. On the final day, Pongal of Cows (Mattu Pongal), worshipers walk in a circle around cows while the cows are decorated, garlanded, and worshiped.

Possession
Possession by gods, ghosts, and spirits is an accepted element in the traditional Hindu worldview, although whether this is good or bad depends on the nature of the being responsible. Possession is the most common means for village deities and certain forms of the Goddess to communicate with human beings, although the highest gods in the pantheon virtually never use this medium. Possession by a deity can bring a person high religious status but is generally said to be physically exhausting; through the medium the deities can interact with human beings, both to make their wishes known and to give their help and advice to those who need it. One of the more unusual cases of this occurs at the annual pilgrimage at Kataragama in Sri Lanka. Devotees (bhakta) suspend themselves from trees by hooks stuck into the flesh of their backs and, while suspended, are believed to be speaking for the god Murugan.

Possession by departed spirits (bhut or pret) or by witches and other malefic beings is always seen as an inopportune event and a dangerous imposition on the sufferer that must be remedied as soon as possible through healing or exorcism. As Sudhir Kakar masterfully shows, the language of possession and exorcism can be interpreted as an “idiom,” using traditional Indian cultural categories, for what modern psychiatrists might call the diagnosis and treatment of mental illness. For further information see Sudhir Kakar, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1991.

Poygai
(7th c.) With Pey and Bhutam, one of the first three Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. According to tradition, the three men were caught in a torrential storm and, one by one, took shelter in a small dry spot, with each making room for the next. As they stood next to one another, they felt a fourth presence, who was Vishnu. The alvars were such great devotees that their combined energy was sufficient to provoke Vishnu's manifestation. Overwhelmed with ecstasy, each burst into song, which formed the first of each of their compositions. For further information see Kamil Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975.

Prabhakara
In Indian philosophy, one of the two great seventh-century commentators in the Purva Mimamsa school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy; the other great commentator was Kumarila. The Mimamsa school was most concerned with the examination and pursuit of dharma (“righteous action”), the Mimamsa school believed all necessary instructions were contained in the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. Much of Mimamsa thought is concerned with principles and methods for textual interpretation seeking to uncover and interpret these instructions. Although both Kumarila and Prabhakara were committed to discovering the boundaries of dharma by interpreting the Vedas, there are significant differences in their philosophical positions, seen most clearly in their theories of error.

Prabhakara believes in a concept similar to the Nyaya concept of inherence (samavaya), a weak relational force that is assumed to connect objects and their attributes—for example, connecting the color red with a particular ball, thus making the ball red. This assumption leads him to characterize error as akhyati (“nondiscrimination”), the inability to make sharp distinctions. For example, a person mistakes the silvery flash of sea shell for a piece of silver. To Prabhakara, the person errs by uncritically connecting two simple judgments: “that object is silvery” and “silver is silvery.” By themselves, both of these statements are true, what is false is their combination into the complex judgment “that object is silver.” Kumarila is closer to the bhedabhada (“identity-and-difference”) philosophical position, which holds that all things both identify with and differ from all other things. Kumarila explains error as viparitakhyati, the mistaken pairing of the similarities between two things, rather than the failure to note their differences.

Prabhupada, A.C. Bhaktivedanta (b. Abhay Charan De, 1896–1977) Devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna and founder of ISKCON (International Society for Krishna Consciousness), more popularly known as the Hare Krishnas. ISKCON has its roots in the Gaudiya Vaishnava religious community founded by the Bengali saint Chaitanya, in which the primary religious action was the repeated recitation of Krishna’s name, often in public settings. Prabhupada was initiated into Krishna devotion in his university years, at which time his guru commanded him to bring the worship of Krishna to the West. At the age of 58, after a successful career as a pharmacist, he boarded a steamer for the United States, arriving with a few books, a typewriter, and eight dollars in his pocket. His timing was exquisite—or, as he put it, reflected Krishna’s grace—for he came during the countercultural movement in the second half of the 1960s; by the time of his death he had thousands of followers. In his later years he focused on translating and commenting on important Vaishnava texts, particularly the Bhagavad Gita and the Bhagavata Purana, and this emphasis on publishing has continued after his death. For an insider’s perspective on his life, see Satsvarupdas Dasa Goswami, Prabhupada, 1983; and Robert D. Baird, “Swami Bhaktivedanta and Ultimacy,” in Robert D. Baird (ed.), Religion in Modern India, 1998.

Prabodhachandrodaya (“Rising of the moon of wisdom”) Sanskrit drama written by Krishnamishra, probably in the latter half of the eleventh century. Clearly allegorical, the play celebrates the triumph of Vaishnava piety, that is, of the devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. The play is particularly notable for its third act, in which representatives for four non-Vaishnava sects appear: a materialist, a Jain monk, a Buddhist monk, and a Kapalika (a member of an ascetic community that worshiped the god Shiva). The last is portrayed as thoroughly depraved, indulging in meat, wine, and sexual gratification, and having a penchant for violence. In the play, all four heretical characters plot to capture another character, named Faith, for their king, named Passion. However, they discover that Faith is a devotee of Vishnu and is outside their powers. In the end Faith is reunited with her son Tranquillity and a character named Compassion. Although the reader may safely assume that this play is written from a biased perspective, it is instructive in the attitudes it reveals toward ascetics and all other non-Vaishnava religious groups.

Pracharak (“director”) In the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), a conservative Hindu organization whose express purpose is to provide the leadership cadre for a revitalized Hindu India, the pracharakas are the full-time RSS workers who provide the link between the local units, known as shakhas (“branches”), and the RSS higher authorities. The RSS is a highly authoritarian organization, with all power ultimately vested in a single, unelected leader, the sarsanghchalak, and the pracharaks are the crucial link between this highly centralized leadership and the highly decentralized local units. The pracharaks are responsible for coordinating and managing RSS activities in their area, as well as for reporting on these at RSS meetings at various levels; they may also be sent out on loan to provide leadership to RSS-affiliated organizations. As a rule, pracharaks are completely devoted to the RSS cause, and most have been associated with the RSS since childhood. Their ethos is one of service and sacrifice to the RSS, and by implication to the country as a whole: They are generally unmarried, have no other employment, receive no salary from the RSS (although the local unit generally provides their living expenses), and are famous for living a simple and spartan lifestyle. Most of them are also well educated and are selected for their ability to get along well with others. For further information see Walter K. Andersen and Shridhar D. Damle, The Brotherhood in Saffron, 1987; and Daniel Gold, “Organized Hinduisms: From Vedic Truth to Hindu Nation,” in Martin Marty and R. Scott Appleby (eds.), Fundamentalisms Observed, 1991.

Pradakshina
(“toward the right”) Circumambulation of an object or person as a sign of worship, reverence, or respect. This is always done in a clockwise direction, so that the walker’s right side (considered the purer and more auspicious side) is always turned toward the object or person being circled. Just about anything can be so circled—one’s parents or teacher, the image of a deity, a temple, a city, or the entire Indian subcontinent. In many larger temples, particularly in the Nagara architectural style, the pradakshina is the name for one of the architectural features. In this case, it is a semicircular processional pas sageway surrounding the temple’s main image, so that people can circumambulate the main image either before or after worship. Pradakshina is also the fifteenth of the sixteen traditional upacharas (“offerings”) given to a deity as part of worship, on the model of treating the deity as an honored guest. The underlying motive here, as for all the upacharas, is to show one's love for the deity and to minister to the deity's needs as one would to a living person's needs.

A.C. Bhaktivedanta Prabhupada was the founder of ISKCON, a religious community devoted to the god Krishna that is popularly known as the Hare Krishnas.

Pradhana
(“principal”) In the Samkhya philosophical school, pradhana is another name for prakrti, the “primal matter” that the Samkhyas consider the first principle from which all material things have evolved. In the secret, ritually based religious practice known as tantra, the word pradhana is used to denote the goddess Shakti, as the active principle behind the formation of the universe. Grammatically, the word is feminine, indicating a connotation of fertility and fecundity.

Pradosh Vrat
("twilight vow") Religious observance celebrated on the thirteenth day of each lunar fortnight, mainly by women, often for the birth of children or to sustain the general family welfare. The vow (vrat) is dedicated to the god Shiva, and its most important part takes place on the evening of the thirteenth day (the word pradosh is interpreted as meaning "twilight") when worshipers present Shiva with the sixteen traditional offerings (upacharas), following which they may take their only meal of the day. In some cases worshipers stay awake through the night so that the observance may finish on the fourteenth day of the month, a lunar day connected with Shiva. When the thirteenth day falls on a Monday (associated with Shiva), Saturday (associated with Saturn), or Sunday (associated with the Sun), this rite is believed to be especially efficacious.

Pradyumna
In Hindu mythology, the son of the god Krishna and his divine queen Rukmini. Pradyumna is the rebirth of the god Kama, who has been completely annihilated by the fire from the god Shiva's third eye. After Kama's death, Shiva reassures Kama's wife Rati that her husband will be reborn as Pradyumna to kill the demon Sambhara. Through his magic powers Sambhara is well aware of the threat; when he finds the child, he throws it into the ocean and thinks that he has killed it. Pradyumna is swallowed by a great fish, which is caught and presented to king Sambhara; when the fish is split open, the child enchants his wife Mayavati, in whose form Rati has taken birth to aid her husband. Pradyumna kills Sambhara in a ferocious battle and is reunited with Rati.

Prahlada
In Hindu mythology, the son of the demon-king Hiranyakashipu, and a great devotee (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. Through harsh physical asceticism (tapas) Hiranyakashipu has gained a series of divine boons that render him virtually invulnerable, yet despite his power, his son Prahlada refuses to abandon his devotion to Vishnu. Prahlada's devotion in the face of his father's ever-growing pride generates an escalating pattern of abuse that culminates in the demand that Prahlada worship him rather than Vishnu. At that point Vishnu comes to Prahlada's aid as the Man-lion avatar, slays Hiranyakashipu, and establishes Prahlada as king in his place.

Prajapati
("Lord of Creatures") Deity appearing late in the Vedas, the earliest Hindu sacred texts, who is described as the creator of the universe and is considered superior to the Vedic deities. The means by which Prajapati carries out creation are different in different places. In Rg Veda 10.121 he is described as the Golden Embryo from which all things developed, whereas in Rg 10.90, also known as the Purusha Sukta, he is described as the primal person.
(purusha) who is sacrificed by the gods and from whose parts the world develops. In later Hindu practice the name Prajapati can also be used to refer to the god Brahma, as fashioner of the universe, or to the gods Vishnu or Shiva, as the universe’s supreme deities.

Prajapatya Marriage
One of the eight ways to perform a marriage recognized in the dharma literature, the treatises on religious duty. In Hindu mythology Prajapati was the name of the creator, and this name suggests that the purpose of this marriage was for people to fulfill their duties to the ancestors by procreating. A Prajapatya marriage takes place when a father gives away his daughter to a man with the condition that they will perform their civic and religious duties together. This was one of the four approved (prashasta) forms of marriage, because it was arranged by the girl’s father. However, it was considered less commendable than the other approved forms, because the girl was given in marriage with conditions. In Indian culture, the best way to give a daughter is to impose no conditions. See also marriage, eight classical forms.

Prajnanam Brahman
(“Wisdom is Brahman”) In the Hindu philosophical tradition, one of the “great utterances” (mahavakyas) expressing the ultimate truth. The truth here is the identity of prajnanam (ultimate wisdom) and Brahman (Supreme Reality); this identity is the heart of the speculative texts called the Upanishads. Aside from their importance in a philosophical context, as encapsulating fundamental truths, the four mahavakyas were also appropriated as identifying symbols by the four divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasi ascetics. Each division had a different mahavakya, just as each had a different Veda, a different primary monastic center, and a different paradigmatic ascetic quality. Prajnanam Brahman is the mahavakya associated with the Bhogawara division of the Dashanami Sanyasis.

Prakamyam
(“irresistible will”) One of the eight superhuman powers (siddhi) traditionally believed to be conferred by high spiritual attainment. This particular power removes all obstructions to the movement of one’s body, such that one can go wherever one desires, even passing through solid objects as if moving through water.

Prakasha
(“illumination”) In Hindu tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice, prakasha is one of the bipolar opposites that are used to characterize the nature of all reality, with its counterpart being reflection (vimarsha). These two terms are particularly important for the creation of the world, which is said to happen when the pure and radiant consciousness (prakasha) of the ultimate Brahman becomes self-conscious through the reflection (vimarsha) of this original consciousness. From one single consciousness, the absolute then evolves into a binary divinity—the god Shiva and his consort Shakti—whose continued interaction combines to create the world. For further information see Jaideva Singh, Pratyabhijnanahrdayam, 1982. See also cosmology.

Prakashatman
(13th c.) Proponent of the Advaita Vedanta school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy. Prakashatman’s Vivarana, a commentary on the work of the Advaita philosopher Padmapada, provides the name for the Vivarana school of Advaita Vedanta. Prakashatman is traditionally described as Padmapada’s disciple, but since the latter is an attested pupil of Shanka-racharya (9th c. C.E.), the time difference makes this unlikely.
Since Brahman is believed to be the locus of all things, Vivarana Advaitins conclude that ignorance must also be a part of Brahman. However, they try to maintain Brahman’s integrity by invoking a theory of reflectionism to explain the apparent difference between Self and Brahman, even though they are ultimately identical. Just as an image appearing in a mirror is based on the original but different from it, so human Selves are identical with Brahman but appear to be separate. The basic position of the Vivarana school is an uncompromising affirmation of Brahman as the sole “reality,” in which anything that exists must belong to it.

Prakrit (“formed”) Collective term for the grammatically simpler vernacular languages that developed from Sanskrit through the natural process of linguistic change. The existence of Prakrits is evident as early as the fifth century B.C.E., at which time several different dialects are spoken. The Prakrits were contrasted with Sanskrit (“perfected”), the language of temple, court, and other elite contexts, which was subject to strict grammatical canons and did not change. Even those fluent in Sanskrit would have learned it as a second language—as a static, learned language, it is inherently artificial—and would have spoken in Prakrit with lower status people (such as servants, commoners, and most women). Despite its “lower” status, Prakrits are vitally important historically: They were the languages for royal inscriptions up to the Gupta era (ca. 350–550), and one of the Prakrits, Pali, is famous as the language for the Theravada Buddhist canon. See also Gupta dynasty.

Prakrti (“nature”) One of the two fundamental principles in the Samkhya school, the other being purusha (“person”). Samkhya espouses an atheistic philosophical dualism, in which purusha and prakrti—roughly, spirit and nature—are the source of all things. Prakrti is better conceived of as force or power rather than a specific material object. It contains within it three different forces with three different qualities (guna): sattva tends toward the good, rajas towards activity or passion, and tamas towards darkness and decay. In the primal prakrti these forces are in perfect equilibrium, each perfectly balancing the others, but when prakrti’s equilibrium is disturbed, it sets in motion a pattern of evolution that creates both the exterior physical world and the interior psychological world. All of these evolves—material or psychic—have a differing balance of the three gunas, which ultimately determines their character as wholesome, active, or unwholesome. For further information see Gerald Larson and Ram Shankar Bhattacharya (eds.), Samkhya, 1987; and Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Pralaya
In Hindu mythology, the dissolution of the universe that comes at the end of the kalpa or Day of Brahma. Pralaya is considered the “night” of Brahma, and lasts for the same amount of time as the day (by one estimate, 4.32 billion years). The approach of this “night” is preceded by the destruction of the earth, first by fire, and then by torrential rains that transform the entire planet into one vast ocean. During this time the only living thing is the god Vishnu, who reclines on the back of his serpent vehicle Shesha, deep in a yogic trance. When the time again comes for creation, a lotus sprouts from his navel, which opens to reveal Brahma, and the world begins anew.

Pramana
In Indian philosophy, a means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge, generally classified as one of three types: Perception...
(pratyaksha), which includes magical or yogic insight as well as direct sensory perception; inference (anumana), which ultimately depends upon direct experience; and testimony (shabda), which can be either scriptural or the instruction of one's teacher. Some philosophical schools also include a fourth source, analogy (upamana), but those who do not recognize this categorize it as another form of inference. The first three are accepted by all philosophical schools except for the materialists, who recognize only perception. The Purva Mimamsa school affirms two additional pramanas—presumption (arthapatti), and knowledge from absence (abhava)—which they argue give one knowledge. The root meaning of this term comes from the verb “to measure”; thus these are tools for measuring and interpreting the world we experience.

Pramukh Swami
("President Swami," b. 1921) Title of Shastri Narayanswarupdas Swami, the present spiritual leader of the Swaminarayan religious community. Swaminarayan Hinduism is based on the life and teachings of Sahajananda Swami (1781–1830), who because of his piety and charisma was deemed by his followers an avatar of the god Vishnu. Pramukh Swami is the uncontested head of the Akshar Purushottam Samstha, a branch of the Swaminarayan movement that separated from the parent group in 1906. He is a strict ascetic who serves as religious teacher (guru) to an estimated million followers all over the world. His devotees (bhakta) are predominately members of the Gujarati community and mostly affluent merchants, making the movement financially robust.

Prana
("breath") As a collective noun, the name for the five “winds” considered to be responsible for basic bodily functions. The first of these, located in the chest, is labeled by the general term prana. Because it performs those functions necessary for sustaining life—respiration, the movement of food into the stomach, and the circulation of blood through the body—its name is often used to designate all five winds. Of the other four winds, apana (in the anal region) is concerned with elimination, samana (in the navel) aids digestion, udana (in the throat) conveys things out of the mouth—like speech, song, burps, etc.—and vyana circulates throughout the body, mixing things together. These winds are the focus of the yoga exercise known as pranayama, the aim of which is to achieve control over the central forces of life.

Pranapratishtha

(“establishing the prana”) Pranapratishtha is the final rite in the consecration of a deity’s image, usually performed by brahmins, since they have the necessary ritual purity and training. The image is infused with the breath of life (prana) through the performance of ritual and the intoning of sacred sounds known as mantras. After this rite is performed, the deity is believed to be resident in the image, which thereafter must be treated with the care such a spiritual entity requires.

Pranava

Name denoting the sacred sound Om. See Om.

Pranayama

(“restraint of breath”) In the ashtanga (“eight-part”) yoga first codified by Patanjali (1st c. C.E.), pranayama is the fourth of the eight constituent elements of yoga practice. Pranayama requires a conscious control of respiration, specifically halting one’s breathing before inhaling and exhaling. When both of these actions have become automatic, this is described as “total” restraint. This practice is supposed to weaken and destroy the practitioner’s unwholesome karma, and render the mind fit for concentration. Removing karma is necessary for liberation of the soul, since all karma (both good and bad) ties one to the cycle of birth and rebirth.

Prapatti

(“throwing oneself down”) Prapatti refers to a devotee’s (bhakta) complete surrender to God’s power as the only means of salvation. This attitude is particularly stressed among the Shrivaishnavas, a southern Indian religious community who are followers of the god Vishnu and whose founder was the great philosopher Ramanuja (11th c.). Although ultimate power is believed to be vested in God’s grace by the practitioners of prapatti, believers nevertheless possess a concern for continuing religious practice. Thus, prapatti is not meant to replace conventional religious activities such as worship. These activities are still performed, but with the consciousness that God’s grace will be sufficient. They are therefore not seen as a means toward salvation, but as reflections of the grace one has already obtained.

Prapti

(“acquisition”) One of the eight superhuman powers (siddhi) traditionally believed to be conferred by high spiritual attainment. This particular power gives one the ability to gain any object simply by desiring it.

Prarthana Samaj

Hindu reformist organization centered in Bombay, whose most important figure was M. G. Ranade (1842–1901). The Prarthana Samaj’s reformist mission focused more on social issues than on theological or worship-related ones. Their primary aim was to rid Hindu society of “evils” such as child marriage and the ban on widow remarriage. Although its members were educated and progressive, they were also religiously conservative and devout Hindus with deep roots in the tradition. They saw their work as a slow and gradual process of reforming Hinduism by removing its most objectionable practices rather than by radically remaking it from start. In this they differed from the Brahmo Samaj, who attempted to remake the tradition wholesale by giving it a strong, quasi-monotheistic emphasis, a quality heavily influenced by European missionaries. The Prarthana Samaj lost its steam by the early 1920s, when social reform associations became absorbed into the Indian National Congress.

Prasad
(“favor”) Prasad is food or drink that has been offered to a deity as part of normal worship and, having been sanctified by the deity’s power, is later distributed to worshipers as a symbol of the deity’s grace. In this process, the deity is believed to have “consumed” part of the food offering, and thus—in keeping with everyday ideas about the contaminating power of saliva—to have “imprinted” the food with its substance. Since this substance has been “charged” with divine presence, it is given to devotees (bhakta) as an emblem of the deity’s grace, and worshipers consume it in the belief that this sanctifies them. Its sacred qualities mean that prasad is treated differently than regular food: It cannot be refused and can never be thrown away. If one cannot eat it, the favored method of disposal is to feed it to a cow. See also jutha.

Prashasta (“Approved”) Marriages
In the dharma literature, or the texts on religious duty, these are the four approved forms of marriage: the Brahma marriage, the Daiva marriage, the Arsha marriage, and the Prajapatyar marriage. These forms are deemed commendable because in each case the father of the bride is responsible for arranging the marriage: In the Brahma form the bride is given as a gift without conditions, in the Daiva she is given as a sacrificial fee, in the Arsha she is given in exchange for a pair of cattle for sacrifice, and in the Prajapatyara she is given with the condition that the husband and wife perform their duties together. The Brahma is the only one of these four practiced in modern India and is the idealized form of marriage. See also marriage, eight classical forms.

Prashastapada
(5th c.) Author of the Padarthadharma-sangraha. This text is the most influential commentary on Kanada’s Vaisheshika Sutras, the founding text of the Vaisheshika school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy. The Vaisheshika school was atomistic, believing that all things were made up of a few basic constituent substances: the five elements (earth, fire, water, wind, and akasha) along with space, time, mind, and individual selves (atman). The five elements combined to form the things in the world, though selves were considered ultimately different from matter.

Prashna (“Question”) Upanishad
One of the later and more developed upanishads, the speculative religious texts that form the latest stratum of the oldest Hindu sacred texts, the Vedas. As with most of the upanishads, the Prashna Upanishad’s underlying concern is to investigate ultimate questions, in particular the nature of the Self (atman). Considered one of the later upanishads, the Prashna Upanishad is similar to the earliest upanishads, the Brhadaranyaka and the Chandogya, but is far shorter, and the text is much more focused. Like the older upanishads, the Prashna is written as a dialogue. It takes the form of a conversation between the sage Pippalada and six questioners. In each section (called a prashna in the text) one of the hearers asks a question, to which Pippalada replies. The six sections all have different themes: the nature of time, prana as the most important human power, the nature of life after death, sleep, meditation, the sound Om, and the nature of the Self. In this way, it uses the older dialogue form to advance a far more developed and cohesive philosophical perspective.
Pratihara Dynasty
See Gurjara-Pratihara dynasty.

Pratijna
(“assertion”) In Indian logic, a part in the generally accepted form of an inference (anumana), or logical statement. The accepted form for an inference has three terms: an assertion (pratijna), a reason (hetu), and examples (drshanta). Each of these three also has its own constituent parts. The pratijna’s two constituent parts are the paksha and the sadhya. The paksha is the subject of the assertion and names a class of things, while the sadhya is the claim to be proven about that class. For example, in the assertion “this mountain is on fire,” the paksha is “this mountain” (the class of things about which a claim is being made), and the sadhya, or thing to be proven, is “is on fire.”

Pratiloma
(“against the hair”) Forbidden marriage union, in which the husband has lower social status than the wife. See hypogamous marriage.

Pratinidhi
(“substitute”) In the context of tantra, a secret, ritually defined religious practice, anything that can correctly be used as a substitute. Certain tantric rites make ritual use of substances or actions that are normally forbidden; the most famous of these rites, the Five Forbidden Things (panchamakara), incorporates violating the social taboos on drinking wine, consuming nonvegetarian food, and engaging in illicit sex. The ritual use of such normally forbidden things must be seen in the larger context of tantric practice. One of the most pervasive tantric assumptions is the ultimate unity of everything that exists. From this perspective, adepts affirm that the entire universe is one principle—often, conceived as the activity of a particular deity—and therefore reject all concepts based on dualistic thinking. The “Five Forbidden Things,” therefore, provides a ritual means for breaking the duality of sacred and forbidden, by sacralizing several things that are ordinarily forbidden.

These five things are used in their actual form in “left hand” (vamachara) tantra, and by substitution in “right hand” (dakshinachara) tantra. Substitution allows the adept to perform the ritual and at the same time to avoid the disapproval that would result from breaking certain social rules. Although tantric texts allow for substitution in this rite, they are usually quite specific about what sorts of things are acceptable substitutes, a signature quality of strictly defined ritual systems. For further information see Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1975; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Pratyaabhijna
(“recognition”) Doctrine advanced by many different schools of tantra, a secret, ritually defined religious practice, and particularly by the Kashmiri philosopher Abhinavagupta, the most influential figure in Trika Shaivism. It holds that the final realization of the Absolute is simply a “re-cognition” of one’s essential unity with the Divine. This unity has always existed and has never been altered, the only factor preventing it from being clearly seen being the obscuring power of false understanding. Final unity with the Divine, therefore, comes not through doing anything, but simply through realizing what has always been the case. This doctrine clearly shows the influence of the Advaita Vedanta philosophical school, but with an important shift. The Advaita school upholds a philosophical position known as monism, which is the belief that a single abstract ultimate principle—which they call Brahman—lies behind all things, and that all things are only particular manifestations of that one principle. The “Recognition” school... adopts this general principle but conceives of Ultimate Reality theistically, as the god Shiva. For Trika Shaivism, Shiva is the sole true reality, who is both supreme god, and the source of the material universe. For further information see Jaideva Singh, Pratyabhijnanahrddayam, 1982.

Pratyahara
("withdrawal [of the senses]") In the ashtanga ("eight-part") yoga first codified by Patanjali (1st c. C.E.?), pratyahara is the fifth of the eight constituent elements of yoga practice. Pratyahara occurs when one withdraws the senses from the sense objects they ordinarily perceive. It is done after one has mastered the sitting positions (asanas)—and thus can sit comfortably for long periods—and after one has gained control of "breath" (pranayama), which allows heightened command of one's physiological capacities. Having gained relative mastery over the body, one is then ready to focus attention inward.

Pratyaksha
("concerning the eye") In Indian philosophy, pratyaksha is the general term for sense perception. All philosophical schools accept perception as one of the pramanas, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge, and it is the only pramana accepted by the materialist school. Although the word's literal meaning implies only information from the eyes, this pramana includes sense data from the other four human senses, as well as "perceptions" obtained through magical cognition, yogic insight, or any other supernormal abilities or phenomena.

Pravahana Jaivali
A character in the Chandogya Upanishad, one of the speculative religious texts that form the latest stratum of the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. In the text, Pravahana Jaivali is a member of the warrior (kshatriya) class who serves as teacher to members of the scholarly-priestly (brahmin) class. His first students are Silaka Shalavatya and Caikitayana Dalbhya, then Shvetaketu Aruneya and his father Gautama. This is... one of several episodes in the Upanishads in which kshatriyas instruct brahmins, thus inverting the accepted pattern that holds brahmins as religious authorities. These episodes reveal the nature of wisdom as conceived in the Upanishads—it is conferred, not by birth or social position, but by individual striving and realization.

Pravara

A lineage system, primarily among brahmins, which builds on the assumptions of the gotra system (the tracing of brahmin lineage to one of seven mythic sages). In his daily worship a brahmin would not only mention the name of his gotra, who is the sage believed to be the family’s immediate progenitor, but also the names of other sages believed to be remote ancestors. Both these “lineages” were passed down only through men, since it was customary for a married woman to adopt her husband’s gotra as part of her new identity. The only context in which gotra and pravara were really important was in fixing marriages, because of the kinship conferred by these mythic lineages. Marriage within the gotra was strictly forbidden, since the assumption that such people were directly related made this marriage incestuous. Marriage within the pravara was also forbidden, although in medieval times different groups interpreted this prohibition differently. For some groups, any shared pravara ancestry would forbid the marriage, but for other groups one shared “ancestor” was deemed permissible. The more lenient interpretation may well have been spurred by practical difficulties in making matches.

Prayashchitta

A general term meaning atonement for one’s misdeeds. The Hindu religious tradition gives considerable attention to penance and expiation, based on the almost universal Hindu belief in the inexorable workings of karma. According to this notion, all good and bad deeds will eventually have their effect, either in this life or the next, and thus one must either atone for the evil one has done or face its consequences in the future. Prescriptions for such expiation can be found as far back as the Vedas, and the acts prescribed for atonement fall into several categories: confession, repentance (which was usually seen as preparation for expiation, rather than absolution of the evil itself), restraint of breath (pranayama), physical asceticism (tapas), fire sacrifice (homa), recitation of prayers (japa), gift-giving (dana), fasting (upavasa), and travel to sacred sites (tirthayatra). The prayashchitta literature is quite well developed, both in detailing differing kinds of offenses and their potentially mitigating circumstances, and in laying out the types of atonement to be performed for each offense. For further information see Pandurang Vaman Kane (trans.), A History of Dharmasastra, 1968.

Prayoga

(“use,” “application”) In the context of Hindu ritual, any prescribed procedure to be followed during worship, meditation, or when performing other ritual actions.

Pregnancy

As in all societies, Hindus regard the impending birth of a child as a time of eager expectation tinged with anxiety. Part of this anxiety stems from purely physical worries that the pregnancy and birth proceed normally, and that the mother and child remain in good physical health. Expectant mothers are usually encouraged to rest and are often given food considered especially nourishing (such as milk products and nuts) to build their strength. From the mother's perspective, pregnancy is an extremely significant event, since the birth of children (especially sons) will solidify her status in her marital family; but this significance also contributes its own quotient of expectation and anxiety. Since the mother's emotional state during pregnancy is believed to affect the child, all efforts are made to shelter the expectant mother from unpleasant thoughts and situations and to generate happy thoughts.

Aside from protecting the expectant mother's physical and psychological health, Hindus take numerous precautions to guard her from other sorts of misfortune. As at other life transitions, during pregnancy and the child's first days the mother and her child are considered particularly vulnerable to black magic, particularly the witchcraft of those who might be jealous of the expectant or new mother. Another avenue for harm comes from inauspicious events, such as an eclipse, during which a pregnant woman should stay inside (away from its malevolent rays) and remain perfectly still, lest her child be born with missing limbs. These hostile forces can also be countered by various rites of protection, such as wearing amulets, charms, or iron (considered to render one impervious to spells), by cutting back on social interaction to avoid possible contact with inauspicious people and things, and by attention to religious rites.

Prenatal Rites
Life-cycle rituals (samskaras) performed by a husband before his child's birth, as prescribed in the dharma literature, the texts on religious duty. According to this literature, there were three such rites: Garbhadhana, which ensured conception; Pumsavana, which guaranteed that the newly conceived child would be a boy; and Simantonnayana, which was performed late in the pregnancy to ensure the child's good health and the mother's easy delivery. Although the dharma literature prescribes these rites as obligatory, none of them are widely performed now except by the most orthodox brahmins.

Pret
("departed," "deceased") The spirit of a person who has recently died but is still inappropriately connected to the world of the living, often as a troubling or malevolent presence to the departed's family or the general population. Prets are believed to be the spirits of people who died in childhood and whose untimely death left them with certain unfulfilled desires, particularly longings relating to marriage and family life. Prets make themselves known to the living in two ways, either through dreams or possession. In some cases they have specific requests and can be placated through worship and offerings. In such instances, dreams offer a method of communicating with the living, so that necessary actions can be performed for the pret. In other cases, the spirit may resort to bodily possession in an attempt to realize unfulfilled desires directly. These spirits are typically malevolent and require an exorcism to be removed. For further information on the care of unquiet family spirits, see Ann Grodzins Gold, Fruitful Journeys, 1988; for a psychological interpretation of spirits, possession, and healing, see Sudhir Kakar, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1991.

Prinsep, James
(1799–1840) British official and amateur Indologist. In 1837, Prinsep became the first modern person to decipher the Brahmi script, and was thus able to translate the edicts of the Mauryan emperor Ashoka (r. 269–32 B.C.E.). Unfortunately, his career was cut short by an early death, a pattern distressingly familiar for colonial administrators in British India. See also Maurya dynasty.
Priyadas
(early 18th c.) Author of the Bhaktirasa-bodhini ("Awakening the Delight in Devotion"), a commentary on the Bhaktamal of Nabhadas, completed in 1712. In his text, Nabhadas had given very brief (six line) biographies of over two hundred contemporary bhakti (devotional) figures. These original biographies are notably free of marvelous and miraculous events, with their major emphasis being the devotee’s (bhakta) personal qualities, to serve as a model for others. In his commentary, Priyadas gives greatly expanded accounts for each one of the devotees mentioned by Nabhadas, and usually describes events to which Nabhadas makes no reference. At least in the case of the poet-saint Ravidas, Nabhadas clearly drew his material from the texts written by the biographer Anantadas, but in many other cases his sources are not clear. The accounts by Priyadas are larded with miracles and wonders, and the prevalence of such events, combined with his chronological distance from his subjects, makes him a less reliable source for the lives of these devotees.

Progress Philosophy
("jativada") Progress philosophy affirms that one can attain complete freedom from bondage—which in the Indian context is identified as the end of reincarnation (samsara) and final liberation of the soul (moksha)—and that one can also specify the necessary and sufficient conditions that allow human beings to bring about this freedom. As a rule, progress philosophy tends to stress gradual spiritual attainment, in which very small beginnings can gradually lead one to the ultimate goal. Progress philosophers thus tend to stress particular religious paths that will lead one to the final goal, and also tend to place a great significance on actions (especially ritual actions) as essential parts of this path. In the Hindu tradition, most philosophical schools are progress philosophies: the combined Nyaya-Vaisheshika school, the combined Samkhya-Yoga school, the Purva Mimamsa school, and even the Bhamati and Vivarana schools of Advaita Vedanta.

Prohibition
Most traditional Hindus have clearly and strongly disapproved of consuming liquor, a substance which, because it may lead to a loss of control, is seen as impure. Among wealthier Indians, drinking alcoholic beverages is seen as a habit that signals the acceptance of Western values and alienation from one’s roots, whereas among poorer citizens, particularly laborers, drinking is often seen as a misuse of money needed to support a family. For all these reasons, the imposition of total or partial prohibition has become an effective part of electoral platforms designed to appeal to traditional and conservative Hindus. In 1997, prohibition had been established in three Indian states: Gujarat, Andhra Pradesh, and Haryana. Of these three, Gujarat is the only one with a long-standing history of prohibition, while prohibition in Andhra Pradesh in 1995, and in Haryana in 1996, was imposed to fulfill campaign promises made during the state elections in those years. In both cases, the imposition of prohibition also stimulated widespread bootlegging and illegal distilling.

Prostitution
Prostitutes or courtesans were a regular feature of ancient Indian life. But far from simply offering sexual pleasure, these prostitutes were in many cases women of culture and learning. One of the sections in the Kama Sutra pertains to such individuals, and the author Vatsyayana portrays prostitutes as women who, while clearly outside normal society, have far greater independence than most women. One finds a similar picture in The Little Clay Cart (Mrcchakatika), a drama in which the courtesan Vasantasena is sought by all the men of the city because of her beauty, wealth, and mastery of the sixty-four aesthetic arts. This picture is doubtless idealized and was probably realistic for only a tiny fraction of the women plying the sex trade, however.

The existence of prostitution also appears in relation to a group of women connected to certain temples. Called servants of the deity (devadasis), these women were not allowed to marry. Instead, they were considered to be married to the god, for whom they would sing, dance, and perform various rites, just as any Hindu wife would for her husband. These women could hold property and resources of their own, but their status was clearly unusual, and it was not uncommon for them to develop long-term liaisons with local men for mutual enjoyment. In some cases this degenerated into prostitution—through which such women became a source of income for the temple—but in other instances they were successful in retaining some autonomy. Since Indian independence in 1947 there has been a prohibition on initiating devadasis, but some older women remain who were initiated before that time. In 1995, a furor developed when the Jagannath temple management committee began to explore the possibility of new initiations. For further information see Vatsyayana (tr. Alain Daniélou), Kama Sutra of Vatsyayana; and Frederique Apffel Marglin, Wives of the God-King, 1985. See also Yellamma.

Prthivi
The most common name for the Earth, which, in addition to its material form, is conceived of as a goddess. This particular name for the Earth goddess comes from a mythic story connecting her to the righteous king Prthu.

Prthu
In Hindu mythology, an ancient king who rules over all the Earth, and whose reign is considered a golden age. Prthu is magically born from the right hand of king Vena, a man so wicked that he has prohibited all sacrifices to the gods. After Prthu's birth the people in his kingdom suffer famine, since the Earth has refused to produce food in protest against Vena's wickedness. Prthu chases the Earth, who has taken the form of a cow. She finally agrees that, if Prthu will spare her life, she will produce food again. It is in memory of this deed that the Earth is given the name Prthivi ("related to Prthu").

Puja
("homage") The most common word for worship in modern Hinduism. The root of the word carries the sense of reverence or respect, but puja is primarily focused on actions, particularly offerings to the deity, who is treated as an honored guest. Although, according to one list, there are sixteen such offerings (upacharas), in practice the worship performed in any particular setting is subject to wide variation—based on regional or local custom, individual inclination, and the person's social status and learning. At the heart of puja, however, is a series of transactions between the deity and devotee (bhakta). One such transaction comes in darshan, the exchange of glances between an image of the deity and a devotee, which initiates the relationship between the two. The other transactions come from offerings given by the devotee, to which the deity responds by giving prasad sanctified by divine contact, most often food or drink for the devotee to consume.

Aside from the transactions, the other most common feature of most puja is the emphasis on purity, both of worshiper and of context. The only exception to this arises in certain forms of tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice in which the performer deliberately inverts normal ideas of purity and impurity (ashaucha) as a way of symbolically destroying all duality.
Devotees commonly purify themselves before worship, and the purity of the site, and the objects used in worship, must be either established (in the case of a place or things not generally used for worship) or maintained (as in the case of a temple or other regularly established place).

In its most basic conception, the temple is a home for the deity, a ritually pure environment. Most temples have at least two different “purity zones,” an outer zone into which the devotees may enter, and an inner zone closest to deity, restricted to the temple priests. In their purity requirements, deities show as much variation as one finds in the human community, and stricter concern for purity indicates higher status, just as for human beings. Whereas village deities are often served by non-brahmin priests and typically take offerings of meat, blood, and liquor, the higher deities are always served by brahmin priests, and the food offered to them is invariably vegetarian. As the ritually purest of all human beings, the brahmin priest acts as an intermediary between the high deities and other worshipers, shielding the deity from potentially contaminating contact. His high ritual purity also makes the brahmin a universal donor, from whose hand all people can receive prasad without fear of pollution. For further information see C. J. Fuller, “Hindu Temple Priests,” in T. N. Madan (ed.), Religion in India, 1991.

Pujari

In its most basic meaning, the word pujari denotes “one who does puja (worship).” In theory this word could refer to any worshiper, but in general usage the meaning is more restricted. It usually designates a man performing worship as his means of livelihood, either as a priest in a temple, or as a religious “technician” hired to perform ceremonies for others. For further information see C. J. Fuller, “Hindu Temple Priests,” in T. N. Madan (ed.), Religion in India, 1991.

Pulaha

In Hindu mythology, one of the six sons of Brahma, all of whom become great sages. All are “mind-born,” meaning that Brahma’s thoughts bring them into being. The others are Kratu, Angiras, Pulastya, Marichi, and Atri.

Pulakeshin II

(r. 609–42) Greatest king in the Chalukya dynasty, which ruled much of the Deccan peninsula from the Chalukya capital at modern Badami. Pulakeshin was a contemporary of the Pushyabhuti emperor Harsha, whom Pulakeshin defeated in battle to contain Harsha's southward expansion. Pulakeshin also defeated the Pallava dynasty king Mahendravarman, who was killed in battle with Pulakeshin's army. He, in turn, was finally defeated and killed by Mahendravarman's son Narasimhavarman. For several centuries afterward, the Chalukya and Pallava Dynasties warred with one another, and although each was strong enough to defeat its opponent at various points in this conflict, neither was capable of keeping the other under subjugation. See also Pushyabhuti dynasty.

Pulastya
In Hindu mythology, one of the six sons of Brahma, all of whom become great sages. All are “mind-born,” meaning that Brahma’s thoughts are enough to bring them into being. The others are Kratu, Angiras, Pulaha, Marichi, and Atri.

Pumsavana (“engendering a male”) Samskara
In traditional calculation, the second of the life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras). The Pumsavana samskara was one of the prenatal samskaras performed before birth, done to ensure that a newly conceived child would be a boy. Various writers give differing prescriptions as to the correct time during the pregnancy to perform this rite, but they generally specify that it be performed when the moon is in a male constellation, at which time the woman should have several drops of the juice from the banyan tree inserted into her right nostril (a common practice in traditional medicine). This samskara is seldom performed in modern times.

Pundit
Term still used in modern times to denote a scholar or learned man. In traditional usage, the word pundit denoted a person proficient in Sanskrit and Sanskrit learning.

Punjab
Modern Indian state that lies south of the state of Jammu and Kashmir on the border of Pakistan. Modern Punjab is one of the so-called linguistic states, created to unite people with a common language and culture (in this case, Punjabi) under one state government. The present state of Punjab was created in 1966, when the former state (also called Punjab) was divided into three areas: Punjab (the Punjabi-speaking region), the state of Haryana (from the Hindi-speaking regions), and Himachal Pradesh (from the hill regions). The Punjab region is replete with history, for it has been the traditional route by which invaders have gained access to the northern Indian plains. The first of these were the Aryans, who coined its name from the five rivers (pancab) flowing through it. The abundant water from these rivers, carried by an extensive irrigation network, has made the Punjab exceptionally fertile, and today it remains the largest wheat-growing area of India.

The Punjab is famous as the birthplace of the Sikh religious community, and is today the only Sikh-majority state. The partition of India into Hindu and Muslim states in 1947 hit the Sikhs the hardest, since the division essentially carved their homeland in half. In the aftermath of the partition millions of people became refugees, and many of them fell victim to the atrocities of the time. For most of the 1980s, Sikh proindependence groups waged an undeclared war against the Indian government. In one of the most dramatic events of this period, the Akal Takht, the traditional symbol for Sikh temporal power, was stormed by the Indian army in June 1984, and the Indian prime minister, Indira Gandhi, was assassinated four months later. By the mid-1990s this movement seemed to have been quelled, although no one can predict whether this is permanent. Punjab is most famous for the Sikh Harmandir (Golden Temple) in Amritsar, a short distance from the Jallianwala Bagh, site of a massacre that was one of the pivotal events in the struggle for Indian independence. For general information about Punjab and all the regions of India, an accessible reference is Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.

Punya

(“holy”) Word most often used as a noun to mean “religious merit”—sometimes to denote the religious distinction arising from a particular deed, but more often to refer to the collective body of religious merit one has accumulated through the good deeds in one’s karmic career. (According to the theory of karma, all of one’s deeds will eventually be realized, so the merit one has earned in the past is stored up to bring benefits in the future.) Its opposite is pap, the most general word for religious demerit.

Purana

(“old”) An important genre of smrti texts, and the repository of traditional Indian mythology. The smrtis, or “remembered,” texts were a class of literature that, although deemed important, was considered less authoritative than the shrutis, or “heard” texts. In brief, the shrutis denoted the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts, whereas the smrtis included the two great epics, namely the Mahabharata and the Ramayana, the dharma literature, the Bhagavad Gita, and the compendia known as the puranas.

According to one traditional definition, a purana should contain accounts of at least five essential things: the creation of the earth, its dissolution and recreation, origins of the gods and patriarchs, the reigns of the Manvantaras, and the reigns of the Solar and Lunar Lines. In practice, the puranas are compendia of all types of sacred lore, from mythic tales to ritual instruction to exaltation of various sacred sites (tirthas) and actions. Individual puranas are usually highly sectarian and intended to promote the worship of one of the Hindu gods, whether Vishnu, Shiva, or the Goddess. By tradition the major puranas number eighteen, but there are hundreds of minor works. Along with the epics, the puranas are the storehouses of the mythic tales that are the common religious currency for traditional Hindus. In this respect the puranas are much more influential than any of the Vedas, because the tales in the puranas are common knowledge. The contents of the Vedas, though more authoritative, are less well known. Judgments on the importance of individual puranas vary according to sectarian persuasion, but some of the most important puranas are the Agni Purana, Shiva Purana, Brahma Purana, Bhagavata Purana, Vishnu Purana, Harivamsha, and Markandeya Purana. For a general translation of stories from puranic texts, see Cornelia Dimmitt and J. A. B. van Buitenen, Classical Hindu Mythology, 1978.

Purana Kassapa

In early Indian philosophy, philosopher opposed to moral rules, whose views are mentioned in Buddhist scriptures. According to these texts, Kassapa believed that there was no religious merit in good acts, and no demerit in evil acts—that neither of these had any affect on the Self at all. Beyond this, very little is known about him.

Purandaradas

(1480–1564) A devotee (bhakta) of the god Vishnu who was the founder of the Haridasas, a sect of saint-composers in the southern Indian state of Karnataka. Aside from the literary merits of the poetry Purandaradas wrote, the musical structure of his songs is believed to have laid the foundations for the Karnatic school of Indian music, the predominant musical form in southern India.

Purattasi

The sixth month in the Tamil solar year, corresponding to the northern Indian solar month of Kanya (the zodiagonal sign of Virgo), which usually falls within September and October. The existence of several different calendars is one clear sign of the continuing importance of regional cultural patterns. One way that the Tamils retain their culture is by preserving their traditional calendar. Tamil is one of the few regional languages in India with an ancient, well-established literary tradition. See also Tamil months, Tamil Nadu, and Tamil language.

Puri

City and sacred site (tirtha) on the Bay of Bengal in the state of Orissa. Puri is best known for its temple to the god Jagannath, a local deity assimilated... into the pantheon as a form of the god Krishna and therefore, by extension, a form of Vishnu. The temple was completed in 1198 C.E. and is currently receiving much needed restoration, after several pieces fell off the tower in the early 1990s. The most important annual festival held in Puri is the Rath Yatra. During this festival, Jagannath, his brother Balabhadra, and his sister Subhadra are carried in procession through the city’s main street in enormous wooden carts. They travel to another temple about a mile away, where they stay for a week, and then return to Puri. Aside from the spectacle, the ceremony is an important ritual theater used to demonstrate the relationship between Jagannath and the kings of Puri, who were considered to be deities ruling in his name. Although the kings no longer wield actual power in modern times, by virtue of their status they still play an important ritual role.

Aside from containing the temple of Jagannath, Puri is one of the four dhams, which symbolically mark the geographic boundaries of India. It is also the home of the Govardhan Math, one of the four Dashanami Sanyasi sacred centers supposedly established by the philosopher Shankaracharya. Puri’s character as a holy city has made it an attractive place for religiously inclined people to make their homes, most notably the Bengali saint Chaitanya (1486–1533), who lived there for much of his adult life. The cultural life generated by the worship of Jagannath also made Puri a center for the arts, and it is the traditional home of the classical dance form known as Orissi. For further information see Anncharlott Eschmann, Hermann Kulke, and Gaya Charan Tripathi, The Cult of Jagannath and the Regional Tradition of Orissa, 1978; and Frederique Appfel Marglin, “Time Renewed: Ratha Jatra in Puri,” in T. N. Madan (ed.), Religion in India, 1991.

Puri Dashanami

One of the ten divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasis, ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva. The Dashanamis were supposedly established by the ninth century philosopher Shankaracharya in an effort to create a corps of learned men who could help to revitalize Hindu life. Each of the divisions is designated by a different name—in this case, puri (“city”). Upon initiation, new members are given this name as their new surname, thus allowing for immediate group identification.

Aside from their individual identity, these ten “named” divisions are also divided into four larger organizational groups. Each group has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by Shankaracharya, as well as other particular religious associations. The Puri Dashanamis belong to the Kitawara group, which is affiliated with the Shringeri Math in the southern Indian town of Shringeri.

Purity

(shaucha) Along with its opposite, impurity (ashaucha), purity is one of the fundamental concepts in Hindu culture. Although to outsiders purity can be easily confused with cleanliness, it is fundamentally different—purity is a religious category marked by the presence or absence of pollution or defilement, whereas cleanliness is a hygienic category. In some cases these categories can overlap, but in most their disjunction becomes clear. For example, from a religious perspective, bathing (snana) in the Ganges River makes one pure, whereas from a hygienic perspective the lower reaches of the Ganges are quite heavily polluted.

On a personal level, purity can be best described as the absence of defilement, gained through removing impurities in some manner, most often by bathing. After becoming purified, one remains pure until coming into contact with a source of impurity. These sources of impurity include essential bodily functions, such as urination and evacuation; sexual activity; contact with impure things both inside and outside one's home; and even contact with certain groups of people deemed impure. Thus, although purity is always easy to regain, it is impossible to retain, since it is breached by many of the actions of everyday life. It is also important to realize that impurity brings no moral stigma to an individual—becoming impure means simply that one has come into contact with some contaminant, and that this must be removed. The only times when purity is particularly important are in worship and in eating—the former to keep from contaminating the deities and their environs, the latter to protect oneself, since the circumstances surrounding what one eats are considered to have long-term effects on an individual.

Aside from its personal dimension, purity has a social dimension as well. Higher status groups, such as brahmins, are considered to have inherently higher ritual purity. This social dimension of purity comes with birth and is the religious basis determining the hierarchical divisions in the traditional social system. To some extent, a group's purity level corresponds to its hereditary occupation. People who had continual contact with substances considered impure (such as latrine cleaners, corpse burners, and scavengers) were seen as tainted by work, and rendered impure. Brahmins, as scholars and priests (the latter a task that brought them in contact with the gods), were the purest. Between these extremes fell the other groups, whose relative status in a specific locale was determined by local factors. For theoretical consideration of the importance that purity plays in modern Hindu life, see Louis Dumont, Homo Hierarchicus, 1980; for another analysis of social ordering, see McKim Marriot, “Hindu Transactions: Diversity Without Dualism,” in Bruce Kapferer (ed.), Transaction and Meaning, 1976; see also Pauline Kolenda, “Purity and Pollution,” in T. N. Madan (ed.), Religion in India, 1991. See also caste and jati.

Purochana
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Purochana is a minister of Duryodhana, the epic's antagonist. He advises Duryodhana to build the House of Lac as a means to kill the Pandavas, the five brothers who are Duryodhana's cousins, and the epic's protagonists. After the Pandavas move into the House of Lac, Purochana sets fire to it. The Pandavas, whose uncle Vidura has alerted them to the danger, are able to escape through a secret underground passage, but Purochana himself is killed in the fire.

Purohit
("[one] placed in front") The most important of the priestly functionaries in the cult of sacrifice found in the Brahmanas. The purohit was responsible for supervising the other sacrificing priests, such as the rtvij and the hotr, and for making sure that the animal sacrifices were completed without error. The purohit would often be attached to a particular ruler and was also called to perform rites for communal well-being. In modern times this latter meaning has persisted, the word is often used to denote one's family priest, who will perform various rituals for the family.

Pururavas
In Hindu mythology, a prominent king of a royal lineage who trace their ancestry to the moon. Pururavas is a righteous king who performs one hundred horse sacrifices (ashvamedha), and the merit from these gives him great power. He is best known for his dalliance with the celestial nymph (apsara) Urvashi, by whom he has several children. Although the two are forced to spend sixty years apart because of a curse, in the end they are happily reunited.

Purusha
(“person”) One of the two fundamental first principles in the Samkhya philosophical school, the other one being prakrti ("nature"). Samkhya upholds an atheistic philosophical dualism in which the twin principles of purusha and prakrti—roughly, spirit and nature—are the source of all things. Purusha is conceived as conscious but completely inactive and unchanging. It is the passive witness to the myriad transformations of prakrti going on around it, and as the source of consciousness purusha is ultimately identified with a person's true Self (atman). Thus purusha is inferred as plural, given the plurality of conscious beings and the fact that one person can gain final enlightenment while all the rest remain in bondage. According to the Samkhyas, the ultimate source of bondage lies in people's failure to distinguish between purusha and prakrti and in identifying the Self with the latter rather than the former. For further information see Gerald Larson and Ram Shankar Bhattacharya (eds.), Samkhya, 1987; and Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Purushartha
The Aims of Life, traditionally numbered at four: material wealth and power (artha), pleasure (kama), religious duty (dharma), and final liberation (moksha). All of these were seen as legitimate goals in traditional Hindu society. See Aims of Life.

Purusha Sukta
(“Hymn to the Primeval Man”) The most common name for the hymn in the Rg Veda (10.90) that describes the creation of the material and social world as the result of a primordial sacrifice. According to the text, in the beginning there was one primeval man, who was dismembered in sacrifice. Different parts of his body became different parts of the physical universe, as well as the four traditional major social groups (varnas): the brahmins came from the primeval man's mouth, the kshatriyas from his shoulders, the vaishyas from his thighs (a common euphemism for the genitals), and the shudras from his feet. This hymn clearly reflects the sacrificial paradigm that was so central to the later Brahmana literature, and is thus believed to be one of the latest hymns in the Rg Veda. It is also notable for giving the first known articulation of the four varnas, as well as the symbolic functions associated with each: for brahmins, speech and the authority of the sacred word; for kshatriyas, protection and military valor; for vaishyas, generation and production, and for shudras, service to others.

Purushottama Mas
Religious observance that occurs when the intercalary month falls during the lunar month of Ashadh. The intercalary month is an extra lunar month inserted into the calendar about every thirty months, to maintain general agreement between the solar and lunar calendar. It begins after any “regular” lunar month in which the sun has not moved into the next sign of the zodiac, and takes the name of the preceding month. Since the intercalary month is an unusual phenomenon, it is generally considered to be inauspicious, and the most common colloquial name for this month is the malamasa, the “impure month.” When this extra month falls in the lunar month of Ashadh, however, devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu take the opposite perspective and treat it as an exceedingly holy time, dedicated to Vishnu in his form as Purushottama (“best of men”). Vaishnavas celebrate this month by reading the sacred texts, chanting Vishnu’s divine names, and other sorts of worship. The month of Ashadh, and its intercalary month, are especially important for the Jagannath temple in the city of Puri, whose presiding deity, Jagannath, is considered a form of Krishna and therefore, by extension, a form of Vishnu. During every year Ashadh is the month in which the Rath Yatra festival is performed in Puri, and in years when the intercalary month falls in Ashadh, new images of Jagannath and his siblings are created.

Purva (“Earlier”) Mimamsa
One of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy, most commonly referred to simply as Mimamsa (“investigation”); it was given the name Purva Mimamsa to distinguish it from the Uttara (“Later”) Mimamsa school, better known as Vedanta. The Mimamsa school’s name is quite apt, for it emphasizes the investigation of dharma (“righteous action”), particularly as revealed in the Vedas, the earliest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts. Mimamsas affirmed that the Vedas were composed either by God or by human beings but were rather simply heard by the ancient sages through their advanced powers of perception, and then transmitted orally from generation to generation.

Since they accepted the Vedas as the primary source of authority and assumed that the Vedas contained codes and prescriptions pertaining to dharma, the Mimamsas then developed complex rules for textual interpretation to discern these, and it is for these rules that they are best known. Mimamsas believed in the existence of the soul and in the necessary connection of actions with their results inherent in the notion of karma—two ideas attested to in the Vedas. In cases where the result of an action comes some time after the act, the Mimamsas believed that the result existed as an unseen force called apurva. This force would invariably bring on the result, thus maintaining the Vedic truth. The Mimamsas were less unified on the existence of God. Jaimini (4th c. B.C.E.), the author of the Mimamsa Sutras and the founder of the school, seems to ignore the issue completely, and 1,000 years later another Mimamsa luminary, Kumarila, argued against the existence of God.

Aside from developing methods for interpreting the Vedas, Mimamsas also contributed to logic and epistemology. One of their notable contributions was postulating two new pramanas, which are the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge. All the philosophical schools accepted perception (pratyaksha) as a pramana, and most also accepted inference (anumana) and authoritative testimony (shabda). The two new modes developed by the Mimamsas were “presumption” (arthapatti) and “knowledge from absence” (abhava). The Mimamsas justified these additions by claiming that they accounted for knowledge that could not be subsumed under the existing pramanas. Arthapatti is an inference from circumstance, in which a judgment is made about one case based solely on similarities to related cases. An example would be the presumption that a traveler had reached his or her destination after the train's arrival time had passed. According to Indian philosophy, this is not a true inference, since the latter must always be confirmed by direct perception. In the same way, abhava or the perception of any absence (e.g., the absence of some object before one) could not be accounted for by any of the existing pramanas, and thus required this new one to explain it. Aside from Jaimini, the two most significant figures among the Mimamsas are Kumarila and Prabhakara, who both lived in the seventh century. For further information see Karl H. Potter, Presuppositions of India's Philosophies, 1972; and Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Pushan

In the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts, Pushan is one of the deities identified with the Sun. Due to this connection, Pushan is described as the witness to all things; he is also considered to be the keeper and protector of flocks, and bringer of prosperity. By the turn of the common era, and perhaps significantly earlier, his presence had almost completely disappeared, and today he remains only historically important.

Pushan

(2) In Hindu mythology, the name of an aditya (minor deity) who attends the sacrifice sponsored by the demigod Daksha. The sacrifice is a disaster, since Daksha insults the god Shiva by not inviting him to the ceremony. When Daksha's daughter Sati, who is also Shiva's wife, inquires why Shiva has been excluded, Daksha begins to insult her in full view of the company. Mortified and humiliated, Sati commits suicide. When Shiva learns of this, he comes with his ghoulish minions and utterly destroys the sacrifice. In the process many of the guests suffer injuries or indignities, and Pushan's teeth are broken and lost.
Pushkar
("blue lotus") City and celebrated sacred site (tirtha) a few miles north and west of the city of Ajmer in the state of Rajasthan. Pushkar's center is a natural lake, and its major importance is as a bathing (snana) place—according to tradition, its lake is so holy that Pushkar is said to be the religious preceptor (guru) of all other sacred sites. Pushkar's lake is surrounded by temples. Of these, the best-known is dedicated to the god Brahma and is his only temple in all of India. Two nearby temples dedicated to the Goddess are said to be Shakti Pithas, a network of sites spread throughout the subcontinent and sacred to the Goddess. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth. The two temples in Pushkar mark the places where both of Sati's wrists fell. Pushkar's largest festival is known as Kartik Purnima (October–November), and falls on a full moon (generally associated with enhancing the sanctity of bathing places). Aside from being a time for bathing, this event is also marked by the holding of an enormous livestock market, particularly for camels and horses. The state government is currently promoting this as a tourist attraction, and it has drawn over 200,000 people in recent years. See also pitha.

Pushkara ("Blue Lotus") Dvipa
In traditional mythic geography, the name of the seventh and outermost of the concentric land masses (dvipas) making up the visible world. See also cosmology.

Pushpa
("flower") The tenth of the sixteen traditional upacharas ("offerings") given to a deity as part of worship. In this offering (based on the model of treating the deity as an honored guest) the deity is given flowers, valued both for their color and their fragrance. The actual act of offering can be performed in various ways and often depends on the worshiper's inclinations. In some cases the flowers will simply be presented before the deity's image, with the understanding that the deity has taken them, whereas in other cases flowers will be placed on the deity's image, or a garland hung around its neck. In either instance, the underlying motive is to show love and respect for the deity and to minister to its needs as one would to a living person. This particular act of respect and love can also be accorded to other human beings; garlanding a person with flowers is a sign of high esteem or congratulations.

Pushpak Viman
("Flower chariot") In Hindu mythology, the most famous of the aerial cars. Pushpak Viman is built by the divine architect Vishvakarma. Vishvakarma's daughter Sanjna has married the Sun but is so overwhelmed by his brilliance that she begs her father to reduce his luster so she can stand to be with him. Vishvakarma does this by trimming some bits off the sun, which are later fashioned into the Pushpak Viman as well as several divine weapons. For some time the Pushpak Viman is held by the minor deity Kubera, who obtains it as a reward for performing intense physical asceticism (tapas). It is later taken from Kubera by the demon-king Ravana, who uses its powers to wreak all sorts of tyranny, culminating in the abduction of Rama's wife Sita. After slaying Ravana, Rama uses the Pushpak Viman to return to the city of Ayodhya and then returns the car to Kubera.

Pushti Marg
Religious community founded by the philosopher Vallabhacharya (1479–1531), whose teachings remain the sect's primary influence. Vallabhacharya characterized his philosophical position as "pure monism" (Shuddadvaita); his fundamental position is that the god Krishna is the Supreme Being and the ultimate source of everything that exists. The world, and human beings, thus share in his divine nature, although only in a limited fashion, and the human soul is imbued with divinity as its inner light and controller.

Since Krishna is the ultimate source of everything and thus everything depends ultimately on God, the school’s primary religious emphasis is on the importance of God’s grace. This grace is seen as nourishing (pushti) the devotee (bhakta) and is best attained by devotion (bhakti), which is conceived of as the only effective religious path. This emphasis on grace and devotion has meant that the Pushti Marg have put little stress on asceticism or renunciation, and the bulk of Vallabha charya’s followers came from affluent merchant communities. The stress on devotion was soon articulated in elaborately arranged forms of image worship in the Pushti Marg’s temples. Devotees would visualize themselves as Krishna’s companions during his daily activities—waking, eating, taking his cows to graze, coming home, etc.—and thus gain the opportunity to take part in the divine play (lila). This emphasis on visualization and participation was fostered through the development of vast liturgical resources, which were composed by eight poets (the ashtachap) who were associated with Vallabha charya and Vitthalnath, his son and successor. The third leader, Vitthalnath’s son Gokulnath, further consolidated the developing community, whose major sacred site is now in Nathdwara in the state of Rajasthan. For further information see R.K. Barz, The Bhakti Sect of Vallabha charya, 1976.

Pushyabhuti Dynasty
(6th–7th c.) Northern Indian dynasty whose capital was at Kanyakubja, the modern city of Kanuaj in the Ganges river basin, and whose territory ran through the northern Indian plain from the Punjab to Bihar. The Pushyabhutis filled the northern Indian political vacuum after the demise of the Gupta empire and in some measure regained its greatness. The dynasty’s greatest ruler was the emperor Harsha (r. 606–47), whose reign was chronicled in panegyric fashion by the playwright Bana, and perhaps more factually by the Chinese Buddhist pilgrim Hsuan Tsang. The latter’s journals give a detailed picture both of Harsha himself, in whose court Hsuan Tsang stayed for some time, and of everyday life in Harsha’s kingdom. See also Gupta dynasty.

Pustaka
A book, traditionally made of palm leaves connected by a string running through a hole punched in the middle, with a wooden cover on top and bottom to keep the leaves from being bent or broken. In Indian iconography, the book is most strongly associated with the goddess Saraswati, in keeping with her identity as the patron deity of the arts, culture, and learning. It also commonly appears as one of the objects held by the god Brahma.

Putana
In Hindu mythology, Putana is one of the demon assassins sent by Kamsa, the king of Mathura, in an attempt to kill his nephew, the child-god Krishna. Through her magic powers, Putana assumes the form of a beautiful young woman and, after cooing over Krishna for awhile, puts him to suckle at her poisoned breast. When Krishna latches on, however, it is Putana who is in dire trouble—Krishna sucks the life right out of her. As she dies, she reverts to her original form, gigantic and hideous, and the crash of her falling body shakes the earth and fells trees.

Putrada Ekadashi
Religious observance that occurs twice per year: on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Shravan (July–August), and on the eleventh day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Paush (December–January). As with all the eleventh-day observances, these are dedicated to the god Vishnu. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, which usually involve fasting (upavasa) and worship, and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. Faithfully observing the ekadashi rites on these days is believed to give one a son (putra), which is a major concern in traditional Indian culture. Sons are necessary for this world and the next, not only to care for their parents in their old age, but also to perform certain ancestral rites after one's death. The strength of this desire for sons is demonstrated by the fact that this particular ekadashi occurs twice during the year—the only ekadashi to do so.

Puttaparthi
Town in Andhra Pradesh near the border with Karnataka, about ninety-five miles north of Bangalore. Puttaparthi is best known in connection with the modern Hindu teacher Sathya Sai Baba, not only as the place where he was born and raised, but also the site of his most important religious dwelling (ashram) and primary residence.
Radha
In later devotional (bhakti) literature, Radha is the woman portrayed as the god Krishna’s lover and companion. Radha’s love for Krishna is a symbol of the soul’s hunger for union with the divine, expressed through the poetic conventions of erotic love.

Although a few references to Radha in poetry date back to the seventh century, her first developed portrayal is in Jayadeva’s lyric poem the Gitagovinda, written around the twelfth century. The Gitagovinda tells the story of Radha and Krishna’s passion, their conflict and separation, and their eventual reconciliation. Jayadeva’s portrayal of Radha is unique. In the poem Radha wishes to have Krishna all to herself, as his sole lover and companion. She sulks jealously when he flirts with other women and angrily dismisses him when he comes to her marked with the signs of another tryst. In the end, however, they reconcile and make passionate love as a symbol of their union.

This picture of love, separation, and reunion between Radha and Krishna gains a sharper focus through the context set by Jayadeva’s hymn Dashavatara Stotra. In it Jayadeva lists the achievements of Krishna’s ten incarnations (avatars) immediately after the text’s introductory verses. The concluding verses of the hymn explicitly refer to Krishna as the ultimate source of the ten avatars, reminding hearers that the person taking part in this drama of jealousy, repentance, and reconciliation is none other than the Lord of the Universe Himself, who in ages past has acted to preserve the world from destruction. Unlike earlier depictions of Krishna in which his connections with his devotees (bhaktas) are portrayed as a form of “play” (lila), the Krishna found in the Gitagovinda seems less lofty and detached, more intimately and intensely involved with Radha as the object of his affection. The poem renders Krishna as one who feels emotions deeply and truly and meaningfully reciprocates the feelings of his devotee.

Jayadeva’s poetic focus is on the inner dynamic between the two lovers, and he reveals little about Radha outside this relationship. In the time after the Gitagovinda, Radha’s character developed in various ways. Some poets describe her as married to another man, thus giving Radha’s trysts with Krishna the color of adulterous, forbidden love. This love is considered more intense in Indian poetics, since the lovers have nothing to gain from the liaison but the love itself and stand to lose everything should they be discovered. Here Radha stands as the symbol of one willing to risk and lose all for the sake of love itself.

The other way in which Radha’s character is developed runs contrary to this adulterous portrayal. In some traditions Radha is not drawn as a simple woman consumed with love for Krishna, but as his wife, consort, and divine power (shakti), through whose agency Krishna is able to act in the world. This deified image of Radha was particularly important for the Nimbarka religious community, which conceived of Radha and Krishna as forms of Lakshmi and Narayana. Another group espousing this equality was the Radhavallabh community, whose members particularly stressed the love Krishna felt for Radha. For further information about Radha, see Barbara Stoller Miller (ed. and trans.), The Love Song of the Dark Lord, 1977; and David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Radhakrishnan, Sarvepalli
(1888–1975) Modern Indian philosopher and statesman. Like many elite Indians
Radha, the god Krishna's lover and companion.
of his generation, Radhakrishnan was educated at Christian missionary schools, and the contrast between the Hindu piety of his home and the Christian doctrine he encountered at school sparked his interest in comparative philosophy. He spent the rest of his life as an interpreter and apologist for classical Hindu thought, particularly the Vedanta school, and as a proponent of philosophical idealism, the notion that absolute truth can be found through intuition alone. Aside from his work as a college teacher and administrator, he also served as the vice president of India from 1952 to 1962, and as president from 1962 to 1967. For further information on his thought, see his An Idealist View of Life, 1981; Paul A. Schilpp, The Philosophy of Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan, 1952; and Robert N. Minor, “Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and ‘Hinduism’ Defined and Defended,” in Robert D. Baird (ed.), Religion in Modern India, 1998.

Radha Soami
Modern Hindu religious community founded in 1861 in the city of Agra by Shiv Dayal Singh, more commonly referred to as Soamiji Maharaj. Soamiji's family had been influenced by Tulsi Saheb, a devotional (bhakti) saint who lived in that region, and Soamiji's teachings reflect the importance of that contact. The two pillars of Radha Soami doctrine are the importance of the spiritual teacher (guru) and the practice of a spiritual discipline called surat-shabd-yoga.

According to Radha Soami teachings, contact with a guru is the single most important factor in a person's spiritual development, and this spiritual progress hinges on complete surrender to the guru's grace. It is essential for the devotee (bhakta) to be associated with a "true guru" (satguru), since not only does such an individual have access to the divine, he is considered a manifestation of the divine itself. Surat-shabd-yoga stresses joining (yoga) the devotee's spirit (surat) with the Divine Sound (shabd). The Divine Sound emanates from the Supreme Being and is always present. Most people cannot hear it, due to their preoccupation with worldly things, but with proper training and devotion to a true guru, anyone can eventually become attuned to the Divine Sound and resonate in harmony with it.

In the era since Soamiji Maharaj, the Radha Soami Satsang has split numerous times, usually based on disagreements over spiritual authority. Given the Radha Soami emphasis on the satguru as the Supreme Being, disagreements over spiritual succession—in effect, disagreements over the identity of the Supreme Being—made schisms virtually inevitable. It also seems clear that the underlying forces in many of these schisms were disagreements over far more mundane things, such as power, status, and property. Various branches of the Radha Soamis have made successful missionary efforts and established centers in Europe and the United States. For further information see Sudhir Kakar, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1991;

Radhashtami
("Radha's eighth") Festival falling on the eight day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Bhadrapada (August–September); this day is celebrated as the birthday of Krishna's consort Radha. Radha is seen differently by various Vaishnava religious communities: For some she is a human woman, the symbol of the perfect devotee (bhakta) who forsakes all else to be with her lover, for others she is considered the queen of heaven and an equal to Krishna himself. In either case, her closeness to him is shown by her birth on the same month and lunar day as Krishna, but in the opposite half of the month. Radhashtami festival is celebrated with particular fervor in Barsana, the village in the Braj region in which Radha is said to have been born.

Radhavallabh Sampraday

Religious community whose members are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu (that is, Vaishnavas), and whose founder was the sixteenth-century poet-saint Harivamsh. Harivamsh held distinctive views on the status of Radha, which his community has preserved. Whereas earlier poetry had often portrayed Radha as the god Krishna’s adulterous mistress, the Radhavallabans conceive of her as his lawful wife and as a deity whose status was equal with Krishna’s. Their devotion was focused on Krishna and on his status as the “beloved of Radha” (Radhavallabh).

Raga

In Indian music, a concrete melodic mode of at least five notes. Any musician playing a raga is limited by the constraints of its established form. The order of these established notes in the raga does not follow their musical order but differs according to whether the note sequence is ascending or descending. There are over 200 recognized ragas, but only about thirty are in general use. Each raga has very particular symbolic associations—particularly with the time of day or with the seasons—and is also believed to convey a particular aesthetic mood (rasa) to listeners. As in all the Indian arts, the musician who plays a raga endeavors to convey a certain mood to an audience and to awaken corresponding feelings within them.

Raghu

In Hindu mythology, Raghu is a famous king of the Ikshvaku dynasty and the grandfather of King Dasharatha. One of Dasharatha’s sons is Rama, the protagonist of the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics.

Raghuvaṃśa

(“Raghu’s Lineage”) One of the great poetic works by Kalidasa, who is generally considered to be the finest classical Sanskrit poet. The Raghuvaṃśa is a quasi-historical epic in nineteen cantos, devoted to the kings of the Solar Line, and particularly to its most eminent member, the god-king Rama. The story of Rama in Kalidasa’s poem is fairly close to that of the epic Ramayana, although Kalidasa describes Rama as an avatar or divine incarnation in a way that Valmiki does not. Kalidasa’s poem also uses the kings of the Solar Line as examples of devotion to the four aims of life (purushartha): wealth (artha), pleasure (kama), religious duty (dharma), and release (moksha). In Kalidasa’s portrayal, the kings at the end of the line are completely immoral and devoted solely to pleasure. Such abject neglect of their duty to rule righteously brings on the destruction of the line and provides a exemplary lesson for hearers of the poem.

Rahu

A malevolent “planet” in Hindu astrology (jyotisha) that has no counterpart in Western astrology and was originally the head of a demon. According to the story, as the gods drink the nectar of immortality they have churned from the ocean of milk, the demon Sainhikeya slips into their midst in disguise. As the demon begins to drink, the sun and moon alert Vishnu, who uses his discus to cut off the demon’s head. Sainhikeya’s two halves become immortal, however, after coming into contact with the nectar. The severed head becomes Rahu, and the decapitated body another evil planet, Ketu. Rahu is regarded not as a physical planet, but as the ascending node of the moon. This is the point where the moon’s northward path intersects the path of the sun in the sky, causing an eclipse. Rahu has particular enmity for the sun and moon, as the deities responsible for his demise, and tries to swallow them whenever he meets them. in the heavens. He always succeeds, but since he no longer has a body to digest them, they escape unharmed through Rahu's severed neck. This, of course, is the traditional explanation for solar and lunar eclipses; their association with the malevolent Rahu has led eclipses to be seen as highly inauspicious times. See also Tortoise avatar.

Raidas
A variant name for the Hindu poet-saint Ravidas.

Rajabhiseka
("royal anointing") Royal consecration ceremony that replaced the earlier rajasuya rite. The Rajabhiseka includes rituals of anointing that were believed to have transformative power, but were less complex than the Rajasuya, and did not involve the ritual slaughter and sacrifice of animals.

Rajadharma
General name for the “king's dharma,” or religious duty, which fell to him (or far more rarely, her) by virtue of his role as ruler. This notion proceeded from the assumption in the dharma literature that every person had a unique role to play in society, a role that provided for social stability but also brought individual fulfillment. The king's most basic duty was to maintain order in the realm, since such peace enabled all others to fulfill their own individual religious duties (svadharma). The dharma literature conceives of maintaining order primarily through inflicting punishment (danda), designed to remove some evildoers and frighten the rest into good behavior. If the king succeeded in maintaining social order, then he could otherwise do as he pleased, with the proviso that taxation should not be so high that it was burdensome to the people. Beyond this, the Indian theory of kingship was largely pragmatic.

Rajagrha
Ancient name for the city corresponding to modern Rajgir, in the Nalanda district of the state of Bihar. Although contemporary Rajgir is a small and insignificant city, at the time of the Buddha it was the capital of the Magadhan empire and the center of the region's political and intellectual life. According to Buddhist tradition, Rajgir was the site of the first Buddhist council, held shortly after the Buddha's death and organized to document his teachings. This story is almost certainly apocryphal, since the Buddhist scriptures went through a much longer period of development, but its setting illustrates Rajagrha's centrality in the middle of the first millennium before the turn of the common era.

Raja Raja (r. 985–1014) Monarch under whose rule (and that of his son Rajendra) the Chola dynasty reached the apex of its power, stretching its influence from the Tanjore district of Tamil Nadu throughout southern India and into southeast Asia all the way to Malaysia. Raja Raja directed the wealth that such power brought toward the construction of massive temples. Of these, he is most noted for the Brhadeshvar temple in the city of Tanjore, dedicated to the “Great Lord” Shiva.

("passion") One of the three fundamental qualities (gunas) believed to be present in all things, the other two gunas being sattva ("goodness") and tamas ("darkness"). According to this model, differing proportions of these qualities account for differences in the properties of concrete things, and in the range of individual human capacities and tendencies. Unlike sattva and tamas, which, respectively, carry exclusively good and bad associations, rajas and its effects can be either positive or negative, depending on context. Rajas is negative, for example, when it leads to an enslavement to the passions that may blind one to careful and conscious thought. Alternately, the energies derived from passion can also engender useful activity and industriousness. The notion of the gunas originated in the metaphysics of the Samkhya school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy, and although much of Samkhya metaphysics connected with the gunas has long been discredited, the idea of the gunas and their qualities has become a pervasive assumption in Indian culture.

Rajashekhara

(10th c.) Dramatist notable for writing plays both in Sanskrit and Prakrit. Rajashekhara's Sanskrit plays were highly literary, and it seems that they were probably intended for reading rather than performance.

Rajasimhavarman

(8th c.) Ruler in the Pallava dynasty who, like his predecessors, was a great patron of the arts. His reign saw the construction of the last of the magnificent shore temples built on the Bay of Bengal, at Mahabalipuram in Tamil Nadu. The temple's major deity was the god Shiva, but a smaller shrine also held an image of the god Vishnu. Although these temples have been weathered by time and the elements, they remain some of the most visited sites in southern India.

Rajasthan

(“land of kings”) Modern Indian state on the border of Pakistan between the states of Punjab and Gujarat, created by combining a network of princely states with Ajmer, formerly under British control. These principalities were the remnants of small kingdoms, usually maintained by force of arms, giving Rajasthan its well-entrenched martial tradition. Many cities in Rajasthan have large forts originally built as defensive strongholds, which in modern times have been popular tourist attractions.

Geographically, the state is split diagonally by the Aravalli Hills, creating two distinct climatic zones. The south gets more rainfall and has traditionally been more thickly settled, whereas the north blends gradually into the Thar Desert—rendered cultivable in recent years by a system of irrigation canals. While the state's most important pilgrimage site is the city of Pushkar, other locales of interest abound. Among them, the temple of Hanuman at Mehandipur has gained regional importance as a site for curing mental illness, and the Karni Mata temple in the village of Deshnok is noted for its sacred rats. For general information about Rajasthan and all the regions of India, an accessible reference is Christine Nivin et al., India. 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.

Rajasthani

One of the two influential “schools” of Indian miniature painting, the other being the Pahari. Distinctions between the two schools are largely geographical and thus somewhat arbitrary, since the Basohli paintings of the Pahari school are stylistically closer to those of Rajasthan than to works in the later Pahari style.

The Rajasthani was the earliest developed school; it flourished in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in the small kingdoms of the Malwa region such as Mandu, and in the kingdoms that now comprise regions in modern Rajasthan—particularly Bundi, Kota, and Mewar, but also Jaipur and Bikaner. The Rajasthani style is generally characterized by a flat perspective and by visual power derived from vivid colors, bands of which often serve as a backdrop to the painting. For further information see W. G. Archer, Indian Painting, 1957.

Rajasuya

Royal consecration ceremony that is one of the most famous of the sacrificial rites that appear in the Vedas, the earliest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts. The ceremony is believed to have developed in the latter part of the Vedic era. Preparations for this rite could last for a year, and the rite itself served to raise the king to semidivine status. As with many Vedic sacrifices, an important part of the rajasuya sacrifice was the ritual slaughter and offering of animals. This rite has long fallen into disuse, partly because of the trouble required to prepare for it and partly because of general disapproval over animal sacrifices. The coronation rite that has replaced it is the rajabhiseka.

Rajatarangini

(“River of Kings”) Historical chronicle of the kings of Kashmir, written in verse by the Kashmiri poet Kalhana. The Rajatarangini is an unusually descriptive and accurate history of Kashmir and the region’s political, social, and religious institutions; the text’s only shortcoming is that it pays little attention to the outside world. Kalhana’s historical emphasis is unusual for Indian writers, and the Rajatarangini is one of the few indigenous Indian histories.

Rajendra I

(r. 1014–42) Monarch under whose rule (and that of his father, Raja Raja) the Chola dynasty reached the apex of its power, stretching its influence from the Tanjore region in Tamil Nadu, throughout southern India, and into southeast Asia all the way to Malaysia. In 1023 Rajendra defeated one of the kings of Bengal to extend his empire all the way to the Ganges but was unable to maintain authority over this expansive domain for long. He also fought a campaign against the Shrivijaya Empire in modern Malaysia, to retain control of trade from China. Like his father, Rajendra was a great patron of temple-building and other public monuments, including the great temple at Gangaikondacholapuram, built to commemorate the victory that opened the way to the Ganges.

Rajneesh, Bhagwan Shri

(b. Mohan Chandra Rajneesh, 1931–1990) Controversial Hindu teacher who mixed traditional Hindu teachings with ideas gleaned from modern psychology. He is most popularly associated with a permissive attitude toward sexuality that attracted many of his followers, both Western and Indian, although the former tended to predominate. This was part of a more generally indulgent attitude in which people were encouraged to act upon their desires, as a way to remove impediments to ultimate realization. For some time his ashram was located in Pune in the state of Maharashtra, but in 1981 he relocated to southern Oregon, propelled by local opposition and an investigation by Indian tax officials. For several years the new site was highly successful, but local opposition to his teachings and unease about his lifestyle—he reportedly owned ninety-three Rolls-Royces and was protected by Uzi-toting bodyguards—caused the spectacular collapse of this community in 1985. Rajneesh returned to India, where he eventually took up residence in Pune again. In his last years he changed his name several times—once claiming that the spirit of Gautama Buddha had entered him—and at the time of his death had taken the name Osho.

Rajput
(“king’s son”) Traditional Indian society was modeled as a collection of endogamous, or intermarried, subgroups known as jatis (“birth”). These jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group’s hereditary occupation, over which each jati had a monopoly. The Rajputs were a martial Hindu jati that at times ruled large parts of western India, and have always claimed to be kshatriyas—buttressing this claim by creating genealogies linking their families to the mythical Solar or Lunar Lines of kings. Their origin is uncertain, for they first appear around the end of the first millennium, and many scholars speculate that they were descended from the Hunas and later assimilated into the small kingdoms. The four main Rajput clans were known as the Agnikula (“fire lineage”), because they claimed descent from a single mythical king who had arisen from a sacrificial fire pit in Mount Abu, Rajasthan. These four ruling clans were the Pariharas in southern Rajasthan, the Chauhans in the region around Delhi, the Solankis in Gujarat, and the Pawars in western Madhya Pradesh.

Whatever their origin, the Rajputs were warrior princes whose martial code stressed death before dishonor and swift reprisals against any insult. During the Moghul Empire era (1525–1707) Rajput kings were often feudal vassals, given kingdoms in exchange for their loyalty and service. After the breakup of the Moghul Empire many of them continued to reign as the rulers of small princely states. They remain an important ruling class even in modern times, through the medium of parliamentary politics.

Rajrajeshvar Temple
Massive temple in the city of Tanjore in state of Tamil Nadu, dedicated to the god Shiva in his form as “Lord of Kings.” Tanjore was the capital of the Chola dynasty, and this temple, built approximately 1000 C.E. by the Chola king Raja Raja, conveys the confidence of a kingdom on the rise. Architecturally speaking, the temple is an enlargement of the simplest sort of Hindu temple, with a garbhaghrha covered by a spire, but it is breathtaking in its scale. The tower over the central shrine is 190 feet high and looks even higher, since the construction minimizes any distracting elements that would arrest the eye’s upward journey. It is capped by a single piece of stone weighing an estimated eighty tons, which required a four-mile-long ramp to put in place. See also Moghul dynasty.

Raksha Bandhan
Festival day celebrated on the full moon in the lunar month of Shravan (July–August); this festival’s theme is the bond of protection (raksha) between brother and sister. On this day sisters tie (bandhan) a string around the brother’s right wrist, which is sometimes just a simple thread and sometimes an elaborately constructed ornamental bracelet. Sisters then mark a tilak (tika) on the brother’s forehead as a sign of respect and feed their brothers sweets. For their part, brothers give their sisters money, clothing, jewelry, or other gifts. As with the festival of Bhaiya Duj, Raksha Bandhan symbolizes the protective bond between brothers and sisters. In the long term, brothers are seen as the family members who will protect their sisters’ interests—since in many cases daughters long outlive their fathers and their brothers are the natal relatives on whom they must depend. Sisters perform these rites to protect... their brothers from misfortune—the string tied around the wrist is believed to ward off evil. The festival of Raksha Bandhan is also performed by men and women who are not related by blood but who are close to one another. Tying on the string “makes” them brother and sister, and thus rules out the potential for any romantic involvement, which would be seen as a form of incest.

Rakshasa
In Hindu mythology, a particular type of asura (demon). Rakshasas are generally considered to be extremely powerful—not only in terms of their prodigious physical strength but also in their considerable skill in the magical arts. They are also generally characterized as malevolent toward human beings, whom they not only kill but also eat. According to one myth, rakshasas are born from Brahma’s anger when he becomes hungry while reciting the Vedas. The capital of the rakshasas is in Lanka, and their most celebrated leader is Ravana, whose death at the hands of Rama is the climax of the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics.

Rakshasa Marriage
One of the eight ways to perform a marriage recognized in the dharma literature, the treatises on religious duty. The rakshasas are a class of demon, and the raksha form of marriage took place when a man had intercourse with a woman after carrying her away by force. Not surprisingly, this was one of the four reprehensible (aprasrasta) forms of marriage and was forbidden because of the woman’s lack of consent, even though it was deemed a valid marriage. (Here the writers’ concern seems to have been to give the “bride” legal status as a wife rather than to legitimate the actions of the “groom.”) Theoretically valid, this form of marriage has been forbidden since the dharma literature was first codified in the centuries before the common era. Although the rakshasa marriage has never been one of the accepted forms of marriage, there are groups in which a ritualized battle and capture of the bride is part of the wedding ceremony. One could even interpret the barat, the procession of the groom and his family to the wedding location, as a ritualized triumphal entry following conquest. See also marriage, eight classical forms, marriage ceremonies, and marriage prohibitions.

Rakshasi
A female form of the type of demon known as a Rakshasa.

Raktabija
In the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most important textual source for the worship of the Goddess, Raktabija is the name of one of the demons vanquished by the goddess Kali. Raktabija has received the boon that any drop of his blood falling to the earth will instantly turn into another version of himself, rendering him practically unconquerable. Kali defeats this demon by drinking his blood as it is shed, until finally it is completely gone, and so is he.

Raktadantika
(“bloody teeth”) Powerful and protective form of the Goddess, particularly noted for killing demons and drinking their blood. During the fall festival of Navaratri, in which the Goddess is worshiped in a different form on nine successive nights, Raktadantika is her manifestation revered on the fifth night.

Rama (Rama Avatar)
The seventh avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu, the crown prince of the Solar Line and the protagonist of the Ramayana, one of the two great Indian epics. As with all of Vishnu’s avatars, Rama is born to destroy a being powerful enough to throw the cosmos out of balance, in this case Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka. The focal conflict in the Ramayana is Rama's quest to regain his wife Sita, who has been kidnapped by Ravana. The climactic sequence of the epic features Rama's struggle with Ravana, Ravana's death, and the reestablishment of cosmic equilibrium, signified by Rama's ascension to divine kingship.

Unlike the god Krishna, whose divine play (lila) often subverts or ignores accepted social values, Rama is a pillar of society. As a whole the Ramayana tends to espouse and uphold the traditional social values of religious duty (dharma), social hierarchy (varna), and the stages of life (ashrama). As the epic's protagonist, Rama is the epitome of all these values. He is solid, dependable, stable, righteous, and predictable. In Hindu culture Rama is the model of the perfect son, and he shows this by being utterly devoted to his parents, giving far greater weight to his duties as a son than as a husband. Unlike Krishna, who has multiple liaisons with his female devotees (bhakta), all in the name of divine play, Rama is married and monogamous. When the time comes for battle, he is the fiercest of combatants, incarnating the warrior (kshatriya) ideal of using strength to uphold justice, protect the righteous, and punish the wicked. In all these things he personifies some of the most deeply embedded values of Hindu culture.

Yet there are also some unsettling incidents, particularly in the Valmiki Ramayana, the epic's earliest version. These incidents either feature Rama inexplicably stepping out of character or else point to problematic tensions in traditional Hindu values. In an attempt to help the monkey-king Sugriva against his rival Bali, Rama shoots Bali in the back from a concealed place—an action incompatible with the notion of fair and honorable warfare. His actions in enforcing the existing social order also show its oppressive and restrictive nature. In one incident, Rama kills a low-status shudra whom he finds performing physical asceticism (tapas), a privilege reserved for his betters, and has molten lead poured in the ears of another shudra who was discovered listening to the sacred Vedas—a forbidden act for such a person. Both incidents show the hierarchical nature of idealized Hindu society, and the king's role in preserving and sustaining this hierarchy. When Rama and his brother Lakshmana are propositioned by Ravana's sister Shurpanakha, they first mislead and ridicule her, then mutilate her by cutting off her ears and nose. These actions seem incompatible with the kshatriya ethic of respect for women and the righteous use of force, and prompt Ravana to kidnap Sita in revenge.

Perhaps the most troubling questions arise from Rama's behavior toward his wife Sita. Immediately after being liberated from enslavement, she undergoes an ordeal by fire, from which her emergence unscathed upholds her claim that she remained chaste while being held captive. Despite this definitive proof, Rama later insists on a second test, in which Sita, in protest, is swallowed up by the earth. Thus, the picture of Rama conveyed by the epic is of a figure righteous by the standards of his time but on occasion rigid and inflexible.

In later versions of the Ramayana, particularly the Ramcharitmanas by the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?), this picture subtly shifts, possibly in an attempt to soften or remove these troubling incidents. Certain changes in Tulsidas's text also highlight the centrality of devotion (bhakti) over all other religious attitudes. Tulsidas's Rama is more explicitly portrayed as God incarnate, a figure who is aware of his divine status and whose actions are undertaken for the benefit of his devotees. This Rama is still concerned with social values, particularly the kshatriya obligation to uphold and protect religious duty (dharma). Yet this ethic is in tension with—and sometimes in opposition to—the importance of bhakti, which is portrayed as the ultimate religious goal. These subtle shifts in the later text point to an occasional conflict between two differing ideals—dharma and bhakti—both of which are affirmed as essential.

For further information on Rama, see the texts of the Ramayana (the Valmiki Ramayana, Kamba Ramayana, and Ramcharitmanas) or translations from the Sanskrit puranas, such as Cornelia Dimmitt and J. A. Ramakrishna (1836–86) Bengali mystic and saint who was one of the most remarkable figures in the nineteenth-century revival of Hinduism. Ramakrishna was the son of a village priest and received little formal education during his life. He retained much of his rustic simplicity and spent his adult life as a temple priest at the Kali temple at Dakshineshwara, outside the city of Calcutta. From his childhood Ramakrishna had been devoted to the Goddess Kali, and characterized himself as being “intoxicated with God.” He sought and found the divine, first through Kali but later through a variety of other religious paths, including the abstract monism of the speculative Upanishads, devotion to the god Vishnu, Christianity, and Islam. Out of these experiences came his conviction that the inner experience in all religious traditions was the same and led to the same divine presence. Although Ramakrishna did not publicize himself, he became known in Calcutta's religious circles through his association with Keshub Chander Sen, the leader of the reformist Brahma Samaj. This association brought him disciples who would spread his teachings, particularly Narendranath Datta, better known as Swami Vivekananda. For a devotee’s perspective on Ramakrishna, see Christopher Isherwood, Ramakrishna and His Disciples, 1965; for a modern psychological reading, see Jeffrey Kripal, Kali's Child, 1995.

Ramakrishna Mission

Hindu religious organization founded in 1897 by Swami Vivekananda to propagate the religious message of Vivekananda’s teacher, Ramakrishna. Since its inception, the Ramakrishna Mission has been equally dedicated to spiritual uplifting and to social service, based on Vivekananda’s realization that India needed material development as much as it needed religious instruction. The mission has sought to fulfill part of this charge by publishing inexpensive editions of religious texts, including but not restricted to the teachings of Ramakrishna and Vivekananda, and by sponsoring social service in the fields of...

Ramana Maharishi
(1879–1950) Modern Hindu sage, whose life and message reiterated the fundamental insight of the ancient speculative Upanishads, namely, that the inner Self (atman) is identical with Supreme Reality (Brahman). Ramana was born into a middle-class Indian family and during his youth demonstrated no unusual abilities. In 1895 he obtained a copy of the Periya Puranam, a text chronicling the lives of the poet-saints known as the Nayanars, and in reading about their lives Ramana began to desire to renounce the world. This inclination was realized the next year, when he imagined the death of his body and reached the conclusion that his real identity was the Self. He left his family and went to the temple of Tiruvannamalai, also known as Arunachala, where he remained until his death fifty-four years later. For some time at the start he was deep in meditation and barely attended to his physical needs. Soon he attracted disciples, through whom his family eventually discovered his whereabouts, although Ramana refused to return home with them when they came to see him. His mother moved to Tiruvannamalai in 1916, and after her death five years later Ramana relocated his dwelling to be near her grave. Although he spoke very seldom, he managed to compose two short works—Self-Enquiry and Who am I?—in which he stated his basic insights. For further information see T. M. P. Mahadevan, Ramana Maharshi, 1977.

Ramananda
(14th c.) Sant poet-saint who is traditionally cited as the spiritual teacher (guru) of the poet-saints Kabir, Ravidas, Pipa, and others. The Sants were a group of poet-saints from central and northern India who shared several general tendencies: stress on individualized, interior religion leading to a personal experience of the divine; disdain for external ritual, particularly image worship; faith in the power of the divine name; and a tendency to ignore conventional caste distinctions. Ramananda is said to have been a charismatic spiritual leader, and is claimed to have been a direct disciple of the southern Indian philosopher Ramanuja, who sent Ramananda north to help spread the devotional movement. The latter claim is almost certainly false, given that the only verse uncontestably attributable to Ramananda is found in the Adigranth, the scripture of the Sikh community. This verse does not reflect Ramanuja’s Shrivaishnava tradition, in which the primary deity is Vishnu, but instead shows the influence of the Nathpanthi ascetics, who stressed yoga. There are other verses ascribed to Ramananda in later sources, but their authenticity is doubtful, and little can be definitely known about his life.

Ramanandi
Renunciant ascetics, devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, who are by far the most numerous and most influential of the Vaishnava ascetics. The Ramanandis claim that their order was founded by the religious teacher Ramananda, about whom little is definitely known. For some time the Ramanandis maintained that Ramananda had been a disciple of the southern Indian philosopher Ramanuja, and thus that their sect had sprung out of Ramanuja’s Shrivaishnava religious community, but this claim was formally renounced after a dispute at the Kumbha Mela festival in the city of Ujjain in 1921. Ramananda is also traditionally thought to have been the guru of many northern Indian bhakti figures, most notably Kabir, Ravidas, Pipa, and Sen, although on this matter too there is little hard historical evidence.
All of the stories about Ramananda, however, point to someone who was firm in his commitment to devotion and was willing to initiate people from all walks of society.

The tutelary deity for the Ramanandi ascetics is Rama, particularly as described in the Ramcharitmanas, a vernacular version of the epic Ramayana written by the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?). Tulsidas portrays Rama as God incarnate, come to earth for the benefit of his devotees, and the text’s primary theme is on the power of devotion. Yet within the larger confines of the Ramanandi fold there are several distinct variations on practice, which have little or nothing in common with one another. One strand is that of the tyagis, who stress renunciation and asceticism. A second strand is that of the Nagas, who in earlier times were fighting ascetics but whose military organization is now important only during the bathing (snana) processions for the Kumbha Mela. The final strand is that of the rasiks (“aesthetes”), whose religious practice is based on highly complex patterns of visualization in which they imagine themselves as present in the court of Rama itself; this sort of visualization was undoubtedly imitated from the patterns of Krishna devotion as practiced in the Braj region. The rasik tradition is by far the most literate and sophisticated; the tyagis and the Nagas perform similar sorts of rites as other ascetics, although their interpretation and their chosen deity is unique to their order. For further information see Peter van der Veer, Gods on Earth, 1988.

Ramanand Sagar
Director of the televised production of the Ramayana, which was completed in the late 1980s. The episodes were aired each Sunday morning for about a year, and were wildly successful despite problems with production quality. (Some of these problems undoubtedly derived from the difficulties of preserving the immediacy of the oral experience of traditional storytelling in the modern medium of television.) In the mid-1990s Sagar devoted his attention to other mythological television serials, with an extended series on the life of the god Krishna.

Ramanuja
(11th c.) Southern Indian philosopher who was the greatest exponent of the philosophical position known as Vishishtadvaita (“qualified nondualism”) Vedanta, and the most important figure in the Shrivaishnava religious community. Ramanuja lived most of his life at the temple-town of Shrirangam in the state of Tamil Nadu, in service of the temple’s resident deity, Ranganatha, a form of Vishnu. Ramanuja was convinced that Brahman, or Supreme Reality, was a personal deity rather than an impersonal abstract principle, and he was also convinced that devotion (bhakti) was the most important form of religious practice. Vishishtadvaita Vedanta, his philosophical position, stressed both of these convictions. According to Ramanuja, in his essential nature God is completely transcendent and free from imperfections. The world develops from God through a process of evolution, an idea adapted from the Samkhya philosophical school. The world is thus similar to God, since it proceeds from him, but also different, since matter is unconscious and insentient. In the same way, human beings are similar in nature to God, because they have him as their source, though unlike God they are subject to ignorance and suffering. For Ramanuja and his followers, God is not identical to human selves or to the world, all of which are perceived as having real and independent existence. The differences in capacity between God and human beings makes devotion the most effective means to gain final liberation (moksha) of the soul, a liberation that is conceived of as eternal communion with God. Ramavali ("Series [of poems] to Rama") A series of 330 short poems dedicated to the god Rama, written in the Braj Bhasha form of Hindi by the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?). The Ramavali is one of Tulsidas’ longest extant works—shorter only than the Ramcharitmanas. The seven sections in the Ramavali parallel the structure of the Ramayana, but differing sections receive unequal emphasis. Tulsidas gives his greatest attention to Rama’s childhood and paints lyrical images of the child Rama’s divine play (līla). Here Tulsidas clearly borrows from devotional poetry to the god Krishna, in which such childhood images are well established. Yet the Ramavali’s portrayal of Rama de-emphasizes the mischievous qualities associated with Krishna, to stress instead the generally milder nature of Rama, and to highlight the devotee’s (bhakta) quiet delight in sharing his divine presence.

Ramayana
One of the two great Sanskrit epics, traditionally ascribed to the mythical sage Valmiki. The Ramayana is much shorter than the other great epic, the Mahabharata, and in many ways is a less complex work. The Ramayana’s text was composed later than the core story of the Mahabharata, but the Mahabharata’s final recension was compiled after the Ramayana had been fixed. The Mahabharata is the story of an “evil” royal family for whom greed and power-mongering ultimately lead to destruction. In contrast, the Ramayana is the tale of a “good” royal family, and many of the epic’s characters are symbols of established Indian family values: Rama is the perfect son and the virtuous king, Lakshmana and Bharata his ideal younger brothers, and Sita the model wife. Despite this, the story is not without some troubling moral issues, particularly connected with Rama’s treatment of Sita.

The story has been altered somewhat over the years, with the most important change being the elevation of Rama to divine status as an avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu. The earliest Ramayana, attributed to the sage Valmiki, mentions Rama’s divinity only in the first and last books, whereas in other portions of the poem he is described merely as a great hero. Given the position of these references to divinity, scholars speculate that they could easily have been added to the original core story of exile, abduction, and revenge.

The text of the Ramayana is divided into seven sections (khandas), each of which has a different focus. In the opening section, the Balakhanda (“childhood section”), the text describes the birth of Rama and his brothers (Lakshmana, Bharata, and Shatrughna) to King Dasharatha, and their lives as young princes. Rama and his brothers take part in an archery contest, sponsored by King Janaka, at which Rama’s prowess as an archer wins the hand of Janaka’s daughter Sita. They are married and live happily at Dasharatha’s court.

The Ayodhyakhanda ("Ayodhya section") tells how Dasharatha makes preparations to anoint Rama as his successor but how, on the night before the ceremony, these plans are spoiled by Rama’s stepmother Kaikeyi. Many years before, Kaikeyi receives the offer of two favors from Dasharatha, which she has never used. At the suggestion of her hunchback maid Manthara, Kaikeyi demands of Dasharatha that Rama be banished to the forest for fourteen years, and that her son Bharata be crowned in his place. This disaster seems grounded in malice but is presented as the culmination of a curse placed on Dasharatha, which predicts he will die bereft of his sons. When informed of his stepmother’s wish, Rama immediately prepares to leave, refusing to seize the throne by force, and Sita and Lakshmana announce their intention to accompany him. Bharata is put on the throne but only as a regent in Rama’s place, and the heart-broken Dasharatha dies of grief.

In the Aranyakhanda (“Forest section”), Rama, Lakshmana, and Sita settle into life in forest exile. Rama and Lakshmana kill many of the demons (rakshasas) who plague the forest-dwellers, thus bringing peace to the area. One day the female demon Shurpanakha comes to their dwelling, is smitten by the two young men, and asks them to marry her. The brothers first mock her, then mutilate her by cutting off her ears and nose. Shurpanakha goes to her brother Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka, and demands revenge for the attack. When frontal assaults fail, Ravana commands his uncle Maricha to assume the form of a golden deer in order to lure Rama away from his hut. At Sita’s behest, Rama pursues the deer after giving Lakshmana strict orders not to leave Sita’s side. Rama slays the deer, which with its dying breath calls out Lakshmana’s name in a voice that mimics Rama’s. Sita hears the call and flies into a rage when Lakshmana refuses to leave her. She finally drives him off, in an uncharacteristic show of temper, by accusing him of neglecting his brother in a time of peril so that he can have Sita to himself. When Lakshmana departs, Ravana comes to Sita disguised as a mendicant ascetic. He lures her out of a protective magic circle that Lakshmana has drawn around her, then kidnaps her. Ravana’s escape is briefly delayed by a virtuous vulture named Jatayu, who attempts to rescue Sita. In the ensuing combat Jatayu is mortally wounded, but he lives long enough for Rama and Lakshmana to find him and learn the identity of Sita’s abductor.

The Kishkindhakhanda (“Kishkindha section”) narrates Rama’s and Lakshmana’s trip south to the Kishkindha forest. There they become allies with the monkey-king Sugriva, whose lost kingdom Rama helps to regain by slaying Sugriva’s brother Bali. After enjoying the spoils of kingship, Sugriva and his monkey subjects, particularly his lieutenant Hanuman, begin searching throughout the country for any trace of Sita. Hanuman decides to leap over the sea, to Lanka, to see if he can find her there.

The Sundarakhanda (“Beautiful section”) begins with Hanuman leaping the sea to Lanka and describes how, after much searching, he finally manages to locate Sita. Meanwhile, Ravana unsuccessfully tries to convince Sita to accept him as her husband. The demon’s actions are motivated by his desire to avoid a curse, which states that he will drop dead if he ever rapes a woman who resists him. Hanuman reassures Sita that all will be well, and after many adventures makes his way back to Rama, to inform him that Sita has been found.

The Lankakhanda (“Lanka section”) describes the beginning of a war between the forces of Rama and Ravana. Aided by armies of monkeys and bears, Rama builds a causeway across the sea to Lanka and begins to besiege the city. In his struggle he is helped by Ravana’s youngest brother Vibhishana, who opposes Ravana’s evil deeds and casts in his lot with Rama. Ravana is assisted by his brother Kumbhakarna and his son Indrajit, but in the end Ravana and his demon allies are killed in battle. After being rescued, Sita undergoes a trial by fire to prove her chastity, and when the fire refuses to burn her, she is shown to have been completely faithful to Rama. They return in triumph to Ayodhya, where Bharata renounces the throne, and the couple rule happily.

In the “Final section” (Uttarakhanda), which was almost certainly added later, Rama has further doubts about Sita’s virtue. While roaming the capital one night, he hears a washerman abusing his wife for staying out all night. The washerman says that he is not as big a fool as their king. Rama is troubled by this and, although he is supposedly convinced of Sita’s innocence, sends her into exile to please his subjects—here showing a distrust uncharacteristic of a figure who supposedly represents the epitome of virtue. While in exile, Sita gives birth to twin sons, Lava and Kusha, whose prowess makes them known to Rama, and they are eventually acknowledged as his heirs. Yet after all her suffering, Sita is not amenable to reconciliation. As a final proof she calls on her mother, the Earth, to bear witness to her virtue, and as a sign that this is true Sita sinks beneath the earth, never to be seen again. Soon after, Rama himself leaves his body and takes again his true form as Vishnu.

The Ramayana has been an extremely influential text, primarily because of the social virtues modeled by its characters. The epic is known throughout the subcontinent, and its popularity can be seen by its numerous retellings in vernacular languages, of which the most famous are the Tamil Ramayana of the poet Kamban (9th c.), and the Ramcharitmanas of the poet-saint Tulsidas (17th c.). The epic continues to be a prominent text in the modern day, as witnessed by its astounding popularity as a weekly television serial produced in the mid-1980s under the direction of Ramanand Sagar. The Valmiki Ramayana has been translated numerous times, the most recent partial translation of the work is by Robert Goldman and Sheldon Pollack. See also Tamil epics.

Rambha Ekadashi
Religious observance falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Kartik (October–November). As with all the eleventh-day observances, this is dedicated to the worship of the god Vishnu, on this particular day in his form as Krishna. As with most Hindu festivals, Rambha Ekadashi requires that certain rites be performed. These rites involve fasting (upavasa) and worship, and promise specific benefits for faithful performance. This ceremony is named after Rambha, a famous apsara or celestial damsel. Its charter myth tells how, by faithfully observing this rite, a certain king was born in heaven and served by Rambha and other apsaras.

Ramcharitmanas
(“Holy Lake of Rama’s Deeds”) Vernacular retelling of the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Sanskrit epics. The Ramcharitmanas was written by the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623), in the language known as Avadhi, an eastern variant of medieval Hindi. Evidence indicates that Tulsidas began the text in Ayodhya in 1574. At nearly 10,000 lines, this text is by far his longest work and is generally considered to be his greatest. For the most part the poem is structured in groups of six to eight verses written in the chaupai form, followed by a verse in the shorter doha form. (The doha verse either sums up the essence of the preceding chaupai verses or serves to foreshadow later developments.) There are also verses written in longer meters such as savaiya, as well as invocations in fluid Sanskrit poetry at the beginning of each of the seven sections. Tulsidas was a masterful epic poet, as evidenced both by the sheer size of his text and the high poetic quality of the verses contained in it.

As with all the Ramayana’s vernacular retellings, Tulsidas did not merely translate the story of Rama but interpreted it according to his own religious convictions. His two most important changes to the poem are the overwhelming emphasis on the importance of devotion (bhakti), and the saving power of the name of Rama, to which Tulsidas gives greater importance than Rama himself. Tulsidas also includes mythic material from a variety of other sources, most notably the Shiva Purana and the Adhyatmaramayana. This material is largely added to the first and last chapters, in which Tulsidas makes his greatest changes from the original epic. One theory to explain why Tulsidas brought in this other material argues that he endeavored to transcend narrow sectarian boundaries, for example, by having the god Shiva narrate much of the text in the form of a dialogue to his wife Parvati. Later, in part of the final book, Shiva is supplanted as narrator by the crow Bhushundi, who symbolizes the power of devotion to rescue even a common carrion-eating crow.

The Ramcharitmanas has popularly been called the “Bible of northern India,” reflecting its enormous influence on ordinary people’s piety. Although according to legend Tulsidas faced some opposition from brahmins who thought it sacrilegious to translate the Ramayana into a vernacular tongue, the text has been immensely popular with ordinary people. Even now there are many people who can recite large sections from memory (“discourses” (katha) on the text can draw hundreds or thousands of people) and many of the verses have become proverbial expressions in modern Hindi. Aside from reading or hearing the text, millions of people see it each autumn, in the dramatic presentation known as the Ram Lila. The oldest and most traditional Ram Lila, held at Ramnagar in Benares, uses the text from the Ramcharitmanas, and takes great pride in this traditionalism. For further information see Philip Lutgendorf, The Life of a Text, 1991.

Ramdev
(1404–58) According to legend, a Rajput prince whose piety and ability to perform miracles won him renown during his lifetime, and who was considered an incarnation of the god Krishna after his death. His tomb in the village of Ramdevra, east of the city of Jaisalmer in the western part of the state of Rajasthan, has become a pilgrimage site for devotees (bhakta) who come seeking various favors. Little is known about Ramdev’s life, and unlike many of the other medieval saints, he has no poetry or body of literature attributed to him, nor did he serve as the leader of any organized religious community. His original followers came to him because he was able to meet their needs, and for this reason pilgrims come to him still.

Ramdevra
Village and sacred site (tirtha) in the northwest corner of the state of Rajasthan, about sixty miles east of the city of Jaisalmer. Ramdevra is famous for the grave of the fifteenth-century saint Ramdev, as well as the grave of his low-caste disciple Dadi Bhai. During his lifetime Ramdev was famous for his piety and generosity, and was credited with performing various miracles to aid those in need. Since his death he has come to be regarded as an incarnation of the god Krishna. Although pilgrims can come throughout the year, most come during the annual religious fair (melā), at which time the near-deserted town takes on the semblance of a bustling city. Many of the visitors come to ask Ramdev for something, often related to concerns over health or prosperity. Others come to show gratitude, especially those whose past wishes have been granted, and to maintain their relationship with him.

Rameshvar
Manifestation of the god Shiva, in his form as “Rama’s Lord” at Rameshvaram in the state of Tamil Nadu. The image of Rameshvar at this site is a linga, a pillar-shaped object said to represent Shiva’s symbolic form. The Rameshvar linga is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of twelve lingas deemed especially holy and powerful, and at which Shiva is thought to be uniquely present. The site’s mythic charter is drawn from the Ramayana, the earlier of the two Sanskrit epics. According to tradition, Shiva is worshiped here by the god Rama, the epic’s protagonist, although there are differing accounts of when this happened. In some stories, it is to gain Shiva’s blessing immediately before Rama's attack on the demon kingdom of Lanka. In other accounts the worship comes after the conquest of Lanka, as a rite of thanksgiving. In either case, both sets of stories portray Rama as a devotee (bhakta) of Shiva and thus buttress Shiva's status as the greatest god of all.

Rameshvaram

(“Rama's Lord”) Sacred site (tirtha) on an island off the coast of the state of Tamil Nadu in the Palk Strait, which separates Sri Lanka from the mainland. Rameshvaram is one of the most important sacred sites in India, for several different reasons. It is one of the four dhams associated with the philosopher Shankarakacharya, which mark the geographical boundaries of the subcontinent. It also has specific mythic associations that make it holy both to devotees (bhakta) of Shiva and Vishnu, two of the most important Hindu deities. For Shiva's devotees, the pillar-shaped image (linga) of Shiva there represents the god in his manifestation as Rameshvar ("Rama's Lord"). This image is also one of the jyotirlingas, a network of twelve lingas deemed especially holy and powerful, and at which Shiva is said to be uniquely present. For Vishnu's worshippers, Rameshvaram is held to be the place from which the god Rama staged his attack on the demon kingdom of Lanka. According to tradition, upon Rama's return with his rescued wife Sita, the image of Rameshvaram was consecrated in gratitude for his success. Rameshvaram also has very old connections with the sacred city of Benares, and even today pilgrims come from there bearing Ganges water to offer to Shiva.

Ramgarh

Architectural site in the Vindhya Hills, 160 miles south of Benares. An inscription in one of the caves at Ramgarh, estimated to be from the third century B.C.E., contains the earliest datable reference to devadasis, a special class of women who served the deities of certain temples.

Ram Janam Bhumi

Site in the city of Ayodhya, where some claim the god Rama was born; since the early 1980s this spot has witnessed some of India's most intense postindependence religious conflict. The site has long been a source of controversy between the Hindu and Muslim communities, and British sources record hostilities there in 1855 and 1934. Until 1992 Ram Janam Bhumi was occupied by the Babri Masjid, a mosque constructed in 1528 by command of Mir Baqi, a general of the Moghul emperor Babar (1483–1530). Local tradition holds that the mosque was built after the razing of an existing Hindu temple there, although there is little evidence for this claim. A few months after India gained independence in 1947, several local Hindus secretly installed images of the child Rama, his wife Sita, and his brother Lakshmana in the mosque, claiming that the images had miraculously appeared in a ball of light. The government, having only recently quieted the Hindu-Muslim massacres that accompanied the partition of British India into India and Pakistan, was loath to ignite religious passions, and its solution, therefore, was to padlock the compound's gates and send the case to the courts for resolution, where it languished for almost forty years.

The early 1980s saw renewed controversy over the site, when the Vishva Hindu Parishad (VHP), a Hindu nationalist organization, first began calling for the site's "liberation," proclaiming that the existing mosque was an insult to all Hindus. The VHP's campaign portrayed the mosque as a symbol of Muslim iconoclasm and depicted government efforts to protect it as an attempt to appease the Muslim community and retain their votes. In 1986, the VHP's drive to liberate the site was aided by Rajiv Gandhi's national government. Together, the VHP and the Gandhi administration... succeeded in unlocking the compound’s gates so that Hindus could worship there, though observers called the action a clear bid to attract the Hindu vote.

Pressure throughout the 1980s, culminated in a series of campaigns to begin construction of a new temple at Ram Janam Bhumi. Many of these campaigns coincided with national elections, and the emotion that they generated boosted the electoral fortunes of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), a political group with close links to the VHP. The final campaign came on December 6, 1992, a day that was scheduled to have “symbolic” meaning, and ended a little over five hours later with the mosque’s demolition. The whole operation was carefully planned—demolition crews ordered the destruction of all television cameras prior to leveling the building in order to prevent any media coverage by outsiders. The razing was also carried out with the blessing of the BJP-led state government, which made no attempt to protect the temple. Riots ensued, particularly in the city of Bombay, where over three thousand people were killed, most of them Muslims.

Even after the destruction of the Babri Masjid, the site remained an area of contention between Muslims and Hindus. Immediately after the demolition, Prime Minister P.V. Narasimha Rao promised to rebuild the mosque but did nothing to accomplish this during the next five years he was in office. Meanwhile, various Hindu groups have been calling for the construction of a Ram Janam Bhumi temple, including traditional religious leaders such as the Shankaracharyas. Seeing nothing but trouble ahead, the government again sent the matter to the courts for resolution, where it remains to this day and may remain for decades to come. For further information see Christophe Jaffrelot, The Hindu Nationalist Movement in India, 1996.

Ram Lila

Any public dramatic presentation of the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics. The epic’s basic plot...
revolves around the unjust exile of the god-king Rama; the abduction of Rama’s wife Sita by Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka; and Rama’s search to regain Sita, a struggle that ultimately ends in Ravana’s death. Ram Lilas are prominent during the autumn in northern India, and usually correspond with the festival of Dussehra (October–November), which celebrates Rama’s victory over Ravana and thus the symbolic triumph of good over evil. Late in the nineteenth century the Ram Lilas were important symbolic vehicles for demonstrating pride in Indian culture. Additionally, they were considered a coded symbol of resistance to British rule. Today, Ram Lilas can be found throughout northern India in many of the larger cities, while neighborhood associations often sponsor their own local productions.

The longest, most elaborate, and arguably the oldest Ram Lila is held at Ramnagar, the fortified town where the kings of Benares reside. The Ramnagar Ram Lila was begun in the early nineteenth century, during the reign of Udit Narayan Singh, and the Maharaja of Benares still plays an important symbolic role in the production even though he no longer wields temporal power over the city. It lasts for thirty-one days, during which the action moves to different places in and around Ramnagar. Thousands of faithful viewers follow the drama for the entire month, but on peak days the audience can reach 100,000. For further information on the Ram Lila, see Norvin Hein, The Miracle Plays of Mathura, 1972; and Anuradha Kapur, Actors, Pilgrims, Kings, and Gods, 1990.

Ram Navami
Festival celebrated on the ninth day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Chaitra (March–April). Ram Navami is celebrated as the birthday of the god Rama, the seventh avatar of the god Vishnu, and this festival also ends the spring Navaratri festival of the Goddess. The Goddess festival of Navaratri, observed twice yearly in the spring and in the fall, ends each time with a celebration for Rama. The reason for this festival sequence is not entirely clear but probably reflects cultural imperatives to contain the explosive but uncontrolled fertile feminine energy personified by the Goddess with the stable and predictable masculine energy of Rama. Ram Navami is widely celebrated across India, but especially in Ayodhya, the city traditionally deemed his birthplace. In their celebrations, devotees (bhakta) may worship in their homes, fast (upavasa), attend religious discourses (katha), or go to temples for darshan and worship. With the recent growth of Hindutva (militant, politicized Hinduism) this holiday has become a day for large demonstrations and political action. This has been particularly true in Ayodhya, where the continuing struggle to build the Ram Janam Bhumi temple at the site of Rama’s birthplace has made this day particularly significant.

Ramprasad
(early 19th c.) Bengali poet-saint and devotee (bhakta) of the goddess Kali, who is justly renowned for the power and expressive quality of his poems. As with many of the devotional (bhakti) figures, little is definitely known about his life. According to tradition, he worked for a short time as a clerk before his indulgent employer, finding him spending his days composing poetry to Kali, became his literary patron to allow him to write full time. Ramprasad’s poetry invokes the Goddess in many of her different personae—as the goddesses Uma, Durga, and Bhairavi—but the majority of his poems are addressed to Kali. Despite Kali’s fearsome qualities, Ramprasad persistently addresses her as “mother,” and, like a child, clings to her despite all her attempts to discourage him. The end result is that his unflinching and unquestioning devotion to Kali removes all fear and brings him liberation. For further reading, see David R. Kinsley, The Sword and the Flute, 1975; and Clinton Seely and Leonard Nathan (trans.), Grace and Mercy in Her Wild Hair, 1999.

Ram Rajya Parishad
("Organization for Ram’s Reign")
Northern Indian political party formed immediately after Indian independence in 1947. It was founded by Swami Karpatri, an influential modern Hindu ascetic. The term Ram Rajya carries mythical significance, referring to the period of righteous rule by the god-king Rama, the protagonist of the epic Ramayana, after his return from fourteen years of exile in the forest. According to popular belief, Rama’s reign was marked by perfect peace, justice, and social harmony.

The Ram Rajya Parishad sought to reshape India according to the vision of this mythical time, and the party’s political platform was solidly rooted in conservative Hindu religious ideas. The party strongly supported the caste system, with its traditional division of social status and labor, and believed that it was essential for a smoothly functioning society. This position would have condemned most low-caste people to a life of servitude, although the party did leave them a few meager windows for advancement. One of these was managing shoe factories, since leather is considered religiously impure by the higher castes, and thus working with leather is the traditional occupation of certain low status groups. Aside from their views on the validity of the caste system, the Ram Rajya Parishad also supported other conservative Hindu causes, particularly a total ban on cow slaughter and a complete ban on the production and consumption of liquor. The Ram Rajya Parishad’s constituency came mainly from conservative, upper-class Hindus, particularly those in the Ganges River basin. Its conservatism gave those outside this group no incentive to support it. Although it had limited electoral success in years immediately after independence, within a dozen years the party had been reduced to a completely marginal presence.

Ram Rasik Sampraday
Religious lineage among the Ramanandis, a community of renunciant ascetics. All Ramanandis are devotees (bhakta) of the god Rama, but members of the Ram Rasik Sampraday stress the worship of Rama and his wife Sita as the divine couple. They focus their worship on the time of domestic bliss when the newly married couple lived in Ayodhya, before Rama’s unjust banishment from that city. Rasik (“aesthete”) devotion involves complex forms of visualization, in which devotees imagine themselves to be servants and companions of Rama and Sita, and spend their days in service to the divine couple. Rasik devotees also draw up exacting “schedules” of the deities’ daily routines—in some cases, down to the quarter-hour—so that through this imaginative exaltation they can savor the bliss of being God’s companions. (This form of dedication is clearly influenced by devotional patterns to the god Krishna, particularly the divine reverence found in the Gaudiya Vaishnava tradition.) religious community.) Because Rasik worship is complex and highly developed, it has remained an elite phenomenon largely confined to a small group of ascetics. For further information see Peter van der Veer, Gods on Earth, 1988; and Philip Lutgendorf, The Life of a Text, 1991.

Ramsnehi

Renunciant ascetic community made up of devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu—in his form as the god Rama—whose practice stresses the love (sneha) of Rama. The Ramsnehis have three main centers, all located in the state of Rajasthan. These centers are unique in that each pays homage only to its own founder, and no founder or preceptor is honored by all three. Ramsnehi religious practice focuses on the repetition of the name of Rama, but has also been influenced by the Jains. Because of this latter influence the Ramsnehis voluntarily take on many restrictions to avoid destroying life.

Ranade, Mahadev Govind

(1842–1901) Lawyer, judge, and one of the great Hindu social reformers of nineteenth-century India. Along with his younger contemporary, Gopal Krishna Gokhale, Ranade was marked by his commitment to reform Hindu life by seeking the cooperation of the British government and by working within established institutions. Ranade was among the first generation of Indians to be educated in British schools and, after earning his degree at Bombay University, chose a career in law. In thirty years as a judge Ranade worked diligently to reform certain religious practices that were deemed social abuses, particularly issues concerning child marriage and widow remarriage. He was also a founding member of the Prarthana Samaj, a Hindu reformist organization that sought to attain similar goals. In addition to his interests in law, Ranade applied himself to the study of economics, to provide practical guidance for economic development.

Ranganatha

(“the rocking lord”) A particular form of the god Vishnu, in which the god is depicted as sleeping on the back of his serpent couch, Shesha, floating in the sea of cosmic dissolution (pralaya). The most famous example of this image is housed in the Ranganathaswamy temple in Shrirangam, in the state of Tamil Nadu.

Rasa

(“tastes”) In Indian aesthetics, the nine moods that can be generated in an audience by various types of artistic expression: erotic, comic, compassionate, cruel, heroic, terrifying, loathsome, marvelous, and peaceful. These nine rasas correspond to the nine bhavas (“states”): sexual excitement, laughter, grief, anger, energy, fear, loathing, wonder, and peace. The nine bhavas are considered to be the most basic unadulterated emotions, and although each of the rasas corresponds to one of the bhavas, there is an important difference. Human emotive states come and go in response to circumstances largely beyond our control. Such emotive states often cannot be sustained, and they are generally not objects of aesthetic satisfaction. The case is very different for an aesthetic mood (rasa), which can be sustained, since it is artificially generated through artistic expression. This emphasis on creating and sustaining such a mood for an audience is the dominant goal of the performing arts in the Hindu tradition.

Rasayana

(“method of essences”) Alchemical school specializing in the use of certain chemicals, particularly compounds made from elemental mercury, in a quest to transmute the body and render it immortal. Some scholars have characterized rasayana as the Buddhist school of alchemy, with the Hindu school known as dhatuvada. The reported difference is that the latter relied solely on the consumption of mercurials, whereas the former used mercurials only to prolong life until the body could be transmuted through meditation, ritual, and extramaterial means. Despite these differing conceptions of the end of the process, the two schools overlap considerably on many other points. Both also probably draw from a common alchemical tradition. For further information see David Gordon White, The Alchemical Body, 1996.

Rashtrakuta Dynasty
(8th–10th c.) Central Indian dynasty whose core area was in the middle of Maharashtra, and whose capital was the Maharashtrian city of Achalpur. The Rashtrakutas were originally vassals of the Chalukya dynasty, but overthrew them in the middle of the eighth century and remained the premier power south of the Vindhya Mountains until the middle of the tenth century. The dynasty directly ruled most of the modern states of Maharashtra and Karnataka, along with parts of the states of Andhra Pradesh and Tamil Nadu, but had vassal states through the entire Deccan plateau, southern India, and Ceylon. Their hegemony ended in 973, when they were overthrown by the later Chalukya dynasty. The Rashtrakutas’ greatest monument is the Kailasanatha temple at Ellora in the state of Maharashtra, which was completed late in the eighth century.

Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh
("National Volunteer Corps," hereafter RSS) Hindu nationalist organization founded in 1925 by Dr. K. B. Hedgewar. Since its inception the RSS has ascribed to the ideals of Hindutva, the notion that the Hindus are a nation despite their regional, linguistic, and cultural differences. The RSS has historically characterized itself as a cultural and character-building organization and, for much of its existence, has shunned direct political involvement, although it has exercised considerable influence through its many affiliated organizations. RSS training stresses loyalty, obedience, discipline, and dedication to the advancement of the Hindu nation, but does not encourage the development of independent thought. The heart of its program are the daily meetings of its neighborhood units known as shakhas ("branches"). At these meetings members, known as swayamsevaks ("volunteers"), spend part of their time playing games, part of their time practicing martial drill—including sparring with sticks—and part of their time discussing and absorbing RSS ideals. The shakhas in any given area are overseen by a full-time RSS worker known as a pracharak ("director"), who serves as a liaison between the local units and the RSS leadership and who oversees RSS activity in his area.

As an organization, the RSS is profoundly elitist, and its self-proclaimed mission is to provide leadership for a renascent Hindu India. Most of its members will never advance beyond the local level, but those who do are generally remarkably efficient, effective leaders. Although the RSS has shunned direct activism that would tarnish its self-proclaimed cultural emphasis, it has exercised considerable influence through the formation of affiliated organizations, for which it has provided the leadership cadre. These organizations are spread throughout every level of Indian society, from labor and student unions to service organizations, religious organizations such as the Vishva Hindu Parishad (VHP), and political parties such as the Bharatiya Janata Party.

Although the RSS has produced some remarkably effective leaders, it has also generated considerable controversy. One reason is that it is a highly authoritarian organization, run on the model of the Hindu joint family. All authority is vested in a single supreme leader, the sarsanghchalak, and proceeds downward from there. In this way the RSS is profoundly undemocratic, and many of its opponents—particularly in the political arena—have felt uneasy about having it as the controlling hand behind its affiliated organizations. Other opponents have also worried about its anti-Muslim and anti-Christian tone—non-Hindus were not allowed to join the organization until 1979—a tone rooted in the organization's Hindutva ideals. A final reservation about the RSS comes on social grounds. The RSS has long condemned untouchability, and has also long asserted that caste distinctions did not exist within its ranks—in keeping with its Hindutva roots, it proclaims that all its members are Hindus and Hindus only. Nevertheless, critics have noted that most RSS members come from brahmin and other privileged castes, and that all of its leaders have been brahmans. These critics contend that such public disavowal of caste distinctions is a mask to perpetuate brahmin control and to conceal whose interests the RSS truly serves. Rasik Person able to appreciate a developed artistic mood (rasa); someone who is cultured and sophisticated. In the context of religious practice, the word refers to a person who has transposed this appreciation of aesthetic mood into a devotional setting. Rasik devotees (bhakta) would engage in elaborate visualizations of their chosen divinity and mentally accompany that divinity during the day. These meditative visualizations were said to give the devotee a sense of participation in the divine play (lila) of God’s presence on earth and thus sharpen his or her enjoyment of it. The two religious communities that laid the greatest stress on this ability were the Pushti Marg and the Ram Rasik Sampradaya, whose objects of devotion were the gods Krishna and Rama, respectively. This type of worship is almost exclusively focused on these deities, or on other forms of the god Vishnu.

Raskhan

(late 16th c.) Poet-saint and devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna who was born a Muslim, specifically a Pathan (Afghan) and whose name may have been Saiyid Ibrahim. According to legend, Raskhan spent the early part of his life in Delhi, where he became enamored of a handsome boy. When the object of his affections proved unattainable, he migrated to Brindavan, the town where Krishna is said to have lived as a child, and spent the rest of his life sublimating that attraction through his devotion to Krishna. The main themes in his poetry are the attraction of the cowherd women (gopis) to Krishna, sparked by Krishna's physical beauty and, especially, the enthralling music of his flute. With Raskhan one finds a person who was a Muslim by birth but who used images and attitudes belonging to Hindu culture in an absolutely genuine manner.

Ras Lila
In the mythology of the god Krishna, the ras lila is the “circle dance” that Krishna and his devotees (bhakta), the gopis, perform on autumn nights on the shore of the Yamuna River. In this dance—a symbol of communion with the divine—Krishna offers a form of himself to every woman present, in order to convince each one that God is paying attention to her and to her alone.

Rat
An animal with a prominent place in at least two religious contexts. On one hand, the rat is famous as the animal vehicle of the elephant-headed god Ganesh, and reinforces Ganesh's identity as the Lord of Obstacles. If Ganesh's elephant head represents his power to remove obstacles by simply knocking them aside, his rat vehicle shows a stealthier approach. Rats are famous for their ability to work their way around obstacles, slipping through the smallest cracks in granaries to get to the grain inside. In their ability to slip around and between obstructing objects, they stand as a worthy complement to Ganesh's power.

Rats are also important to the temple of the goddess Karni Mata in the village of Deshnok, in the state of Rajasthan. The Karni Mata temple is inhabited by thousands of rats, considered to be Karni Mata's sons and thus sacred animals. According to tradition, when the rats die they are reborn as members of the families that comprise the temple's hereditary servants, and thus the rats and the temple priests are all members of one extended family.

Rath Yatra
Festival falling on the second day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Ashadh (June–July). The primary deity worshiped in this festival is Jagannath, who is considered a form of the god Krishna. This festival is celebrated all over India but especially in the sacred city of Puri, where the principal temple of Jagannath is located. During the festival in Puri, Jagannath, his brother Balabhadra, and his sister Subhadra are carried in procession through the city's main street to another temple about a mile away. They stay in this nearby temple for a week, and then return to the Jagannath temple.

The deities are processed by their devotees (bhakta) in three enormous wooden chariots (rath), which the devotees pull using long ropes. The largest of the three, belonging to Jagannath, is forty-five feet high, thirty-five feet broad and wide, and travels on sixteen wheels each seven feet high. The English word “juggernaut” is a corruption of Jagannath, and the connotation of a juggernaut as an unstoppable force undoubtedly derives from the momentum that these carts attained once they began to move. One of the staple fictions of British colonial lore described Jagannath's frenzied devotees committing suicide by throwing themselves under the car's wheels, so that they would die in the sight of God. Despite such tales being widely repeated, suicides of this sort were extremely uncommon. Still, there was some risk in pulling the carts, since people losing their footing in the massed crowd would be unable to get up, and could potentially be crushed by the wheels. For further information see T. N. Madan (ed.), Religion in India, 1991.
Rati
(“pleasure,” particularly sexual pleasure)
The wife of Kama, god of love. Rati is both Kama’s wife and his ally, reflecting the way that sexual pleasure can both accompany and amplify desire.

Ratri
Name of the goddess of Night. See Night, goddess of.

Ravana
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Ravana is the ten-headed demon king of Lanka. To destroy Ravana, the god Vishnu is born in his incarnation as Rama. Ravana is a reincarnation of Vishnu’s gatekeeper Jaya, who has been cursed by a sage to be reborn three times as a demon and to be killed by Vishnu each time. As a rakshasa, a type of demon, Ravana possesses enormous physical strength and various magic powers. He augments these natural abilities by performing intense physical asceticism (tapas), which in Indian culture is widely believed to generate spiritual power and bring boons from the gods. When the god Brahma finally appears and directs Ravana to choose his boon, Ravana requests that he be able to be killed by no one but a human being. This seems to make him practically immortal, since his powers are such that no ordinary human will be able to harm him, much less kill him. Ravana then proceeds to terrorize the gods, secure in the knowledge that they will not be able to harm him. He begins with his half-brother, the minor deity Kubera, who loses his home and all his possessions to Ravana.

Ravana’s virtual invulnerability goes to his head, and the powerful demon begins to disregard all rules of decency and morality. He is particularly guilty of molesting and abducting women, acts which result in various curses being laid upon him by his helpless victims, many of them predicting his death. As a result of one of these curses his sister Shurpanakha is mutilated by Rama’s brother Lakshmana. Ravana is determined to avenge this insult, and decides that the best way will be to abduct...
Rama’s wife Sita. Although his wife Mandodari and his brothers rebuke him for this act and advise him to return Sita and make peace with Rama, Ravana stubbornly refuses to listen. His inflated pride and desire to avenge the insult to his sister deafen his ears to their good counsel, and he eventually pays for his stubbornness with his life when Rama kills him in battle.

As with all demons, Ravana is not completely villainous by nature but rather greatly powerful and greatly flawed at the same time. According to some stories he is a devotee (bhakta) of the god Shiva, and the hymn to the dancing Shiva known as the Shivatandava Stotra is often attributed to Ravana.

Ravidas

(ca. 1500) Sant poet-saint who lived his life in the city of Benares and is traditionally believed to have been a younger contemporary of the poet-saint Kabir. The Sants were a loose group of central and northern Indian poet-saints who shared several general tendencies: stress on individualized, interior religion leading to a personal experience of the divine; disdain for external ritual, particularly image worship; faith in the power of the divine Name; and a tendency to ignore conventional caste distinctions. Both tradition and references in his poetry describe Ravidas as a leather worker (chamar), a social group whose contact with dead animals and their skins rendered them untouchable. He is believed to have supported himself by his hereditary trade, and much of his poetry speaks on issues of worldly birth and status. He never denied the importance of heredity but ultimately felt that his devotion to God had helped him to transcend his birth and given him status based on different criteria. His poetry reflects this staunch personal faith, as do his frequent warnings to his listeners that life is short and difficult, and that they should pay great attention to religious practice.

Given his low social status, Ravidas was almost certainly illiterate. His poetic songs were likely first transmitted orally, though their personal appeal made him one of the most popular sant poets. The two oldest attested sources of his work are the Adigranth, the scripture for the Sikh community, and the Panchvani collections, compiled by the Dadupanth. In modern India, Ravidas has also served as a model for the depressed classes; his followers call themselves Ravidasis. For further information see John Stratton Hawley and Mark Juergensmeyer, Songs of the Saints of India, 1988; and Winand M. Callewaert and Peter Freidlander (trans.), The Life and Works of Raidas, 1992.

Ravidas Jayanti

Festival falling on the full moon in the lunar month of Magh (January– February), celebrated as the birthday of the medieval bhakti poet-saint Ravidas, born near Benares. Ravidas's birth into the untouchable caste of leather workers (chamar) afforded him a very low social status. His poetry is set in a personal voice and contrasts this lowly status with the honor and renown he gained through his devotion to God. In modern times many members of the depressed classes see Ravidas as a model, and his birthday is celebrated with great fervor.

Rawal

Title given to the head priest (pujari) at the temple of Badrinath in the Himalayas. The Rawal is invariably a Nambudiri brahmin, who must remain unmarried to retain his position. In Hindu belief, Badrinath is one of the four dhams ("divine abodes") connected with the philosopher Shankaracharya. Seeking to combat the spread of Buddhism and revitalize Hindu religion, Shankaracharya reportedly chose one Hindu sacred center in each corner of the subcontinent, and at each established a Dashanami Sanyasi monastic center (math) to train learned monks. Badrinath is associated with the Jyotir Math in the Himalayan town of Joshimath, forty miles south, which is also the place where the deity Badrinath is symbolically transported for the winter.

According to Badrinath temple records, for several hundred years the position of head priest was filled by Dandi Sanyasis, who were also Nambudiri brahmins, the same caste into which Shankaracharya is supposed to have been born. When the last of these died without a successor in 1776, the local king who served as the protector of the shrine invited a non-ascetic Nambudiri brahmin to serve as the temple's priest. This priest was given the title rawal (from the word raja, "deputy"), and his extended family has run the shrine since then. The rawal was the only person allowed to touch the image of Badrinath, and was responsible for performing worship during the six months that the temple is open. Because of these duties, the rawal was required to remain a bachelor, lest the ritual impurity arising from the birth of a child (sutakashaucha) render him unable to attend to his duties. Until the Badrinath Temple Act of 1939 established a temple board as the ultimate authority, the rawals had sole rights to the offerings given at the shrine.

Rawat

A particular subgroup of the warrior princes known as the Rajputs; the Rawats' major area of influence was in southwestern Uttar Pradesh state.

Reciprocal Dependence

In Indian logic, one of the fallacies to be avoided in constructing an argument. Reciprocal dependence occurs when two things each stand as cause and effect to the other—when A depends on B, and B in turn depends on A. This is seen as an extended case of self-residence, and equally objectionable.

Reconversion

General name for the rites by which people who have converted to other religious traditions are accepted back as Hindus. See shuddhi.

Reflectionism

Theory used in later schools of Advaita Vedanta to explain how one single primal ignorance could afflict multiple ignorant selves. Reflectionism is rooted in the idea of an image appearing in a mirror; different from the original, it is nonetheless based on it. In the same way, according to this explanation, the ignorance affecting each individual is simply a reflection of a primal ignorance. For further information see Karl H. Potter, Presuppositions of India's Philosophies, 1972.

Religious Persecution
In popular belief India is visualized as a land of perfect religious tolerance in which all schools of thought have been allowed to grow unchecked. Although true in its basic form, this picture is greatly simplified. There is a long history of competition between differing religious communities and schools of thought, sometimes fueled by scathing polemics designed to persuade listeners that one was correct and the others false. What has been quite rare, however, are acts of violence accompanying these arguments, or the notion that people should have to fear for their lives because of their ideas. In the literature of the Nayanar and Lingayat communities—both devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva—language toward the Jains has a genuinely hostile edge, and the Nayanar leader Sambandar has been persistently implicated in the impalement of 8,000 Jains in the southern Indian city of Madurai. In the same way, the northern Indian king Sashanka, who was also a devotee of Shiva, harbored a pathological hatred of Buddhists. Sashanka reportedly not only persecuted Buddhists themselves, but also tried to destroy the tree in Bodh Gaya under which the Buddha purportedly gained enlightenment.

Sectarian competition aside, people whose religious faith has led them to ignore generally accepted social conventions have been quite likely to encounter stiff opposition. Stories of the devotional (bhakti) poet-saints are replete with tales of the troubles they faced from guardians of conventional morality, usually said to be brahmans. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries there was a running and often bloody conflict between two groups of militant ascetics—the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis, and the Bairagi Nagas—although in that case the motives might just as well have been economic, namely, the control of trade in the Ganges valley. A final example of religious persecution appears in the rise of Hindutva in the 1980s. Propelled by verbal attacks on Muslims and Christians, this persecution has all too often prompted physical violence.

Renuka
In Hindu mythology, the wife of the sage Jamadagni and mother of the Parashuram avatar, the fifth avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu.

Republic Day
Indian national holiday, falling on January 26, that marks the day the Indian constitution was adopted in 1950. As a holiday connected with Indian independence, it is one of the few celebrated according to the common calendar. Republic Day is comparable to the Fourth of July in the United States and is celebrated with massive parades in India's major cities. The largest occurs in New Delhi—from which it is televised to the rest of the nation—and includes singers and performers from all over the country, as well as large displays of military hardware, including fly-overs by the newest jet planes.

Reservations
Modern government policy designed to rectify the long-standing economic and social disadvantages faced by certain poor or low-status groups by offering them preferential treatment in employment and education. This is usually done by setting aside, or “reserving,” for such groups certain percentages of government jobs or places in institutions of higher learning, which admit people from disadvantaged communities under much lower standards than those for the general public. Those groups who qualify for such reservations are generally referred to as Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes, after the “schedule” or official government list on which the names of these groups appear. The Scheduled Castes are low-status caste Hindus, who in earlier times would have been called untouchables, while the Scheduled Tribes are aboriginal peoples (adivasis), who mainly live in central India.

Although the reservations policy has been implemented for some time, it remains a continual source of controversy. Proponents claim that it is moving socially disadvantaged people into the mainstream of Indian life and helping to correct centuries of injustice. Opponents decry the fact that less-qualified people are being deliberately chosen, making a mockery of the notion of merit. Critics also argue that the people who benefit the most from such policies are the best-off members of such communities—the so-called creamy layer, designating their position at the top—whereas the truly disadvantaged remain in the same positions as they have always been. Aside from the philosophical debates about this policy, it has had a recognizable impact on people’s livelihoods. Such reservations have made competition even more ferocious for the remaining spots, and made reservations a politically volatile issue. Given the benefits derived from reservations, there has also been considerable lobbying to include other, less-disadvantaged groups under its rubric, as a way to spread benefits to other sectors of Indian society.

Rg Veda

The oldest and most important of the four Vedas, which are themselves the most ancient and authoritative Hindu religious texts. The Rg Veda is a group of 1,028 hymns collected in ten books. Judging by their content, the hymns were clearly composed over a long period of time, but the actual dates are the subject of sharp disagreement. Traditional Hindus assert that the Vedas were not composed either by God or by human beings but, rather, simply heard by ancient sages through their advanced powers of perception, and then transmitted orally from generation to generation. Because of their origin, the Vedas thus belong to the class of religious texts known as shruti (“heard”). Scholarly consensus maintains that the Vedas were begun in the earlier part of the second millennium B.C.E., perhaps 1800–1500 B.C.E., and were finished somewhere around the end of the second millennium B.C.E., perhaps 1200–900. All these dates are highly speculative, since the hymns themselves have no internal evidence to allow precise dating, which has instead been based primarily on a comparative study of changes in the language of certain Vedas. Some of the hymns, for example, are thought to have been created relatively later than others, both because their language is less archaic and closer to classical Sanskrit and because the locations mentioned in them reflect a broader geographical area.

Most of the hymns in the Rg Veda are addressed to a particular deity. The primary deities are Indra, Agni, and Soma, although Varuna is prominent in the earliest hymns. It is generally accepted that the hymns were chanted at sacrifices as a way to invoke these deities. Evidence from the hymns themselves describes these sacrifices as large public rites, usually involving the slaughter of animals, which were burned on a sacrificial fire, and the preparation and consumption of the mysterious beverage soma. In this context, the Vedic hymns reflect a body of sacred learning known to only a small group of religious specialists. Accordingly, these hymns were never meant for universal public dissemination, since all except twice-born men were forbidden to hear them.
The Rg Veda’s tenth and final book differs sharply from the preceding ones. Its language is closer to classical Sanskrit, and its content is far more speculative than that of the earlier books, hinting at a major conceptual shift. This book features the famous Creation Hymn (10.129), in which the poet speculates on how the world came to be, only to conclude that the answer may be unknown even to the creator. Another notable hymn in this book is the Purusha Sukta (10.90), which describes both the earth and human society as the product of a primeval sacrifice. The former hymn foreshadows the religious and cosmological speculation found in the texts known as the Upanishads. The latter, which contains the first known articulation of the four major social groups (varnas), along with their symbolic functions, is distinguished as foreshadowing the later dharma literature.

Rhythm, in Music
See tala.

Right Hand Tantra
Name for a type of tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice. Certain tantric rituals make use of substances that are normally forbidden, such as liquor and nonvegetarian food, in an effort to unify the world by destroying all conceptual dualities, including that between sacred and forbidden. These substances are used in their actual forms in “left hand” (vamachara) tantric ritual, and by substitution in “right hand” (dakshinachara) tantric ritual. See dakshinachara.

Rishabha
According to Jain tradition, Rishabha was the founder of the Jains. He is considered the first of the Jain tirthankaras, the founding figures in the Jain religious tradition. He is one of three Jain tirthankaras who are mentioned in the Yajur Veda, one of the earliest Hindu religious texts. The figure most often credited with developing the teachings used by the Jains today is Mahavira, who is considered the twenty-fourth tirthankara.

Rishi
Common word to designate a sage, seer, or inspired religious leader. It is most often used to indicate religious figures of the distant past, and is not usually applied to contemporary figures.

Rishikesh
City and sacred site (tirtha) in the Himalayan foothills of the state of Uttar Pradesh. Rishikesh lies about fifteen miles up the Ganges River from the sacred city of Haridwar. As with many sites on the Ganges, Rishikesh is famous primarily as a bathing (snana) place, although it is also noted as a dwelling-place for ascetics, particularly at the ashrams in the area around Lakshman Jhula. As a sacred site, Rishikesh is also notable for having no single charter myth. According to one story, this is the place where the god Rama kills several demons, enabling the sages to carry out their sacrifices undisturbed. Another story names this as the place where Rama does penance (prayashchitta) for killing the demon-king Ravana. A third story names Rishikesh as the site where a sage named Raibhya receives a vision of the god Vishnu. The most famous temple in Rishikesh is named after Rama's brother Bharata.

Rishi Panchami
Festival falling on the fifth day (panchami) of the light (waxing) half of the lunar month of Bhadrapada (August–September). This festival is dedicated to the Seven Sages (rishi) born of Brahma: Bhrigu, Pulastya, Kratu, Pulaha, Marichi, Atri, and Vasishtha. Worshiping these seven sages on this day is said to bring prosperity and happiness.

Rishyashringa
A sage in the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics. King Dasharatha commissions Rishyashringa to perform a great sacrifice, to enable the king's wives to conceive. At the conclusion of Rishyashringa's sacrifice, a shining figure emerges from the sacrificial fire, places a pot of milk-rice before Dasharatha, and directs him to feed it to his wives. Dasharatha divides the contents among his wives Kausalya, Kaikeyi, and Sumitra, and in due time they all bear sons. Kausalya is the mother of Rama, the Ramayana's protagonist. Kaikeyi is the mother of Bharata, and Sumitra is the mother of Lakshmana and Shatrughna.

Rites of Passage
General term for rites that recognize and mark transitions in an individual life-cycle, and that often signify a change of state or status. See samskara.

Rites of Protection
For many Hindus, the world is a ritually dangerous place. Certain hours, days, and periods of the year are considered inauspicious. At these times the very tone of the cosmos is disagreeable and all sorts of bad fortune can befall the ignorant or the unwary. Rites of protection are used to counter these dangers, as well as the problems of one's past karma, which can be diagnosed through an inauspicious conjunction in one's birth horoscope (natal horoscope).

Some inauspicious times are unlucky only for certain types of activities. Potential misfortune can be avoided simply by refraining from these activities. However, certain events that cannot be avoided, such as eclipses, are also believed inauspicious. In such cases, one can prevent the negative effects of inauspiciousness by transferring it to another person, usually through the medium of gifts (dana); giving gifts is also the preferred means for getting rid of inauspiciousness stemming from a bad conjunction in one's birth horoscope. People also safeguard themselves by performing prayer and worship as positive protective forces.

Inauspicious forces are also generated by human jealousy, greed, and hatred, which can find their agency in black magic, the evil eye (nazar), or other sorts of witchcraft. Finally, some Hindus believe there are a host of non-human beings, such as spirits, ghosts, and witches, who sometimes seek to harm human beings through the exercise of supernormal powers. Despite the power and prevalence of all of these malevolent forces, if one is aware and careful of them there are ways to counter them.

For problems stemming from human malice, there are well-established solutions. One is to avoid those people who are considered inauspicious, such as widows. Another strategy is to avoid inciting people's jealousy by never proclaiming one's good fortune too openly, praising a child too lavishly, or flaunting one's wealth too freely. In many cases, people will counter potentially vulnerable moments in the life cycle by various protective rites. It is still common for people to wear talismans or amulets, which are believed to protect the wearer. Another common protective measure is to carry iron, which is believed to render the person carrying it impervious to witchcraft. Young children will often have a black smudge of lamp-black put on their faces, to symbolically disfigure them and take away the motive for jealousy. Another protective strategy is to hang up an object (such as a clay pot with a painted face) intended to absorb all the bad feelings, which is then discarded. For further information see Lawrence Babb, The Divine Hierarchy, 1975; Gloria Goodwin Raheja, The Poison in the Gift, 1988; and David F. Pocock, “The Evil Eye,” in T. N. Madan (ed.), Religion in India, 1991.

Rock Edicts

Name for a set of inscriptions commissioned by the Mauryan emperor Ashoka (r. 269–32 B.C.E.). The inscriptions were official pronouncements on royal policy, and advice and instructions to his subjects on a variety of topics, including religious tolerance. In general, the rock edicts were carved into large boulders or rock faces in places that would have been at the borders of the Mauryan Empire, thus symbolically defining its boundaries. The text was fairly consistent throughout the empire, even though different examples of these edicts were found in widely separated places. The other major class of Ashokan inscriptions, the pillar edicts, were inscribed on pillars of polished Chunar sandstone and set up on the major roads running through the empire, where they would have been visible to passersby. See also Maurya dynasty.

Rohini

In Hindu mythology, a daughter of the demigod Daksha who, along with her twenty-six sisters, is married to the Moon. The Moon favors Rohini over all her sisters, despite Daksha’s entreaties to give them all equal time. In the end Daksha lays a curse on the Moon to lose his luster. The curse is later modified so that the moon will alternately wane and wax, but that its disappearance will never be final.

Rohini

(2) In Hindu mythology, birth mother of Balarama, the god Krishna’s brother. Balarama’s birth is unusual. After his conception the fetus is magically transported from the womb of Devaki to that of Rohini. This is done to protect him from harm, as Devaki’s wicked uncle Kamsa has already killed her first seven children and will certainly do the same to Balarama if she carries him to term.

Roy, Ram Mohan

(1774–1833) First major Indian proponent of Hindu social and religious reform, who founded the organization Brahmo Samaj for this purpose. He came from a wealthy Bengali family and was a successful businessman and civil servant. He moved to Calcutta in 1815, at the time when the British were first beginning to take serious notice of traditional Indian society, especially the aspects they considered “evil.” Roy’s reformist interests largely meshed with that of the British. From an early age Roy had rejected the practice of using images in worship, perhaps through exposure to Sufi ideas, and his first public crusade was against such worship of gods and goddesses. Like most Indian reformers, Roy used Sanskrit texts selectively, and for him the most important ones were the speculative Upanishads, which (under the influence of the English Unitarians) he translated to reflect a monotheism (belief in the existence of only one God). In his later years he promoted many different educational and social works, but is especially known for his opposition to sati, the custom of burning a widow on her husband’s funeral pyre. Although later seen as too heavily influenced by the British, his reinterpretation of the past provided a model for others to use. For further consideration see Robert D. Baird (ed.), Religion in Modern India, 1998.

Rta

In the Vedas (the oldest and most authoritative Hindu texts) rta is the cosmic order and regularity that allows the rhythms of time and the seasons to occur in orderly succession. According to the texts, rta also had a moral dimension, which human beings had an obligation to support. One such moral dimension was truth, which was seen as upholding the cosmos, whereas its opposite, anrta, came to signify falsehood. The connection between natural and moral world came through the Vedic god Varuna, who was both the guardian of rta and the deity who punished untruth, usually by affliction with dropsy.

Rtvij

In the Hindu sacred texts (Vedas), one of the priests who officiated at sacrifices. The four chief priests at sacrifices were the hotr, udgatr, adhvaryum, and brahman.

Rudra

(“howler”) Fearsome deity who first appears late in the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts, later identified with the god Shiva. Several hymns in the Rg Veda are dedicated to Rudra, where he is identified with the storm-god Indra, and the fire-god Agni. A more developed picture of Rudra appears in the Shvetashvatara Upanishad, one of the later speculative texts known as the Upanishads. In the third chapter (adhyaya) of this text, Rudra is identified as the ruling power in the universe and the source and origin of the gods themselves. Rudra’s depiction in this upanishad shows considerable ambivalence, both mentioning the destructive arrows that he bears and imploring him to appear in a form that is auspicious (shivam) and peaceful. This ambivalence perhaps reflects the religious tension associated with the figure of Shiva, who was a deity outside the Vedic sacrificial cult but was gradually absorbed into established religion and is now one of the primary Hindu deities.

Rudraksha

(“eye of Rudra”) The dried seed of the tree Elaeocarpus ganitrus, which is considered sacred to the god Shiva. Rudrakshas are often strung into garlands and worn by Shiva’s devotees (bhakta). The seed itself is round with a knobby, pitted surface, with a natural channel in the middle through which a thread can easily be drawn. Each seed also has natural longitudinal lines running from top to bottom, which divide the seed into units known as “faces” (mukhi). The most common rudrakshas have five faces, but they can have up to fourteen. Each differing number of faces has been given a symbolic association with a particular deity. The rarest form is the ekmukhi rudraksha, which has no faces at all and is considered to be a manifestation of Shiva himself. This rudraksha is so valuable that street sellers routinely make counterfeit versions by carving them out of wood. Another rare form is the Gauri-Shankar, in which two rudraksha seeds are longitudinally joined; this is considered a manifestation of Shiva and Shakti. Aside from the number of “faces,” the quality of rudrakshas is judged by their color and size. The color runs from reddish brown to a light brown, with the former considered more desirable, while the smaller sizes are preferable to the larger ones.

Rudranath

Temple and sacred site (tirtha) in the Garhwal region of the Himalayas in the valley between the Mandakini and the Alakananda rivers, about thirty miles from the district headquarters at Chamoli. The temple’s presiding deity is the god Shiva in his manifestation as “Lord Rudra.”
Rudranath is one of the Panchkedar, a network of five sacred sites spread throughout the Garhwal region; the other four sites are Kedarnath, Kalpeshvar, Tungnath, and Madmaheshvar. This network of five sites is seen as a symbolic representation of Shiva's body, since Shiva is believed to dwell in the Himalayas. Rudranath is believed to be Shiva's face.

Rudraprayag
Himalayan town and sacred site (tirtha) at the junction of the Mandakini and Alakananda rivers, two Himalayan tributaries of the Ganges River. As with all the other river junctions in the Garhwal region, Rudraprayag is considered an especially holy place for bathing (snana), although the raging currents make it dangerous. Above the junction of the rivers is a temple to Shiva in his form as Rudra. According to local tradition, this marked the place where the sage Narada performed physical asceticism (tapas) to gain his skill as a bard. Shiva, pleased with Narada's efforts, instructed Narada in music and remained at the spot.

Rudra Sampraday
One of the four branches (sampraday) of the Bairagi Naga ascetics. The name Bairagi denotes ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. The name Naga describes a class of fighting ascetics recruited to protect the other Bairagi ascetics who, because they were saintly, scholarly men, could not protect themselves. Bairagi Nagas were organized in military fashion into different anis or “armies.” Until the beginning of the nineteenth century the Nagas' primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests. The Nagas lent money at interest, engaged in trade, and often owned large amounts of property. They were particularly powerful in parts of the country where the centralized government had broken down. Their roles as mercenaries and in trade have both largely disappeared in contemporary times.

Rukmini
In Hindu mythology, the chief queen of the god Krishna in his later life as the king of the city of Dwaraka. Rukmini is the daughter of the king of Vidarbha, and although both she and her parents favor her marriage to Krishna, her brother, who is Krishna's bitter enemy, makes arrangements to marry her to his friend Shishupala. On her wedding day, with all the guests assembled, Krishna carries Rukmini off in his chariot. They are married, and, according to tradition, have ten sons.
Sabarmati
Northern Indian river that rises in the Aravalli Hills in the state of Rajasthan, and flows south to the Gulf of Cambay in the state of Gujarat. It is best known as the site of the Sabarmati Ashram, across the river from the city of Ahmedabad in Gujarat. The Sabarmati Ashram was home to Mohandas K. Gandhi for sixteen years after he returned from South Africa in 1915. He organized much of the struggle for Indian independence from this ashram.

Sacchidananda
Sanskrit compound word denoting the three generally accepted attributes of the supreme Brahman (the Ultimate Reality of the universe according to some Hindu traditions): being (sat), consciousness (chit), and bliss (ananda). The differences between the form of the individual words and their form in the compound are the result of sandhi or euphonic combination.

In certain Hindu philosophical traditions, but particularly in the Advaita Vedanta school, the supreme Brahman is considered the Ultimate Reality behind all things. Although Brahman is considered to be without particular qualities, these three attributes are believed to be inseparable from its very nature. It has the attribute of being, because it is the reality from which all other “being” comes. In the same way, it is consciousness, as the source of all conscious thought. Finally, bliss proceeds from its perfection, which is ultimate and complete.

Sacred Ash
Substance used in rituals and by devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva to mark their bodies, in imitation of their patron deity. The name given to this ash is vibhuti. See vibhuti.

Sacred Sites
Hindu religious life is intimately connected to the land of India itself, which is studded with sacred sites, known as tirthas. These can be lakes, rivers, mountains, or any other natural feature; they can also be cities, temples, or any other created environment; they can even be the presence of holy men and women. Pilgrimage (tirthayatra) to any sacred site is a means of spiritual and religious advancement. See tirtha.

Sacred Thread
A circular cord made of three strands (in which each strand itself has three strands), which is worn over the left shoulder, crossing the body to fall on the right hip. The sacred thread is given to a boy as part of the upanayana samskara, which is the adolescent religious initiation also known as the “second birth.” Second birth entitles a boy to study the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. In the dharma literature this initiatory rite is prescribed for all young men belonging to the three “twice-born” social groups (varnas)—that is, the brahmins, kshatriyas, and vaishyas. The sacred thread would have been the most visible sign of a twice-born man, for whom wearing the thread was mandatory, since any religious acts performed without wearing it were said to be ineffective.

In modern times its presence generally means that the wearer is a brahmin, since it is mainly the brahmins who carry out this rite today. The sacred thread is worn for extended periods of time, although it must be changed at certain times: after the wearer has suffered violent impurity (ashaucha), such as that of death; after performing any rite of expiation (prayashchitta); and after eclipses or other highly inauspicious times. For further information see Pandurang Vaman Kane, A History of Dharmasastra, 1968; and Raj Bali Pandey, Hindu Samskaras, 1969. The former is encyclopedic and the latter more accessible; despite their age, they remain the best sources on traditional Hindu rites.

Sacrifice
Generally a rite involving a sacred fire and, often, an offering in that fire. This sort of ritual is rooted in the oldest part of the Hindu tradition, although it has undergone some profound changes, particularly in the decline of animal sacrifice. This sort of sacrificial rite is known as a yajna.

Sadachara
(“practice of good [people]”) One of the traditional sources for determining religious duty (dharma) for matters not treated in the dharma literature, or for cases in which the literature itself gave conflicting opinions. This was the least authoritative source of dharma, after the Vedas (the oldest Hindu scriptures) and the dharma literature. Sadachara recognizes that life has many ambiguities and uncertainties, and at the same time provides a resource for determining the appropriate action, by taking as a model the practice of established and upright people. Another term to designate this sort of authority was shishtachara, the “practice of learned [people].”

Sadasatkhyati
(“discrimination of the unreal as the real”) Theory of error propounded by the Samkhya philosophical school. All theories of error attempt to explain why people make errors in judgment, the stock example being of mistaking the silvery flash of a sea shell for a piece of silver. The Samkhya theory of error is based on dualistic metaphysics, in which the fundamental error comes in confusing purusha and prakrti—roughly, spirit and nature—which are the sources of all things. These are the two Samkhya first principles—purusha as conscious witness, and prakrti as insentient matter—which are always separate from each other, and whose attributes can never coincide. For the Samkhyas, the fundamental error is to confuse these two completely different principles—that is, to attribute powers of motion and development to purusha, and consciousness to prakrti. Purusha is conceived as conscious, but completely inactive and unchanging. It is the passive witness to the myriad transformations of prakrti going on around it.

This initial misidentification causes the evolution of the entire world, both the interior, subjective world and the exterior world the subject perceives. Against this background, confusing the shell for silver is just an extension of this original mistake and is rooted in it. According to the Samkhya, perfect knowledge would protect one from all sorts of errors, both cosmic and mundane. For further information see Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India’s Philosophies, 1972.

Sadashiva
In certain schools of tantra practice, particularly in the Trika school of Kashmiri Shaivism, the name for the first step in the evolution of the cosmos. According to the Trika school, the Ultimate Reality, conceived as Shiva, is utterly nondual, and thus neither masculine nor feminine. The first step in cosmological evolution comes when the divine consciousness becomes conscious of itself through the reflection (vimarsha) of its original illumination (prakasha). Moved by this self-consciousness, the unqualified divine being transforms itself into a divine being containing a masculine and feminine nature, the first of many such bipolar dyads from which the universe is born. The masculine part of this first dyad is Sadashiva, which is considered the material cause of the universe. The energy for creation comes from the creative and dynamic power of the dyad’s female principle, Shakti. For further information see Jaideva Singh, Pratyabhijnaahrdayam, 1982.

Sadhana
("accomplishing") The most common colloquial Hindu term designating established and regular religious practice. It is given this name because it is through such practice that one gains spiritual attainments. In modern Hindi, the word can also be used to refer to anything to which one has devoted a great deal of time, attention, and hard work.

Sadhana ("common") Dharma
In the dharma literature, the religious duties required of all human beings, including truth, generosity, and compassion. One’s essential obligation, however, is to fulfill one’s own dharma (svadharma), which may supersede or even contradict the requirements of the common dharma. For instance, it is generally accepted that a king must occasionally disregard truth to be an effective ruler. Since a king’s primary duty is to maintain peace and order in the country, so that other people have the opportunity to do their duties, he is required to do whatever it takes to accomplish this.

Sadhu
("virtuous man") A general term that can be used for any ascetic, although it more often refers to an ascetic who has not undergone formal initiation into an established ascetic order.

Sadhubela
In the time before the partition of India in 1947, Sadhubela was the name of the most important ascetic center for the Udasi ascetics; it was in Sukkur.
in the province of Sindh province, now in Pakistan.

Sadhya

("to be proved") Element in the accepted form of an inference (anumana) in Indian philosophy. An acceptable inference has three terms: an assertion (pratijna), a reason (hetu), and examples (drshtanta); each of these three has its own constituent parts. The sadhya is, along with the paksha, one of the two parts of the assertion. The paksha is the subject of the hypothesis and names a class of things, while the sadhya contains the claim to be proven about that class. In the standard example, in which the hypothesis is “this mountain is on fire,” the paksha is “this mountain” (the class of things about which a claim is being made); and the sadhya, or thing to be proven, is “is on fire.”

Safai

Small cloth wrapped around the base of a chillum, a clay cylinder used for smoking a mixture of tobacco and hashish (charas). The safai serves two purposes, one ritual and one physical. On one hand, it forms a barrier intended to prevent passing the ritual impurity (ashaucha) carried by saliva when the chillum is being passed from person to person. Ascetics who are very conscious of purity or status will often wrap their own safai around the base of the chillum before smoking. Aside from helping to protect personal purity, the safai also serves a practical purpose—it is usually dipped in water before being wrapped around the chillum, which serves to cool and mellow the smoke being drawn through it.

Sagar

In Hindu mythology, a celebrated king of the Solar Line. Sagar, the son of King Subahu and his wife Yadavi, gets his name because one of Yadavi’s co-wives has given her poison (gara) while she is pregnant with him. Sagar has a very hard early life. His father is driven from his kingdom even before he is born, and Sagar is raised at the ashram of the sage Aurvā, where his mother has taken asylum. When he comes to maturity Sagar embarks on a series of military campaigns in which he wins back all the lands his father lost, and becomes a righteous and religious king whose only concern is his lack of progeny.

To beget sons, Sagar calls on the sage Bhṛgu, who gives Sagar’s two wives a choice: one wife will bear 60,000 sons who will all die childless, and one wife will bear one son who will carry on the line. Each of his wives chooses, and in due course both have their children—Keshini delivers her one son in the normal way, whereas Sumati delivers a lump of flesh that is divided and put into 60,000 pots, each of which develops into a handsome son.

In his prosperity King Sagar continues to sponsor religious rites, and is on the verge of completing his hundredth horse sacrifice (asvamedha), which will entitle him to the throne of Indra, the god who is the king of heaven. To forestall this, Indra steals the sacred horse and hides it in the ashram of the sage Kapila. Sagar sends his 60,000 sons to search for the horse, but they make the mistake of insulting the sage, who burns them all to ash through his yogic powers. To rescue their souls it is necessary to bring down the Ganges from heaven, a job that Sagar’s descendants diligently attempt to complete. After several generations of frustration, his great-great-grandson Bhagirath is finally successful.

Sagara Dashanami

One of the ten divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva. The Dashanamis were supposedly established by the ninth-century philosopher Shankaracharya in an effort create a corps of learned men who could help to revitalize Hindu life. Each of the divisions is designated by a different name—in this case, sagara ("ocean"). Upon initiation, new members are given this name as a surname to their new ascetic names, thus allowing for immediate group identification.

Aside from their individual identity, these ten “named” divisions are divided into four larger organizational groups. Each group has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by Shankaracharya, as well as other particular religious associations. The Sagara Dashanamis belong to the Anandawara group, which is affiliated with the Jyotirmath in the Himalayan town of Joshimath.

Saguna
("with qualities") Anything having distinguishing qualities. In the context of ideas about divinity it refers to particular deities with particular attributes. In the religious traditions based on the ideas of the Upanishads, the speculative texts that are the final texts in the Vedas, any manifestation of a deity with qualities is seen as ultimately inferior to the unqualified (nirguna) Brahma. This assumption is adamantly opposed by certain theistic traditions, such as the Gaudiya Vaishnava religious community, which insists that the highest deity, in this case Krishna, has a particular form (and thus certain qualities).

Sahadeva
Fifth of the five Pandava brothers who are the protagonists in the great Hindu epic, the Mahabharata. Sahadeva's mother is Madri, who is the junior wife of King Pandu. None of the Pandava brothers are actually Pandu’s sons, since he has been cursed to die the moment he holds his wife in an amorous embrace. Madri conceives her sons magically, using a mantra given to her co-wife, Kunti, by the sage Durvasas. The mantra gives the woman who recites it the power to call down any of the gods and to have by him a son equal in power to the god. With Pandu's blessing Kunti teaches the mantra to Madri, who meditates on the Ashvins, the divine twins who are the physicians of the gods, and thus bears the twins Nakula and Sahadeva. As the sons of the physicians of the gods, both are skilled healers of animals and human beings. Although they are among the five Pandava brothers, they are less important to the Mahabharata than their three elder siblings.

Sahajiya
Religious community originating in medieval Bengal. The Sahajiyas synthesize devotional practices to the god Vishnu and the ritual practices of the secret tradition known as tantra, particularly the extreme practices associated with the “left-hand” (vamachara) tradition of tantra. The name sahajiya comes from the word sahaja ("natural" or "spontaneous"), indicating the group's belief that one's natural passions, qualities, and tendencies should not be suppressed but should be channeled to help one gain final liberation of the soul (moksha). Over this foundation of tantric ritual practice was added the devotion to the god Krishna and his consort Radha, a devotional thrust strongly influenced by the Gaudiya Vaishnava religious community, founded by the Bengali saint Chaitanya. For further information see Shashibhushan B. Dasgupta, Obscure Religious Cults, 1962; and Edward C. Dimock Jr., The Place of the Hidden Moon, 1989.

Sahasradalapadma
In many schools of yoga, and in the religious tradition known as tantra, one of the sites in the subtle body (an alternate physiological system believed to exist on a different plane than gross matter but with certain correspondences to the material body). The subtle body consists of a set of six psychic centers (chakras), which are visualized as six multi-petaled lotus flowers running roughly along the course of the spine and connected by three vertical channels. Each of these chakras has important symbolic associations—with different subtle elements (tan-matras), and with different seed syllables (bijaksharas) formed from the letters of the Sanskrit alphabet, thus encompassing all sacred sound. Above and below these centers are the bodily abodes of Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power), the two divine principles through which the entire universe has come into being. The underlying assumption behind this concept of the subtle body is thus the homology of macrocosm and microcosm, an essential Hindu idea since the time of the mystical texts known as the Upanishads.

The sahasradalapadma is the site at the apex of the subtle body, visualized as a "thousand-petaled lotus" located in the crown of the head. This is identified as the bodily abode of Shiva, where he is ever-present. In tantra, final liberation (moksha) comes through the divine union of Shiva and Shakti in one's own body. This is done through awakening the kundalini, the bodily correlate of Shakti that lies dormant at the base of the spine, and drawing the kundalini up to the sahasradalapadma to effect the divine union. The sahasradalapadma is identified with the seed syllable Om, the symbol of completeness and perfection. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; Philip S. Rawson, The Art of Tantra, 1973; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Sai Baba

Name used by two different charismatic Hindu teachers, now distinguished by the addition of other names. The earlier of the two is Shirdi Sai Baba (d. 1918), so named for the town in the state of Maharashtra where he lived much of his life. The latter figure, Sathya ("true") Sai Baba (b. 1926), is a modern Hindu religious figure of the type known as a godman, who claims to be the reincarnation of Shirdi Sai Baba.

Sainhikeya

In Hindu mythology, demon who appears in the story of churning the Ocean of Milk. After the gods and demons join forces to churn the Ocean of Milk and obtain the nectar of immortality (amrta), the gods succeed in tricking the demons out of their share. As the gods divide this nectar among themselves, the demon Sainhikeya slips into the distribution line and is mistakenly served some as well. As the demon drinks it, the Sun and Moon alert the god Vishnu to his presence and Vishnu cuts off the demon’s head with his discus. Although the head and body are separated, both parts become immortal through their contact with the nectar. The head becomes Rahu, while the body becomes Ketu, both of which are considered malevolent planets in Indian astrology (jyotisha). According to tradition, Rahu is also the cause of eclipses: He roams the sky, chasing the Sun and Moon, and tries to get revenge by swallowing them, but the two planets always pass unharmed out of his severed neck. See also Tortoise avatar.

Sakata Chauth

Festival falling on the fourth day (chauth) of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Magh (January–February), which is celebrated as the birthday of the god Ganesh. Those who observe this festival are believed to gain Ganesh’s blessings—wisdom, freedom from troubles, and prosperity. The fourth day of every lunar fortnight is sacred to Ganesh, and vows marking this day may be performed by his devotees (bhakta). The biggest Ganesh festival of the year is not his birthday, but Ganesh Chaturthi, which falls on the fourth day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Bhadrapada (August–September).
Sakha (“companion”) Bhava

The third of the five modes of devotion to the Supreme Being that were most prominently expressed by Rupa Goswami. Rupa used different types of human relationships as models for the possible relationships between deity and devotee (bhakta). These five models increased in emotional intensity from the peaceful (shanta) sense that comes from realizing one's complete identity with Brahman, or Supreme Reality, to conceiving of God as one's master, friend, child, or lover. In the sakha bhava, devotees consider themselves as God's friends and companions and thus as taking part in his regular, everyday activities.

Sakshi

(“friend,” “companion”) The motif of friendship as a religious ideal was well developed by the devotees (bhakta) of the god Krishna, and to a lesser extent by devotees of the god Rama. Both of these deities are avatars (incarnations) of the god Vishnu, and Vaishnava devotion tends to stress not only worship of the chosen deity, but also the notions of relationship and communion—both between the deity and devotee, and among devotees themselves. Vaishnava religious practice often involved elaborate visualization exercises, in which devotees would envision the deity's daily activities—for Krishna, the simple life of a village cowherd, and for Rama, the life of a prince. Some devotional manuals give detailed daily schedules of the deity’s activities to facilitate this process of visualization. Such elaborate visualization allowed the devotees to symbolically enter the deity's world and take part in the deity's divine play (lila) on earth, building a relationship with God through sharing the mundane elements of everyday life. In this sort of visualization, devotees commonly considered themselves to be the deity's sakhis or companions—in some cases male companions, and in other cases female companions of the deity's consorts, Radha and Sita. Taking on the persona of a sakhi provided a devotee with a concrete place in the divine world, in which he or she could both observe and participate in the god's earthly activity.

Sakshin

(“witness”) The perceiving consciousness believed to be the inner Self (atman), which observes changes going on around it but is utterly unaffected by them. It is described in a primitive way as early as the Upanishads, the speculative texts that form the final layer of the Vedas, the most authoritative Hindu religious texts. The Katha Upanishad describes the Self as a thumb-sized person inside the head. The Samkhya philosophical school develops this notion in a more subtle and sophisticated way: of its two fundamental first principles, one is the purusha, which is the conscious but inert witness to the transformations of prakrti, or nature. Later philosophical schools such as Vedanta reject the Samkhya school’s dualism by collapsing all reality into a single ultimate principle known as Brahman. Vedanta’s conception of Brahman as “being-consciousness-bliss” (sacchidananda) also conceives of the Self as the conscious and unchanging witness to the material flux surrounding it.

Sala

In Hindi, “wife's brother.” The term can be used as a serious insult if applied to someone who is not related in this way. Calling someone “sala” implies that the other is in a position of relative subservience, since he is a member of the family that “gives” the bride. It also implies that one is having sexual relations with that person's sister, an allegation that is an insult to a family's honor, whether or not it is true.
Salmala ("Silk-Cotton Tree") Dvipa
In traditional mythic geography, the third of the seven concentric landmasses (dvipas) making up the visible world. See also cosmology.

Samadhi
("trance") In the ashtanga yoga first codified by the philosopher Patanjali, the last of the eight elements of yoga practice. Along with dharana ("concentration") and dhyana ("meditation"), samadhi is one of the three practices that make up the "inner discipline" (samyama), the culmination of yogic training. Samadhi is described as a state in which the mind is conscious of only the object of concentration, and is devoid of any notion of the self as perceiver. Once one has attained samadhi on the conscious plane, one supposedly pursues it on more subtle inner planes.

The loss of subjectivity in samadhi is believed to make people unaware of the outside world, such that they will not respond to stimuli and may sometimes appear almost dead. For this reason, the burial places of deceased ascetics are usually referred to as samadhi shrines, since it is popularly believed that they are not dead, but only rapt in deep meditation.

Samadhi Shrine
Burial place of a deceased ascetic. Part of the process of ascetic initiation is the initiate's ritualized death, in which he (or far more rarely, she) performs his (or her) own funeral rites, followed by rebirth with a new name and a new identity. Consequently, upon the physical death of an ascetic the funeral rites (antyeshthi) are not performed, since the ascetic is (ritually speaking) already dead. The body is often disposed of by being weighted down with rocks and thrown into a river, but well-known and powerful ascetics are often buried, usually in a sitting position as if in meditation. Such people are often buried in places associated with their presence during their lives—whether a room, building, or particular outdoor site. In popular wisdom such ascetics are believed not to be dead but only rapt in deep meditation (samadhi). The samadhi shrines of very renowned ascetics often have shrines built over them, which can become places of pilgrimage for those seeking the ascetic's continuing blessings (ashirvad).

Samana
In traditional Indian physiology, one of the five bodily winds considered responsible for basic bodily functions, the others being prana, apana, vyana, and udana. The samana wind is considered to reside in the navel, and to aid in the process of digestion.

Samasthana
In yoga practice, sitting position in which the legs are bent, with the soles of the feet pressed flat against one another and the outer edges of the feet on the ground. See utkutikasana.

Samavartana ("return") Samskara
The fourteenth of the life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras), which marks the end of a young man's life as a celibate student (brahmacharin) and the return to his parental home. The most important element in this rite is a bath, after which the young man changes into new clothes, marking his change in status. The young man is supposed to ask his guru's permission before performing the ceremony, and gives him his teacher's fee (dakshina), both as payment for services rendered and as a sign of respect. Shortly after his return to his natal home, the young man usually gets married. In modern times this rite is not often observed, due to the decline of the traditional paradigm of the brahmacharin stage of life, although sometimes it is performed in preparation for a marriage.
Samavaya
(“inherence”) Fundamental category in the worldview of the Nyaya-Vaisheshika philosophical school. This school conceives of the world as made up of atomistic parts, which are connected to form larger things. The fundamental function of samavaya is as a subtle glue to connect various things: wholes and their parts, substances and their attributes, motions and the things that move, and general properties and their particular instances. It also connects both pleasure and pain to the Self. Thus samavaya is the fundamental thing holding the universe together. The philosophical problems raised by the idea of inherence—particularly the claim that inherence was one single principle, and not a collection of things—were ultimately responsible for the rise of Navyanyaya school, which attempted to explain these relationships in a more sophisticated way.

Sama Veda
Traditionally considered the second of the four Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts. The Sama Veda is a collection of hymns, arranged for singing as one of the components of the Vedic sacrifices (yajna). While drawn mostly from the Rg Veda, the singing patterns are far more elaborate than the simple chanting generally associated with the Rg Veda. Thus it is believed that the Sama Veda developed later than the Rg Veda.

Sambandar
(7th c.) One of the earliest of the Nayanars, a group of sixty-three southern Indian poet-saints who were devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. Along with their contemporaries the Alvars, who were devotees of Vishnu, the Nayanars spearheaded the revitalization of Hindu religion through their passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed in hymns sung in the Tamil language. Along with his contemporary Appar. Sambandar actively opposed the unorthodox sects of the times, particularly the Jains, whom he reviles in his poems. The depth of his hatred can be seen in a well-established tradition that, after converting the king of Madurai, of the Pandya dynasty, from Jainism to Shaivism, Sambandar was instrumental in having eight thousand Jain ascetics executed by impalement. The collected hymns of the three most important Nayanars—Appar, Sambandar, and Sundaramurtti—comprise the Devaram, the most sacred of the Tamil Shaivite texts. See also Shaiva.

Samharakrama
(“destruction method”) Ritual in the Shrividya school of the secretive religious practice known as tantra. This ritual uses the shrichakra, a symbolic diagram used in worship. The adept’s ritual journey starts at the outer edges of the shrichakra, which represents the apparently “real” everyday world, and gradually moves toward the center, where a single point (bindu) represents absolute unity. This process is called “destruction” because the ritual process systematically deconstructs the notion of the dualistic world and destroys the notion of a Self that is separate from the Absolute Reality. For further information see Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Samhita
(“collection”) The most archaic textual layer in the Vedas, comprising hymns to the Vedic deities, benedictions, prayers, spells, and litanies. The term indicates that this group of texts is a collection of various things important, not only for their cognitive meaning, but for their power as mantra (sacred sound). The samhitas were chanted during rites of sacrifice and remain the oldest living part of the Hindu tradition. Following the samhitas are the three later textual levels: the Brahmanas, which are essentially manuals detailing correct performance of the sacrifice, and the Aranyakas and the Upanishads, which ask speculative questions about the power behind the sacrifice.

Samkalpa
(“intention”) Important ritual sequence at the beginning of many religious rites in which the person performing the rite states his or her identity, the time and place at which the action is being performed, the performer’s intention to carry out this particular ritual act, and the benefits desired from the action. The samkalpa is important as the formal commitment to perform the stated action. For ritual actions that promise several different possible benefits—for example, birth in heaven or final liberation—performing the samkalpa is believed to give one the result one desires.

Samkhya
(“enumeration”) One of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy, whose founding text is the Samkhya karikas, written by Ishvarakrishna in the third century B.C.E. Samkhya espouses an atheistic philosophical dualism positing two fundamental principles as the source of all things. The first of these is called purusha (“person”), which is conscious, but completely inactive and unchanging. It is seen as a passive witness to the transformations going on around it. As the source of consciousness, purusha is ultimately identified with an individual’s true and eternal Self. Purusha is inferred as plural, given the plurality of conscious beings, combined with the fact that one person can gain enlightenment while all the rest remain in bondage.

The other fundamental principle is prakrti, (“nature”), which provides the object to the purusha’s subject. Prakrti is better conceived of as force or power rather than a specific material object. Prakrti contains within it forces with three different primordial qualities (gunas):
sattva tends toward the good, rajas towards activity or passion, and tamas towards darkness and decay. In the primal prakrti these three forces are in perfect equilibrium, each perfectly balancing the others. The two principles of purusha and prakrti are distinct, separate, and alone.

When prakrti's initial equilibrium is disturbed, it sets in motion a pattern of evolution that creates both the exterior physical world and the interior psychological world. From prakrti emerges mahat ("the great one"), which has as its psychological counterpart the subtlest form of mental activity (buddhi). From buddhi evolves ahamkar, which contains the first real ideas of individual identity. From ahamkar evolves the mind (manas), the sense organs (jnadriyas), the organs of action (karmendriyas), and the subtle elements (tanmatras); from the last evolve the gross elements that actually make up the material world. All of these evolutes—material or psychic—have a differing balance of the three gunas, which ultimately determines their character as wholesome, active, or unwholesome. Throughout this process of evolution, purusha remains unchanged, a mere witness to prakrti's unceasing transformations. Their mutual functioning is described using the metaphor of the lame man (purusha) being carried by the blind man (prakrti).

The ultimate source of bondage, according to the Samkhya school, comes because people do not recognize the difference between these two principles. Through this lack of discrimination between the two, the Self (purusha) appears as if it is an agent, and the evolutes (from prakrti) as if they are conscious. The Samkhyas illustrate this misunderstanding using the example of the rose behind the crystal, in which the latter appears to be colored but is in fact unchanged. Although for the Samkhyas prakrti undergoes real transformations, the primary problem is epistemological—that is, how one comes to know things—rather than ontological, or rooted in the nature of things themselves. Since the purusha never changes, there is no question of making it into anything else or regaining the way that it used to be; the real problem is making the distinction between the differing realities of these two principles. Once this has been done, the evolution of prakrti is said to reverse, leaving the purusha again in its state of magnificent isolation (kaivalya).

Of course, once one has a developed (if erroneous) idea of (conventional) personality, this discrimination becomes all the more difficult. This mistaken idea becomes the basis for one's volitional actions (karma) and one's emotional dispositions. One's actions and dispositions reinforce each other, and both of these are undergirded by the notion of a Self.

The Samkhya metaphysics were adopted wholesale by the yoga philosophical school, and the two schools are usually mentioned together—Samkhya as the theoretical foundation, and Yoga as the practical component. One of Samkhya's lasting contributions to Indian thought is the idea of the gunas, a basic concept running through Hindu culture. Another influential but less pervasive idea is their model of evolution, which has been adapted by other schools but often subsumed under theistic assumptions in which God is the source of both consciousness and the material world. The one philosophical problem that the Samkhya could never surmount was to explain the source of bondage, given their starting assumptions. If purusha and prakrti are completely separate, how could the two of them interact—much less mistake one for the other—and how did the process of evolution begin? Although their contributions remain significant, they were largely eclipsed by Vedanta, which claimed that the problem is ignorance of the Self and not-Self, and that the world around us is not an actual evolution, but only an illusory transformation (vivarta). This philosophical model is called Vivartavada. For further information see Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and

Sampraday

(“tradition”) Literally, “that which is handed down,” or the transmitted body of teachings that distinguishes one religious group from another. Belonging to a particular sampraday is based on having received teachings from one’s spiritual preceptor (guru), thus becoming part of a spiritual lineage, and continuing the life of that sampraday by transmitting the teachings to disciples. Although the sampraday is often translated as “sect,” this loses its sense of uniqueness within particular theistic traditions. For example, one can speak of different sampradays among Tamil Shaiva brahmans, by virtue of their differing spiritual lineages, even though they worship the same deity and share a common cultural heritage.

Samsara

(“wandering”) The cycle of reincarnation, one of the most fundamental assumptions throughout all Indian religion. In the Indian worldview, reincarnation involves a series of births and rebirths in different realms and forms, all based on the quality and quantity of karma, formed through previous actions and patterns of thought. Beings with good karma may be born into the heavens, which are essentially realms of pleasure and carefree enjoyment; those with bad karma may be reborn as animals or as ghosts, or into realms of punishment, such as hells. Neither pleasure nor punishment is eternal, although they may last an extremely long time. Beings in heaven enjoy the results of their past actions, but when their good karma is exhausted they must take another, lower birth; beings in realms of punishment are paying for their evil deeds, but when this has been done they will take another birth, presumably in some higher status.

Between these two lies the human realm, which comprises infinite possibilities, based on various factors—such as high status or low, wealth or poverty, health or disability, and the religious piety of one’s natal family. Varying mixtures of good and bad karma combine for many different human circumstances, and according to popular belief one’s present life and body are a record of one’s past. The notion that people are, in life, where they deserve to be because of karma can be seen as the basis for the caste system. Fulfilling one’s particular social role (svadharma), no matter how humble, not only upholds the social order but is a means for individual spiritual advancement.

The human realm is widely believed to be the best of all for spiritual life, partly because human beings can make rational choices, including the decision to take part in religious life. In this humans are different from animals, which are driven mainly by their instincts, and from ghosts or hell-dwellers, who are simply expiating their past acts. At the same time human life, unlike life in the heavens, is full of reverses and sorrow continually reminding human beings about the transience of life and possessions and the need to engage in spiritual development. Embodied existence is a constant cycling from one realm to the next, leaving one body and assuming another, and the inherent uncertainty of this condition has led to the search, dating from the time of the speculative texts known as the Upanishads, for an unchanging state, completely out of this cycle of rebirth. This unchanging state is widely accepted as life’s supreme goal, although in any generation very few actively seek it, with most people content to relegate it to some indefinite future lifetime. For further information see Wendy Doniger O’Flaherty (ed.), Karma and Rebirth in Classical Indian Traditions, 1980.
Samskara

(“making perfect”) Collective name for the various life-cycle ceremonies in Hindu society. Although status in Indian society depends most on one’s birth, this alone is not sufficient to become a complete and finished person. In an individual’s development, the raw material given by nature must be refined through the process of culture, or the action of samskaras. This process of transformation begins before birth, with the three prenatal samskaras, and continues to death with the antyeshthi samskaras. In general, samskaras transform people in two ways: by removing latent or residual impurities, such as the childhood chudakarana samskara, or by generating new capacities and entitlements, such as the upanyana (initiation) and vivaha (marriage) samskaras.

Although different writers in the dharma literature disagree on the number of samskaras, traditionally, sixteen are accepted. Three were prenatal samskaras: one to ensure conception (Garbhadhana), one to ensure the birth of a boy (Pumsavana), and one to ensure an easy delivery and a healthy child (Simantonayana). Six samskaras were associated with childhood: ritual actions immediately after birth (Jatakarma), name-giving (Namakarana), the first outing (Nishkramana), the first solid food (Anna-prashana), head-shaving (Chudakarana), and piercing of the ears (Karnavedha). Five samskaras were connected with life as a celibate student (brahmacharin): beginning of learning (Vidyarambha), adolescent religious initiation (Upanayana), the beginning of Veda study (Vedarambha), the first shave (Keshanta), and the return home at the conclusion of studies (Samavartana). The final two samskaras were marriage, and the last rites for the dead (antyeshthi samskara).

These sixteen samskaras were the rites for a twice-born man, whom this literature considered the default person. A twice-born man was one born into one of the three “twice-born” varnas—brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya—who were ritually eligible for the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” Women in the twice-born groups would undergo all the rites through the childhood rites, but would have no further rites until marriage, which was considered equal to all samskaras for them. People born outside the twice-born groups—namely, shudras and untouchables—would perform few if any of these rites.

These life cycle rites drive and govern the formation of the individual. In modern times many of these samskaras are still performed, but mainly by brahmins who, because of their traditional role as priests and scholars, conserve this practice to help maintain their traditional prestige. For further information see Pandurang Vaman Kane, A History of Dharma-sastra, 1968; and Raj Bali Pandey, Hindu Samskaras, 1969. The former is encyclopedic and the latter more accessible; despite their age, they remain the best sources about traditional Hindu rites.

Samudra Gupta
(r. 335–376) The second monarch in the Gupta dynasty, son of Chandra Gupta I. During his reign Samudra Gupta made significant territorial gains from the Gupta dynasty's home base in eastern Uttar Pradesh and Bihar westward to the Ganges basin and eastward into Bengal and Assam. Orissa and much of the Coromandel Coast gave tribute as independent but vassal states. Samudra Gupta left a personal account of his prowess inscribed on a stone column at Allahabad. This column had originally been carved to display one of the Pillar Edicts of the Maurya emperor Ashoka (r. 269–232 B.C.E.), and in claiming it as his own Samudra Gupta was attempting to appropriate some of the Maurya dynasty's luster.

Samvad
(“dialogue”) Technical term for the speaking parts in the Ramnagar Ram Lila, a dramatic presentation of the Ramayana staged annually at the fortified town of Ramnagar, near Benares. The dialogues are interspersed with recitations from the Ramcharitmanas, a vernacular retelling of the Ramayana written by the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?), and render the archaic language of the Ramcharitmanas into modern vernacular Hindi. The action in the Ram Lila alternates between contemporary and archaic text.

Samyama
(“inner discipline”) In the ashtanga yoga first codified by the philosopher Patanjali, a collective name for the last three stages in yoga practice, namely dharana, dhyana, and samadhi. These stages are concerned with focusing and disciplining the mind, and are the most subtle and internalized elements in yogic practice.

Sanaka
In Hindu mythology, one of four sages born of the god Brahma, who are paradigms of asceticism; the other three are Sanandana, Sanatana, and Sanatkumara. When Brahma emanates these four sages, he commands them to begin the work of creation, but they are so detached from worldly concerns that they refuse to do so. They are celibate their entire lives, study the Vedas from childhood, and always travel together.

Sanakadi
(“Sanaka and the others”) In Hindu mythology, a collective name for four sages born of Brahma who are paradigms of asceticism; the four sages are Sanaka, Sanandana, Sanatana, and Sanatkumara. When Brahma emanates them, he commands them to begin the work of creation, but they are so detached from worldly concerns that they refuse to do so. They are celibate their entire lives, study the Vedas from childhood, and always travel together.

Sanaka Sampraday
One of the four branches (sampraday) of the Naga class of the Bairagi ascetics. Bairagi ascetics are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. The Nagas are fighting ascetics hired by the other Bairagis to protect them. The Naga class is organized in military fashion into different anis or “armies.” Until the beginning of the nineteenth century their primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests; both of these have largely disappeared in contemporary times. The Sanaka Sampraday traces its spiritual lineage from the Nimbarki sect, founded by Nimbarka. Members of this sect worship Radha and Krishna as a divine couple, with both deities holding equal status.

Sanandana
In Hindu mythology, one of four sages born of the god Brahma who are paradigms of asceticism; the other three are Sanaka, Sanatana, and Sanatkumara. When Brahma emanates these four sages, he commands them to begin the work of creation, but they are so detached from worldly concerns that they refuse to do so. They are celibate their entire lives, study the Vedas from childhood, and always travel together.

Sanatana
(“eternal”) Dharma
In the dharma literature, the ultimate and eternal moral order of the universe. It is the eternal ideal pattern revealed in the Vedas (the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts). This pattern must be upheld to maintain the stability of society. All aspects of religious duty (dharma) aim ultimately toward the maintenance and fulfillment of this order, including common religious duties (sadharana dharma), religious duties stemming from social status (varna dharma) and stage of life (ashrama dharma), and individualized religious duty (svadharma). In more recent times, the term has been used by Hindus to identify the religious tradition known to the outside world as “Hinduism.”

Sanatana Sampradaya
Another name for the Nimbarki religious community. The philosopher Nimbarka was the community's historical founder, but, according to the Nimbarkis, the actual founder was the god Vishnu himself. One of Vishnu's disciples was named Sanatana (“eternal”), hence the name of the sampraday.

Sanatkumara
In Hindu mythology, one of four sages born of the god Brahma who are paradigms of asceticism; the other three are Sanaka, Sanandana, and Sanatana. When Brahma emanates these four sages, he commands them to begin the work of creation, but they are so detached from worldly concerns that they refuse to do so. They are celibate their entire lives, study the Vedas from childhood, and always travel together.

Sandarshana (“expositing”) Mudra
In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, a particular symbolic hand gesture (mudra), in which the tips of the thumb and index finger are touching, with the rest of the fingers extended and the palm facing the viewer. This is the hand gesture used to signify explanation or exposition, and for this reason it is also known as the vyakhyana (“teaching”) mudra. Since the teaching gesture indicates a person of higher spiritual attainment, it is also known as the chit (“consciousness”) mudra.

Sandhabhasha
Symbolic language used in tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice. The literal translation of the term is disputed; it is often translated as “twilight language” because of its shadowy and mysterious character, but Agehananda Bharati is emphatic that the term means “intentional language.” The elements of tantric worship and practice are described in a coded language drawn from the parts and functions of the human body considered private by most standards. Such coded discourse is used to hide the tradition's essentials from noninitiates and also to project the speakers into an altered understanding. For noninitiates, such language reinforces the general conception of tantric practitioners as completely debased. Douglas R. Brooks reports in The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990, that although widely used in Buddhist tantra, Sandhabhasha is less common among Hindus, who for their coded language favor using common words with contextually technical meanings. For further information see Swami Agehananda. Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1977; Appendix A in Linda Hess and Shukdev Singh (trans.), The Bijak of Kabir, 1983; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Sandhi
(“junction”) In classical Sanskrit grammar, a term for the euphonic (harmonic) combination of words. In general this is done by modifying the final phoneme of one word, based on the initial phoneme of the following word, to facilitate a smooth verbal transition between the two. An example is the compound word sacchidananda, which designates the three essential aspects of the ultimate unqualified Brahman, and is formed from the words sat (“being”), chit (“consciousness”) and ananda (“bliss”).
Sandhya
("union") Morning and evening twilight, the two transitional times between day and night and thus, metaphorically, the times when day and night are united. The word also often denotes certain rites performed daily at morning, noon, and evening, the three times when different parts of the day are in union. These rites are prescribed in the dharma literature as mandatory for all twice-born men, that is, all men from the brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya groups who have undergone the adolescent religious initiation known as the "second birth." At present time these rites are performed only by the most orthodox brahmins.

Sangam
("coming together") Meeting-place for two rivers and the point at which their capacity for purification is believed to be heightened. The most famous such site is the confluence of the Ganges and the Yamuna rivers at the city of Allahabad, but numerous other such sites exist throughout the Indian subcontinent.

Sangama Dynasty
See Vijayanagar dynasty.

Sangam Literature
Collection of classical literature from the Tamil culture, composed during the early centuries of the common era; Sangam (also spelled Cankam) means "academy." The most famous texts in Sangam literature are eight collections of short poems. Three of these collections fall into the genre called puram ("the outer part"); the other five are in the genre called akam ("the inner part"). Puram poetry was "public" verse, describing the deeds of kings, war, death, and other heroic actions. Akam poetry was about an individual's inner experience, especially cultured love, of which the Sangam poets distinguished five developed moods: union, patient waiting, unfaithfulness, separation, and hardship. Each of these moods had well-developed symbolic associations, including associations with a specific type of landscape, time of day and year, flora, fauna, and types of people; such richly developed symbolism gives these poems incredible symbolic depth. The akam poems are arguably the literary antecedents to devotional (bhakti) poetry, which first developed in Tamil Nadu. For further information see A.K. Ramanujan (trans.), The Interior Landscape, 1994; and Glenn Yocum, "Shrines, Shamanism, and Love Poetry: Elements in the Emergence of Popular Tamil Bhakti," in the Journal of the American Academy of Religion, Vol. 41, No. 1, 1973. See also Tamil epics and Tamil language.

Sanjaya
Minister of the blind king Dhrtarashtra, an important older figure in the Hindu epic the Mahabharata. Sanjaya tries valiantly to avert the war that is the epic's climax by counseling the king to better control his son Duryodhana, and to deal more equitably with his nephews the Pandavas, the five brothers who are the epic's protagonists. In the end, the king ignores Sanjaya's advice. Sanjaya is most famous for his ability to see anything he thinks about ("tele-vision"). This power is given to him as a gift from the sage Vyasa so he can describe the progress of the war to Dhrtarashtra without actually having to be there. After the war, Sanjaya goes to live in the forest with Dhrtarashtra, and it is he who informs the Pandavas about the blind king's death in a forest fire.

Sanjaya Belatthiputa
Agnostic thinker in early Indian philosophy whose views are alluded to in the Buddhist scriptures. The scriptures portray Sanjaya as an advocate of profound agnosticism with regard to another world, the effects of good and evil deeds, and just about every facet of religious life.
Sanjna
In Hindu mythology, the daughter of Vishvakarma, workman and architect for the gods. Sanjna has been married to Surya, the Sun, but finds his dazzling radiance too much to bear. To help his daughter adjust to her husband, Vishvakarma trims off some bits of the sun with his divine tools, removing enough of his radiance that Samjna can bear to be with him. The trimmed-off parts of the sun are used to build the Pushpak Viman, an aerial car, as well as the god Vishnu's discus (chakra), the god Shiva's trident, and various other divine weapons.

Sankalpa
Spoken ritual performed before a religious act. The person about to perform the act identifies himself by name, tells the location of the act, and gives the lunar calendar date and time. He goes on to describe the religious act and what benefits he wants to receive as a result. Sankalpa is done before rituals such as suicide and doing morning puja to the Ganges. See samkalpa.

Sankarshana
(“dragging away”) Epithet of the god Krishna’s brother Balarama, referring to Balarama’s unusual prenatal development—he is conceived by Krishna’s mother Devaki but is magically transferred into the womb of her co-wife Rohini. This is done to protect him from harm, since Devaki’s wicked uncle Kamsa has already killed her first seven children, and will certainly do the same if she carries Balarama to term. See Balarama.

Sankat Mochan
(“freeing from distress”) Epithet of a particular form of the monkey-god Hanuman, whose main temple is on the southern part of Benares. Sankat Mochan has been an increasingly popular form of Hanuman since the 1970s. As with all manifestations of Hanuman, Sankat Mochan is considered a strong protective deity, with the power to rescue his devotees (bhakta) from all kinds of trouble and misfortune.

Sankat Mochan (2) A temple in the southern part of Benares dedicated to the monkey-god Hanuman in his form as Sankat Mochan. The temple does not have a long history but first became famous in the nineteenth century through some Ramanandi ascetics living there, whose piety drew visitors to the spot. In modern times, the temple has become popular because the image of Hanuman is believed to be very powerful, but also accessible—qualities that lead petitioners to come with requests and leave with the assurance that help is forthcoming.

Sankranti
(“transition”) The transition of a celestial body (sun, moon, or planet) from one sign of the zodiac to another. Such transitions can give the celestial bodies or the time in question positive or negative qualities. The most important of these celestial bodies is the sun, whose two directional transitions—northward at Makara Sankranti, and southward at Karka Sankranti—define more and less auspicious times for the entire year.

Sanskrit
(“perfected”) For much of Indian history, Sanskrit was the language of the cultural and religious elite. Even in the twentieth century, it is still the language with the highest religious status. Its name reflects the religious conviction that it was the perfect language—the language of the gods. Sanskrit was essentially fixed in the fourth century B.C.E. by the grammarian Panini in his Ashtadhyayi. Since it has not changed from Panini’s time, Sanskrit is no longer considered a “natural” language. Even in Panini’s time, Sanskrit would have been a person’s second language, learned by conscious study after acquiring a grammatically simpler mother tongue (one of the Prakrits).
through the normal process of language learning. In a religious context Sanskrit has primarily been the province of brahmins, serving both as a sacred language and a common language through which the brahmins from various areas could communicate with each other. Its place of pride as the religious language par excellence has been somewhat undercut by the influence of the devotional (bhakti) religious movement. One of this movement’s pervasive features was poetry composed in vernacular languages, which reflected the conscious choice to speak in a language that everyone could understand.

Sant

Literally, someone who has found the truth, or who is searching for it. The word is derived from the Sanskrit word sat (“truth”). More generally it refers to two major groups of devotional (bhakti) poet-saints. One group was centered around the temple of Vithoba at Pandharpur in the state of Maharashtra, and includes saints from the Varkari Panth community such as Namdev, Tukaram, Chokamela, and Eknath. The other group included later poet-saints from various places in northern India, among them Kabir, Ravidas, Dadu, and Guru Nanak, the founder of the Sikh community.

As a group the sants shared certain general tendencies rather than an explicit body of doctrine. Sant religion was inclined to stress an individualized, interior religion leading to a personal experience of the divine, rather than participation in established cults. One of the most common sant themes was their disdain for external ritual, and the general rejection of any worship using images. The northern Indian sants are the most uncompromising advocates of nirguna devotion, in which the divine is seen as beyond conception; but even among the Pandharpur devotees (bhakta) the stress was on devotion to the god Vithoba, rather than actual worship. The sants stressed the power of the divine Name and its ability to remove all obstacles. They disregarded caste distinctions, viewing them as an arbitrary barrier dividing the human community. They stressed instead the value of satsang, and the transforming effects that such “good company” could bring. Satsang thus formed an egalitarian community through the common bonds of faith and devotion, as an alternative to the hierarchical society established by birth.

It is sometimes suggested that all of these themes can be traced to the sants’ social background, since many of them came from very low caste communities. It is certainly true that devotees of low social status would have been forbidden even to enter temples, much less worship the images in those temples, and thus a religious path emphasizing the Name and interior religious experience, which are accessible to everyone, might have seemed a more viable option. In the same way, the socially oppressed might find the notion of an alternative, egalitarian community immensely attractive. Yet to reduce the sant tradition to a simple reaction by marginal social groups cannot explain why one of its major figures is Eknath, a brahmin. Such reductionist analyses ignore the sant movement’s real thrust, namely the passionate search for the divine that permitted no compromises and no excuses. For further information see Karine Schomer and W. H. McLeod, The Sants, 1985.

Santal
Tribal (adivasi) community in northern India, particularly in the border districts of Bihar and West Bengal. As with most tribals in India, many are very poor and make a precarious living as cultivators.

Santoshi Ma
(“the mother who satisfies”) Goddess who is one of the most fascinating Hindu deities, and whose recent explosive popularity illustrates both the flexibility of the Hindu pantheon, and the way that Hindu religion reflects and responds to changes in Indian society. Santoshi Ma’s popularity was largely inspired by a film released in 1975, Jai Santoshi Ma (“Victory to Santoshi Ma”). The film first details the birth of Santoshi Ma as the daughter of the god Ganesha, but then cuts to the earthly problems suffered by one of her devotees (bhakta), Satyavati. Satyavati is a new bride having problems adjusting to her marital home, particularly because of tensions with her wicked sisters-in-law. By the end of the film, through Satyavati’s steadfast devotion to Santoshi Ma, all of her problems are resolved.

This film did not invent Santoshi Ma, although it was largely responsible for spreading her worship. The prescriptions for Santoshi Ma’s religious vow (vrat) had existed before the film was made, and both the rite’s charter myth and the film focus on the problems of a new bride and their eventual resolution through her steadfast devotion to Santoshi Ma. Santoshi Ma’s ultimate source is a mystery, but her iconography suggests that she is an amalgam of other female deities. She is seated on the lotus, a feature associated with the goddess Lakshmi; she wields the sword associated with the goddesses Kali and Durga, as well as the trident associated with the god Shiva. She shows the attributes associated with both married and unmarried goddesses: Like the married goddesses, she is nurturing and caring to her devotees, playing the role of the benevolent Indian mother, and like the independent unmarried goddesses, she is powerful and potentially dangerous—one of the film’s climactic scenes shows her utterly destroying a temple after Satyavati’s sister-in-law intentionally ruined the sanctified food (prasad) meant for her devotees. Yet she is also believed to have the power to grant her devotees’ requests, no matter how large. Through her nurturing, benevolent character coupled with power, she crosses the usual boundaries associated with Hindu goddesses.

Part of the popularity of Santoshi Ma’s vrat comes from its simplicity, cheapness, and promise of benefits. The observance is usually kept by women with the aim of attaining concrete goals for themselves and their families: getting a job, passing an exam, conceiving a child, or arranging a marriage. The rite involves weekly fasting (upavasa) and worship. One of the social factors cited in Santoshi Ma’s explosive popularity is the steadily growing uncertainty in Indian (and South Asian) life, which makes very ordinary things difficult to attain and necessitates the use of all possible resources. In this context, an inexpensive rite that promises concrete benefits for assiduous devotion is an attractive option. See also Santoshi Ma Vrat.

Santoshi Ma Vrat

Religious observance celebrated on Fridays in homage to the goddess Santoshi Ma (“the mother who satisfies”). This religious vow (vrat) is usually kept by women with the aim of attaining concrete goals for themselves or (more commonly) their families: getting a job, passing an exam, conceiving a child, or arranging a marriage. When one’s wish has been granted, a final ceremony calls for the observant to feed eight brahmin boys a meal of rice, yogurt, and bananas. After this concluding rite, one is no longer required to observe the vow, although many women choose to continue performing it as a means to maintain the household’s general good fortune.

The Santoshi Ma Vrat has become extremely popular throughout northern India since the late 1970s, one reason being that it is simple and inexpensive. On the day of the fast (upavasa) the worshiper should not eat until the evening meal, although tea and other beverages are generally allowed. In the late afternoon the worshiper should light a lamp in front of a picture of Santoshi Ma, offer her small amounts of chickpeas and raw sugar—things that can be found in even the poorest households—and read aloud the rite’s charter myth, which tells how a poor, unfortunate woman solved all her family’s troubles through her devotion to Santoshi Ma. After this, the worshiper may eat the evening meal, although it is also subject to restrictions: Since Santoshi Ma is a goddess associated with sweetness, the food must not contain any sour, spicy, or bitter seasonings. This observance thus carries the two common features of most religious vows: some form of worship and modification of one’s diet, with the promise of benefits in return.

Sanyasi

(“renunciant”) According to the dharma literature, the last of the idealized stages of life (ashrama) for a twice-born man, that is a man born into the brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya communities. Boys born into these communities are eligible for the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” After engaging in religious learning as a celibate student (brahmacharin), marrying and raising a family as a householder (grhastha), and gradually detaching himself from the world as a forest-dwelling recluse (vanaprastha), a twice-born man should finally renounce all possessions and all attachments to devote himself exclusively to the search for ultimate truth. Although in a general sense the word Sanyasi can (and sometimes does) refer to any such renunciant, it is most used as the name of a particular ascetic community, the Dashanami Sanyasis, who are believed to have been founded by the great philosopher Shankaracharya, and who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva.

Sanyasi Rebellion

Name given by the British to a long-term struggle in the Bengal region in the latter half of the eighteenth century. This was the period in which the British East India Company was consolidating its economic, political, and military control over the region, causing wide-ranging dislocations in traditional Bengali society. Among the entrenched powers with which the British clashed were organized bands of soldier-ascetics, both Hindus and Muslims. These soldier-ascetics were significant local forces, with both military and economic power gained through mercenary services, trading, and money-lending, and they competed with the British East India Company for political authority and land revenue.

Conflict between the British and the ascetics peaked shortly after the Bengal famine of 1770–1771. The rebellion was caused partly by competition for greatly reduced agricultural revenue and by British-sponsored changes in land ownership patterns, in which officials in the East India Company replaced many of the “unprofitable” traditional landowners with their own Company employees. Many of the traditional landowners owed money to ascetic moneylenders (Sanyasis), and had pledged their land revenue as security. The Sanyasis were upset when the landowners were replaced and the debts not honored. For their part, the Company’s officials were reluctant to allow the ascetics, who traveled in heavily armed bands, to pass through the company’s territories while on religious pilgrimage, as the ascetics had traditionally done. Ultimately the ascetic attacks were disorganized and local, and the disparate Sanyasi bands were unable to withstand British resources and organization. A fictionalized account of the Sanyasi Rebellion appeared in the novel Anandamath, by Bankim Chandra Chatterjee (1838–1894), who used the Sanyasi Rebellion as a coded call for resistance to contemporary British rule.

Sapaka
One of the parts of an acceptable form of inference (anumana) in Indian philosophy. An acceptable inference has three terms: an assertion (pratijna), a reason (hetu), and examples (drshanta); each of these three has its own constituent parts. The sapaksha is part of the third term, the examples. It is a positive example given to support the claim made in the initial assertion, by showing that similar things happen in comparable cases. For example, in the inference, “there is fire on the mountain, because there is smoke on the mountain,” the sapaksha could be “as in a kitchen,” since this place has both fire and smoke, and thus supports the initial assertion. Conventionally, an inference also has to have a negative example, to show that the claim made in the assertion does not happen in some other cases.

Saphala Ekadashi
Religious observance falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the dark (waxing) half of the lunar month of Paush (December–January). All the eleventh-day observances are dedicated to the worship of Vishnu. Most Hindu religious festivals have certain prescribed rites, which usually involve fasting (upavasa) and worship and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. Those performing this rite must stay up all night singing and telling of Vishnu’s exploits. The name Saphala means “successful,” and those who faithfully observe this will be successful in all their endeavors.

Sapinda
(“having a common body”) Term for people having common ancestry, who could thus be said to share the same body through the ancestor. This relationship was held to cease after seven generations on the father’s side, and after five on the mother’s. Men and women who were sapinda were theoretically forbidden to marry, although this prohibition has been routinely ignored in southern India since very early times. See also marriage prohibitions.

Sapindikarana
Funerary rite (antyeshthi samskara) performed on the twelfth day after death, which symbolically represents the one-year anniversary of the death. In this rite, the departed person is transformed from a potentially dangerous wandering spirit (pret) to a benevolent ancestral spirit (pitr). Each day for ten days following a person’s death, mourners leave a ball of cooked grain (pinda) for the departed spirit. Gradually the ten pindas “construct” a new body for the departed person. Then sapindikarana is performed on the twelfth day. A large pinda, representing the departed, and three smaller ones are collected, representing the departed’s father, grandfather, and great-grandfather. The rite’s central moment comes when the departed's pinda is divided into three parts, one part is mixed with each of the other three pindas, and finally all three pindas are combined into one. At the moment the three pindas are combined, the departed is believed to have become one (sapindi) with his ancestors, and to have been transformed from a wandering spirit into an ancestor as well. This twelfth day rite is the last of the funerary rites performed on a strict timetable. Mourners may wait for years before performing the final rite of asthi-visarjana, in which bone and ashes from the dead person's cremation pyre are immersed.
in a sacred river, although with the advent of better transportation this is sometimes now performed before the twelfth day rites. In addition, people still perform annual memorial rites for the deceased. For an excellent account of this rite, see David M. Knipe, “Sapindikarana: The Hindu Rite of Entry into Heaven,” in Frank E. Reynolds and Earle H. Waugh (eds.), Religious Encounters With Death, 1977.

Saptapadi
("seven steps") The most important rite in the Hindu marriage ceremony, in which the bride and groom take seven steps together to symbolize their marital union. The seventh step completes the transfer of the bride from her natal family to the groom's family and is also the point when the marriage becomes permanent. As described in the dharma literature, the bride and groom would perform this rite by taking seven steps in a straight line. In contemporary times this rite is often combined with the agnipradakshinam ("circumambulating the *fire"), in which the bride and groom make seven revolutions around a small fire—considered to be a form of the god Agni and thus the divine witness to the marriage. While circling the fire, the bride and groom are often physically joined by tying part of his turban to the edge of her sari as a visible sign of their marital union.

Saptasindhu
("seven seas") In traditional mythic geography, the seven oceans surrounding the seven concentric landmasses (dvipas) that make up the visible world. Each of these seven seas is composed of a different substance. The ocean accessible to human beings is composed of salt water, but the oceans beyond that are composed of sugarcane juice, wine, ghee (clarified butter), yogurt, milk, and sweet water. Few specific details exist about most of these oceans, but the Ocean of Milk has a prominent place in Hindu mythology, since it was by churning this that the gods obtained the nectar of immortality (amrta). See also Tortoise avatar.

Sarama
In the Rg Veda, the earliest Hindu sacred text, a servant of the storm-god Indra. In Rg Veda 10.108, Sarama is sent as an emissary to Indra's enemies, the Panis, to inquire where they have hidden the cows they have stolen, and to threaten them with Indra's wrath if they do not reveal their location.

Saraswat
Traditional Indian society was modeled as a collection of endogamous, or intermarried, subgroups known as jatis ("birth"). Jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group's hereditary occupation, over which each group has a monopoly. This sort of differentiation applied even to brahmins, whose role has been to serve as priests, scholars, and teachers. The Saraswats are a brahmin jati counted as one of the five northern Indian brahmin communities (Pancha Gauda); the other four are the Gaudas, the Kanaujias, the Maithilas, and the Utkalas. Unlike most other brahmin communities, which had a well-defined core region, the Saraswats are found in several widely separated locations. One group lived in the coastal region of Sindh in modern Pakistan, although after Partition in 1947 most of the group migrated to Bombay. Another group was located in prepartition Punjab, although here too they have tended to migrate away from the part of Punjab in modern Pakistan. A third branch, known as the Gauda Saraswats, is found on a narrow strip of coastline in the southern Indian state of Karnataka. The Saraswat community takes its name from Saraswati, patron goddess of speech and learning, and, as a group, is famous for its erudition and piety.
Saraswati

Goddess associated with art, aesthetics, learning, sacred speech, and wisdom. Saraswati is the patron deity of culture in all its manifestations. The spoken word is considered very powerful in Hindu culture and Saraswati can either promote or frustrate one's efforts by conferring or withdrawing the ability to speak clearly. Her association with sacred speech goes back to the time of the sacrificial manuals known as the Brahmanas, in which the cult of sacrifice was based on the precise performance of sacred speech and ritual.

Her iconography emphasizes her connection with the life of the mind: She holds a book, a crystal (symbolic of a purified mind), a vina (musical instrument), and a rosary (associated with religious rites, and particularly with the repetition of the sacred sounds known as mantras). Her animal vehicle is the swan, whose white color is a symbol of purity and whose high flight is a symbol of transcendence. Through Saraswati’s blessings (ashirvad) human beings can transcend their biological condition to create works of art and culture.

Saraswati is usually believed to be married, although different mythic sources give her different husbands. In some cases she is described as the wife of the god Brahma, the creator; here their joint activity encompasses the formation of the material world and its transformation through human cultural activity. In other stories she is described as the wife of Vishnu, and thus a co-wife of Lakshmi. Here the realms of Lakshmi and Saraswati can be seen as giving differing messages about the “good things” in life—while Lakshmi grants wealth and material prosperity, Saraswati brings wisdom and culture. A popular Indian saying reports that Saraswati’s devotee (bhakta) will never make money, while a follower of Lakshmi (whose vehicle is the owl) will be “blind” to spiritual wisdom. For more information on Saraswati and all the goddesses of Hinduism, see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Saraswati Dashanami

One of the ten divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva. The Dashanamis were supposedly established by the ninth-century philosopher Shankaracharya in an effort to create a corps of learned men who could help to revitalize Hindu life. Each of the divisions is designated by a different name—in this case, Saraswati (the patron goddess of learning and culture). Upon initiation, new members are given this name as a surname to their new ascetic names, thus allowing for immediate group identification.

These ten “named” divisions of Dashanami Sanyasis are divided into four larger organizational groups. Each group has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by Shankaracharya, as well as other particular religious associations. The Saraswati Dashanamis belong to the Bhuriwara group, which is affiliated with the Shringeri math in the southern Indian town of Shringeri. The Saraswati division is elite in that it is one of the few that will initiate only brahmins (the other such divisions are Ashrama, Tirtha, and part of the Bharati order).

Saraswati River

One of the seven sacred rivers of India, along with the Ganges, Yamuna, Godavari, Narmada, Indus, and Cauvery. The Saraswati is particularly interesting because no one is sure exactly where this river is located. A river by this name is mentioned in the hymns of the Vedas, the earliest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts, and thus the Saraswati River would seem to have been in the northeastern part of India, in which these hymns are set. In modern times a Saraswati River flows through the northern Indian state of Haryana and dries up in the desert of the state of Rajasthan. Archaeologists have found extensive settlements from the Indus Valley civilization on its banks, indicating that in earlier times the river was an active tributary of the Indus. Popular belief holds that the Saraswati continues to flow underground, and joins the Ganges and Yamuna Rivers at their confluence in Allahabad. This reputed confluence of three sacred rivers is the source for one of the site’s names, Triveni (“triple stream”).

Sarmanochegas

According to the Greek writer Strabo, the name of an ascetic who was part of a delegation sent to Athens by a king of the Pandya dynasty, met by Augustus in Athens in 20 B.C.E. In Athens, Sarmanochegas, tired of a life of bondage on earth, committed religious suicide by burning himself on a pyre.

Sarvadarshanasangraha
("Collection of all [philosophical] views") A philosophical encyclopedia composed by Madhava in the late fourteenth century. In this text, Madhava compiled the views of all the existing philosophical schools, which he placed in hierarchical order, based on his judgment of their truth value. The materialist schools were ranked the lowest and least reliable since their proponents completely denied the virtue of any religious life. After this came various Buddhist schools, whose low standing can be attributed to the widespread perception that they were nihilists (nastikas). Madhava then moves through the various Hindu philosophical schools, finishing with the Advaita Vedanta school—his own—which was judged the highest and most perfect expression of the truth. Although the Sarvadarshanasangraha is a polemical text with a clear bias, it is one of the few extant sources that considers the perspectives of all the existing schools.

Sarvam Idam Khalu Brahman
("Truly, this universe is Brahman") In the Hindu philosophical tradition, one of the “great utterances” (mahavakyas) expressing the ultimate truth, here the sameness of the individual Self (atman) with the Supreme Reality (Brahman).

Sarvasvara
Sacrificial rite found in the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts. The most notable feature of the sarvasvara is that it involved the suicide of the sacrificer, who concluded the rite by entering the sacrificial fire. The sarvasvara is an extreme example of the class of ritual actions known as kamya karma, which consists of action performed solely because of the performer’s desire (kama) to obtain certain benefits. This element of desire makes kamya karma different from the other two classes of ritual action, nitya karma and naimittika karma, which were each in some way obligatory. The sarvasvara could be undertaken to obtain any outcome, such as birth in heaven as a god, or rebirth in a royal family. The sacrificer declares the benefit in the part of the rite called the samkalpa. Although the sarvasvara had extreme elements, it was completely voluntary.

Sashanka
(7th c.) King of Bengal who was an ardent devotee (bhakta) of the god Shiva and a fierce opponent of Buddhism, which was deeply entrenched in his domain. According to reliable historical reports, Sashanka not only persecuted the Buddhists themselves but also tried to destroy the tree in Bodh Gaya under which the Buddha gained enlightenment. This is one of the few well-documented cases of religious persecution.

Sat
In Indian philosophical thought, the most basic denotation for “that which (really and truly) exists.” The term is a present participle of the verb “to be,” so a fairly common translation is “Being,” but the word also carries connotations relating to the idea of Truth—that things that exist are both “real” and “true.” Sat is the first of the three attributes traditionally ascribed to the unqualified, ultimate Brahman as sacchidananda, along with consciousness (chit) and bliss (ananda).

Satavahana Dynasty
Central Indian dynasty whose core area was in the Deccan plateau in the western state of Maharashtra, and whose capital was in the city of Paithan. The Satavahana dynasty was at its peak from the first to the third centuries, when it ruled an area spanning the modern states of Gujarat, Madhya Pradesh, Maharashtra, Karnataka, and Andhra Pradesh. It was in the Satavahana domains that the first cave temples were constructed in the chaitya and vihara architectural styles, which paved the way for later architectural forms.

Satguru

("true guru") In the sant religious tradition, an epithet (label) that can refer either to the Supreme Being or to a genuinely realized religious teacher, through whose instruction a disciple attains the Supreme Being. The sants were a loose group of central and northern Indian poet-saints who lived between the fifteenth and seventeenth centuries and who shared several general tendencies: stress on individualized and interior religion, leading to a personal experience of the divine; disdain for external ritual, particularly image worship; faith in the power of the divine Name; and a tendency to ignore conventional caste distinctions. Many of the sants, particularly in northern India, thought of the divine as without qualities (nirguna) and beyond human powers of conception. Given these aniconic and occasionally iconoclastic tendencies, it is not surprising that the sant tradition highlights the importance of the spiritual teacher (guru), since the guru's human form is the only image that a disciple has to work with. In human form, the satguru guides the disciple's spiritual practice and thus becomes the vehicle for spiritual attainment. Yet a true guru, according to the tradition, always remains a servant rather than a master, maintaining and transmitting the teaching of his or her particular lineage. The sant notion of the satguru has been adopted into many modern Hindu movements, most notably the Radha Soami Satsang.

Sathya Sai Baba

(b. Satya Narayana Peddi Venkappa Raju, 1926) Modern Hindu teacher and religious figure who presides as religious teacher (guru) over millions of devotees (bhakta), both Indian and foreign. He was born in the small village of Puttaparthi in the state of Andhra Pradesh, where his main ashram is still located. He first claimed to be an incarnation of Shirdi Sai Baba, a Maharashtrian saint, at thirteen—a move that gave him religious authority and obviated the need to accept a human guru and a spiritual lineage. Sathya Sai Baba has since stated that he will be reincarnated a third time, thus eliminating awkward questions about a successor. His fame rests upon his supposed magic powers, particularly the ability to heal and to materialize objects from thin air. Sai Baba has many middle- and upper-class Indian devotees, whom he obliges to perform service (seva) to others. Some observers are highly skeptical about his reputed powers and about Sai Baba in general. For further information see Lawrence Babb, "Sathya Sai Baba's Saintly Play," in John Stratton Hawley (ed.), Saints and Virtues, 1987; "Sathya Sai Baba and the Lesson of Trust," in Redemptive Encounters, 1987; and "Sathya Sai Baba's Miracles," in T. N. Madan (ed.), Religion in India, 1991.

Sati

Hindu goddess, daughter of the demigod Daksha and wife of the god Shiva, whose death and dismemberment are pivotal incidents in the mythology of both Shiva and the Goddess. According to legend, after Sati marries Shiva, her father Daksha feels that Shiva has not shown him proper respect and develops bad feelings toward him. Inflated with pride, Daksha plans a great sacrifice to which he invites all the gods but deliberately excludes Shiva. When Sati learns about the sacrifice, she insists that she wants to go, since it is in her natal home. Shiva, after trying to discourage her by pointing out that one should not go without an invitation, finally gives her his permission. When Sati arrives at the sacrificial grounds and asks...
Daksha why he has excluded her husband, Daksha responds with a stream of abuse, excoriating Shiva as worthless and despicable. Humiliated by these public insults, Sati commits suicide—in some versions, by leaping into the sacrificial fire, in others by withdrawing into yogic trance and giving up her life.

Shiva, furious at what has happened, creates the fierce deity Virabhadra (or in some versions, Virabhadra and the fierce goddess Bhadrakali), and dispatches them to destroy Daksha’s sacrifice. They gleefully carry out his command, scattering the guests and killing Daksha. The resulting carnage ends only when the assembled gods praise Shiva as the supreme deity. Daksha is eventually restored to life with the head of a goat, and he too repents his arrogance and worships Shiva. At Daksha’s request, Shiva agrees to remain at the sacrificial site forever and sanctify it. Shiva takes the form of a linga, the pillar-shaped object that is his symbolic form, and can still be seen at the Daksha Mahadev temple in the town of Kankhal.

Although Shiva’s anger has been pacified by this worship, he is disconsolate at Sati’s death and wanders the earth carrying her body on his shoulders. In his grief, Shiva neglects his divine functions, and the world begins to fall into ruin. The gods, concerned over the world’s imminent destruction, go to the god Vishnu for help. Vishnu then follows behind Shiva and uses his razor-sharp discus to gradually cut away pieces of Sati’s body, until finally there is nothing left. When the body is completely gone, Shiva leaves for the mountains, where he remains absorbed in meditation until it is broken by Kama. Sati is reborn as the goddess Parvati and later remarries Shiva.

The myth connected with the figure of Sati is important for several reasons. First, it provides the charter myth for the Shakti Pithas (“bench of the Goddess”), a network of sites sacred to the Goddess that spreads throughout the subcontinent. Each of these Shakti Pithas—in some lists there are fifty-one, and in others 108—marks the site where a part of Sati’s body fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess. These differing goddesses, spread all over the subcontinent, are thus seen as manifestations of this one primordial goddess, united by the symbolism of the human body. Aside from establishing this network, the myth has several other important messages: It graphically illustrates the supremacy of devotion (in this case, to Shiva) over the older sacrificial cult; it illustrates some of the tensions in the joint family, in which women feel the conflict of loyalty between their natal and their marital homes; and it is the charter myth for the Daksha Mahadev temple in the town of Kankhal, just south of the sacred city of Haridwar, where Daksha’s sacrifice is claimed to have taken place. Satkaryavada
One of the three causal models in Indian philosophy, along with asatkaryavada and anekantavada. All three models seek to explain the relationship between causes and their effects in the everyday world, which has profound implications for religious life. All the philosophical schools assume that if one understands the causal process correctly, and can manipulate it through one’s conscious actions, it is possible to gain final liberation of the soul (moksha). Thus, disagreements over different causal models are not merely academic disputes but are grounded in basically different assumptions about the nature of things. The satkaryavada model assumes that effects preexist in their causes, which can thus be seen as transformations (real or apparent) of those causes. The classic example is the transformation of milk to curds, butter, and clarified butter. According to satkaryavada proponents, each of these effects was already present in the cause, and emerges from it through a natural transformation of that cause.

This causal model tends to reduce the number of causes in the universe, since anything can be seen as a transformation of other things. Given these strong relationships, if one can understand how these relationships work, they can be manipulated to one’s advantage. The disadvantage of this model is that it can lead to fatalism. In a world in which everything occurs through natural transformation, it can seem as if the universe is running under its own power, and that human actions may not be able to influence such strong relationships. The philosophical schools espousing this model are the Samkhya, proponents of Bhedabhada, Ramanuja’s Vishishtadvaita Vedanta, and the various branches of Advaita Vedanta. The first three believe that the difference between cause and effect is a genuine transformation of the cause, whereas the Advaita school stresses that this transformation is only apparent, and that the real source of bondage (and liberation) lies in avidya, the fundamental lack of understanding that causes one to misperceive the nature of things. For further information see Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India’s Philosophies, 1972.

Satkhya
(“discrimination of the real”) Theory of error propounded by Ramanuja, the eleventh century philosopher who was the founder of Vishishtadvaita Vedanta. This theory is also known as yathakhyati (“discrimination [of things] as they are”). All the theories of error aim to explain why people make errors in judgment, the stock example being mistaking the silvery flash of sea shell for a piece of silver. Ramanuja’s analysis is based on the understanding that all things are composed of the five elements, and that the different proportions of the elements account for their differences. The viewer is correct in perceiving the silvery flash, since this is a property shared by both shell and silver. The error comes in supposing that the object is silver—that is, taking the part of the judgment that is true, and making an incorrect assumption based on that. As for some of the other theories, the ultimate reason one “sees” silver and not other silvery things comes from karmic dispositions stemming from avidya, specifically the greed for silver that prompts us to look for such items of value. For further information see Bijayananda Kar, Theories of Error in Indian Philosophy, 1978; Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India’s Philosophies, 1972.

Satsang
(“company of the good”) Quasi-congregational meeting and worship that was particularly emphasized in devotional (bhakti) religious life as a way to associate with fellow devotees (bhakta). The word covers an enormous range of activities and contexts, from an informal gathering for singing and conversation in someone’s home, to highly orchestrated meetings in which a guru may preach to thousands of devotees, and anything in between. In all these cases the importance of satsang lies in the wholesome religious atmosphere generated by the presence of good people, which is believed to create beneficial effects in terms of reinforcing one’s own good qualities and reforming one’s faults.

Sattan
(7th c.) Tamil poet who was the author of the Manimegalai, a text that was clearly written as a sequel to the earlier poem “The Jeweled Anklet” (Shilappadigaram). Sattan’s story focuses on a young woman named Manimegalai, who was wooed by the local prince but eventually became a Buddhist nun. Although the story’s bias clearly favors the Buddhists, the Manimegalai has numerous debates with people from competing religious traditions, thus giving a rounded if somewhat subjective picture of contemporary religious life. See also Tamil epics and Tamil language.

Sattva
(“goodness”) One of the three fundamental qualities (gunas) believed to be present in all things. The other two gunas are rajas (“passion”) and tamas (“darkness”). According to this model, the differing proportions of these qualities account for the differences between the properties of concrete things, and in individual human capacities and tendencies. Of the three, sattva is invariably positive and carries associations with goodness, truth, wholesomeness, health, cognitive thought, and deep-rooted religious life. The notion of these three gunas originated in the metaphysics of the Samkhya school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy. Although much of Samkhya metaphysics connected with the gunas have been long discredited, the idea of the gunas and their qualities has become a pervasive assumption in Indian culture.

Saturday
(Shanivar) The sixth day of the Hindu week, whose presiding planet is Saturn (Shani). Saturn is by far the most feared of all the planets, and Saturday is considered by far the most inauspicious day of the week. In Hindu iconography, Saturn is depicted as a terrifying black figure holding a sword and riding a buffalo; he is also considered easily affronted and extremely thorough in avenging any offenses. Any misfortune Saturn brings will last for fourteen years—a figure doubtless drawn from the fourteen years of Saturn’s orbit.

Hindus counter this danger by avoidance and rites of protection, just as they do on Tuesday, the other day considered to be generally inauspicious. Movements and activities are often widely restricted on Saturday, and certain activities, in particular buying things made from iron (whose black color is associated with Saturn), are avoided except when absolutely necessary. As on Tuesday, people worship protective deities and give as charity (dana) items associated with Saturn: iron, mustard oil, black sesame seed, black cloth, and black lentils. Giving away such items associated with Saturn is believed to transfer any potential inauspiciousness from Saturn to the recipient, providing a way to get rid of one’s bad luck.

Saturn
In Hindu astrology (jyotisha), a strongly malevolent planet associated with obstruction and death. Saturn’s power and malevolent nature make him extremely dangerous, particularly since any misfortune he brings will last for fourteen years—a figure doubtless drawn from the fourteen years of Saturn's orbit. During the week Saturn presides over Saturday, considered by far the most inauspicious day of the week. On this day people refrain from numerous activities and also commonly perform rites of protection, such as giving alms (dana) as a way to give away any potential misfortune.

Satyabham
In Hindu mythology, one of the wives of the god Krishna, when he has assumed his kingly station as the ruler of Dwaraka.

Satyagraha
(“Holding Fast to the Truth”) Organized campaign of nonviolent resistance or non-cooperation as a political tool, a technique best refined by Mohandas K. Gandhi. For Gandhi himself, the basis of this technique was rooted in his commitment to the truth and his conviction that his opponents could be swayed by the power of truth, if it was put before them. Gandhi's satyagraha campaigns would begin by publicly pointing out the injustice in question, in the hope that this alone could lead to the matter being rectified. If nothing was done, a campaign would then begin, but the adversary would always be informed of what was to happen next. The real goal was not to humble the adversary but to persuade the other party to see the rightness of one's position and to accept it. The most important thing of all was to retain one's own commitment to the truth and never to compromise it, even if doing so could gain one some immediate advantage. For Gandhi, in the end the truth was the only thing that mattered, and winning or losing could only be measured insofar as one kept this in perspective.

Satyakama
(“He whose desire is truth”) Legendary figure in the early speculative text Chandogya Upanishad, renowned for his adherence to the truth. Desiring to take initiation as a celibate student (brahmacharin), Satyakama asks his mother about his extended family, so that he can have this information to give his teacher. His mother Jabala replies that she does not know who his father is and tells him to take her name, and call himself Satyakama Jabala. Satyakama, when asked by his teacher Gautama to tell about his family roots, tells the whole story. Impressed by his honesty, Gautama initiates him at once. This story is often cited in modern times, to emphasize the importance of one's actions over one's birth.

Satyanarayan Vrat
Religious observance that may be observed any day of the month but is most commonly performed on the day of the full moon. The presiding deity is Vishnu, worshiped in his form as Satyanarayan (“Lord of Truth”). The rite is believed to destroy evil and to promote the prosperity of its sponsors (those who hire a brahmin to perform the rite), its performers, and even its hearers. The rite's major features involve modification of diet and worship, the two general characteristics of most Hindu religious observances. On the day this rite is performed, the observant must keep a strict fast (upavasa) until the ceremony is over. A pavilion is prepared in which an image of Satyanarayan is installed and worshiped (part of the worship includes reading the rite's charter myth), and after which prasad is given to all those present.

Satyavan
In Hindu mythology, the husband of Savitri, a woman famous both for her devotion to her husband and for her cleverness in outwitting Death to regain her husband after he dies.
Satyavati

In Hindu mythology, the mother of the sage Vyasa. Satyavati is born in an unusual way. Her mother, a celestial nymph who lives as a fish in the Ganges as the result of a curse, one day swallows some semen that has fallen into the Ganges, becomes pregnant, and delivers a son and a daughter. Satyavati grows into a beautiful young woman, but because of her origins she always smells of fish, and because of this is also called Matsyagandhi (“fish-scent”). She works ferrying passengers across the Ganges and one day ferries the sage Parashara, who is struck by her charms. Parashara creates an artificial fog to give the two of them privacy, has sexual relations with her, and grants that from that day onward Satyavati will smell of musk instead of fish. The son born of this union is Vyasa.

Satyavati continues to ply her trade, and one day ferries King Shantanu, who is also struck by her beauty. Before she will marry him she demands that her sons will rule Shantanu's kingdom. Shantanu agrees; and to give her absolute certainty, his son Bhishma takes a vow that he will never marry, so that his line will never compete with hers. Satyavati has two sons: Chitrangada dies in childhood, and Vichitravirya dies after he marries the princesses Ambika and Ambalika but before having any children. In desperation, Satyavati thinks of her first son Vyasa, who conceives a son with each of the wives: Pandu from Ambalika, and Dhrtarashtra from Ambika. The descendants of these two sons are the warring families in the Sanskrit epic Mahabharata, of which Vyasa is famed as the narrator.

Saumya

(“mild”) Term used to refer to the deities in their benevolent, beneficent, and gentle manifestations, as opposed to their terrifying (ghora) manifestations. This distinction is particularly applicable to Shiva and the Goddess, both of whom can appear in either form and whose worship can focus on either aspect.

Saundaryalahari

(“waves of beauty”) Poetic text dedicated to the praise of the Goddess as the supreme power in the universe. The text is traditionally ascribed to the philosopher Shankaracharya, who is also believed to have written other hymns in praise of Hindu gods and goddesses, despite being the greatest exponent of the philosophical school known as Advaita Vedanta, in which the Supreme Reality, called Brahman, is believed to be completely devoid of specific attributes. If Shankaracharya did in fact author these poetic texts, one possible explanation is that Shankaracharya was an intensely religious man and expressed this devotion in various ways. The text has been an enormously influential, particularly in those schools of tantra (a secret, ritually based religious practice) in which the Goddess is considered the single Ultimate Reality.

Savaiya

Syllabic meter in Hindi poetry, composed of four lines of between twenty-two and twenty-six syllables each. Its loose form gives the poet some flexibility, but the challenges of working with such an extended meter place considerable demands on the poet’s skill, making this one of the more “literary” meters.

Savarkar, Vinayak Damodar

(1883–1966) Hindu nationalist leader and thinker whose ideas have had lasting influence. Savarkar spent his entire life opposing British rule, often by violent means. He was also virulently opposed to Muslims, whom he saw as invaders and intruders in the Indian homeland. After being expelled from college for organizing a political rally, he spent four years in London, where he and his compatriots learned bomb-making and planned political assassinations. In 1911 he was sentenced to life imprisonment in the Andaman Islands but was released because of political pressure in 1924, although he was barred from politics until 1937. In the time after that he served for seven years as president of the Hindu Mahasabha, until failing health finally forced him to resign. Throughout his life he had sharp differences with Mohandas Gandhi, first over the latter's commitment to nonviolence and later over the partition of India, which Savarkar characterized as the "vivisection" of the Indian motherland. Savarkar was brought to trial when Gandhi was assassinated by one of his former associates, Nathuram Godse. Savarkar was acquitted, but the accusation had a negative affect on the rest of his life.

Savarkar's keynote work, Hindutva, was composed and committed to memory while he was imprisoned in the Andamans. His central thesis was that the Hindus were a nation, despite all of their differences—social, regional, cultural, linguistic, and religious—because for them India was their motherland, fatherland, and holy land. He called on Hindus to transcend the particular identities that divided them and to gain strength through unity to resist the oppression of outsiders. Savarkar's formulation equates Hinduism and Indian nationalism and thus marginalizes both Muslims and Christians as "outsiders." His ideas profoundly influenced Dr. K. B. Hedgewar, founder of the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS). The RSS and its affiliates have continued to stress some of Savarkar's ideas, which, during the 1990s, have gained a national audience with the rise of the RSS-affiliated Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP). For further information see Lise McKean, Divine Enterprise, 1996; and Christophe Jaffrelot, The Hindu Nationalist Movement in India, 1996.

Savikalpika
("with conceptions") In certain schools of Indian philosophy—among some Buddhists, the Nyayas, and the Prabhakara school of Mimamsa—a term referring to complex conceptual knowledge in which the mind puts together and interprets data from the senses or from memory. Since such knowledge involves the activity of the mind, it is susceptible to error. The opposite sort of knowledge, called nirvikalpaka, nonconceptual awareness, is produced directly by the operation of the senses without any interpretation. According to these schools, if the senses producing this awareness have no defect, such an awareness is true.

Savitri
("generator") Epithet of Surya, the sun, in his aspect as the progenitor and nourisher of all things. This particular name appears in the Gayatri Mantra, a sacred formula whose daily recitation is required of all twice-born men.
According to the dharma literature, a twice-born man was one born into the brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya communities, who was thus eligible for the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” See Surya.

Savitri
In Indian culture, a mythic figure and the model for a virtuous and faithful wife, who by her cleverness is able to rescue her husband Satyavan from the clutches of Death himself. Before Savitri is betrothed to Satyavan, she has been told that he will die within a year. Savitri replies that she has chosen him for her husband and will not be deterred. On the day that he is fated to die, Satyavan goes to the forest to cut wood, accompanied by Savitri. After Satyavan falls unconscious while working, Savitri sees Yama, the god of Death, draw out Satyavan’s soul and start his journey back to the underworld. Savitri follows them. When Yama tells her that she cannot follow where they are going, she meekly replies that it is her wifely duty to follow her husband. Yama grants her some wishes, although she is forbidden to ask for her husband’s life. Savitri first requests that her blind father-in-law shall regain his sight, then that he shall regain the kingdom from which he has been exiled, and finally that she shall have many sons. All of these requests are granted, and when she points out that the return of her husband will be necessary for her to have many sons, Yama acknowledges that he has been outwitted, and leaves the two of them to many happy years together.

Savitri Puja
Religious observance on the new moon in the lunar month of Jyeshth (May–June), celebrating the virtue of Savitri, who rescued her husband Satyavan from the clutches of Yama, the god of Death. This observance is usually kept only by women, to promote the health and longevity of their husbands, and thus ensure them a long married life. As a woman whose entire energies were directed toward the well-being of her family, Savitri is a cultural model for Indian women; her ability to save her husband from death demonstrates her virtue and cleverness as well. Women observing this rite worship Savitri, Satyavan, and Yama; keep a strict fast (upavasa) before the worship; and after worship eat only fruit for the rest of the day.

Sayana
(14th c.) A southern Indian brahmin scholar most famous for his commentaries on the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts. Sayana’s commentary is notable, in part because it is an outstanding scholarly work, but also because this is generally believed to be the first time that the Veda was ever written down, an estimated three thousand years after some of the hymns were composed. Part of Sayana’s commentary was simply explanatory because, in the time since the Vedas had been composed, the meanings of many of the words had been forgotten. Sayana’s text is noted as a careful and credible clarification of the text.

Sculpture
Branch of the visual arts most important in Hindu religion for its use as decoration in architecture and in the construction of images of Hindu deities for worship. Both these sculptural forms were regulated by precisely defined canons. See also shilpa shastra.

Seasons
According to the most traditional enumeration, there are six seasons, each spanning two lunar months: Vasanta (spring) in the lunar months of Chaitra and Baisakh; Grisha (hot season) in Jyeshth and Ashadh; Varsha (rains) in Shravan and Bhadrapada; Sharad (fall) in Ashvin and Kartik; Hemanta (winter) in Margashirsha and Paush; and Shishira (late winter) in Magh and Phalgun. In actual practice, there are three major seasons, at least in northern India: the hot season (April–June), the monsoon (July–September), and the cool season (October–March). All these seasons are approximate, because they are ultimately determined by larger climatic phenomena. In the hot season the sun bakes the northern Indian plains, eventually setting in motion air currents that suck moist air north from the Indian ocean; the resulting monsoons break the heat and provide rain for the crops. The weather then gets gradually cooler until January, when it becomes gradually hotter until the hot season returns. The monsoon arrives at different times in different parts of the country—earlier to regions further south, later to regions further north—and at times the monsoons are sporadic or do not come at all. Each of these three seasons has general correlations with certain festivals.

The hot season is a time of gradually increasing heat, and many of the festivals during this time have associations with heat: Holi, Navaratri, Ram Navami, Shitalashtami, and Ganga Dashahara. Although the rising heat can make life difficult, it is considered a generally auspicious time.

The rainy season is a time of both physical and ritual danger. The sudden influx of rain drives venomous animals such as snakes and scorpions from their holes, and their search for other habitats often brings them into contact with human beings. On a bacteriological level, the runoff from the rains often leads to the contamination of water supplies by sewage and to a sharp rise in sickness and death from gastrointestinal ailments, as well as other infections. On the ritual level, the gods are considered to be sleeping during part of the rainy season and thus less available to protect their devotees (bhakta). At the same time, the coming of the rains is greatly anticipated, and the moisture is essential for crops to grow. Consequently, although this is a time of great fertility and abundance, it is also associated with danger, and some of the festivals are rites of protection: Nag Panchami, Raksha Bandhan, Ganesh Chaturthi, Anant Chaturdashi, and the Pitrpaksha. Other ceremonies are associated with water or with the rains, such as the Shravan festival and Janmashtami.

In the cool season the gods awaken from their sleep, and crops that have been fed by the rains are ready for harvest. This is the most ritually active time of the year, and is generally auspicious. Major festivals include the fall Navaratri, ending with the festival of Dussehra (Vijaya Dashami), Diwali, Karva Chauth, Kartik Purnima, Makara Sankranti, and Shivaratri. The last major festival of the year is Holi, which marks the unofficial beginning of the hot season. In ending with Holi, a festival celebrating license, excess, and the dissolution of all social boundaries, followed by an abrupt reestablishment of propriety and social order, the lunar year thus mirrors the cycle of the cosmos, which is subject to degeneration and periodic renewal.

Seed Syllable
A syllable, or set of syllables, that are believed to have an intimate connection with a deity—either as a way of gaining access to the deity’s power or as the subtlest form of the deity itself. They are seed syllables in that they contain the deity in its briefest form, just as a seed contains the potential for a plant. These seed syllables are called bijaksharas. See bijakshara.

Self-Residence
In Indian logic, one of the fallacies in constructing an argument. Self-residence occurs when the cause and effect are believed to be the same thing. Although the simplest forms of this fallacy are almost never found, since it is so patently unconvincing, one does find extended forms of it, such as reciprocal dependence, vicious circle, and infinite regress.
Self-Revealing Knowledge
In Indian philosophy, the notion that certain things, such as knowledge, are self-revealing and do not need proof or substantiation to be known. Whether such knowledge (or things) exists, and what they would be if they did, was a source of lively disagreement among Indian thinkers. See svaprakasha.

Self-Validating Knowledge
In Indian philosophy, a name denoting a sort of knowledge believed to carry its own stamp of truth, which does not need to be verified by anything outside itself. See svatahpramanya.

Semen
As with all bodily fluids, semen is considered to make a person ritually impure through emission or contact, although it is obviously necessary for procreation, which is an auspicious event. Semen is also considered the concentrated essence of a man's vital energy, distilled drop by drop from his blood; in Hindu mythology the semen from the gods is portrayed as having wondrous generative powers, as in the story of the god Skanda, who spontaneously developed when the god Shiva's semen fell on the ground. Although a married man is obliged to have intercourse with his wife at certain times during her menstrual cycle, this is also seen as a potentially dangerous depletion of his vital energy. Since in Indian culture women are seen as having stronger sex drives than men, men are faced with the constant demand on their resources, which must be carefully husbanded to maintain their vitality. This problem of depletion is particularly pronounced in the unusual case when a man is younger than his wife; for in that case her needs are believed to be far greater than his capacity. Because all seminal emission depletes one's vital forces, there are strict taboos on masturbation, which is seen not only as an abject surrender to one's baser instincts, but as posing actual physical danger.

Sen
(15th c.) Poet and saint of the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered around the worship of the Hindu god Vithoba. According to tradition, Sen was a barber—a very low-caste occupation—at the court of the king of Bidar. Sen renounced this occupation to wander and sing Vithoba's praises. Little is known about him, but he is mentioned as a model of devotion in one of the hymns by the northern Indian poet-saint Ravidas, which indicates that he was well known outside Maharashtra. For traditional hagiography, see Justin Abbott and Narhar R. Godbole, Stories of Indian Saints, 1988.

Sen, Keshub Chander
(d. 1884) Reformist Hindu and leader of the Brahmo Samaj, to which he gave most of his life. His emphases on the ideal of ethical monotheism and rejection of many rituals were heavily influenced by English Unitarianism. In 1865, the Samaj split over Keshub's insistence that members should no longer wear the sacred thread. Then in 1878 Keshub had an inexplicable lapse in principles when he arranged for the marriage of his thirteen year-old daughter. Most of his followers left him in protest, and he spent his remaining years creating what he called the New Dispensation, a new religion using elements drawn from various religious traditions. At his death he had few followers but had been influential through his earlier efforts to reform Hindu society, and to look critically at Christian culture and religion. In his curiosity for religious ideas, he happened to meet the Bengali mystic Ramakrishna, and it was through association with Keshub that Ramakrishna began to attract disciples from Calcutta's middle class, most notably Narendranath Datta, who became famous as Swami Vivekananda.

Sena Dynasty
(11th–13th c.) Eastern Indian dynasty whose ancestral homeland was in the Bengal region but whose territory also... included the western part of the state of Bihar. The Senas were originally vassals of the Pala dynasty but became independent in 1097 and later seized much of the Pala domain in Bihar. The Sena dynasty survived until 1245, when it was finally conquered by the Mamluks, who had been seizing Sena territory since the beginning of that century. The Senas (and their predecessors, the Palas) are particularly noted for a certain type of sculpture in which the images were carved from black chlorite schist that was polished to a mirror finish.

Setubandha
("Building the Bridge") Early medieval poem whose theme is taken from the epic Ramayana and describes Rama's invasion of Lanka by building a bridge across the ocean straits. The poem is written in Prakrit, an umbrella term for the grammatically simpler vernacular languages that developed from Sanskrit through natural linguistic change. The poem has been falsely ascribed to Kalidasa, the greatest Sanskrit poet. The true author is unknown.

Seva
("service") Actions springing from an attitude of loving devotion, manifested as attendance on and service to a deity, religious teacher (guru), or any superior person. The notion of seva is particularly important in the relationship between religious teacher and disciple. The teacher's task is to further the disciple's spiritual development, which may sometimes entail harsh criticism to reform some of the disciple's faults. The ideal disciple will accept such direction in a spirit of self-effacement and carry out the teacher's instructions faithfully and without protest, as a sign of submission and service. Such arrangements are often necessary for spiritual growth, and a teacher can often give a much more objective assessment of the disciple's true spiritual state and what must be done for advancement. Still, when one of the parties is not sincere, this model has great potential for abuse. In such circumstances the teacher's call for obedience and service—in which any "resistance" to the teacher's demands can be cited as a sign of spiritual immaturity—can be a way to take advantage of a devotee (bhakta).

Sevagram
("service village") City in the eastern part of the state of Maharashtra about fifty miles south and west of Nagpur. It is most famous for the ashram established there by Mohandas K. Gandhi in 1933, which was founded to promote his ideal of a decentralized village economy. This economic model had political and cultural symbolism, since it was independent of the industrialized economy run by the British and intended to counterbalance it by providing a model of an economy based on indigenous “Hindu” values.

Seven Sacred Cities

Seven sacred cities (tirthas) spread throughout the Indian subcontinent in which death is traditionally believed to bring final liberation of the soul (moksha). The seven cities are Ayodhya, Mathura, Haridwar, Benares, Kanchipuram, Ujjain, and Dwaraka.

Shabara

In the Purva Mimamsa school of Hindu philosophy Shabara was the author of the earliest and most famous commentary on Jaimini’s Mimamsa Sutras, the school’s founding text. The commentary is called Shabarabhashya. The date of the text is highly uncertain, and estimates range from the first century B.C.E. to the fourth or sixth century C.E. As often happens, later commentators have accepted Shabara's commentary as part of the text itself and commented on it as well as on the original sutras.

Shabarabhashya

(“Shabara’s commentary”) Extensive commentary on the Mimamsa Sutras of Jaimini, the founding text of the Purva Mimamsa school of philosophy. The date of the text is uncertain. It is believed to have been written by Shabara in either the first century B.C.E., or the fourth or sixth century C.E. As often happens, later commentators have accepted Shabara’s commentary as part of the text itself and commented on it as well as on the original sutras.

Shabari

In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, a tribal woman who is a sincere devotee (bhakta) of the god Rama. Shabari belongs to a group known as the Shabaras, and so her name conveys a sense of anonymity, since it is simply the feminine form of the group’s name. Rama and Lakshmana stop for some time at Shabari’s dwelling during their search for Rama’s kidnapped wife Sita. Although as a tribal she has very low social status, Rama graciously receives her hospitality as a reward for the devotion with which it is given. In the Ramcharitmanas, the vernacular retelling of the Ramayana written by the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?), Shabari tastes each fruit before she gives it to Rama, to be sure that he will get only the very sweetest—an act that violates one of the most pervasive ritual taboos barring the exchange of any food that has come into contact with saliva, and particularly from lower to higher status people. Yet in the story Rama eats the fruits very happily because of the love with which they are given. The message in this episode is consistent with a primary theme in the Ramcharitmanas, namely, the power of devotion to override or overturn conventional social norms. Soon after Rama and Lakshmana’s visit, Shabari dies a happy death.

Shabari Malai

Temple and sacred site (tirtha) in the hills of the southern state of Kerala, about seventy miles north of Trivandrum. Shabari Malai is renowned for the temple to Aiyappa, a regional divinity who has been assimilated into the larger pantheon as the son of the gods Vishnu and Shiva; he is born when Vishnu takes the form of the enchantress Mohini. Shabari Malai’s annual month-long pilgrimage occurs from the middle of December to the middle of January, with the exact dates determined by astrological calculations.
This pilgrimage is most often taken by men, since, according to the charter myth, the site is forbidden to women of childbearing age. The pilgrimage itself is a highly structured ritual process. Pilgrims carry out their spiritual training for the journey in well-defined village groups, each headed by a local leader, who supervises their strict religious discipline. Their preparatory vows commence forty-five to sixty days before the actual journey begins, and entail strict celibacy and avoiding the company of women, distinctive dress, a ban on shaving and wearing shoes, a strict vegetarian diet, daily worship, and the erasing of all social and status distinctions among members. In essence, the men training for this pilgrimage live as renunciant ascetics for this period and later revert to their normal identities. The pilgrimage itself is an arduous and exhausting journey over the twisted ridges of the Periyar Hills, during which pilgrims symbolically divest themselves of their egos, to be filled with the grace of God. For a first person account of the Shabari Malai pilgrimage, see E. Valentine Daniel, Fluid Signs, 1984.

Shabda

(“word”) In Indian philosophy, the general term for authoritative testimony. This is generally accepted as one of the pramanas, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge, except by the materialists, who reject all pramanas except perception (pratyaksha). Such authoritative testimony is of two sorts. It most often refers to authoritative scriptural texts, such as the Vedas, but it can also refer to verbal instruction given by one’s guru, which is considered to have equal authority, at least by members of that spiritual lineage. Shabda is an important pramana because it tells people about those things that the other pramanas cannot uncover, such as the nature of the heavens, the course of the soul after death, proper religious life, and so forth. With regard to the liberation of the soul, it is often the most important pramana, since this cannot be discovered in any other way.

Shabdabrahman

(“Brahman-as-sound”) This term refers to the notion that the Supreme Reality (Brahman) exists in its most subtle form, not as matter, but as sound. This idea is particularly prevalent in tantra, a secret, ritually based system of religious practice, and helps to explain the tantric stress on mantra, or sacred sound, as the essential means through which one gains access to this reality. In this understanding, the primary mantra (mula-mantra) of one’s particular deity would be the clearest articulation of shabdabrahman, with other mantras conceived as derivative forms of that primary mantra; these latter mantras were the source for everyday speech and the mundane sounds of ordinary experience.

Shachi

In Hindu mythology, the wife of the god Indra, also known as Indrani. See Indrani.

Shaddarshana

(“six perspectives”) Collective name for the six schools of classical Hindu philosophy. These six were usually grouped in three pairs: Nyaya and Vaisheshika, Samkhya and Yoga, and Purva Mimamsa and Vedanta. See six schools.

Shaiva

Devotee (bhakta) of the Hindu god Shiva, who along with Vishnu is one of the major figures in the Hindu pantheon. From the evidence at hand, it seems that the earliest sectarian Shaivites were the Kapalikas, Kalamukhas, and...
Shaiva Nagas

Pashupatas. All three of these were communities of renunciant ascetics, perhaps to accord with the example set by their patron deity. The information for all three must be reconstructed, since the sects have all disappeared. Shaivas can still be found in ascetic life in the Dashanami Sanyasis and the Nathpanthis, two living ascetic communities. The major current through which Shaiva devotionalism (bhakti) came into mainstream society was through the devotional hymns of the Nayanars, a group of sixty-three poet-saints who lived in southern India in the seventh and eighth centuries. Their passionate devotion, conveyed in hymns in the Tamil language, was later systematized into the southern Indian philosophical school known as Shaiva Siddhanta. As the bhakti movement moved northward, it found Shaiva expression in the Lingayat community in modern Karnataka, as well as the Krama and Trika schools of Kashmiri Shaivism. Shaivism has had a long association with tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice, and the influence of tantra is evident in the Kashmiri schools as well as in the doctrines of the Nathpanthi ascetics.

Shaivism does not show the bewildering sectarian variety characterizing Vaishnavas, devotees of the god Vishnu, and Shaivites tend to be less strict about membership in a particular sect. Nevertheless, Shiva has millions of devotees in modern India, and a well-established network of pilgrimage places (tirtha), particularly in the Himalayas.

Shaiva Siddhanta

Southern Indian religious community that was particularly developed in the Tamil country, and whose members are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. Shaiva Siddhanta is based on a series of fourteen texts, all completed by the fourteenth century C.E., in which the ideas about Shiva found in Sanskrit texts were reinterpreted in light of the devotional faith of the Nayanars. The Nayanars were a group of sixty-three poet-saints who lived in southern India in the seventh and eighth centuries. The most famous and influential of these interpreters was the ninth-century poet Manikkavachakar. Central to Shaiva Siddhanta is the triad of Shiva as the “Lord” (pati), human souls held in bondage (pashu), and the “bonds” (pasha) holding these souls. Shiva is conceived as the supreme divinity, who wields the bonds of maya, or illusion, to keep souls in bondage. Yet he is also pictured as gracious and loving to his devotees, a far cry from the capricious and somewhat dangerous figure in his earliest mythology. As the supreme lord, Shiva is the source of all spiritual illumination and energy, and also the power through which the world is created, sustained, and reabsorbed again. Souls are conceived as different from Shiva, since they are the Nagas’ primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests. Such resources allowed many Naga leaders to become rich and powerful men despite often coming from lower social strata, and in earlier times such opportunities would have made a career as a Naga an attractive proposition for an ambitious young man. Both these sources of income have largely disappeared in contemporary times, although some Naga communities are still landowners with extensive properties and thus both rich and influential. See also shaiva.

Shaiva Nagas

Naga (“naked,” i.e., fighting) ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, organized into different akharas or regiments on the model of an army. The other major Naga division was the Bairagi Nagas, who were devotees of the god Vishnu. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century subject to imperfections, although here too his power is their ultimate source. The only path to liberation is devotion to Shiva, through whose grace the bonds of maya can be broken or transcended. Even after liberation souls remain distinct from Shiva, although they remain in his presence. For further information see M. Dhavamony, Love of God According to Saiva Siddhanta, 1971. See also shaiva and Tamil Nadu.

Shakha ("Teak") Dvipa
In traditional mythic geography, the sixth of the seven concentric landmasses (dvipas) making up the visible world. See also cosmology.

Shaka Era
One of the dating systems in India, which is claimed to mark the defeat of the Shakas by King Salivahana. For any given year in the common era, the Shaka era date is either seventy-eight or seventy-nine years earlier, a discrepancy that stems from the differing days on which the years begin in these two systems. In the common era the year begins on January 1, but in the Shaka era it begins with the sun's transition into Aries, determined in India as falling on April 14. Hence, to convert a Shaka era date to a common era date, one adds seventy-nine years for dates from January 1 to April 14, and seventy-eight years for dates from April 15 to December 31.

Shakata
("cart") One of the demon assassins sent by Kamsa, the demon-king of Mathura, to kill his nephew, the child-god Krishna. Shakata takes the form of a cart, intending to take the infant Krishna unaware. Yet Krishna is not fooled by this deception: With a kick of his infant toes Krishna launches the cart into flight, killing the demon with the force of the blow.

Shakha
("branch") The name given to a local "branch" of the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), whose membership is often drawn from a particular neighborhood or section of a city. The RSS is a conservative Hindu organization whose express purpose is to provide the leadership cadre for a revitalized Hindu India. The RSS has historically characterized itself as a cultural and character-building organization, and for much of its existence has shunned direct political involvement, although it has exercised considerable influence through its many affiliated organizations. Each shakha, or local RSS unit, holds a daily meeting for its members, who are known as svayamsevaks ("volunteers"). The meeting's typical activities include an opening ceremony in which the organization's saffron banner is raised; traditional games or exercises, including martial drill, and a discussion period in which RSS ideals can be disseminated and propagated. The shakhas in any given area are overseen by a full-time RSS worker known as a pracharak ("director"), who serves as a liaison between the local units and the RSS leadership, and who oversees RSS activity in his area. Most of the shakha's members will never advance beyond this local level, and those who do are usually gifted leaders. Thus, the primary stress at the shakha level is on forming personal relationships with other members, as a way to develop loyalty to the organization. Although the shakhas often have very high attrition, the bonds developed there are often very strong as well and are particularly beneficial in helping displaced and newly urbanized people develop a sense of community. For further information see Walter K. Andersen and Shridhar D. Damle, The Brotherhood in Saffron, 1987.
Shakra
An epithet of the god Indra. See Indra.

Shakta
Worshiper of the Goddess in any of her myriad forms. The name itself is derived from shakti, the divine feminine “power” that gives the Goddess her vitality. Among the most famous forms of the Goddess are Durga and Kali, who are both powerful and dangerous goddesses. Aside from these, there are a host of other goddesses, who are often the presiding deities of a particular place. See also Lakshmi, Nirriti, Parvati, Prithvi, Sati, Shiwalik goddesses, and Ushas.

Shakti
(“power”) In Hindu iconography, the name of the spear carried by the god Skanda. The spear’s head is shaped either like a leaf or a diamond, and it is fitted with a wooden shaft.

Shakti
(2) Epithet of the Goddess. Shakti is believed to be a divine feminine power that is present in each person as the kundalini. See also Goddess and kundalini.

Shakti Pithas
(“benches” or “seats” of Shakti) General term for a network of sites connected with the worship of the Mother Goddess. Although their number differs from source to source—some list fifty-one, and others 108—in both cases the sites are spread throughout the subcontinent, from Baluchistan (in modern Pakistan) to Assam to the deep south. According to the charter myth, each of these places marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess; in the case of Shakumbhari Devi, the body part is said to have been Sati’s head. The temple is in a thinly settled region, and the major time of year that pilgrims come to visit is during the Navaratri festivals.

Shakumbhari Devi
Presiding deity of the Shakumbhari Devi temple in the district of Saharanpur in Uttar Pradesh, and one of the nine Shiwalik goddesses. This site is one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the Goddess that spreads throughout the subcontinent. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess; in the case of Shakumbhari Devi, the body part is said to have been Sati’s head. The temple is in a thinly settled region, and the major time of year that pilgrims come to visit is during the Navaratri festivals.

Although Hindi literature identifies Shakumbhari Devi as a form of Durga, the site’s charter myth shows the nurturing capacities of the Goddess as well as the warrior aspect more commonly associated with Durga. According to the story, a demon named Durgam gains the boon that he cannot be conquered by any of the gods. After subduing all the gods, Durgam prevents the storm-god Indra from sending rain to the earth for one hundred years. Seeing the earth’s distress, the gods approach the Goddess and beg for her help. The Goddess, as differing manifestations of a single primordial Goddess. It also connects the subcontinent into a single conceptual unit, knit together by this network of sites as the body is connected by its members. One should also note that different places may claim the same body part in the drive to enhance the religious prestige of any particular site. As but one example, according to most “official” lists Sati’s vulva, the most powerfully charged part of the female body, fell at the temple of Kamakhya in Assam, but the same claim is made at Kalimath in the Himalayas. Suffice it to say that there is no single authoritative list of sites, and competing claims are not unusual. See also pitha.
filled with pity, takes a form with one hundred eyes, because of which one of her epithets is Shatakshi (“hundred eyes”). From each eye comes a stream of tears, and when these fall to the earth, plants begin to grow again. Further, when her tears do not reach some places, she puts forth vegetables (Shak) from her own body to nourish the creatures of the earth. Her final action is to kill the demon Durgam, reasserting the Goddess as a strong and protective figure. Although there is little information on Shakumbhari Devi in English, there are further references to her in David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986. See also pitha.

Shakuntala

A figure in Hindu mythology and the protagonist in the drama Abhijnana-shakuntala written by the poet Kalidasa. Shakuntala is the daughter of the apsara Menaka and the sage Vishvamitra, conceived when Menaka is sent to seduce Vishvamitra in an attempt to reduce his spiritual powers. Shakuntala is raised at the ashram of the sage Kanva, where she grows into a beautiful young woman. One day she attracts the eye of King Dushyanta, who has been hunting in the forest, and they are married by the gandharva form of marriage (consensual sexual intercourse), conceiving their son Bharata. Shakuntala’s happiness, however, is short-lived. As she is thinking one day about Dushyanta, who has traveled back to his capital without her, she fails to notice the arrival of the sage Durvasas. In his anger at being ignored, Durvasas lays a curse that her beloved will completely forget her. Shakuntala, horrified, manages to convince Durvasas to modify the curse: Dushyanta will remember everything, as soon as Shakuntala shows him proof of their union. Shakuntala has Dushyanta’s signet ring as proof, but she loses it on her way to see Dushyanta. Dushyanta (as expected) denies that he has ever met Shakuntala, and she eventually ends up working as one of the palace cooks. Her salvation comes unexpectedly, when she finds the missing ring in the belly of a fish she is preparing for the king’s dinner. When she shows him the ring, Dushyanta immediately recognizes Shakuntala and acknowledges her as his wife, and the couple live happily ever after.
Shalagram
Black stone containing an ammonite, the spiral-shaped fossil shell of a prehistoric sea creature. The shalagram is primarily found in the upper reaches of the Gandaki River in Nepal. The circular ammonite fossil is understood to be Vishnu's chakra, and the shalagram is thus understood as a “self-manifest” (svayambhu) form of Vishnu. As with all such “self-manifest” forms, the shalagram is believed to be especially holy, since in it Vishnu has chosen to reveal himself to his devotees (bhakta) rather than coming to an image fashioned by human hands. Because of its holiness, the shalagram is often an object of worship. Its portability (and durability) made it the preferred form of Vishnu for wandering Vaishnava ascetics. One also finds cases in which small images are claimed to have been revealed when a shalagram was broken open; these images carry the glamour of a finished image as well as the divine power that accompanies spontaneous manifestation.

Shamvuka
Shudra ascetic who appears both in the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, and in the poet Kalidasa's Raghuvamsha, whose story line is based on the Ramayana. According to the story a brahmin comes to Rama, the epic's protagonist, and complains that his son has died because of the unrighteousness running through the land. Since the king is considered responsible for the general moral climate in his kingdom, Rama immediately asks the brahmin for more information. He is told that a man named Shamvuka has been doing physical asceticism (tapas) in a bid to generate spiritual powers through his suffering, even though Shamvuka is a member of the servant (shudra) class, and these sorts of religious exercises are forbidden to people of such low social status. Rama finds Shamvuka hanging his head downward over a smoking fire, and when he refuses to desist from his ascetic practices, Rama kills him. This episode conveys several important messages. One of these is the Indian cultural belief that physical suffering generates spiritual and/or magic powers. When this belief is combined with a profoundly hierarchical model of society, it becomes important for the higher-class people to control the people who are allowed to do this, lest the lower classes gain power over their “betters.” Finally, this story shows the Ramayana's general tendency to uphold established social values and boundaries.

Shankara
("auspicious") Epithet of the god Shiva. With the honorific suffix acharya ("teacher"), this is also the name of the most significant figure in the Advaita Vedanta philosophical school, Shankaracharya, who is popularly considered to be Shiva incarnate. As noted above, the generally accepted meaning of the name Shankara has intensely positive connotations, yet the verb shank, from which this name is almost certainly derived, has associations with doubt, uncertainty, and anxiety. This sort of ambivalence has a long association with Shiva; the earliest accepted reference, in the Shvetashvatara Upanishad, mentions both his death-dealing arrows, and his kindness to his devotees (bhakta). The traditional meaning of this name may thus be a form of propitiation—knowing that Shiva wields awesome and unpredictable power but describing him as “auspicious” in the hope that he will show his kinder side.

Shankaracharya

(788–820?) Writer and religious thinker who is unquestionably the most significant figure in the Advaita Vedanta philosophical school, and arguably the single greatest Hindu religious figure. Very little is known about his life—even his dates are a matter of speculation—but popular tales abound. According to one story, he was the god Shiva incarnate, who descended to earth to reveal the knowledge of the absolute. This connection is shown by his name—Shankara is one of the epithets of Shiva, and acharya (“teacher”) is an honorific suffix. He is traditionally believed to have been born in a Nambudiri brahmin family at Kaladi in the state of Kerala, to have become an ascetic at a very young age, and to have traveled widely engaging in religious disputes, particularly with the Buddhists, whose religious influence he put in permanent decline. He is believed to have established the ten Dashanami Sanyasi orders and the four maths that are their centers, to have written commentaries on the three texts central to the Vedanta school—namely the Upanishads, the Vedanta Sutras, and the Bhagavad Gita—and to have gone finally to the high Himalayas, where he died at the age of 32.

Many of these claims cannot be substantiated, but the significance of his work cannot be denied. His commentary on the Vedanta Sutras, the Brahmansutra Bhashya, gives the classic formulation of Advaita Vedanta, with its emphasis that the Ultimate Reality is the unqualified (nirguna) Brahman, which is eternal and unchanging, and to which the human soul is identical. The changing phenomenal world (the world we see and sense) is an illusion, created through the superimposition (adhyasa) of mistaken ideas upon the unqualified Brahman. Since Shankaracharya believes that one is released from bondage by replacing this mistaken understanding with the correct one, insight and not action is the means to liberation. This moment of understanding can be described as a flash of realization, but it seems mistaken to characterize Shankaracharya as a mystic. This is because he strongly emphasizes the authority of the sacred texts as a source of accurate knowledge about the ultimate truth. Although this stress on insight devalues the ultimate worth of ritual action, except in a preparatory role by removing defilements, Shankaracharya also believed that required ritual actions should be performed from a sense of duty.

Shankaracharya is as philosophically significant for his silence as for his speech. He gives no definitive answer on many philosophical issues: about whether selves are one or many, about whether the locus of ignorance (avidya) was Brahman or the individual, about the nature of ignorance itself, and about the real nature of the material world. His refusal to take a position on these issues left many different routes open to those who came after him. Shankaracharya himself tended to emphasize epistemological issues—how human beings come to know things, and particularly how to correct the mistaken ideas through which human beings are held in bondage. The image that comes through his writing is of a deeply religious man whose primary concern was to help his hearers destroy their illusions and gain final liberation of the soul (moksha). Given this underlying goal and his acute philosophical mind, one can argue that he was aware of such metaphysical questions but chose to ignore them, since they were unrelated to his primary goal. For further information on Shankaracharya's thought, see Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957; and Karl H. Potter (ed.), Advaita Vedanta up to Samkara and His Pupils, 1981.

Shankaracharyas

The philosopher Shankaracharya (788–820) is traditionally said to have established centers for the Dashanami Sanyasi ascetics, devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, at four places in India: Badrinath, Puri, Shringeri, and Dwaraka. The head monk at each of these centers has been given the title Shankaracharya, as a sign of the status of his office. The head of the Kamakotipith, an ascetic center in the southern Indian city of Kanchipuram, has also come to be described as a Shankaracharya, even though this site is not one of the original four; this reflects the Kamakotipith's importance as an ascetic center and Kanchipuram's general status as a religious center. Although by this reckoning there are five places, at present there are only four Shankaracharyas, since Swami Swaroopanand Saraswati holds the seat for both Badrinath and Dwaraka. The other Shankaracharyas are Swami Nishchalanand (Puri), Swami Bharati Tirtha (Shringeri), and Swami Jayendra Saraswati (Kanchipuram). Their traditional office gives the Shankaracharyas a great deal of religious status and prestige, and because of this they have become highly influential figures, even in an intensely decentralized religious tradition.

Shankaradigvijaya

(“Shankara’s victory tour”) A written account of the life of the philosopher Shankaracharya traditionally attributed to the fourteenth-century writer Madhavacharya, although evidence within the work points to composition several centuries later. The story is clearly hagiographical, for it is filled with fantastic legends intended to highlight Shankaracharya’s achievements and his ultimate identity with the god Shiva himself. According to this story, after gaining full wisdom, Shankaracharya embarks on a “victory tour” (digvijaya) of India. During this tour he travels throughout the country, debates all opponents, and defeats them all convincingly, thus establishing the supremacy of his Advaita Vedanta philosophical school. The motif of the digvijaya (literally, “conquest of [all] directions”) was a common theme in works about political and military leaders, and here it has been adapted to tell a religious story.

Shankha

(“conch shell”) In Hindu religious imagery, one of the identifying objects always carried by the god Vishnu, along with the club (gada), lotus (padma), and discus (chakra). Vishnu’s conch is considered both a musical instrument and an instrument of war, since through its powerful sound he is said to have struck terror in the hearts of his enemies. The conch is also commonly carried by certain powerful forms of the Goddess. The reason for this can be found in her charter myth, in which she is formed from the collected radiance of all the gods and receives duplicates of all their weapons.

Shanta (“peaceful”) Bhava
The first of the five modes of devotion to God that were most prominently articulated by Rupa Goswami, a devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna and a follower of the Bengali saint Chaitanya. Rupa used five different models of human relationships to explain the variety of links followers might have with the deities. These five models showed growing emotional intensity, from the peaceful (shanta) sense that comes from realizing one's complete identity with Brahman, or Supreme Reality, to conceiving of god as one's master, friend, child, or lover. The shanta bhava, in which one finds mental peace through the realization of complete identity with Brahman, is the only one of these modes in which the devotee does not have a personalized relationship with God. Given Rupa's assumption that Krishna was the highest manifestation of godhead, and that true religious life involved having a relationship with him, the shanta bhava was thus judged inferior to the other four modes.

Shantanu
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Sanskrit epics, Shantanu is the father of Bhishma by his first wife, and the husband of Satyavati in his second marriage. Satyavati has agreed to marry Shantanu on the condition that her sons reign, despite the fact that Bhishma is the eldest and thus is rightly entitled to the throne. Shantanu agrees to this condition, and to please his father Bhishma vows never to marry, so that he will have no heirs to compete with Satyavati's. Bhishma upholds his promise until his death, but Shantanu's willingness to put aside the rightful heir has terrible consequences. When Satyavati's son Vichitravirya dies childless, she calls on her elder son Vyasa to sire children by his wives. From this union comes Pandu and Dhrutarashtra. The struggle for royal power by their respective sons culminates in the Mahabharata war, in which the family is destroyed.

Shantiniketan
(“abode of peace”) Town in the Birbhum district of West Bengal, about ninety miles northeast of Calcutta. It is most famous for Vishva-Bharati University, founded in 1921 by the Indian poet and Nobel laureate Rabindranath Tagore (1861–1941). As an educational institution, the university was dedicated to providing an education that would satisfy people's material and spiritual needs and thus develop an integrated human being. It did this in part by promoting the arts and by stressing the interconnection between nature and human beings, both themes that were close to Tagore's heart.

Sharada Math
One of the four maths or sacred centers for Hindu ascetics (often translated as “monasteries”) traditionally believed to have been established by the great philosopher Shankaracharya; the others are the Jyotir Math, Shringeri Math, and Govardhan Math. These four sacred centers are each associated with one of the four geographical corners of the Indian subcontinent; the Sharada Math is in the western quarter, in the city of Dwaraka in the state of Gujarat, on the shore of the Arabian Sea. Shankaracharya is traditionally cited as the founder of the Dashanami Sanyasis, the most prestigious Hindu ascetic order. The Dashanami (“ten names”) ascetics are devotees (bhakta) of the god
Shiva who are divided into ten divisions, each with a different name. These ten divisions are organized into four larger organizational groups—Anandawara, Bhogawara, Bhuriwara, and Kitawara—each of which has two or three of the ten divisions and is associated with one of the four maths. Of these, the Sharada Math is associated with the Kitawara group.

Sharva
(from shara, “arrow”) Epithet of the god Shiva. In his earliest description in the Shvetashvatara Upanishad, the god Rudra (later identified with Shiva) is identified as a god whose primary weapons are infallible arrows. This characterization of Shiva as an archer has continued ever since; his bow Pinaka is one of few divine weapons famous enough to have a name. See Shiva.

Shastra
(“order”) A shastra is the name given to a technical treatise explaining the standards of a particular cultural or artistic discipline in Hinduism, as in Bharata’s Natya-shastra, a technical manual that discusses dance and the theater. When it is placed at the end of a compound (as in “Shilpa Shastra”), the word shastra can also serve to denote the whole body of teaching on that particular subject. All of the classical arts were placed under well-defined canons, each with its own specific rules and standards to guide artists: Sculpture and architecture were under Shilpa Shastra, music under Sangita shastra, and dance and theater under Natya shastra. Given the prevailing emphasis on upholding such strict rules, artistic genius meant doing something unusual within the larger confines of the tradition rather than creating something entirely new or original.

Shastri Narayanswarupdas Swami
The ascetic name of the spiritual leader of the Akshar Purushottam Samstha, a branch of the Swaminarayan religious community. He is more commonly known by his title Pramukh Swami (“President Swami”). See Pramukh Swami.

Shatakstrayam
(“The Three Hundred”) Collection of Sanskrit poems ascribed to the poet-philosopher Bhartrhari, who is believed to have lived in the fifth century. The text is a three-part collection of poems about political life, love, and renunciation, which explore all of the conventional ends of life: The first two sections are about power (artha), sensual or physical desire (kama), and righteous action (dharma), whereas the final section is concerned with liberation of the soul (moksha). Much of the poetry carries a cynical, slightly bitter tone, suggesting the world-weariness of a man who has seen too much of the harsh realities of life. For further information see Barbara Stoller Miller (trans.), The Hermit and the Love-Thief, 1978.

Shatakshi
(“[having] one hundred eyes”) Epithet of the goddess Shakumbhari Devi, based on a story that tells of a time when the earth is parched with drought, and she takes a form with a hundred eyes, watering the earth with her tears. See Shakumbhari Devi.

Shatapatha
(“Hundred-Path”) Brahmana
One of the two most important texts in the Brahmana branch of sacred Vedic literature, along with the Aiteraya Brahmana. The Brahmanas were primarily manuals describing the correct performance of Vedic ritual sacrifices. Each Brahmana was in theory connected with one of the Vedas, which gave them Vedic authority, but in fact they were quite different from the Vedas in scope and content. According to tradition, the Shatapatha Brahmana was connected with the “white” recension of the Yajur Veda, a variant form of the text in which the explanatory notes connected with the Vedic mantras have been collected into a separate appendix. This is in contrast with the “Black” Yajur Veda, in which these notes have been incorporated into the body of the text itself. Aside from giving instruction on the practice of rituals, the Shatapatha Brahmaṇa includes a wide variety of texts, one of which is the Isha Upanishad. The upanishad’s presence in a Brahmaṇa text clearly shows that there was considerable overlap in the times of composition of various Vedic literary styles, rather than clear-cut “periods.”

Shatrughna

(“Foe-slayer”) In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Shatrughna is the second son of King Dasharatha and his wife Sumitra, and the youngest brother of Rama, the epic’s protagonist. Whereas Rama’s brothers Lakshmana and Bharata play important roles in the epic—the former as Rama’s minion and shadow, the latter serving as Rama’s regent during his exile—Shatrughna is virtually invisible and does not play an important part in the larger epic narrative.

Shattila Ekadashi

Religious observance falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Magh (January–February). As with all the eleventh-day observances, this is dedicated to the worship of the god Vishnu. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, which usually involve fasting (upavasa) and worship and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. On this day one should bathe an image of Vishnu with the five auspicious things (milk, curds, honey, ghee, and sugar water), placing some sesame seed (tila) into each. One should also eat food containing sesame seed. During the night one should sleep before the image of the deity. This ekadashi’s name comes from the six (sat) ways in which the sesame seed has been used. Faithfully observing this festival is said to cause one to be reborn in Vishnu’s realm, Vaikuntha.

Shaving

An act of ritual purification as well as an act of hygiene. The hair of the head and face is believed to trap impurity (ashaucha), and shaving one or both is a significant part of many rites of purification. Body hair, however, is rarely shaved, since the Sanskrit language has different words for these two types of hair, and they are considered to be different things entirely. During the period of impurity associated with death (maranashaucha) the mourners will not shave for the entire ten days, signifying their continuing impurity, but at the end of that period they will shave completely to signify their final purification. Hindu men will sometimes also refrain from shaving as a sign of austerity while they are keeping religious vows, and shave when the vow has been completed. One example occurs during the lunar month of Shravan, in which men who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva will often refrain from shaving. Another example can be found in the ritual preparation for the annual pilgrimage to Shabari Malai; men must keep a strict ascetic discipline for forty-one days before the pilgrimage, in which one element is a ban on shaving.

Shesha
("remnant") Mythical thousand-headed serpent upon which the god Vishnu reclines, as on a couch; Shesha is also considered to support the various regions of the earth, particularly the underworlds. His name comes from the fact that he is considered a partial incarnation of Vishnu and is thus related to Vishnu, both as incarnation and through his status as Vishnu's couch. As with most of the gods' animal associates, Shesha does not play a prominent role in his own right. The one mythic episode in which he does play an important part is that of churning the Ocean of Milk in which Shesha serves as the churning-rope to turn Mount Mandara, with all the gods pulling from one side, and the demons pulling from the other. Yet here too he is only instrumental, necessary for the episode to unfold but with the main focus lying elsewhere. Shesha is seen as having a protective role. In Hindu astrology (jyotisha) he is identified as the protective deity for the fifth day of each half of the lunar month. See also Tortoise avatar.

Shibi
In Hindu mythology, sage-king who is famous for his virtue and commitment to his word. Shibi's reputation reaches the ears of the gods, who decide to test it. The god Dharma, who is righteousness personified (or in some other versions, the god Agni) takes the form of a dove, and is pursued by the god Indra, in the form of a hawk. The dove flies into Shibi's lap and entreats him for asylum, which Shibi grants. The hawk observes that it is inappropriate for Shibi to deprive him of the food he needs to eat, and demands in exchange an equal weight of flesh cut from Shibi's body. Shibi agrees, but no matter how much of his flesh he throws into the balance, the dove is still heavier. Finally Shibi sits his whole body into the balance, as a sign that he will sacrifice his life for the dove. At this point the gods resume their divine forms and bless Shibi for his steadfastness.

Shikhandi
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, the rebirth of the maiden Amba, daughter of the king of Kashi. Amba and her sisters have been kidnapped by Bhishma to be married to his nephew Vichitravirya, but when she informs Bhishma that her heart already belongs to King Salva, Bhishma gallantly releases her. Yet Salva refuses to marry her, for since she has been kidnapped he is not certain of her virginity. Amba then returns to Bhishma, who refuses to marry her because of his vow to remain a lifelong bachelor. In her anger Amba swears to get revenge on Bhishma and performs harsh physical asceticism (tapas) to generate the spiritual powers necessary to do this. Her austerities eventually please the god Shiva, who promises her that she will be rewarded in her next birth. Amba then raises a pyre and burns herself to death.

Amba is reborn as Shikhandi to King Drupada, whose wife has received a boon that she will give birth to a girl, but that the girl will later be transformed into a boy. When Shikhandi is born, it is announced that the child is a boy and the child is given the training appropriate for a prince. It is only upon fixing a marriage for Shikhandi that the issue of the child’s gender comes up and it is finally resolved when Shikhandi exchanges sexes with a nature spirit (yaksha) named Sthunakarna, who becomes a woman, and Shikhandi a man. The switch is originally intended to be for only a short period, but is later extended until Shikhandi’s death, at which time Sthunakarna again becomes male.

During the Mahabharata war Shikhandi challenges Bhishma in battle but the latter refuses to fight him, since Shikhandi has been born a woman. Shikhandi takes advantage of this gallantry to shoot a barrage of arrows at Bhishma, as does the warrior Arjuna, who hides behind Shikhandi for protection. With this assault, Bhishma finally decides that the time has come for him to give up the fight and die. In the battle that follows after Bhishma falls, Shikhandi is killed by Ashvatthama, the son of Drona, who fights on the side of the Kauravas in the war. Based on Shikhandi’s role in shielding Arjuna from harm, in modern Hindi the name Shikhandi is used to designate a scapegoat, someone behind whom another person hides and escapes blame.

Shikhar

Temple tower that was the central feature of the Nagar architectural style, prevalent in northern and eastern India. The temple’s tallest tower was always directly over the image of the temple’s primary deity, although there were often also smaller, subsidiary towers to lead the eye up to that primary one. Within this general pattern there are two important variations, exemplified by the temples at Khajuraho and Orissa. In the Khajuraho style a group of shikharas is unified into one continuous upward swell, which draws the eye upward like a series of hills leading to a distant peak. In contrast, the Orissan style tends to emphasize the differences between the temple’s parts, with a low entrance hall (jagamohan) next to a beehive-shaped temple tower (deul), which is often three or four times taller than the entrance hall.

Shiksha

(“learning”) One of the six Vedangas. These were the supplemental branches of knowledge connected with the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts, and all the Vedangas were associated with the use of the Vedas. Shiksha was concerned with articulation, proper pronunciation, and the laws of euphonic combination (sandhi), that is, sounds combined in a certain way to have a pleasant effect. Although this may sound trivial, it was a central concern in the cult of sacrifice laid out in the Brahma literature. This was because the power of these sacrifices was believed to depend on the proper delivery of the Vedic mantras, with any mistake being potentially ruinous. Aside from shiksha, the other Vedangas are vyakaran (Sanskrit grammar), chandas (Sanskrit prosody), kalpa (ritual instructions), nirukta (etymology), and jyotisha (favorable times for sacrifices).
Shilappadigaram
("the Jeweled Anklet") The greatest epic poem in classical Tamil literature. It is traditionally ascribed to the poet Ilangovadigal (2nd c.) but almost certainly was written several centuries later. The poem is a symbolic theater for several important themes that have pervaded Hindu culture, particularly the need for a king to rule righteously and the power gained by a wife through her devotion to her husband. The story tells the tale of a married couple, Kannaki and her husband Kovalan. In his infatuation with a dancer, Kovalan squanders the family’s wealth, selling nearly all their possessions. When he finally returns to his wife, their only remaining valuables are one pair of her jeweled anklets. The couple decides to travel to the town of Madurai to sell the anklets, and use the proceeds to reestablish their family as traders.

When they reach Madurai, however, tragedy strikes. The night before the couple’s arrival, a dishonest jeweler has stolen an identical pair of anklets from the queen of Madurai, and when Kovalan goes to sell the anklets, the same jeweler accuses him of being the thief. Kovalan is executed, and when Kannaki hears of this she comes into the city, bearing the other anklet as a sign of his innocence. She gains an audience with the king, who falls dead with remorse when he realizes the disaster he has caused. Still furious, Kannaki rips off her left breast, pronounces a curse on the city, and hurls the breast onto the street; the breast bursts into flames that consume the city. In the end, Madurai’s patron goddess persuades Kannaki to withdraw her curse, and Kannaki dies a few days later.

One of the forces assumed to be operating here is the power of a woman’s devotion to her husband. Even though Kovalan squanders all their money through unfaithfulness, Kannaki readily takes him back when he returns, and is willing to give up her last resource to help him. The power of her devotion gives her the ability to cause widespread destruction through a single curse, and the strength of this power is still an article of faith among many Hindus even today. For further discussion of the themes in this play, and more general consideration of images of Hindu women, see Sarah Mitter, Dharma’s Daughters, 1991. See also Tamil language and Tamil epics.

Shilpa Shastra
General name for rules and standards governing the mechanical arts and handicrafts—traditionally numbered at sixty-four—through which anything was... formed, made, or fashioned. In the context of art and architecture, the term shilpa shastra is most often associated with two specific areas, which by the medieval era had had their conventions strictly fixed. One of these governed the creation of sculptural images, according to which the images of the deities had to be carved to exactly defined proportions, along with their identifying attributes. The other area was in regard to buildings, whether individual structures such as temples, or collections of buildings in city planning. The layout of temples was modeled after the human body (and thus mirrored the sculptor’s precision regarding the images of the divine); entire towns were similarly modeled to create a harmonious urban environment.

Shipra River
A distant tributary of the Yamuna River, which has its headwaters in the Vindhya Mountains in Madhya Pradesh. The Shipra is considered a holy river because it flows through Ujjain, a central Indian city with great religious and historical significance.

Shirdi
Small town in the state of Maharashtra, about 120 miles northeast of Bombay. It is famous as the home of the modern saint Shirdi Sai Baba, who appeared there as an adolescent boy in 1872 and lived there until his death in 1918. He was greatly esteemed by people from all religious communities, and the shrine built in the place in which he lived receives considerable traffic even today.

Shirdi Sai Baba
(d. 1918) Hindu ascetic and religious teacher whose disciples came from many different religious communities—Hindu, Muslim, Parsi, and Christian. His origins are mysterious, for in 1872 he simply appeared in the town of Shirdi in Maharashtra, as a boy of about sixteen. He was dressed in the manner of a Muslim faqir (religious mendicant, or beggar), but claimed to have forgotten his birthplace and his family. Because of his dress a local priest forbade him from staying at a Hindu temple, so he moved into a small, unused mosque, where he lived for the rest of his life. He kept a perpetual fire burning in a fire pit, and for religious rituals performed both Muslim prayers and Hindu worship. He was most famous for his supernatural powers: healing (for which he often gave people ash from his fire pit to eat), foretelling the future, multilocation (the ability to be in two places at the same time), and appearing in dreams to guide his followers. His response to people’s immediate needs made him famous through much of India, but he always maintained that his purpose in performing miracles was to attract people to spiritual life. He gradually attracted disciples, and in the time since his death the town of Shirdi has become an important regional pilgrimage place (tithra). Although he referred to himself as Sai Baba, he is now usually called Shirdi Sai Baba, to distinguish him from Sathya Sai Baba, another religious leader who claims to be Shirdi Sai Baba’s reincarnated form.

Shishtachara
The “practice of learned [people],” which was one of the traditional sources for determining religious duty (dharma) for matters not discussed in the dharma literature, or for cases in which the literature itself gave conflicting opinions. Although Shishtachara was the least authoritative source of dharma, after the Vedic scriptures and the dharma literature, making it an authority recognizes that life has many ambiguities and uncertainties and at the same time provides a resource for determining the appropriate action by taking as a model the practice of established and knowledgeable people. Another term to designate this sort of authority was sadachara, the “practice of good [people].”
Shishupala
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Shishupala is the son of the king of Cedi. He is also described as a reincarnation of Jaya—one of the gatekeepers of the god Vishnu’s heavenly dwelling, Vaikuntha—who has been cursed by the sages to be born three times as a demon and killed by the god Vishnu each time. Shishupala is born with three eyes and four hands, but as his horrified parents are about to abandon him, a celestial voice informs them that the child will grow up into a powerful king. The heavenly voice also says that Shishupala can be killed by only one person on earth, that Shishupala’s third eye will disappear when he sees that person, and that two of his hands will disappear when the person takes him in his lap. After some time the god Krishna pays a visit to Cedi, and when the signs take place as foretold, Shishupala’s parents know that Krishna is the only person who can kill their son. Shishupala’s mother is Krishna’s aunt, and when she begs him not to kill her son, Krishna promises to forgive Shishupala’s misdeeds one hundred times. Krishna sticks to his word, but such forbearance only makes Shishupala more reckless, and after the one hundred and first insult, Krishna throws his discus and cuts off Shishupala’s head.

Shishupala-Vadha
(“Slaughter of Shishupala”) Sanskrit drama written by the seventh-century poet Magha, which is traditionally reckoned as one of the six mahakavyas. The play’s theme is the death of the mythic figure Shishupala, whose mother has been promised by Krishna that he will forgive her son one hundred times. This promise only makes Shishupala more reckless, and after the one hundred and first insult, Krishna throws his discus and cuts off Shishupala’s head. Aside from its mythic theme, the play is notable for a number of unusual verses, such as verses that are perfect palindromes (verses that are the same when read backward or forward), or that use only one or two consonants, as a sign of the poet’s skill.

Shishya
(“to be taught”) A word that in its literal meaning can refer to any student but in its most common sense refers to the disciple of a religious instructor (guru).

Shitala
Hindu goddess who is both worshiped and feared. Shitala was traditionally believed to be the physical representation of smallpox, a deadly virus, and a person infected with the disease was thought to be possessed by the goddess, a notion reinforced by the fever and delirium that often accompany this disease. Shitala is also associated with heat—both because of the fever caused by smallpox and because her major religious observance, Shitalashtami, comes near the advent of the hot season. Shitala is considered a jealous, spiteful goddess whose wrath is visited upon those who ignore and displease her. The literal meaning of her name, “Cool One,” can be seen as an attempt to appease her wrath through flattery. Shitala has retained prominence even though the World Health Organization has declared that smallpox has been completely eradicated. In a fascinating example of religious change, one writer details how Shitala has shifted the disease through which she shows herself, and now appears in the guise of tuberculosis. See Margaret Thrice Egnor, “The Changed Mother, or What the Smallpox Goddess Did when There Was No More Smallpox,” Contributions to Asian Studies XVIII, 1984.

Shitalashtami
Religious observance celebrated on the eighth day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Baisakh (April–May), in honor of the goddess Shitala. In northern India this festival falls at the advent of the hottest time of year; the climate thus mirrors the heat and fevers brought on by contact with Shitala herself, in her form as smallpox. Although Shitala is conceived as spiteful and jealous, she cannot be ignored, since this will be sure to provoke her wrath.

Shiv Sena

(“Army of Shivaji”) Militant Hindu organization formed in Bombay in the late 1960s by Bal Thackeray. It was originally a movement made up of people native to Maharashtra, a modern “linguistic state” formed to unite people with a common language, to resist the perceived dominance of outsiders, in this case migrants from Tamil Nadu who were taking away jobs from the Maharashtrian “sons of the soil.” This nativist bent is reflected in its name, taking as its symbol the Maharashtrian hero Shivaji, who successfully resisted the power of the Moghul Empire. In more recent times the movement has associated itself with Hindutva or Hindu nationalism, projecting itself as defending the interests of the larger Hindu community against the “outsiders,” in particular Muslims. The Shiv Sena’s potential for violent action is well known, and they have always been ready to defend their interests with physical force, as well as working through official channels. The Sena’s ability to provide “muscle power” has given them political strength in Maharashtra, both in the municipal government of Bombay, and most recently as a partner (with the Bharatiya Janata Party) in running the state government. This political strength is being translated into a strong presence in other areas, particularly in labor unions, in which the Sena-affiliated union is gaining greater influence and membership. See also Moghul dynasty.

Shiva

(auspicious) Along with the god Vishnu and the Goddess, one of the three most important deities in the Hindu pantheon. All three are notable for being virtually absent from the Vedas, and their collective rise to dominance (and the gradual eclipse of the original Vedic gods) points clearly to a definitive change in the Hindu tradition. Of the three, Shiva is not mentioned at all in the Veda. He is identified with the god Rudra, who first appears in a few of the late Vedic hymns and who is later identified in the Shvetashvatara Upanishad as the single supreme deity behind all things. The word Shiva (“auspicious”) first appears in this upanishad, but as an adjective modifying the feminine noun body.

Despite Rudra/Shiva’s appearance in the upanishad as a supreme divinity, his position is not clear-cut. He is described as a master of archery who dwells in the mountains (and thus away from human beings) and is implored not to use his arrows to harm either man or beast. It is certain that Rudra/Shiva is not a Vedic deity, and some have claimed that his roots lie in the ancient urban-cultural center known as the Indus Valley civilization, citing as evidence one of the seals found in Harappa, an ancient city of Pakistan, which shows a horned figure sitting cross-legged as if in meditation. This identification is possible but hardly compelling. A more likely possibility is that he entered the pantheon as an ascetic worshiped by ascetics, who have always been associated with mountain dwellings. His connection with ascetics is reinforced by several ascetic characteristics attributed to Shiva, such as the matted locks and ash-smeared body. Ascetic origins would also account for his marginal status among the gods, since this would have rendered him an “outsider” to Vedic sacrificial cult, which was the “established” religion of the time. Shiva’s dramatic entry into the pantheon comes in the story of the death of his wife Sati. In this story, his father-in-law Daksha's insulting remarks—that Shiva was an ascetic with no money, job, or family, and was unfit to join respectable society—finally resulted in the destruction of Daksha's sacrifice as a sign of Shiva's supremacy.

Shiva has retained this ambivalent, sometimes marginal quality in his iconography, his mythology, and his character. Perhaps his most basic and important characteristic is that he is a divinity whose nature allows him to move beyond the opposing forces (or dualities) within himself and the world by being at all times the possibility of both forces at once. Shiva can represent both the wild and dangerous side of life and the respectable and refined side. On the one hand, he is the typical ascetic, with matted hair, ash-smeared body, and a home on Mount Kailas in the remote Himalayas. On the other hand, he is Hindu society's ideal for the good husband, who dotes upon his wife Parvati. His body is adorned with snakes and clothed with a bloody elephant skin, but he also wears the Ganges River and the crescent moon, which are associated with beauty, purity, and auspiciousness. His mythic deeds stress his overwhelming power, against which no enemy can stand, and his sudden and sometimes impetuous temper, seen best in the destruction of Kama, the god of love; yet this sudden violence contrasts with his grace and favor toward his devotees (bhakta), by whom he is given the name "quickly satisfied" (Ashutosh) and to whom he will give almost everything. Although he is portrayed as simple and without deceit (as Bholanath, the "simple lord"), he is also traditionally described as the expositor of the tantras, the most secret and hidden religious practice of all. This transcendence of all opposites can be seen in the images that commonly represent him: in his form as Nataraja, in which many of these contrary attributes are shown, or as Ardhanarishvara, in which the image is half male and half female. This transcendence of duality is also visible in the linga, the pillar-shaped object that is his symbolic form, whose base and shaft are interpreted as symbolizing male and female reproductive organs. Finally, one can see this transcendence in the tantric conception of the subtle body (the system of psychic centers, or chakras, that run throughout the human body), in which religious practice aims for the union of Shiva and Shakti. As Wendy Doniger O'Flaherty points out, through his actions Shiva embodies all the contradictory possibilities for human experience, and in mythic form provides a resolution that one ordinary human life can never provide.

In medieval times Shiva's devotees developed a doctrine of avatars (incarnations of Shiva who take the form of a variety of saints, sages, and minor deities who appear on earth to restore balance and perform other necessary acts), probably in response to the older and better developed notion of avatars of Vishnu. Unlike Vishnu's avatars, Shiva's do not seem to have been a way to create a place for smaller existing deities in the larger pantheon. Of Shiva's twenty-one avatars, the most important one is Hanuman, who is the only one with a well-established independent cult. The others were sages (such as Durvasas) and important beings, but the worship of Shiva's avatars has never upstaged the worship of Shiva himself, as has often happened with Vishnu. For further information on the mythology of Shiva, see Wendy Doniger O'Flaherty Shiva, 1981; and Stella Kramrisch, The Presence of Shiva, 1981. See also Shaiva.

Shivaga-Sindamani
By far the latest of the three Tamil epics, written perhaps in the late sixth century. The story describes the adventures of Shivaga, a man who excels at every possible manly art, who with each new challenge wins a new wife for his harem but in the end renounces everything to become a Jain monk. Although the story clearly has a Jain bias, the Shivaga-Sindamani paints a useful picture of contemporary southern Indian life.

Shivaji

(1627–1680) Maratha chieftain who carved out an independent kingdom in western Maharashtra and Goa, and was able to hold onto it despite the efforts of the Moghul emperor Aurangzeb to take it back. Shivaji’s father Shahji was a Moghul governor in the city of Bijapur, and Shivaji began his operations as a robber chief there. He gained the support of the local Maratha people, and his first important conquest was a hill fort near the city of Pune. From there he expanded his territory and consolidated his power, building forts to hold the territory. Shivaji was a devout Hindu, which undoubtedly helped gain him support from the common people. In modern times his Hindu roots, and his opposition to Moghul rule, have transformed him into a Hindu nationalist hero, particularly in Maharashtra. See also Moghul dynasty.

Shivananda, Swami

(1887–1963) Hindu ascetic, teacher, and founder of the Divine Life Society. Shivananda’s first calling was to be a doctor; after getting his degree, he spent some time practicing medicine in Malaysia, spurred by a passion to serve others. Later in life he felt the call of renunciation and, in 1924, settled in Rishikesh, where he was based for the rest of his life. Shivananda’s message stressed the teachings of the Advaita Vedanta school, which is devoted to a belief in monism (the belief in a single Ultimate Reality where all things are united), and the practice of yoga for a disciplined life. He saw his own mission as teaching others, a mission fostered by the Divine Life Society’s publications, Shivananda’s learning and religious charisma made him greatly respected, and in keeping with his original vocation, one of the charitable works sponsored by the Divine Life Society is a free medical clinic. For further information see David Miller, “The Divine Life Society Movement,” in Robert D. Baird (ed.), Religion in Modern India, 1998.

Shiva Purana

One of the eighteen traditional puranas, which were an important genre of smrti texts and the repository of much of traditional Indian mythology. The smrtis, or “remembered” texts, were a class of literature, which, although deemed important, were considered less authoritative than the shrutis or “heard” texts. In brief, the shrutis included the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts, whereas the smrtis included the Mahabharata and the Ramayana, the dharma literature, the Bhagavad Gita, and the puranas. The puranas are the collection of all types of sacred lore, from mythic tales to ritual instruction to exaltation of various sacred sites (tirthas) and actions. Most of the puranas stress the worship of one deity as supreme over all others and as this one’s name clearly shows it is focused on the worship of Shiva. The Shiva Purana is one of the longer and larger puranas. It gives an exhaustive account of Shiva’s mythic deeds—many of which have become the common mythology for many traditional Hindus—as well as instructions for how, when and where Shiva is to be worshiped.

Shivaratri

(“Night of Shiva”) The most important annual festival for devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, celebrated on the fourteenth day of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Phalgun (February–March). Worshipers of Shiva on this night are said to receive unlimited religious benefits. The observances for this festival fall into three general categories: fasting (upavasa), wakefulness, and worship. Those fasting on Shivaratri must abstain from all grains—which define the difference between a “snack” and a “meal”—but are free to eat all other things. During the night observers stay awake, preferably at a temple, relating and listening to Shiva’s mythic exploits, and worship Shiva early the next morning. Shivaratri is a major Indian festival, and in many places the readings and discourses are broadcast through loudspeakers, so that those nearby may also share the religious merit.

The charter myth for this festival describes the power of any religious observances performed on this day, even if unknowingly. According to the story, a hunter lost in the woods on the evening of Shivaratri climbs a tree for safety, and spends the night. Unknown to him, at the base of the tree is a linga, the pillar-shaped object which is Shiva’s symbolic form. The hunter passes a cold and miserable night, and through his shivering shakes the tree, sending dew and leaves from the tree as offerings onto the linga; upon descending the tree he kneels to pick up an arrow he has dropped during the night and thus kneels before the linga. Despite a lifetime of bad karma generated by his livelihood as a hunter, the religious merit from this unknowing observance brought this hunter to the abode of Shiva on his death, and to a later rebirth as a king.

Shiwalik Goddesses

Local goddesses from the Shiwalik hills separating the Himalayas from the northern Indian plain. Some have little importance beyond the borders of their particular villages, whereas others have become important regional deities. As with all the goddesses of India, the Shiwalik goddesses are considered to be manifestations of the same feminine divine energy—the Goddess. As one sign of this identity, many of these sites are claimed to be Shakti Pithas—places where a part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth and took form as a different goddess. Shiwalik goddesses are also thought of as relatives. Kathleen Erndl mentions seven goddesses, known as the Seven Sisters: Vaishno Devi, Jwalamukhi, Vajreshvari Devi, Chintapurni, Naina Devi, Chamunda, and Mansa Devi. Modern Hindi language sources list nine—the seven just mentioned plus Shakumbhari Devi and Kalika Devi. This group of nine is scattered in three different Indian states along the Shiwalik Range: Seven are in Himachal Pradesh, Vaishno Devi is in Jammu and Kashmir, and Shakumbhari Devi is in Uttar Pradesh. The pantheon here is fairly flexible, and the goddesses mentioned in these lists will probably vary over time, partly reflecting the success or failure to establish the holiness of these sites. For further information on the Shiwalik goddesses and worship of the Mother Goddess in northwestern India, see Kathleen Erndl, Victory To The Mother, 1993. See also pitha.

Shiwalik Hills
Himalayan foothills running through the Indian states of Uttar Pradesh, Himachal Pradesh, and Jammu and Kashmir. The hills are an ecological transition zone between the plains and the mountains but have their own religious ecology as well. Whereas the sites high in the Himalayas are often associated with Shiva, the primary sacred sites (tirthas) in the Shiwaliks are associated with the Goddess. See also Shiwalik goddesses.

Shraddha
(“faithful”) Ancestral memorial rite, performed either for one specific person (ekoddishta), or for a group in which the primary beneficiaries were one’s three paternal ancestors (parvana).

An ekoddishta shraddha is usually first performed on the eleventh day after a person’s death, although it may be repeated on the anniversary of the death. It is also usually performed every year during the Pitrapaksha, a two-week period specifically devoted to such rites, on the lunar day during this period that corresponds to the lunar day of death.

A parvana shraddha can be performed on a number of different occasions, for a number of different reasons. In the dharma literature and its commentaries, shraddhas are classified as falling in all three categories of ritual action: nitya, naimittika, and kamsa. Certain shraddhas are obligatory (nitya) because they are prescribed for certain particular times, such as during the Pitrapaksha. Other shraddhas are occasional (naimittika) because they are necessary only under certain conditions, such as the obligation to give a tirtha shraddha when one visits a pilgrimage place (tirtha). Finally, certain shraddhas are freely performed because of the desire (kama) for certain benefits from them—usually conceived as the well-being of one’s ancestors—and these are desiderative (kamsa) shraddhas.

Whatever the motive for giving the shraddha, the general procedure always has two particular features: symbolically feeding one’s ancestor(s) by offering balls of cooked grain (pindas), and feeding real food to a group of brahmans (the group with the highest social status in Hinduism) representing one’s ancestors. Each of these parts is given a great deal of ritual elaboration, and there is considerable disagreement about which should come first, but in modern times offering the pindas generally precedes the meal. Many texts exalt the spiritual merits generated from feeding brahmans, but this is hardly surprising, since most of these texts were written by brahmans, and for many brahmans living at pilgrimage places these shraddhas were (and remain) an important part of their livelihood. However, many people deem this livelihood parasitic, and it is also potentially inauspicious, since it is gained through rites performed for the

Shraddhanand, Swami
(b. Lala Munshi Ram, d. 1926) Key figure in the development of the Arya Samaj, a modern Hindu reformist movement. Shraddhanand was born in Punjab and got a law degree from the Government College in Lahore, but was most influential through his support for the Arya Samaj’s educational institutions. His greatest work was establishing the Gurukul Kangri near the sacred city of Haridwar in 1901. The Gurukul (“teacher’s household”) was a boarding school where Arya Samaj children could be raised with “progressive” Arya values, far from the corrupting influences of traditional mainstream Hindu society. This model was based on the Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious texts, which the Arya Samaj took as the sole religious authority, and in which a student would live as a member of his teacher’s family. Educationally, the curriculum stressed the arts and sciences necessary for a “modern” education, but also traditional Sanskrit learning, particularly of the Vedas. Shraddhanand became a Sanyasi in 1917 but continued to support political causes, particularly Indian social and political leader Mohandas Gandhi’s 1919 call for non-cooperation with the British government. His fervor and strength of character made him an unpopular figure, and he was assassinated by a Muslim in 1926.

Shrmauna
(from the Sanskrit verb shram, “to strive”) General term denoting religious adepts from the middle of the first millennium before the common era whose beliefs stressed renunciation, ascetic practices, and the search for intuitive insights. Shrmauna religious practice was individualist, experiential, free-form, and independent of society. All of these qualities put them in religious competition with the brahmin priests, whose practice stressed mastery of sacred texts and performing enormously complex rituals; the need for sponsors for these rituals made brahmin religion “establishment” religion, serving its patron classes. Indian grammarians use the pair shrmauna and brahmin to illustrate typically bitter opponents, along with examples such as mongoose and cobra, and their difference seems to be between a religious model stressing individual charisma (shramana), and one stressing highly trained technical expertise (brahmin). Part of the shrmana tradition remained outside the Hindu fold by virtue of resolutely rejecting the authority of the Vedas; the Jains, Buddhists, Ajivikas, and other religious groups developed as a result of this rejection of the Vedas. Part of the shrmana tradition was absorbed into traditional Hinduism in the dharma literature, which found a place for renunciant asceticism in the form of the Sanyasi, the last of the four traditional stages of life (ashramas). For further information on the shrmanas and the development of this tradition, see Padmanabh S. Jaini, “Sramanas: Their Conflict with Brahmanical Society,” in Joseph Elder (ed.), Chapters in Indian Civilization, 1970.

Shrutya Sutras
(“aphorisms on Vedic rituals”) A set of brief sayings (4th c. B.C.E.) explaining the ritual instructions for performing the public sacrifices prescribed in the Vedas, the earliest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts. Such sacrificial instructions had been prescribed in the Brahmana literature—itself considered part of the Veda—but with the passage of time the Brahmanas had become too complex and difficult to understand. The Shrutya Sutras were essentially manuals for the priests presiding over the Vedic sacrifices, composed to ensure that the sacrifices would be performed correctly. Aside from instructions for performing the sacrifice, the Shrauta Sutras also contained an appendix with the exact measurements for the sacred altar, known as the Sulva Sutras. In theory, the Shrauta Sutras were the first part of a Kalpa Sutra, which would also contain prescriptions for domestic rites (Ghrya Sutras) and appropriate human behavior (Dharma Sutras), with each Kalpa Sutra being connected to one of the four Vedas. But in practice the story of the Shrauta Sutras is far more complex, since aside from the three complete Kalpa Sutras that have survived, by Apastamba, Baudhayana, and Hiranyakeshin, there are other Shrauta Sutras, indicating a more independent composition.

Shravan
According to the lunar calendar, by which most Hindu religious festivals are determined, Shravan is the fifth month in the lunar year, usually falling within July and August. In northern India Shravan is associated with the rains, the breaking of the heat and revival of the land, and a general feeling of release. The major holidays in Shravan are Nag Panchami, Kamika Ekadashi, Tulsidas Jayanti, Putrada Ekadashi, and Raksha Bandhan. In addition, the entire month is deemed sacred to the god Shiva, with all Mondays and the Shravan Vrat marked out as times for particular observances.

Shravan Vrat
Religious vow (vrat) performed during the entire lunar month of Shravan (July–August), which is dedicated to the god Shiva. During this month devotees (bhakta) will perform various acts of homage, abstinence, and worship, although the strictness of this observance depends largely on individual inclination. Some worshipers observe a vow on each Monday of Shravan to worship Shiva (Monday is the day of the week over which he presides). The observant will fast (upavasa) during the day, worship Shiva and members of his “family” (Ganesh, Parvati, and Nandi), and sometimes stay up late into the night reciting Shiva's mythic deeds. Some devotees will also refrain from cutting their hair and shaving their beards during this month, in imitation of Shiva's primary identity as the great ascetic.

Another observance falling in Shravan is the festival of kanvars, in which devotees draw pots of water from the Ganges, suspend them from a bamboo pole (kanvar), and carry this water to a Shiva temple, where it is offered to Shiva. This practice occurs in many places throughout northern India, but the most famous place is at Deoghar in the state of Bihar. There Shiva is present in his form as Vaidyanath (“Lord of Physicians”), and the image of Vaidyanath at Deoghar is one of the twelve jyotirlingas (images considered especially sacred). Pilgrims going to Deoghar draw their water from the Ganges at Sultanganj, and then walk to Deoghar to offer the water, a distance of over sixty miles. This particular observance combines devotion to God with the willingness to suffer hardship; it is often performed to fulfill a vow made when asking for some divine favor. See also Solah Somvar Vrat.

Shri
(“auspicious,” “bringing good fortune”) Epithet of the goddess Lakshmi, reflecting her identification with luck, fortune, and prosperity. See Lakshmi.

Shri Aurobindo
Name taken by the Indian philosopher and social activist Aurobindo Ghose after retiring from political life to become an ascetic. See Aurobindo Ghose.

Shrichakra
Symbolic diagram (yantra) used in worship by the Shrividiya school, a branch of the secret, ritually based religious practice known as tantra. The Shrichakra is a set of nine interlocking triangles with four pointing up and five pointing down. The figure is surrounded by a double series of lotus petals, then an enclosing circle, and finally angular exterior walls. In the center of the diagram is a single point known as the bindu, representing the ultimate divinity that is the source of all things. The shrichakra is considered a subtle form of the goddess Lalita Tripurasundari, a goddess who is identified with different local goddesses throughout southern India. Lalita Tripurasundari is considered a “textual” goddess since she appears as an object of worship in the Shrichakra diagram but has no temple or image. The Shrichakra is used as a ritual aid during the rite known as samharakrama, in which the adept symbolically destroys the external world and ideas of a separate Self to become completely identified with this goddess, who is considered the source of all reality. For extensive information on the Shrichakra, see Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Shrichandra
(b. 1494–1612?) Historical founder of the Udasi (“indifferent”) ascetic community. Shrichandra was the elder son of Guru Nanak, the first of the Sikh community’s ten gurus. By all accounts, Shrichandra was a devout and pious man, but Nanak passed over Shrichandra to designate one of his followers, Angad, as the second Sikh guru. According to tradition this was because Guru Nanak, believing that his followers should live married lives in regular society, disapproved of Shrichandra’s status as ascetic. Due to his pedigree and his piety, Shrichandra gained a considerable following of his own, but the Udasis have always been considered as belonging in the Hindu fold. During the Kumbha Mela, an important bathing (snana) festival held in different places in northern India, the Udasis march third in the bathing procession, behind the Sanyasis and the Bairagis.

Shrikrishnavali
(“Series [of poems] to Krishna”) Series of sixty-one short poems dedicated to the god Krishna, written in the Braj Bhasha form of Hindi by the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?). This collection is unusual, since Tulsidas is renowned as a devotee (bhakta) of the god Rama, and most of his literary work describes Rama’s exploits. The Shrikrishnavali is a poetic cycle about Krishna’s life, so it begins with poems devoted to Krishna’s childhood and youth in the Braj region. Most of the text, however, describes the sorrow of the cow herd girls (gopis) after Krishna’s departure for his kingdom in Mathura, and their scornful rejection of Krishna’s messenger Uddhava, who tries to convince them that since Krishna is the supreme deity, he is everywhere. This work is an example of the ecumenical, or universal, tendencies found throughout Tulsidas’s work. Not only did he compose poems in praise of another deity, thus transcending sectarian barriers, but he also transcended linguistic barriers by writing these poems in Braj Bhasha, the most widely read language of his time, rather than his own native Avadhi.

Shrinathji
The name of a particular image of the god Krishna, the presiding deity of the Shrinathji temple in Nathdwara, Rajasthan. According to tradition, the image was originally hidden on top of Mount Govardhan, a famous mountain in the Braj region that is mythically associated with Krishna’s humiliation of the storm-god Indra. The image’s location was revealed in a dream to Vallabhacharya, the founder of the religious community known as the Pushti Marg. Vallabhacharya built a temple to house the image on Mount Govardhan, and his descendants have remained Shrinathji’s hereditary servants since that time. The image was taken to Rajasthan in 1669, a move prompted by fears that it would be destroyed by the Moghul emperor Aurangzeb. According to tradition Shrinathji revealed his wish to stay in Nathdwara by sinking his wagon's wheels deep into the earth, so that it could not go further. A new temple was erected and dedicated in 1672, and the image has remained there ever since.

Whether or not one accepts the claim of the divine mandate, much of the story seems reasonable. Given the proximity of Braj to Agra, the Moghul capital, keepers of well-known images might have been concerned about their safety, and since the neighboring state of Rajasthan was controlled by the Moghuls' Hindu vassals, this would have been an obvious place to go. Even today Nathdwara is in a remote and thinly settled region of Rajasthan, which indicates that in earlier times it would have been a place of refuge. The Nathdwara temple is particularly important to the Pushti Marg, a religious community devoted to the god Krishna, who play the major role in administering it. For more information see Rajendra Jindel, Culture Of a Sacred Town, 1976. See also Moghul dynasty.

Shringeri

Town and sacred site (tirtha) in eastern Karnataka, about 160 miles west of Bangalore. Although Shringeri is a very small town, it is religiously significant as the home of the Shringeri Math, one of the four Dashanami maths, the monastic centers believed to have been established by the philosopher Shankaracharya. The ascetics of the Shringeri math have a reputation for very strict adherence to traditional practice, and the town has a long standing as a center for religious learning.
Shringeri Math
One of the four maths or monastic centers traditionally believed to have been established by the great philosopher Shankaracharya; the others are the Jyotir Math, Sharada Math, and Govardhan Math. These four sacred centers are each associated with one of the four geographical corners of the Indian subcontinent; the Shringeri Math is in the southern quarter, in the city of Shringeri in the southern Indian state of Karnataka. Shankaracharya is traditionally cited as the founder of the Dashanami Sanyasis, the most prestigious Hindu ascetic order. The Dashanami ("ten names") ascetics are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, who are divided into ten divisions, each with a different name. These ten divisions are organized into four larger organizational groups—Anandawara, Bhogawara, Bhuriwara, and Kitawara—each of which has two or three of the ten divisions, and each of which is associated with one of the four sacred centers. Of these, the Shringeri Math is associated with the Bhuriwara group.

Shrirangam
Island in the Cauvery River, just north of the town of Tiruchirappalli in the state of Tamil Nadu. The site is most famous for the Ranganathaswamy Temple, dedicated to the god Vishnu in his form as Ranganatha, who is sleeping on the back of his serpent couch Shesha in the sea of cosmic dissolution (pralaya). The temple is built in the Dravida style of architecture, in which the temple buildings are of modest height but cover an immensely large area and are surrounded by a boundary wall with massive towers (gopurams) over each wall’s central gateway. In the temple’s outer zones one often finds shops and houses, making such temples veritable cities in their own right. The Ranganathaswamy temple has a series of seven concentric processional streets, making it one of the largest temples in India. It was built in stages by the various dynasties that controlled this part of southern India—Chera, Pandya, Chola, Hoysala, and Vijayanagar—although the bulk of the construction was done by the last two. Since Vishnu’s image is that of the divine king, it is hardly surprising that each of these regional dynasties patronized this site, as a way of using this divine imagery to support and validate their own right to rule.

Shrirangapatnam
Demolished fortress city just outside the city of Mysore in the state of Karnataka. Shirrangapatnam formerly served as the capital of Tipu Sultan (r. 1782–1799), the last ruler of Mysore. Throughout his reign he fought against the encroachment of outside powers. However, in 1799 he unsuccessfully took up arms against the British and was killed in battle, leaving the city largely destroyed. The city got its name from a temple there to the god Ranganatha, a form of Vishnu in which he is sleeping on his serpent couch Shesha in the sea of cosmic dissolution (pralaya). The temple survived the demolition and is still functioning today. Ranganatha is considered a divine king, and his most famous image, on the island of Shirrangam in Tamil Nadu, has strong associations with southern Indian kings and kingship. Even though Tipu was a Muslim, invoking Ranganatha’s powerful symbolism would have been an astute political move, to legitimate his rule in the eyes of his Hindu subjects.

Shri Sampraday
One of the four branches (sampraday) of the Bairagi Naga ascetics. The Bairagi Nagas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, organized in military fashion into different anis or “armies.” Until the beginning of the nineteenth century their primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests; both of these have largely disappeared in contemporary times. The Shri Sampraday traces its spiritual lineage through the poet-saint Ramananda to the southern Indian philosopher Ramanuja, who is claimed to have been Ramananda's guru. This claim can also be seen in the name of the sampraday, since Ramanuja's followers, the Shrivaishnava, focus their worship on Vishnu and Shri (Lakshmi). Yet the Ramanandi ascetics worship an entirely different pair of deities—Rama and Sita—and the claim of any connections between the Ramanandis and the Shrivaishnava was formally renounced at the Ujjain Kumbha Mela in 1921, at the insistence of the Shrivaishnava. As with another Bairagi order, the Brahma Sampraday, the claim to be connected to a famous religious figure seems to be a way to gain the authority and prestige of an ancient and established tradition. Even without this claim, the Shri Sampraday is the largest and the most important of the Bairagi Naga orders. For further information see Peter van der Veer, Gods on Earth, 1988.

Shrisaila
(“holy mountain”) Sacred mountain in the center of the state of Andhra Pradesh, about 185 miles south and slightly east of Hyderabad. The site is remote and difficult to reach but is famous for a temple sacred to the god Shiva, in his manifestation as Mallikarjuna, “[Lord] White as Jasmine.” Shiva's image as Mallikarjuna is in the form of a linga, the pillar-shaped image that is his symbolic form, and the Mallikarjuna linga is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites deemed especially sacred to Shiva, and at which Shiva is uniquely present.

Shrivaishnava
Southern Indian religious community who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu and Shri (Lakshmi), and whose religious life is rooted in the devotional hymns of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All the Alvars were devotees of Vishnu, and their stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. Two centuries later, the Alvars' devotional outpouring was organized and systematized by the philosopher Ramanuja, considered the Shrivaishnava founder. Ramanuja was convinced that Brahman, or Supreme Reality, was a personal deity, rather than an impersonal abstract principle, and was also convinced that devotion was the most important form of religious practice. Vishishthadvaita Vedanta, his philosophical position, stressed both of these convictions, and thus opposed the Advaita Vedanta school founded by the philosopher Shankaracharya, which stressed that the Supreme Being was impersonal and that realization (jnana) was the best spiritual path. In the time after Ramanuja the Shrivaishnava community split into two smaller groups, the Tengalai and the Vadagalai. The schism stemmed from a disagreement over whether human action was necessary to attain final liberation, or whether the hope came in complete surrender (prapatti) to God's grace; the Vadagalais held the former position, and the Tengalais the latter.

In practice, the Shrivaishnava community has been strongly influenced by the doctrine of divine “emanations” originated by the Pancharatra religious community, particularly the notion that a properly consecrated image becomes a form of the deity itself. Shrivaishnava piety has tended to center around temples, and particularly the service of the temple's image, which is considered a genuine form of the deity. Given this stress on learning and temple-based worship, it is not surprising that the community has been dominated by brahmins, and the few non-brahmins in the community have distinctly inferior status. For further information see K. Rangachari, The Sri Vaisnava Brahmans, 1931; and
Shrivatsa
An auspicious mark on the god Vishnu’s chest, also found on Vishnu’s form as Krishna, which is sometimes described as a mole and sometimes as a curl of hair. In statues and pictures, the Shrivatsa is usually portrayed as a four-petaled flower, and it is believed to be the kaustubha jewel, which was one of the precious things churned from the Ocean of Milk along with the goddess Lakshmi, the wishing-cow Surabhi, and amrta, the nectar of immortality. See also Tortoise avatar.

Shrividya
Southern Indian school of tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice, in which the principal deity is the goddess Lalita Tripurasundari. The Shrividya tradition is noted for its ritual use of the shrichakra, a particular symbolic diagram (yantra) composed of a series of interlocking triangles. The Shrichakra ritual is known as samhara-krama, and is a systematic ritual deconstruction of the perceivable world and all illusions of duality, to attain union with the single true reality. The interior counterpart to this exterior ritual is the practice of kundalini yoga, which is based on the tantric idea of the subtle body—the six psychic centers (chakras) running along the spine—and seeks to gain ultimate union within the aspirant’s own body by bringing together the microcosmic forms of the deities Shiva and Shakti that exist within the body. For a careful and considered picture of the Shrividya tradition, see Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Shriyantra
Another name for the Shrichakra, a symbolic diagram (yantra) used in worship by the Shrividya school, a particular branch of the secret, ritually based religious practice known as tantra. See Shrichakra.

Shrutashravas
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Krishna’s paternal aunt and the mother of Shishupala.

Shruti ("[that which is] heard") The most authoritative type of Hindu sacred literature, made up of all the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. The Vedas are generally considered to have four types of texts: the hymns to the gods known as samhitas, the ritual manuals called the Brahmanas, and the speculative texts known as the Aranyakas and the Upanishads. The term comes from the traditional Hindu belief that these texts were not composed by human beings but are based in the primordial vibrations of the cosmos itself. The ancient sages, whose faculties of perception had been sharpened through persistent religious practice, were able to “hear” and understand these vibrations, and transmitted them to others in a lineage of learning. Thus, the belief that their origin is nonhuman makes the shruti the highest religious authority.

Shuddadvaita ("pure monism") Philosophical school first propounded by Vallabhbhacharya (1479–1531). Vallabha called his school shuddadvaita, or "pure monism," to distinguish it from the Advaita Vedanta school founded by the philosopher Shankaracharya. The latter school propounds "nondual" (advaita) monism, in its claim that a single Ultimate Reality lies behind all things, and that all things are merely differing forms of that reality. The Advaitins call this single reality Brahman, which they conceive as formless, impersonal, and having no defining attributes except for being, consciousness, and bliss (sacchidananda). In the Advaita understanding, since all conceptions of particular deities have specific attributes, they are thus conditioned forms of the ultimate Brahman. In fact, any assumption that the world as it appears is real is a fundamental misunderstanding that ultimately causes human beings to be trapped in karmic bondage, reincarnation (samsara), and suffering.

Shankaracharya’s philosophical position was based primarily on the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu texts, and particularly on the Upanishads, the speculative texts that are the latest part of the Vedas. Vallabhabhacharya used both of these sources in framing his Shuddadvaita school, but also used the Bhagavata Purana, which he considered to be of equal authority. The Bhagavata Purana is one of the later sectarian collections known as puranas. It is the most important source for the worship of the god Krishna, whom Vallabha considered to be the ultimate manifestation of the Supreme Being, rather than the unqualified Brahman promoted by Shankaracharya. Aside from promoting a personal conception of the deity over an impersonal conception, another difference in the two schools concerned the status of the world. For Vallababhacharya, the world as perceived is not an illusion but is real, because it and human beings have both evolved from God through the exercise of his supreme power. Krishna is conceived in the traditional threefold divine aspect as being–consciousness–bliss. Living beings possess being and consciousness, but not the divine bliss, whereas the material, nonliving, world has only being. Since this conception gives real value to the everyday world, Vallabhabhacharya described it as “pure monism.”

In Vallabhabhacharya’s system God is the inner controller of all souls, which makes human beings dependent on God for thinking and perception (pratyaksha). This dependence on God highlights the importance of grace, which he refers to as pushti, meaning “that which nourishes the soul.” Because of this emphasis on grace, Vallabhabhacharya’s religious community is also known as the Pushti Marg. The Pushti Marg believes that God’s favor is gained through devotion (bhakti), which is open to all and for which there are no prerequisites. The emphasis on devotion has marginalized all other forms of religious practice, and the Pushti Marg is particularly known for rejecting all ascetic endeavors, such as celibacy, fasting (upavasa), or renunciation. Its members tend to be householders coming from merchant families, particularly from the state of Gujarat. The community’s primary temple is at Nathdwara in the state of Rajasthan. For further information see Richard Barz, The Bhakti Sect of Vallabhacarya, 1976.

Shuddhi
(“purification”) Any ritual purification that removes impurities and thus returns one to a state of ritual purity. In a more specialized context the term denotes the “reconversion” back to Hinduism of people who had either converted to another religion or who had adopted practices characteristic of other religious traditions. This practice was first instituted in the 1890s by the reformist Arya Samaj, led by Swami Dayanand Saraswati. There was a tremendous stir in the Sikh community when several Sikhs were a part of a group thus “purified,” and in Sikh accounts this threat of reabsorption into the Hindu community was one of the major forces behind the Singh Sabha movement, which defined the Sikhs as a separate religious community. In modern times this practice has been employed by the Hindu nationalist organization Vishva Hindu Parishad, which has used it to “purify” certain groups who had adopted some Islamic practices.
Shudra
Among the four major social groups (varnas) in the traditional Hindu society, the shudras are the lowest and least influential. In this model, the shudras’ social function was to serve all the others. This low social status is reflected in the creation story known as the Purusha Sukta, in which the shudras are described as being created from the Primeval Man’s feet. The feet are the lowest and basest part of the body, and the shudra was correspondingly seen as the lowest level of caste Hindu society. Unlike members of the “twice-born” varnas—brahmin, kshatriya, and vaishya—whose adolescent males were entitled to have a ritual second birth that entitled them to study the Veda, shudras were always once-born, and thus forbidden to study or even to hear the Veda. In practice the status of shudras differed widely from region to region—in southern India, many of the land-owning jatis (endogamous social subgroups) were shudras, and they were very influential communities. At the very least, they were accorded a definitive place in caste Hinduism, unlike the untouchables, who were considered completely impure, usually because of their hereditary occupations.

Shudraka
(early 5th c.) Playwright and author of the Mrccchatikата (“The Little Clay Cart”). This drama describes the love between a poor but noble brahmin, Charudatta, and a wealthy but virtuous courtesan, Vasantasena, set in the context of a complicated political intrigue. It is notable for its detailed portrayal of everyday urban life, exemplified by the little clay cart, which is a child’s toy. It has been translated into several languages, and is periodically performed for modern American audiences.

Shukra
(“parrot”) In Hindu mythology, a sage whose life story upholds the traditional doctrine of the four stages of life (ashramas). Shuka was the son of the sage Vyasa, born when Vyasa had a seminal emission upon seeing a celestial nymph (apsara) in the form of a parrot. From boyhood Shuka was interested only in spiritual life and had the firm desire never to marry, but despite intensive spiritual study he could not find contentment. He eventually decided to visit the sage-king Janaka, who advised Shuka that he could rightly consider renunciation only after having married and raised a family. Shuka returned home to his father and lived the householder’s life; later in life he took up renunciation again and became perfectly realized.

Shukla Paksha
(“light half”) Name denoting the waxing half of a lunar month, so called because the moon’s light increases every night.

Shukra
In Hindu mythology, the religious teacher (guru) of the type of demons known as asuras. Shukra is a well-known figure who appears most prominently in the tale of the Vamana avatar. In this tale, the Asura king Bali is performing a great sacrifice. He is approached by the god Vishnu, who has taken the form of a dwarf (vamana), and asks Bali for three paces of land to build a sacrificial altar. Shukra suspects a trick, and warns Bali not to grant it, but Bali ignores Shukra’s cautionary advice. As soon as Bali grants the gift, the dwarf grows immensely large. With his first two steps Vishnu measures out the cosmos, and with his third pushes Bali down into the underworld, where he is allowed to reign as king.
Shula
A lance or pike; one of the characteristic weapons in Hindu iconography. The most famous example of this is the trident (trishul), which has three points, although the center one may be larger than the side ones. This weapon is most intimately associated with Shiva, but it is also commonly carried by certain powerful forms of the Goddess. This may reflect her charter myth, in which she was formed from the collected radiation of all the gods and received duplicates of their weapons from all of them. The lance with a single blade is associated with the god Skanda, particularly in his southern Indian manifestation as Murugan. When carried by Skanda-Murugan, the lance is usually called shakti (“power”), rather than shula.

Shumbha
In Hindu mythology, demon killed by the goddess Kali in the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most important text for the mythology of the Goddess. Together with his brother Nishumbha, Shumbha is a general in the army of a demon named Mahishasura, the figure whom the Goddess takes form to destroy. Due to a divine boon given to Mahishasura, Shumbha and Nishumbha are able to conquer the gods and assume control of heaven, but they are unable to resist the power of the Goddess.

Shurpanakha ([having “nails [like] winnowing-fans”])
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Shurpanakha is the sister of Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka. Although she is a minor character in the epic, she plays a pivotal role in advancing the action of the story. As Ravana’s sister, Shurpanakha is a demon woman of high status, and is free to choose her own husband according to her inclinations. As she roams through the forest one day, she happens to see Rama, the epic’s protagonist, and is immediately smitten by his handsome form. Assuming the shape of a beautiful woman, she approaches him and expresses her desire for him. Rama tells her that since he is already married, his brother Lakshmana will be a more appropriate match for her. When Lakshmana gives her reasons why he too cannot marry her, Shurpanakha becomes angry. Realizing that Rama’s wife Sita is the real impediment to her desires, Shurpanakha tries to harm her, and in the struggle that follows, Lakshmana mutilates her by cutting off her ears and her nose. Shrieking with pain and humiliation, Shurpanakha returns to her brother Ravana’s court, who swears that her insult will be avenged. After their brothers Khara and Dushana are killed in a direct attack on Rama, Ravana decides to get revenge by kidnapping Sita, an action that eventually causes his own death.

Shvetaketu
A character in the Chandogya Upanishad, one of the speculative texts that form the latest stratum of the Vedas. In the upanishad, Shvetaketu is the son of Uddalaka Aruni, and a paradigm for a seeker of knowledge. Shvetaketu’s education also symbolizes the conception of true knowledge found in the Upanishads and the way that this differs from earlier conceptions. According to a story in the upanishad’s sixth chapter, Shvetaketu is sent away by his father to study the Vedas, and when he returns twelve years later having mastered all the Vedas, he incorrectly considers himself learned. Shvetaketu’s father punctures his arrogance, showing him the difference between memorization and true knowledge, by asking Shvetaketu questions about the nature of the cosmos. When Shvetaketu cannot answer these, he admits his ignorance and accepts instruction from his father on the nature of the Self (atman). This instruction contains the teaching “That thou art” (tat tvam asi). This is one of the “great statements” (mahavakya) in Indian philosophy, and asserts the ultimate nondifference between Brahma and atman, the cosmos and the individual Self.

Shvetashvatara Upanishad
A text generally regarded as one of the latest upanishads, the speculative religious texts that themselves form the most recent stratum of the Vedas. This judgment is based on both the Shvetashvatara Upanishad’s form and on its content. Stylistically, the earliest upanishads tend to be written in prose, or prose mixed with verse, whereas the later upanishads, including the Shvetashvatara, are completely in verse. In terms of content, the earlier upanishads tend to be long and rambling, whereas in the later ones the ideas are far more concise and clearly developed. The Shvetashvatara Upanishad’s most original idea is its description of the Supreme Being in completely theistic terms, in contrast to the abstract, impersonal representations in the earlier upanishads. It identifies Ultimate Reality as the god Rudra, who was later identified with the god Shiva, one of the most important modern Hindu deities. The text is also notable for an explicit description of the process and results of yoga, which is the first known written explanation of this tradition.

Although it is best noted for these new ideas, the upanishad also reveals continuity with the older tradition. The second chapter begins with an extended invocation to the god Savitr (Surya), the sun, using verses drawn directly from Vedic texts composed a thousand years earlier. Such anachronisms indicate that there was no clear dividing line between the four differing types of Vedic text—samhita, Brahmana, Aranyaka, and upanishad—but rather that these textual styles were composed in overlapping periods.

Shyam
(“black”) Epithet of the god Krishna, based on the dark color of his skin. See Krishna.

Siddha
(“perfected one”) Name for a religious adept who is believed to have attained the perfect knowledge, enlightenment, and ultimate spiritual realization.

Siddhapith
(“seat of the perfected”) Name denoting a site believed to have particular power in conferring spiritual attainments upon those who carry out religious practices there. This power is usually tied to a mythic charter in which a deity became resident at the site—and is thus still present to assist people—but such sites have often been further sanctified by the presence of charismatic ascetics whose lives and spiritual discipline serve as examples to others.

Siddhasana
(“perfected posture”) One of the common sitting postures (asana) used for meditation. In this position one foot (often the left) is placed with the heel in the area between the anus and genitals, with the other foot resting on the opposite calf, turned so that the heel is straight up. This is called the “perfected” posture partly because of its difficulty—only those perfected in yoga can do it—but also because it is believed to bring substantial spiritual benefits.

Siddhi
(“attainment”) The most common word used to denote a superhuman power or faculty. The siddhis are first referred to in yoga’s founding text, the Yoga Sutras of Patanjali (3.45), and are traditionally said to number eight: minuteness (anima), lightness (laghima), greatness (madhima), acquisition (prapti), irresistible will (prakamyam), control (vashitvam), superiority (ishitvam), and suppression of desire (kamavasayitvam).

The possession of such siddhis is generally seen as the evidence of high spiritual attainment, but the attitude toward the powers is mixed. They give one great abilities, but they are also seen as being highly seductive, since they can be used for both good and evil. The ability to keep from being beguiled by them is the true sign of spiritual maturity, and a spiritually immature person could easily fall into using them for selfish purposes. For this reason, religious aspirants are discouraged from aiming to gain such powers, since the very act of seeking is considered a selfish desire. In contrast, when one has gained such powers as a by-product of spiritual attainment, one is believed to be able to keep them in proper perspective.

Simantonnayana Samskara
Traditionally, the third of the life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras), and the last of the prenatal samskaras. This was performed when the pregnancy was further advanced, although various writers gave differing times for this. The major element in this rite is the husband parting the hair of his wife, supposedly to protect her from the misfortune and black magic that are supposed to plague pregnant women. One can also interpret parting the hair as symbolizing an easy delivery, and since this was a rite of protection, it would also give the expectant mother psychological assurance that everything would be all right. One bit of evidence supporting this interpretation is that many of the dharma literature writers classify this samskara as being for the woman rather than the unborn child, and as only needing to be performed during the first pregnancy. This samskara is seldom performed in modern times.

Simhakarna
("lion's ear") Another name for the hand gesture (hasta) known as kataka hasta, in which the fingers are loosely pressed onto the thumb, creating a ring. This particular name comes from the fanciful notion that the shape of the hand resembles a lion's ear. See kataka hasta.

Simuka
(1st c. B.C.E.) Founder of the Satavahana dynasty, which for over three centuries ruled over much of central India and the Malwa region from their capital in the city of Paithan.

Singh, Ishvari Prasad Narayan
(r. 1835–1889) A Maharaja of Benares who, with the help of local scholars, wrote the dialogues (samvads) for the characters in the Ramnagar Ram Lila. The Ram Lila at Ramnagar, the fort that is home to the kings of Benares, is the most famous and traditional of all these Ram Lilas. According to tradition, the Maharaja was a great devotee (bhakta) of the god Rama and a patron of the Ram Lila at Benares itself, but on several occasions found it difficult to get across the Ganges because of the seasonal flooding. As a solution to the problem, he sponsored his own Ram Lila—no doubt also symbolically intended to reinforce his kingship—which has become the oldest, most traditional, and most important Ram Lila in Benares. Udit Narayan Singh finalized the locations of the Ram Lila, which is performed throughout the city, whereas his son Ishvari Prasad Narayan Singh was responsible for writing the dialogues (samvads) spoken by the characters. For further information see Anaradha Kapur, Actors, Pilgrims, Kings, and Gods, 1990.

Sinhastha Mela
Name for the Kumbha Mela festival held in the holy city of Ujjain. The festival is called Sinhastha because it is celebrated when Jupiter is in Leo (Sinha). The Sinhastha Mela's climactic bathing (snana) day comes on the full moon in the lunar month of Baisakh (April–May). The Kumbha Mela is a massive religious festival celebrated at three-year intervals in four different cities: Haridwar, Allahabad, Ujjain, and Nasik; the festival thus comes to each city every twelve years. The Kumbha Mela is chiefly a festival at which participants bathe in sacred rivers. The festival's primary participants are ascetics, who come from all over South Asia to bathe in the sacred waters. According to tradition, the Kumbha Mela was organized by the great philosopher Shankaracharya to promote regular gatherings of learned and holy men, as a means to strengthen, sustain, and spread Hindu religion.

The charter myth for the Kumbha Mela is taken from the story of Churning the Ocean of Milk. After the ocean has been churned and the nectar of immortality (amrta) has been extracted, the gods and their demon opponents begin to quarrel over the pot of nectar. The gods snatch the pot and run off with it, but the one carrying the pot grows tired, and in twelve days of carrying it sets it on the ground in twelve different places. Eight of the places are in heaven, but the other four are on earth and these are the four sites where the Mela is held. In each place a bit of the nectar splashes on the ground, sanctifying the site, and since a divine day is considered to be a human year, the twelve-year cycle is established. According to popular belief, at each Kumbha Mela's most providential moment, the waters in which people are bathing become the nectar of immortality, and all those who bathe in these waters gain immeasurable religious merit.

Historically speaking, the two most important sites have been Haridwar and Allahabad; one measure of their dominance is that they have held “half” (ardha) Kumbha Melas after six years, and that these have consistently drawn bigger crowds than the “full” Kumbha Melas at Ujjain and Nasik, which fall during those times. In recent times, however, political considerations have increased the attendance at the Sinhastha Mela. Ujjain is located in central India, in the heartland of the Hindu nationalist groups such as the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh, Vishva Hindu Parishad, and Bharatiya Janata Party. The city of Ujjain is also close to the ancestral kingdom of Vijaya Raje Scindia, the matriarch of a former royal family and a prominent figure in the Bharatiya Janata Party. In such a political climate and local environment, the Sinhastha Mela has been seen as a good opportunity for religious-political theater, in order to generate publicity, deliver patronage, and give the people in these organizations greater status and visibility. See also Tortoise avatar.

Sita

(“furrow”) Daughter of King Janaka, wife of the god-prince Rama (himself the seventh avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu), and the major female character in the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Sanskrit epics. Unlike many other Hindu goddesses, Sita's identity stems almost completely from her husband, and she has little independent worship or personality of her own. Her abduction by the demon-king Ravana is the single major event driving the plot of the Ramayana, prompting her husband and his allies first to search the earth for her and then to fight a climactic battle to regain her, concluding with Ravana's death. Throughout all the tumult Sita simply waits to be rescued, sure that this will provide her husband with greater glory.

According to her charter myth, Sita is not born in the normal way but is found in a furrow by King Janaka as he plows his field. Sita thus carries a strong association with the earth, fertility, and prosperity; as David Kinsley points out, her marriage to Rama symbolizes the union between the fecund earth and a righteous king that will make it prosper. Her connection with the earth is also seen in her disappearance, when in response to Rama's accusations of unfaithfulness, she calls on the earth to swallow her up as a witness to her chastity, and disappears forever.

Sita's primary virtue is her devotion to her husband, and in her unflagging love for him she is a model Hindu wife, just as many of the Ramayana's other characters incarnate cultural ideals. An early sign of her devotion is shown when Rama has been wrongly exiled in the forest for fourteen years. Even though Sita has never known anything but luxury and ease, she is determined to accompany him into exile, based on the conviction that a faithful wife should always accompany her husband. Rama objects, reasons, and even forbids her, but Sita does not give in—perhaps the only time that she does not observe her husband's wishes. She goes to the forest with Rama and her brother-in-law Lakshmana, cheerfully taking on the difficult life of an ascetic, since this means she can remain with her husband.

The more difficult test of her devotion to her husband comes when she is abducted and held captive by Ravana. She holds steadfast despite Ravana's unceasing persuasion, threats, and attempts to convince her that Rama has been killed. According to one story, the only part of Ravana that she ever sees is his feet, since as a devoted wife she kept her eyes modestly downcast rather than look directly at another man. When Rama's ally Hanuman discovers where Sita is hidden, she refuses to let him carry her away, since this will have meant touching another man, as well as depriving her husband of the opportunity to rescue her.

Her devotion is severely tested after her rescue, when Rama insists that she must have been unfaithful to him during her long captivity. This accusation reflects the Indian cultural assumption that women have much higher sex drives than men, and much less ability to control these drives. Stung by this accusation, she asks Rama to have a funeral pyre built for her and enters it with the wish that, if she is innocent, the fire will not harm her. When the blaze dies down she emerges unscathed, with the god Agni (fire personified) as a witness to her chastity. Despite this proof, Rama banishes her from Ayodhya after their return. When Rama later demands a second ordeal, Sita calls on the earth to swallow her up as a witness to her purity, and disappears forever.

Sita's ability to withstand both ordeals reflects the widespread Indian belief that women gain power through their devotion to their husbands, power that can be so great that they can even curse the gods themselves. Encoded in this notion are cultural messages about the role of women and the importance of their relationships with others. Sita represents the model Indian woman, whose primary loyalty is to her husband and his family. This reflects the northern Indian marriage pattern in which brides are brought into the groom's home and become part of their marital families, severing their connection with their birth family. Wives are expected to place other people's welfare before their own, so that they may live a happily married life. In return for such self-sacrifice, a wife becomes a model for all to respect and honor.

Sitamarhi

City in the northern part of the state of Bihar, about ten miles from the border with Nepal. It is in the Panchala region traditionally reckoned as the kingdom of King Janaka, and Sitamarhi is believed to be the place where the goddess Sita was found in a furrow of the earth while King Janaka was plowing.

Six Schools

Collective name for the six developed schools of traditional Hindu philosophy. All six schools consider the religious texts known as the Vedas to be the most authoritative pramana, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge. All six schools also assume that philosophical reflection must ultimately serve religious goals, to release the embodied soul (atman) from an otherwise unending cycle of transmigration. Aside from these basic similarities, each of these schools developed distinctive and characteristic perspectives. Despite their differences, by the early centuries of the common era the schools had become associated in pairs: Nyaya-Vaisheshika, Samkhya-Yoga, and Purva Mimamsa-Uttara Mimamsa, with the final school more commonly known as Vedanta.

Of these, the Nyaya school focused on examining and cataloguing the pramanas, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge, and their conclusions became accepted by all six schools. The Vaisheshika school was a descriptive ontology that categorized the world in atomistic fashion, in which all things were considered to be constructed from smaller parts. This school had inherent philosophical problems that contributed to its eclipse. Samkhya is an atheistic dualism based on the distinction between a conscious but inert purusha ("person," or spirit), and an unconscious but active prakrti ("nature"). According to the Samkhya proponents, failure to discriminate between the two leads to the evolution of the world and the individual person, whereas correct understanding reverses this process. Samkhya provides the theoretical basis for the Yoga school, which essentially details techniques to help one gain the correct understanding between these two entities. Purva Mimamsa stresses the study of the Vedas as the source of instruction for human beings, an emphasis that led it to develop sophisticated theories of language and methods for textual interpretation. These tools were used by the Vedanta school in its efforts to reveal the ultimate meaning of the Vedas. Most of the first millennium during the common era was a time of lively debate among these schools, each of which held varying positions on basic things such as the reality of the world. By the end of the millennium Vedanta had become the most significant philosophical perspective, largely eclipsing the others, although it had absorbed certain influences from them. For further information see Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Skanda

Hindu deity who is the son of the god Shiva. Skanda is born to destroy the demon Taraka, who has received the divine boon that he can only be killed by a son of Shiva. When Taraka makes this request, Shiva is deep in meditation in his grief after the death of his wife Sati, and it seems unlikely that such a son can ever be born. After Taraka grows too strong, the other gods begin the process of trying to encourage Shiva to marry, which results in his wedding with the goddess Parvati.

Skanda is born in an unusual way. According to the legend, Shiva and Parvati are disturbed while making love, and Shiva inadvertently spills his semen on the ground (the verb skand means “to leap” or “to ooze”). In Indian culture semen is seen as a man’s concentrated essence, and for a deity like Shiva this means that the semen is inordinately powerful, capable of destroying the earth. The semen is first held by the god Agni, who is fire personified, but it proves too powerful for him. Agni then puts it in the River Ganges, and after 10,000 years the river deposits a shining child in the reeds by its bank. The child is discovered by the Krittikas (the Pleiades personified), each of whom want to nurse him. To oblige them Skanda grows five extra heads. As a mark of the Krittikas’ care, one of his epithets is Kartikkeya. Skanda grows rapidly, assumes command of Shiva’s heavenly host (gana), and kills the troublesome Taraka. His persona remains that of a warrior prince, unlike that of his brother Ganesh, who is a scholar and sage.
In northern India Skanda is considered a member of Shiva's household, and although his power is acknowledged, he is generally not a primary object of worship. In southern India Skanda has been identified with Murugan, a regional deity associated primarily with the hunt, but also with war. In this atmosphere he has taken on a much greater role, particularly in Tamil Nadu, and has assumed the mantle of a philosopher and exponent of the Shaiva Siddhanta school.

Smallpox

In traditional Hindu belief, smallpox was personified as the goddess Shitala ("Cool One," a euphemism), and the fever and skin eruptions accompanying the disease were interpreted as signs of possession by this goddess. In the time since the World Health Organization has declared smallpox officially eradicated, in some regions Shitala has been identified with tuberculosis. See Shitala.

Smara

("memory") Epithet of the god Kama, the deification of desire, reflecting the importance of memory in generating and maintaining desire. See Kama.

Smarana

("remembering") One of the standard religious practices mentioned in lists of religiously meritorious actions. Smarana is most often associated with deities but is also mentioned in conjunction with sacred sites (tirthas), one's spiritual teacher (guru), or even particular acts of worship. This practice involves thinking constantly upon the deity, person, place, or object, and in the case of a deity this often involves mental recitation of the deity's name. The primary emphasis in this practice is to create habitual behavioral patterns that, over the long term, will have beneficial effects on one's character.

Smarta

Name for a particular group of brahmins distinguished not by region or family, but by the religious texts that they hold most authoritative. For the Smartas, the most authoritative texts are the texts known as the smritis—either the texts themselves or commentaries and compilations based on them. The smritis or "remembered" texts were a class of literature that, although deemed important, were considered less authoritative than the shrutis or "heard" texts. In brief, the shrutis denoted the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts, whereas the smritis included the dharma literature, the Bhagavad Gita, the Mahabharata, and Ramayana, and the collection known as the puranas. The Smartas thus stand in contrast with sectarian brahmins, whether Shaiva (devotees of Shiva) or Vaishnava (devotees of Vishnu), for whom their particular sectarian scriptures have the highest religious authority. Smarta brahmins can therefore claim to be following the oldest and best established religious texts and thus in some way to be the most orthodox. Since Smartas are distinguished by their authoritative texts and practice rather than by the deity they worship, individual Smartas may worship different Hindu deities, and many do. Yet particularly in southern India, many Smartas perform the panchayatana puja to the five divine forms—Vishnu, Shiva, Surya, Ganesh, and the Goddess—which is intended to show the ultimate unity behind the differing manifestations of divinity.

Smrti

("[that which is] remembered") An important class of Hindu religious literature that, despite its sacrality, is deemed less authoritative than the other major category, shruti. According to tradition, the shruti ("heard") texts were not composed by human beings but are based in the primordial vibrations of the cosmos itself. The ancient sages, whose faculties of perception had been sharpened through rigorous religious practice, were able to “hear” and understand these vibrations, and transmitted them to others in a lineage of learning. The smrti texts, in contrast, are attributed to human authors, who are putting forth matters that are “remembered” and thus carry with them the possibility of error. The smrti literature is wider and much more varied than the shruti, which is restricted to the texts in the Vedas; smrti literature includes the dharma literature, the sectarian compilations known as puranas, the two great epics (Mahabharata and Ramayana), the Bhagavad Gita, and the tantras, which are manuals detailing the secret, ritually based religious practice of tantra followers. Although theoretically the smrtis have less religious authority than the shrutis, in practical terms they are often far more important, in part because their contents are much better known. This is particularly true for sectarian Hinduism, in which a group’s sectarian literature will often be given the highest religious authority.

Snana

(“bath”) Bathing is arguably the single most commonly performed Hindu religious act, and it is a necessary one before performing any rite or worship. An early morning bath is the norm for just about all Hindus, and this has been true for centuries. The earliest European visitors invariably remarked on this practice, since some of these visitors bathed only a few times in their lives. For Hindus, bathing not only keeps one clean but is a way to regain ritual purity by using water (most commonly) to remove any source of defilement.
Bathing is normally the last part of one's morning rites, preceded by cleaning one's teeth and tongue, rinsing the mouth (achamana), and (immediately before bathing) voiding one's bladder and bowels. These latter acts are a necessary part of life, but they also render one ritually impure, a state that the bath removes. People generally perform any daily worship immediately after bathing, while this ritual purity is still unbroken.

Most people bathe only in the morning, although those scrupulously concerned with purity (generally brahmmins or ascetics) will bathe more often. The bath itself is usually quite brief and in some cases consists of simply immersing oneself in a natural body of water, or pouring a bucket of water over one's head. In modern times people often use soap, but the traditionally prescribed cleansing medium is earth. It is preferable to bathe in running water, since the bath purifies by removing the impurity (ashaucha) and carrying it away and although bathing in a large pond is seen as acceptable, bathing in a bathtub is seen as simply spreading the impurity around rather than getting rid of it. Although the most common medium for bathing is water, when this is impossible one can ritually cleanse oneself with oil, or one can perform ritual cleansing with mantras by using sacred sounds to remove defilement and bring one to a state of ritual purity.

In the context of worship, snana is the sixth of the sixteen traditional upacharas ("offerings") given to a deity as part of worship, on the model of treating the deity as an honored guest. In this offering, the deity is bathed, either literally or symbolically. The underlying motive here, as for all the upacharas, is to show one's love for the deity and minister to the deity's needs.

Snataka
("[one who has] bathed") In the dharma literature, this is the name for a young man who had performed the samavartana samskara, the life-cycle ceremony that marks the end of his stage of life as a celibate student (brahmcharin) and return to his parental home. The most important element in the rite was a bath, after which he changed into new clothes, marking his change in status. Before doing this he was supposed to ask his guru's permission, and also to give him his teacher's fee (dakshina), both as payment for services rendered and as a sign of respect. A young man who had performed this rite would be eligible to get married, and the literature prescribes that this should follow in short order.

Solah Somvar Vrat
A religious vow (vrat) that is a variant of the worship of the god Shiva prescribed for every Monday (Somvar), the day of the week over which he is believed to preside. In the Solah Somvar Vrat, the observer vows to do perform this rite for sixteen (solah) consecutive Mondays. Each week's observance is marked by fasting (upavasa), worship, and reading aloud the charter myth for this particular observance. As with most literature pertaining to such rites, the text ends with a catalog of the benefits brought by the rite—in essence, it gives whatever one desires.

According to the vow's charter myth, as Shiva and his wife Parvati are playing dice in a temple, Parvati asks a nearby brahmin which of them will win, and when he replies that it will be Shiva, she angrily curses him to be afflicted with leprosy. The curse comes true (as with all curses in Indian mythology) and the brahmin is in a terrible state. Shiva takes pity on the brahmin, tells him to perform the Solah Somvar Vrat, and on the sixteenth Monday, the brahmin is completely cured. Some time later Parvati sees him and is amazed at his recovery. When she asks how he has been cured, the brahmin tells her about the vow, which she later uses to cure her son of disobedience (thus emphasizing the power of the vow, since it is even used by the gods themselves).
Solar Line

In Hindu mythology, one of the two great lineages, the other being the Lunar Line. The Solar Line traces its descent from Ikshvaku, the grandson of the Sun himself. Its descendants include many of the principal characters in the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics. One of these descendants is Rama himself. In many of the small former princely states in Rajasthan, the rulers claimed descent from the Solar Line as a way to establish and support their royal authority. Although they no longer wield ruling power, many of these royal houses still exist, and thus this lineage is believed to be still extant.

Soma

Soma is one of the most enigmatic deities in the Hindu tradition. The 120 hymns to soma in the Rg Veda, the oldest Hindu sacred text, variously describe soma as a plant, as the juice pressed from that plant, and as the deified form of both juice and plant. The Vedic hymns give detailed descriptions of how the sacrificial priests pressed it, strained and filtered it, and finally consumed it, which then brought visions upon them. These hymns portray soma as some sort of mind-altering substance, although there is no general agreement on what the soma plant might be. Its identity has been lost since late Vedic times, and since then various substitutes have been used in rituals.

Although the hymns describe soma as hallucinogenic, one need not take this literally. One can explain such visions in purely psychological terms, as induced or fostered by the priests’ heightened expectations in the sacrificial arena. If one assumes that soma was actually mind-altering, it could not have been an alcoholic beverage—since it was prepared and consumed on the same day, this would have given no time for fermentation. One theory is that soma was hashish (charas), which is still consumed in certain ritual contexts. The most intriguing theory was proposed by R. G. Wasson, who contended that soma was Amonita muscaria, a mind-altering mushroom that has a long history of use in Asian shamanic traditions. Although Wasson’s theory would explain soma’s ability to take immediate effect, many Indologists have taken issue with this claim. See Robert Gordon Wasson, Soma, 1971; for contrary remarks, see J. Brough, “Soma and Amonita Muscaria,” in The Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, Vol. 34, 1971.

Somavati Amavasya

Religious observance celebrated when a new moon (amavasya) falls on a Monday, which can thus occur in any month in the year. On the new moon day the sun and moon travel together during the daylight sky, and when this happens on the Monday, whose presiding planet is the moon, this confluence is deemed particularly favorable. Another auspicious connection arises because Monday’s presiding deity, the god Shiva, also has mythic connections with the moon. A Somavati Amavasya is thus judged a particularly beneficial time to worship Shiva, as well as to bathe (snana) in a sacred river such as the Ganges, or to perform any other religious act.

Someshvara I

(r. 1042–1068) Monarch in the Chalukya dynasty. Aside from his long reign, he is most noted for performing religious suicide by intentionally drowning himself in the Tungabhadra River when his mental faculties began to wane. Although in general suicide was strongly condemned, suicide by a person suffering from a terminal disease or enduring chronic pain was a well-attested exception to this rule. This sort of suicide was performed according to a well-defined ritual, which was intended to put the performer in the proper frame of mind. In about the twelfth century this was declared one of the rites “forbidden in... the Kali [Age]” (Kalivarjya), although it had been permitted in earlier times.

Somnath

Temple and sacred site (tirtha) in the state of Gujarat. The temple is named for its presiding deity—the god Shiva in his manifestation as the “Lord of the Moon.” Shiva is present at Somnath in the form of a linga, the pillar-shaped image that is his symbolic form, and the Somnath linga is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites deemed especially sacred to Shiva, and at which he is uniquely present. According to the site’s charter myth, the moon is married to all of the twenty-seven nakshatras, or signs in the lunar zodiac, but he loves Rohini nakshatra so much that he stays with her all the time, and neglects his other twenty-six wives. His father-in-law Daksha protests to the moon, but when he refuses to give them equal time, Daksha lays a curse on him that he will lose all his light. The moon overcomes this curse by worshiping Shiva at Somnath for six continuous months and is given the boon that he will only shrink during half the lunar month, and that during the other half he will grow. As a sign of this gift, Shiva takes residence there as Somnath, and remains to this day.

Aside from its importance as a sacred site, the Somnath temple is a potent political symbol. The original temple was razed and pillaged by Mahmud of Ghazni in 1024, who reportedly carried off astounding booty. The present temple at Somnath was built after Indian independence in 1947 and consecrated in 1951. As a symbol, Somnath is thus associated with past oppression and depredation, and with the revitalization of Hindu culture in India. For this reason, the Somnath temple is a popular image for proponents of Hindutva, an idea that identifies Hindu identity and Indian citizenship.

Sonar

In traditional northern Indian society, a Hindu jati whose hereditary occupation was gold smithing and jewelry making. Traditional Indian society was modeled as a collection of endogamous, or inter-married, subgroups known as jatis (“birth”). These jatis were organized
Song of Manik Chandra

Traditional Bengali song describing the adventures of the mythical king Manik Chandra, his wife Mayana, and their son Gopi Chand; the latter figures are the primary characters, since Manik Chandra dies early in the story. The text is a romance but also contains many of the doctrines associated with the Nathpanthi ascetics. In particular, Queen Mayana has power over Yama (death personified), which was one of the primary aims of the Nathpanthi ascetics. Furthermore, she acquired this power through the spiritual instruction given by her guru Gorakhnath, the Nathpanthi founder.

Her power over death is shown in various ways. When her husband dies, Mayana descends to Yama’s realm and physically abuses both Yama and his minions. In his flight Yama changes into various forms to escape Mayana’s wrath, but she is never deceived and continues to harass him. On other occasions, she shows her power over death by her inability to be killed. She mounts her husband’s funeral pyre, and although the fire burns for seven days and nine nights, not even her clothing is scorched. Many years later, Mayana survives seven fearsome ordeals, such as boiling in oil. When asked how she acquired these magical arts, she replies that Gorakhnath himself taught her. The appearance of such ideas in an essentially popular tale shows how deeply these ideas had sunk into the popular mind.

Sons

It is difficult to overstate the importance traditional Hindu culture has placed on the need for sons, and the cultural bias for sons over daughters. Religious motives underlie one important reason for this bias, since only sons are entitled to perform the memorial offerings for the dead known as shraddhas. The men in each generation are responsible for making these offerings to their ancestors. They are in turn obliged to have sons of their own, so that the family lineage and the chain of ancestral offerings remains unbroken through the generations. Sonless couples are not completely out of luck, since sons can be obtained through adoption.

The other major reason behind the preference for sons lies in far more pragmatic motives. According to the traditional Indian marriage pattern, daughters move into their marital homes and become members of their marital families, whereas sons bring their brides into the home and through their own families continue the family line. Thus, parents sometimes see their daughters as “temporary” family members, while their sons are “permanent.” The sons will dwell in their natal house their entire lives, support their parents in old age, and produce the family’s future generations. These traditional practices and beliefs still hold very strong, although the forces of modernity have affected the joint family. It has become more common for husbands and wives to live separately from the husband’s parents.

The religious, economic, and social factors behind this preference for sons have sometimes had terrible consequences. Consciously or unconsciously, sons may be favored over daughters in many significant ways. Sons are often given better access to education and economic opportunities, because men are traditionally required to support their families. A similar presumption lies behind the inequities in traditional Hindu inheritance laws, which give the sons a much larger share of the inheritance. In poorer families, sons may even get preference for basic needs such as food and access to medical care. Despite these patterns, in contemporary times many families treat all their children with equal love and care. Given the trend toward smaller families, the birth of a daughter can be cause for as much rejoicing as that of a son.

Sopashraya

("using a support") One of the sitting postures (asana) described in commentaries to the Yoga Sutras of Patanjali, the foundational text for the practice of yoga. The name of this posture derives from a wooden support used by the sitter to keep erect, often portrayed as a crutch-shaped prop under the chin.

Soratha

Metrical form in northern Indian devotional (bhakti) poetry, made up of two lines of twenty-four metric beats, divided unevenly after the eleventh beat. The metric pattern for the first line is 6+4+1, with the pattern for the second line being 6+4+3. The soratha is thus an inversion of the metrical form doha. Although the soratha was a common poetic form, the dhoa was far more popular and widely used.

South Africa

One of the countries with significant Hindu diaspora populations. This is particularly true in Natal province, where Hindus were first brought as indentured agricultural laborers, but there is a significant Hindu presence in other parts of the country as well. South Africa is best known as the place where Mohandas K. Gandhi first developed and refined his program of nonviolent resistance, or satyagraha, which he employed in the service of the Indian community there. In contemporary times the South African Hindu community, as with many Hindu diaspora communities, has loosened religious ties to India, and is in the process of forming a Hindu religious life in another geographical setting.

Space

One of the five elements in traditional Indian cosmology, the others being earth, fire, water, and wind. Akasha or “space” is not conceived in the sense of “outer space,” but rather the space between or within visible objects on earth. For example, an “empty” pitcher was not actually empty, but was filled with space, until it was displaced by some fluid. This elemental sense of space was thus something closer to what might be considered the “atmosphere,” and was actually seen as having fluidlike properties. In some philosophical schools, each of the elements is paired with one of the five senses; here akasha is associated with hearing, since it is believed to convey the sound from place to place.

Sphota

("disclosure") Crucial element in the theory of language propounded by Bhartrhari (7th c.). Bhartrhari was the founder of the Grammarians, a philosophical school that conceived of Brahman, the Supreme Reality, as being manifested in sound, particularly the sound of the spoken word. According to this theory, a verbal utterance had three elements: the sound or sounds produced by the speaker and heard by the listener; a phonological pattern, of which that utterance is an instance; and finally the sphota, which was expressed by the sounds and signified the object of that utterance. According to Bhartrhari, sphota had to be postulated to explain how words could carry meaning. They do so because they are connected to the sphota, which designated a particular object, and in producing the sounds the speaker expressed that sphota.

Sri Lanka

Island nation off the southeastern coast of India, formerly known as Ceylon. Local tradition claims that Sri Lanka was the place at which the biblical Adam alighted from paradise. Yet despite the island’s idyllic natural beauty, its human geography has been far more troubled. Since 1981 the nation has been in the throes of civil war between the Sinhalese and the Tamils, the island’s two major ethnic groups. The Sinhalese comprise about 70 percent of the population, are largely Buddhist, live mainly in southern, western, and central Sri Lanka, and consider themselves the island’s traditional inhabitants. The Tamils comprise little more than 20 percent of the population, are both Hindu and Christian, and are concentrated in the north and east. The Tamils came to Sri Lanka in two different ways—about half are descended from medieval invaders, who established Tamil kingdoms in northern Sri Lanka after crossing the straits from southern India, others were brought to Sri Lanka in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, to serve as laborers on tea plantations.

Since independence in 1948, the Tamils have been at a distinct disadvantage vis-à-vis the Sinhalese, whose majority has allowed them to control virtually all aspects of national life. This precarious position was often further undermined by anti-Tamil riots, particularly in Colombo, the nation’s capital. In 1981 Tamil groups began a struggle for an independent nation in the Tamil-majority areas. The Sinhalese majority was deathly opposed to this notion, and since then Sri Lanka has been marked by periods of vicious civil war. Given their slimmer resources, the Tamils have tended to wage guerrilla warfare. Their soldiers are famous for wearing a cyanide capsule around their necks with which to commit suicide if captured. These soldiers are also notorious for their willingness to serve as human bombs, striking against civilian populations in urban areas. In 1991 one such human bomb was responsible for the assassination of former Indian Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi in revenge for Gandhi’s perceived treachery in cooperating with the Sri Lankan government. Although the Tamil regions have been offered limited autonomy by Chandrika Kumaratunga, Sri Lanka’s present prime minister, the conflict has been so bitter that it is not likely to be easily resolved.

Sri Lanka has traditionally been part of the Indian cultural orbit and has a long history of cultural exchanges with India. According to local tradition, Buddhism was brought to Sri Lanka from India in the third century B.C.E. by Mahinda, who was the son of the Mauryan emperor Ashoka. Another sign of this connection is that Sri Lanka contains an important Hindu pilgrimage place (tirtha), Kataragama, located near the island’s southern coast. Kataragama’s perceived power draws Hindus from abroad as well as Sri Lankans from all religious communities. Although Kataragama is Sri Lanka’s only major Hindu site, the northern regions strongly reflect the Tamil culture of the region’s population, which stems from their geographic roots. See also Tamil Nadu.

Stages of Life
As described in the dharma literature, there were four stages (ashramas) in the life of a twice-born man, that is, a man born into one of the three “twice-born” groups in Indian society—brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya—who are eligible for the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” In the first stage, immediately after this initiation, the young man would live as a celibate student (brahmacharin) studying the Vedas in his guru’s household. The second stage was that of the householder (grhastha), in which he would marry, raise a family, and engage in worldly life. In the third stage, as a forest-dwelling hermit (vanaprastha), he would gradually detach himself from worldly entanglements. The final stage was as a total renunciant (Sanyasi), who had given up all things in a search for the ultimate religious truth. These four stages are an idealized progression and should not be understood as describing actual practice, since most men never pass beyond the householder stage of life and have no desire to do so.

Beneath this idealized progression lies the tension between two differing modes of religious life—that of the householder, which is based in the world, and that of the ascetic, which renounces the world. The latter ideal originated with the religious adepts known as the shramanas and evolved into the monastic asceticism of the Buddhists and Jains, which was portrayed as a superior religious path than the householder’s life. Both these groups were highly influential—the Jains had a significant presence in southern Indian society up to the eighth century C.E.—and it is generally accepted that the pattern of the four ashramas was evolved as a way to appropriate and transform this stress on ascetic life. The doctrine of the four stages provided a place and time for asceticism, but as the last stage, at the end of one’s life. The clear message was that one should engage in the search for religious truth only after fulfilling one’s social and ancestral duties.

Steya

(“theft”) In the dharma literature, one of the Four Great Crimes whose commission made one an outcast from society; steya was theft of a brahmin’s gold, above a certain specified amount. One guilty of this crime was to go to the king bearing an iron club and receive a blow to the head intended to be fatal. This blow would absolve the sin, whether or not one actually died, although one was also expected to restore the stolen property. For lesser amounts of gold the punishment was less severe and satisfied by fasting (upavasa) and other penance (prayashchitta). The stress on the seriousness of this sin clearly reflects the interests of the brahmins, who undoubtedly wrote most of the dharma literature.

Sthala Murti

(“fixed image”) Image of a deity that is fixed in a certain place and does not move from it (in the case of stone images, this is often because such images are so large and heavy that moving them is virtually impossible). The other sort of image is the utsava murti, a movable image used during festival processions.

Sthunakarna

In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Sthunakarna is a nature spirit (yaksha) who exchanges sexes with Shikhandi, the rebirth of the maiden Amba, daughter of the king of Kashi.

Stridhan

(“woman’s wealth”) Term denoting any property owned or inherited by a woman, which usually included any gifts given to her by her family or money that she earned herself. In the patrilineal inheritance systems prescribed by texts such as the Mitakshara and the Dayabhaga, stridhan was not considered part of the family property, but a woman’s personal property that she could dispose of as she pleased. Stridhan could be inherited, but the inheritance patterns were different than those for family property. The primary inheritors were a woman’s daughters; for women with no daughters, the ownership would devolve to her husband and his heirs, or to her birth family.

Stridharma

Term denoting “women’s religious duty” (dharma), the set of social roles, rules, and duties broadly conceived as applying to all women. In the dharma literature, it was generally assumed that appropriate women’s roles were as daughters, wives, and mothers, and that their lives would be primarily defined by their relationships with men—whether fathers, brothers, husbands, or sons. As described in the dharma literature, their position seems to have had status, but little authority. One well-known passage from the Manu Smrti warns that a woman must never be independent, but always under the guardianship of a man; this is followed by an equally famous passage warning that the treatment of women was a marker of the family’s honor, and that a household in which the women were badly treated would disappear. In real life women exercised considerably more power than in this theoretical model, but such power usually came later in life, when a woman’s sons had formed families of their own, and she had thus become the matriarch of an extended family.

Subhadra
The divine sister of the god Jagannath, who is invariably pictured with him and their brother Balabhadra. The most important site for these three deities is the Jagannath temple in the city of Puri, at which Jagannath is the presiding deity. Although Jagannath is identified with the god Krishna, he is generally considered an autochthonous (“of the land”) deity who was originally the local deity of Puri. He has been assimilated into the Hindu pantheon by his identification with Krishna.

One piece of evidence for this theory is the deities’ invariable appearance, with Jagannath (Krishna) on the right, his brother Balabhadra (Balarama) on the left, and Subhadra as a smaller figure in the center. Such a triadic grouping is virtually unknown in Krishna devotion, which tends to stress either Krishna alone or the divine couple of Krishna and Radha. The female figure of Subhadra is also very unusual, since as Jagannath’s sister she is ineligible for the amorous adventures usually associated with Krishna. Although Jagannath is the most important of the three deities, the identifications with the other two also reveal larger syncretizing tendencies. Balabhadra is sometimes identified as a form of the god Shiva, and Subhadra as the powerful goddess Durga. In this way, Puri’s divine trio embody the three most important Hindu deities. For further information on Subhadra and her brothers, the best source is Anncharlott Eschmann, Hermann Kulke, and Gaya Charan Tripathi, The Cult of Jagannath and the Regional Traditions of Orissa, 1978.

Subodhini
(“Greatly enlightening”) A name given to commentaries on various texts—presumably because of the commentary’s ability to illuminate the text. The most famous of these commentaries, to which the name Subodhini is often understood to refer, is the one by Vallabhacharya (1479–1531) on the Bhagavata Purana. The Bhagavata Purana is one of the later sectarian compendia known as puranas, and it is the most important source for the mythology of the god Krishna, whom Vallabhacharya considered the Supreme Being. Vallabhacharya’s Subodhini lays out the basic doctrines of his religious community, known as the Pushti Marg because of their stress on god’s grace, which they called pushti, meaning “that which nourishes the soul.”

Subrahmanya
(“dear to brahmins”) Epithet of the god Skanda, particularly in his southern Indian manifestation as Murugan. See Skanda and Murugan.

Subtle Body
Alternate human physiological system that exists on a different plane than gross matter, but has certain correspondences with the anatomy of the material body. Different parts of the subtle body contain the microcosmic forms of the deities Shiva and Shakti, the bipolar forces believed to be the powers behind the cosmos. The subtle body is thus based on the principle of the homology, or essential similarities, of macrocosm and microcosm, a fundamental Hindu idea since the time of the Upanishads. The Sanskrit texts describing the subtle body assume that there are different planes of reality, and thus that the subtle body actually exists, but given the network of symbols associated with it, one need not accept its literal reality for it to be religiously meaningful.

The subtle body is visualized as a set of six psychic centers (chakras), running roughly along the course of the spine: the muladhara chakra at the base of the spine, the svadishthana chakra in the genital region, the manipura chakra in the navel region, the anahata chakra in the heart region, the vishuddha chakra in the throat region, and the ajna chakra is in the forehead between the eyebrows. Associated with each of these chakras is an elaborate symbolic system: All six can be seen as symbols for a human physiological capacity; the first five are associated with one of the subtle elements (tanmatras), and the sixth with thought.
The lotus petals on each chakra contain a letter of the Sanskrit alphabet, thus encompassing all sacred sounds. Some models of the subtle body are even more developed, with each chakra associated with a certain color and a certain presiding deity.

These centers are capped at the top of the head by the “thousand-petaled lotus” (sahasradalapadma), which is the abode of Shiva in the human body. Connecting all of the centers are three vertical channels (nadi)—the ida nadi on the left, the pingala nadi on the right, and the sushumna in the center. Coiled three times around the muladhara chakra is the kundalini, the latent spiritual force in all human beings. This is considered an aspect of the universal Shakti, or feminine divine power, but in most people is regarded as dormant, symbolized by its coiled state. The separation of Shakti and Shiva at the opposite ends of the subtle body also symbolizes the ordinary person’s unenlightened state, since enlightenment transcends this duality, and the two deities are united and identical.

The subtle body is a fundamental aspect of tantra practices and some forms of yoga. In the types of yoga that focus on the subtle body, including kundalini yoga, the ultimate aim is to awaken and straighten the kundalini, moving it up the sushumna through the chakras to the abode of Shiva. Since the kundalini is nothing but raw energy, the process must be carefully controlled to prevent the aspirant from unleashing uncontrollable forces, and manuals warn against doing this without being under the supervision of a spiritual teacher (guru). The union of Shiva and Shakti in the aspirant’s body mirrors the action of these divine forces in the macrocosm, and with this union the aspirant gains bliss and final liberation of the soul (moksha). For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1959; Philip S. Rawson, The Art of Tantra, 1973; Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1977; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Suchi Hasta
In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, a particular hand gesture (hasta), in which the hand is closed except for the index finger, which is pointing downward to indicate something to the viewer. The word suchi means “needle” but is derived from a verb that can mean either “to pierce” or “to indicate”—both meanings that imply focusing on a particular place.

Sudama
In Hindu mythology, one of the god Krishna’s childhood friends who is a symbol for god’s grace and providence. In later life Sudama is desperately poor and, at his wife’s urging, goes to beg for help from his childhood friend, who is now the king of Dwaraka. Sudama is so poor that the only gift he can bring for Krishna is a small packet of parched rice, but Krishna greets him and graciously accepts it. The two have an enjoyable visit in which they reminisce about old times, and Sudama goes home without asking for anything. Some of the stories explain this lapse as stemming from shame, but in others Sudama is portrayed as having had such a nice time that he simply forgets. During his homeward journey Sudama worries over the reception he will get from his wife, but when he arrives he discovers that his hut has been transformed into a palace by Krishna’s divine power, and from that day he is never poor again.

Sudarshana
In Hindu mythology, the name for the god Vishnu’s discus weapon (chakra), which is fashioned by Vishvakarma, the workman and architect of the gods. According to the story, Vishvakarma has married his daughter Sanjna to the sun, but she finds her husband’s brightness too much to bear. To help his daughter adjust, Vishvakarma trims off some bits of the sun with his divine tools, removing enough of his radiance that Sanjna can bear to be with him. He then fashions the trimmed-off portions into Vishnu’s Sudarshana chakra, Shiva’s trident, and various other divine weapons, as well as the Pushpak Viman, an aerial car. Sudarshana’s divine source makes it a fearful weapon, and it is thus able to decimate any enemy.

Sudarshana Sampraday
Another name for the Nimbarki religious community, since their founder Nimbarka was believed to be an incarnation of Sudarshana, Vishnu’s weapon.

Sugriva
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, a monkey king and an ally of the god Rama in his struggle to regain his kidnapped wife Sita. Sugriva and his brother Bali jointly rule the kingdom of Kishkindha but become enemies because of a misunderstanding. On one occasion the two are fighting a magician who has taken refuge in a cave. Bali goes in, after instructing Sugriva on certain signs that will indicate which of them has been killed. Sugriva waits outside the cave for a year, and then sees the sign indicating his brother’s death, which the cunning magician has engineered during his own death. Thinking that his brother is dead, Sugriva rolls a stone over the mouth of the cave to trap the magician, and returns home. Bali eventually manages to get out of the cave and, thinking that his brother has used this opportunity to get rid of him, forces Sugriva into exile and keeps Sugriva’s wife as his own. Sugriva lives in exile until he makes an alliance with Rama, who kills Bali by shooting him while Bali fights with Sugriva. After regaining his kingdom, Sugriva is a faithful ally to Rama, and with his monkey armies aids in the conquest of Lanka.

Suicide
An act whose permissibility and consequences have elicited varying opinions over time. In medieval times commentators distinguished between several types of suicide, depending on the circumstances surrounding the act. Any suicide prompted by an overpowering emotional impulse such as rage or grief was always strictly forbidden, and those who did this were said to reap dire karmic consequences. Another case entirely was suicide performed as an expiation (prayashchitta) for one’s sins, which was often prescribed to expiate one of the Four Great Crimes. A third type was suicide by people suffering from a terminal disease, or who were in chronic pain. This sort of suicide was performed according to a well-defined ritual, intended to put the performer in the proper frame of mind. This third category was one of the rites designated as “forbidden in the Kali [Age]” (Kalivarjya), although it had been permitted in earlier times. The most fascinating sort of suicide was at pilgrimage places (tirtha), particularly at Allahabad. This was also done according to a very specific ritual, and part of the ritual required the performer to name the benefit for which the rite was being performed—in some cases liberation of the soul (moksha), in other cases life in heaven for many eons. This practice is well documented up to the seventeenth century, although it is no longer done in contemporary times.

Sulfur
A pivotal substance in Indian alchemy, the conceptual foundation for which is its analysis of the world as a series of bipolar opposites in tension with one another, and the conviction that unifying these opposing forces brings spiritual progress and the end of reincarnation (samsara). Hindu alchemy shares this model of uniting or transcending opposing forces with Hindu tantra, a secret, ritually based system of religious practice, and with hatha yoga, which is based on a series of physical exercises that are also believed to affect the subtle body.

In the alchemical tradition, the governing metaphor for this combination of opposites is the union of sun and moon. Both are connected to other opposing principles through an elaborate series of associations, in keeping with this bipolar symbolism. In Hindu alchemical conceptions, sulfur is conceived of as the uterine blood of Shakti, and thus a powerful element. It is also identified with the sun, with heat, dryness, and withering force. When sulfur is mixed and consumed with elemental mercury, which is identified with the god Shiva's semen, the aspirant's gross body is purified and refined, eventually rendering it immortal. Modern descriptions of this practice invariably warn that it should only be carried out under the direction of one's guru (spiritual teacher), since otherwise the combination will be harmful. This warning is not surprising, since by itself mercury is a deadly poison. For further information see Shashibhusan B. Dasgupta, Obscure Religious Cults, 1962; and David Gordon White, The Alchemical Body, 1996.

Sulva Sutras
("aphorisms on measurement") A collection of brief sayings giving the exact rules for constructing the sacrificial altars for the public Vedic sacrifices. The Sulva Sutras were connected to the Shrauta Sutras, which laid down the ritual prescriptions for these rites, of which the preparation of the site was an obvious necessity. Given the premise that the sacrifice would be unsuccessful unless it was performed exactly right, such precise attention to the altar's construction seems a necessary consequence.

Sumitra
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Sumitra is one of the three wives of King Dasharatha and the mother of Rama's half-brothers, the twins Lakshmana and Shatrughna. In their fidelity and service to Rama, her sons are important characters in the epic, but aside from bearing them, Sumitra has little importance.

Sun
In Hindu astrology (jyotisha), a planet generally associated with strength and vitality, although it can be malevolent, possibly reflecting the relentless destructive power of the Indian sun. The sun's vitality makes it a strong planet, and as in Western astrology the sun's position in the zodiac plays a major role in fixing a person's natal horoscope.
The sun presides over
Sunday, a day of the week that is not strongly marked as either auspicious or inauspicious. See also Surya.

Sundaramurtti
(8th c.) The last of the Nayanars, a group of sixty-three southern Indian poet-saints who were devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. Along with their contemporaries the Alvars, who were devotees of Vishnu, the Nayanars spearheaded the revitalization of Hindu religion through their passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language. Along with his predecessors, Appar and Sambandar, Sundaramurtti actively opposed the heterodox sects of the times, particularly the Jains, whom he reviles in his poems. The collected hymns of the three most important Nayanars—Appar, Sambandar, and Sundaramurtti—comprise the Devaram, the most sacred of the Tamil Shaivite texts. Sundaramurtti is also important for his catalog of the sixty-three Nayanars, which forms the first literary source for Tamil Shaivite hagiography.

Sundareshvara
(The “Handsome Lord”) Epithet of the god Shiva in his manifestation as the husband of the goddess Minakshi. Minakshi is the presiding deity of the Minakshi temple in the city of Madurai in the state of Tamil Nadu. See Shiva.

Sunday
(Ravivar) First day of the Hindu week, whose presiding planet (and deity) is the sun (ravi). As a day, Sunday is considered generally auspicious but not particularly powerful, probably because the sun is acknowledged as a deity but is not widely worshiped as a primary one.

The Sun Temple at Konarak, Orissa. It was built in the thirteenth century to resemble the chariot that was believed to carry the sun.
Sun Temple
The most famous temple to the sun is at Konarak in Orissa state, right on the shore of the Bay of Bengal. The temple was built by King Narasimhadeva (r. 1238–1264), a monarch in the Ganga dynasty, and the entire temple was intended to be a likeness of the sun's chariot. It has twelve great wheels carved on the sides at the temple's lowest level, and in front, statues of several colossal horses. As at the temples of Khajuraho, the lower levels here are covered with erotic and sexually explicit carvings, to which people have given differing interpretations: Some claim that these sanction carnal pleasure as a religious path, some interpret them allegorically as representing human union with the divine, and still others view them as teaching that the desire for pleasure must ultimately be transcended to attain the divine.

The temple was built on a massive scale; according to one estimate, the central spire would have been over 200 feet high. It is uncertain whether this spire was ever actually completed, since the sandy soil on which the temple platform was built would have been unable to support the weight of such an enormous structure. This same unstable soil has been the greatest contributor to the temple's increasing deterioration. The primary structure left at the site is the jagamohan (assembly hall), which was filled with sand in the nineteenth century, in an effort to prevent further collapse. For further information see Roy Craven, Indian Art, 1997.

Suparna
("having beautiful wings") Epithet of the god Vishnu's vehicle, the divine eagle Garuda. See Garuda.

Superhuman Powers
Widely believed to be attainable, either through voluntarily suffering harsh physical asceticism (tapas) or as products of high spiritual attainment. See Siddhi.

Surapana
("liquor-drinking") In the dharma literature, one of the Four Great Crimes whose commission made one an outcast from society. Although in modern times the word sura is the term for "wine," here it was believed to refer to a particular type of spirituous liquor made from rice flour. For members of the three highest social groups—brahmins, kshatriyas, and vaishyas, the most commonly prescribed penance (prayashchitta) for habitually drinking sura was to drink this same beverage boiling hot, until one died. Interestingly, this penalty does not apply to members of the lowest social class, the shudras. This difference reflected their lower status, in which they were not held to the same sorts of scrupulous standards as the "twice-born." Despite the harsh penalty for drinking sura, there were other sorts of intoxicants that kshatriyas and vaishyas could drink without penalty, although brahmins who drank these had to perform mild penances.

Surasa
In Hindu mythology, Surasa is the mother of all the Nagas, a class of minor divinities conceived in the form of serpents. In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Surasa takes the form of a gigantic serpent to test the fortitude of the monkey-god Hanuman, who jumps over the sea to Lanka to search for Sita, the god Rama's kidnapped wife. Surasa tells Hanuman that no one can go by without passing through her mouth, and in response Hanuman makes himself larger and larger. Surasa in turn opens her jaws wider and wider, and finally Hanuman becomes very small and darts in and out of her mouth. Surasa, pleased with Hanuman's ingenuity and courage, gives him her blessing.

Surat-Shabd-Yoga
Mystical discipline in the Radha Soami religious community, which stresses the... joining (yoga) of the spirit (surat) with the Divine Sound (shabd). The Divine Sound emanates from the Supreme Being and is always present. Most people cannot hear it due to their preoccupation with worldly things. With proper training and devotion to a true guru (satguru), anyone can eventually become attuned to the Divine Sound, and resonate in harmony with it. The most important part of this path is contact with a true guru, since only a true guru has access to the divine and is considered a manifestation of the divine itself. Devotion to a true guru is the single most important factor in a person's spiritual development, and this spiritual progress hinges on complete surrender to the guru's grace.

This metaphor of the Divine Sound, and human resonance with it, has much in common with the images used by Guru Nanak, the first of the Sikh gurus, and with the Nathpanthis before him. The overwhelming stress on a guru makes it possible for this religious discipline to be practiced by just about anyone, and most of the Radha Soami followers are householders living in the world rather than ascetics. For further information see Sudhir Kakar, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1990; Lawrence Babb, Redemptive Encounters, 1987; and Mark Juergensmeyer, Radha-soami Reality, 1991.

Surdas
(early 16th c.) One of the ashtachap, a group of eight northern Indian bhakti (devotional) poets. The compositions of these eight poets were used for liturgical purposes by the Pushti Marg, a religious community whose members are devotees (bhakta) of Krishna. In the Pushti Marg's sectarian literature, all eight poets are also named as members of the community and as associates of either the community's founder, Vallabhabhacharya, or his successor Vitthalnath. In this literature, as recounted in the Chaurasi Vaishnava ki Varta ("Lives of eighty-four Vaishnavas"), it was at Vallabhabhacharya's order that Surdas began to compose poems about Krishna's Illa, his playful interactions with the world and his devotees. He then proceeded to compose the 5,000-odd poems of the Sursagar.

The oldest manuscripts paint a much different picture of Surdas, for most of them contain only a few hundred poems, which are usually quite short. The most important themes in the early poetry are supplication (vinaya) and separation (viraha), and although one also finds the depictions of Krishna's childhood for which Surdas has become most famous, these themes are more important later in the poetic tradition. Surdas's poetry thus shows a wide range of themes, from his own spiritual life to devotional "glimpses" of Krishna; the latter most commonly explore the religious tension between the image of Krishna as a charming child and his alter ego as lord of the universe. As in much of Vaishnava devotional poetry, Surdas composed these poems to invite his hearers to enter Krishna's world.

The difference between these pictures raises doubts about the connection between Surdas and Vallabhabhacharya. Although songs by Surdas have been worked into the rites of the Pushti Marg, Surdas composed no poetry in praise of Vallabhabhacharya, unlike the other ashtachap poets. It seems just as likely that, as the popularity of Surdas's poems grew, he was "claimed" by the Pushti Marg as a fellow Krishna devotee. In fact, there is very little definitely known about him, including whether or not he was actually blind, as is generally accepted. Only two of the oldest poems mention blindness; one of these is clearly metaphorical, and the other is part of a litany of the woes of old age. As with so many of the bhakti poets, one knows a great deal more about the poems than the poet. Sureshvara Philosopher in the Advaita Vedanta school, and one of two attested disciples of the school’s founder, Shankaracharya (788–820?), the other being Padmapada. The Advaita school upholds a philosophical position known as monism, which is the belief that a single Ultimate Reality lies behind all things, and that all things are merely differing forms of that reality. Advaita proponents exemplify this belief in their claim that reality is nondual (advaita)—that is, that all things are nothing but the formless, unqualified Brahman, despite the appearance of difference and diversity. For Advaita proponents, the assumption that the world is real as perceived is a fundamental misunderstanding of the ultimate nature of things and a manifestation of avidya. Although often translated as “ignorance,” avidya is better understood as the lack of genuine understanding, which ultimately causes human beings to be trapped in karmic bondage, reincarnation (samsara), and suffering.

In Hindu thought, Sureshvara is the only explicit proponent of leap philosophy, although one can see traces of this in the other figures in Advaita Vedanta, particularly in his teacher. Leap philosophy affirms that one can attain complete freedom from bondage, which in the Indian context is identified as the end of reincarnation and final liberation of the soul (moksha), but that such freedom cannot be gained by a precisely specified sequence of causes and effects. According to Sureshvara, since the ultimate problem stems from one’s mistaken understanding, the only solution can come from purified, correct understanding. Sureshvara’s path, such as it is, is to use a negative dialectic to distinguish clearly what the Self is not, and when one’s mind has been prepared, to gain a flash of mystic insight through hearing one of the mahavakyas (“great utterances”) that identify the Self with Brahman. Sureshvara affirms that actions can have no part in this process, since action is bound up with the world and is pervaded by ignorance. For further information see A. J. Alston (trans.), The Naiskarmya Siddhi of Sri Suresvara, 1959; and Karl H. Potter (ed.), Advaita Vedanta up to Samkara and His Pupils, 1981.

Sursagar
(“Ocean of Sur”) Corpus of poetry in the Braj Bhasha language ascribed to the northern Indian poet-saint Surdas. Traditional versions of the Sursagar are divided into twelve parts, to mirror the structure of the Bhagavata Purana, which is the most important Sanskrit source for the mythology of the god Krishna. Surdas was a Krishna devotee (bhakta), and this arrangement is a way to confer the luster of an authoritative Sanskrit text on vernacular religious poetry. Just as the Bhagavata Purana lavishly describes Krishna’s youthful exploits, the Sursagar is most commonly associated with poems painting intimate and affectionate pictures of Krishna’s childhood.

Although the poetry published in editions of the Sursagar is ascribed to Surdas, most of it is certainly pseudonymous. The oldest manuscripts of Surdas’s poetry have at most a few hundred poems, and the size of this corpus roughly doubles every century, reaching the five thousand poems in the present Sursagar. The general tone of the earliest poems also shows a marked thematic difference. Although they include Krishna’s childhood, a far greater percentage express the poet’s pangs of separation (viraha) from Krishna or complaint (vinaya) about his spiritual troubles. Even the earliest manuscripts show no common body of poems, and it seems likely that from the very beginning the “Surdas” poetic tradition was drawn from the songs of wandering singers, a characterization that fits well with the image of the poet himself. For

Surya

The sun, both in its physical form as a celestial phenomenon and personified as a deity. The sun has been an important deity as far back as the Vedas, the earliest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts, and has retained a position of some importance since that time. One example of this is the Gayatri Mantra, a sacred formula that is supposed to be recited every day by twice-born males, that is, men from the three “twice-born” groups—brahmin, kshatriya, and vaishya—who have undergone the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” The Gayatri Mantra invokes the sun as the generator and nourisher of all things, and requests him to stimulate the minds of those who perceive him. Surya is still worshiped by many Smarta brahmins as one of the “five-fold” (panchayatana) deities (the others being Shiva, Vishnu, the Goddess, and Ganesh), a practice attributed to the Advaita philosopher Shankaracharya. For some time Surya was also the primary deity for certain communities, particularly in eastern India, although his cult has been largely eclipsed in recent times. The most spectacular example of this worship is the temple of the sun at Konarak (now ruined), whose claims to fame stem from its enormous size and the profuse erotic sculptures on its exterior walls. For further information see Vibhuti Bhushan Mishra, Religious Beliefs and Practices of North India During the Early Medieval Period, 1973; and Sarat Chandra Mitra, The Cult of the Sun God in Medieval Eastern Bengal, 1986. See also panchayatana puja.

A painted relief of Surya, the sun god.
Suryapraksha
("effulgence of the sun") Name given to the banner that is the symbolic emblem of the Mahanirvani Akhara, a particular group of the Naga class of the Dashanami Sanyasis. The Nagas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva, organized into different akharas or regiments on the model of an army. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century the Nagas' primary occupation was as mercenary soldiers, although they also had substantial trading interests; both of these have largely disappeared in contemporary times. All of the akharas have particular features that signify their organizational identity, and this particular banner—one with strong connections to a martial identity—is one such feature.

Suryavarman II
(r. 1112–1153) Ruler of the Khmer people in Cambodia, whose reign saw the construction of the massive temple complex at Angkor Wat. Although Suryavarman and his people were native Cambodians, the temples at Angkor Wat were dedicated to Hindu deities, showing the vast influence of contemporary Indian culture.

Sushruta
(4th c.) Physician and writer who is traditionally regarded as the author of the Sushruta Samhita. Along with the slightly earlier Charaka Samhita, the Sushruta Samhita is one of the two major sources for ayurveda, an Indian medical tradition.

Sushruta Samhita
Along with the slightly earlier Charaka Samhita, one of the two major sources for the Indian medical tradition known as ayurveda. Underlying ayurveda is the theory of the three bodily humors—vata (wind), pitta (bile), and kapha (phlegm). Each is composed of different elements, and although everyone has all three humors, their varying proportions are used to explain differing body types, metabolic dispositions, and personalities. The cause of disease is an imbalance of these humors—whether caused by environmental sources or personal habits—whereas the state of this equilibrium is the state of health. The Sushruta Samhita has been edited and translated into various languages, and served as a source for secondary studies, such as Debiprasad Chatterji, Science and Society in Ancient India, 1977.

Sushumna
One of the vertical channels (nadi) in the traditional conceptions of the subtle body. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system believed to exist on a different plane than gross matter but with certain correspondences to the material body. It is visualized as a set of six psychic centers (chakras) running roughly along the course of the spine, connected by three parallel vertical channels. Above and below these centers are the bodily abodes of the two divine principles, Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power)—the latter as the latent spiritual energy known as kundalini—conceived in the form of a coiled serpent. In the types of yoga that focus on the subtle body, the ultimate aim is to awaken the kundalini, and move it up through the chakras to the abode of Shiva. The union of Shiva and Shakti in the aspirant's body mirrors the action of these divine forces in the macrocosm, and with this union the aspirant gains bliss and final liberation of the soul (moksha).

The sushumna is the middle of the three vertical channels in the subtle body—the side channels are the ida nadi and the pingala nadi—and it is by far the most important of the three. The sushumna provides the pathway for the rising kundalini as it awakens and straightens during the aspirant's spiritual exercises, piercing through the chakras on its way. In most people the Sushumna is closed where it intersects the chakras, which blocks the flow of energy from moving smoothly through it. When the chakras have been pierced and opened by the rising kundalini, the passageway has been opened for the kundalini to rise to the abode of Shiva, and effect the union of Shakti and Shiva that will bring ultimate realization. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; Philip S. Rawson, The Art of Tantra, 1973; Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1975; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Suta
In Hindu mythology, a disciple of the sage Vyasa, who is said to have recounted the puranas to other renunciants in the Naimisha forest. The puranas are an important genre of religious texts that collect all types of sacred lore, from mythic tales to ritual instruction to exaltation of various sacred sites (tirthas) and actions. Individual puranas are usually highly sectarian and intended to promote the worship of one of the Hindu gods, whether Vishnu, Shiva, or the Goddess. The traditional puranas are numbered at eighteen, and in many of them Suta is named as the narrator, in accordance with the legend mentioned above.

Sutakashaucha
The impurity (ashaucha) caused by childbirth (sutaka). All bodily effluvia (hair, spittle, pus, blood, etc.) are considered to be sources of impurity, and because birth is attended with these it is considered impure, even though it is always regarded as an auspicious and happy event. There is also impurity caused by death, known as maranashaucha, but the presence of the corpse renders this impurity more violent; needless to say, it is also considered inauspicious.

Sutra
(“thread”) In a metaphorical sense, a sutra is a short phrase or aphorism that can easily be committed to memory. Many early philosophical and grammatical texts were collections of such sutras, which are so brief that they virtually presuppose a commentary to explain their meaning. In many cases the commentary would have been an oral exchange between teacher and student, thus effecting the living transmission that is still the norm in tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice. Memorizing such sutras was a way to gain mastery over an entire text, and the sutras could also serve as an aid to memory for the commentary, thus enabling a person to preserve the “thread” of the argument. In a more literal sense, the word sutra can also refer to the cord or cords strung through the centers of palm leaf manuscripts, which kept the pages of the text in their proper order.

Svadharma
(“one’s own dharma”) In the dharma literature, svadharma is an individual’s unique religious duty (dharma), based on that person’s social position, stage of life, and gender. The governing assumption behind this notion is that every person has a social role to fulfill, and each of these roles is necessary for the maintenance of society, no matter how humble it might be. For each person, his or her svadharma carries the highest authority, and supersedes all other religious laws. As one example, violence is generally prohibited, but it is a necessary part of a ruler’s svadharma—both to protect the land from external invaders, and to punish criminals within the country. In both cases the use of violence helps to maintain social order, which is the king’s primary duty. In the same way, society depends on a host of other people fulfilling their particular social roles. This notion of social responsibility and interconnectedness is tied to religious fulfillment through the notion of the Path of Action (karmamarga). According to this idea, selflessly performing one's social duty, for the good of the world rather than through selfish desire, was also a path to ultimate spiritual fulfillment and final liberation of the soul (moksha). According to this conception, since every svadharma is potentially a path to final liberation, each person has a path that only he or she can tread.

Svadhishtana Chakra
In many schools of yoga, and in the esoteric ritual tradition known as tantra, the svadhishtana chakra is one of the six psychic centers (chakras) believed to exist in the subtle body. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system, believed to exist on a different plane than gross matter but with certain correspondences to the material body. It is visualized as a set of six psychic centers, which are conceived as multipetaled lotus flowers running roughly along the course of the spine, connected by three vertical channels. Each of these chakras has important symbolic associations—with differing human capacities, with different subtle elements (tanmatras), and with different seed syllables (bijaksharas) formed from the letters of the Sanskrit alphabet, thus encompassing all sacred sound. Above and below these centers are the bodily abodes of Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power), the two divine principles through which the entire universe has come into being. The underlying assumption behind this concept of the subtle body is thus the fundamental similarity and interconnectedness of macrocosm and microcosm, an essential Hindu idea since the time of the mystical texts known as the Upanishads.

The six chakras are traditionally listed from the bottom up, and the svadhishtana chakra is the second. It is visualized as a six-petaled lotus located in the region of the genitals. The petals each contain a seed syllable formed from a letter of the Sanskrit alphabet, in this case the consonants from “ba” to “la.” On a symbolic level, the svadhishtana chakra is associated with the human capacity for reproduction. It is also identified as the bodily seat for the subtle element of water, the fluid medium through which reproduction is possible. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; and Philip S. Rawson, The Art of Tantra, 1973.

Svadhyaya
(“study”) Study of the sacred texts, which connotes oral recitation, since these texts were traditionally studied by reciting them. This is one of the methods named in the Yoga Sutras as one of the preparatory elements to yoga, since the text claims that such study attenuates one's karmic hindrances and fosters the ability to enter trance. Even in modern times the act of reciting a religious text is seen to have multiple spiritual benefits and, if performed over a long period of time, to be able to transform the person reciting.

Svakiya
(“belonging to oneself”) Mode of conceiving the relationship between lover and beloved, in which the man and woman are married to each other. The svakiya relationship is socially respectable—sanctioned by society, upholding social propriety, fruitful, and procreative in its course. Although this mode of relationship is rich and celebrated, this very social approval is said to make it less intense than the adulterous parakiya relationship, in which the lovers gain nothing but their love itself. Although in most cases the union between the god Krishna and his consort Radha is described as parakiya, some Vaishnava communities—such as the Radhavallabh community—claim that this relationship is svakiya, perhaps reflecting reservations about endorsing adultery, even by the deities.
Svaprakasha

("self-revealing") In Indian philosophy, the notion that certain things such as knowledge are self-revealing and do not need anything else in order to be known. The issue about whether these things existed, and what they were if they did, was a source of lively disagreement among Indian thinkers.

Svastika

Although in the modern mind the svastika is indelibly associated with Adolph Hitler's Germany, it has a long and venerable history as an Indian symbol, predating the Nazis by several thousand years. The name is compounded from su ("good") + asti ("to be") + ka ("making"), and a general translation would be something like "bringing good fortune." In Hindu India the svastika is a symbol of life, prosperity, and good fortune, at least when the arms are pointing in a clockwise direction. Circling an object in this direction presents one's right side to the central object, and since this side is considered purer, the svastika with arms pointing clockwise is considered more auspicious than its counterclockwise counterpart.

Svastikasana

Svatahpramanya

("self-validating") In Indian philosophy, the notion that certain things, such as knowledge, are self-validating. This means that they can be definitively known to be true in themselves, without reference to any of the other pramanas, the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge. The issue about whether these things existed, and what they were if they did, was a source of lively disagreement among Indian thinkers.

Svayambhu

(“self-born”) Epithet of the god Brahma. This name underscores his role as the fashioner of the worlds—as the agent responsible for arranging the cosmos, he cannot himself be a created being. According to Hindu mythology, at the beginning of each cycle of creation Brahma emerges from the calyx of a lotus that sprouts from the god Vishnu’s navel; at the time of cosmic dissolution he again enters the lotus, and is reabsorbed into Vishnu’s body. See Brahma.

Svayambhu

(“self-manifested”) Images
Name denoting any image of a Hindu divinity believed to exist by virtue of divine self-revelation, rather than by being made or established by human hands. These images are believed to be intensely holy and powerful, and to have a more pronounced sense of the deity’s presence. They mark instances where these deities have revealed themselves out of grace, in order to become accessible to their devotees (bhakta), and they are places where the deities are believed to be particularly present and “awake,” and thus more receptive to requests for favors.

Svayambhu images can be found for each of the three major Hindu deities. Images of the Goddess are often natural rock formations, such as the image of the goddess Kamakhya, which is a natural cleft in the rock, or the stone images of many of the Shiwalik goddesses; they can take other forms as well, such as the image of the goddess Jwalamukhi, which is a burning vent of natural gas. For the god Vishnu, the best-known self-manifested form is the shalagram, a black stone containing the spiral-shaped fossil shell of a prehistoric sea creature, which is believed to be a symbol of his discus (chakra). The god Shiva’s pillar-shaped symbol known as the linga appears in the widest variety of self-manifested forms. Many of these self-manifested lingas are found in natural rock formations, such as at Kedarnath; Amarnath, where the linga appears as a pillar of ice; and the bana linga, which is a naturally rounded stone, usually small enough to be easily portable. Further, in the Hindu religious groups that stress the subtle body, both Shiva and the Goddess are believed to be present within one’s own body. In some cases for all these deities, carved images are claimed to be self-manifest forms; in their usual motif the statue’s location is revealed to a favored devotee in a dream. A self-manifested image is a powerful claim for any site and will bolster its importance as a place of divine access.

Svayamsevak

(“volunteer”) Rank-and-file member of the Rashtriya Svayamsevak Sangh (RSS). The RSS is a conservative Hindu organization the express purpose of which is to provide the leadership cadre for a revitalized Hindu India; for most of its history it has characterized its mission as cultural and character-building rather than religious or political. The svayamsevaks are the rank-and-file members of the local RSS branches (shakhas), and are thus “foot soldiers” who make up the organization’s core membership. The shakhas in any given area are overseen by a full-time RSS worker known as a pracharak (“director”), who serves as a liaison between the local units and the RSS leadership, and oversees RSS activity in his area.

The svayamsevak is the lowest level of RSS membership. Most members do not advance beyond this rank, since to do so requires complete commitment to the RSS and its ideals; those who do, however, are usually gifted leaders. The primary stress at the shakha level is on forming personal relationships with other members, as a way to develop loyalty to the organization. Each shakha, or local unit, holds a daily meeting. Activities include an opening ceremony in which the organization's saffron banner is raised; traditional games or exercises, including a martial drill; and a discussion period in which RSS ideals can be disseminated and propagated.

Svayamvara
("self-choice") In Hindu mythology, a form of marriage in which the bride would choose the groom she wanted, indicating her choice by placing her garland around his neck. In the stories in which a svayamvara occurs, the bride-to-be is usually of royal lineage, as are her suitors, so the bride's choice was an exercise fraught with potential political consequences. One famous mythic svayamvara was that of Nala and Damayanti, in which Damayanti prefers Nala even to the gods who have come as suitors. This story also illustrates the dangers of such a choice, when an unhappy suitor cursed the couple to endure separation and privation.

Swami Malai
Temple and sacred site (tirtha) on a hill in the Tanjore district of Tamil Nadu, just outside the temple-town of Kumbhakonam. Swami Malai is part of the network of six temples in Tamil Nadu built to honor Murugan, a hill deity who has been assimilated into the larger pantheon as a form of the god Skanda, the son of Shiva. Five of these temples have been definitively identified, and each is associated with a particular region, a particular ecosystem, and a particular incident in Murugan's mythic career. In the case of Swami Malai, it is said to be where he taught the meaning of the sacred syllable (Om) to his father Shiva, and thus presents him in the aspect of a teacher, which is one of his identifying features in Shaiva Siddhanta (a series of fourteen texts, all completed by the fourteenth century C.E., which reinterpret the ideas about Shiva found in Nayanar devotional poetry). The sixth of these temples is said to be every other shrine to Murugan in Tamil Nadu. This belief seems to stress Murugan's presence throughout Tamil Nadu and sacrilize the entire landscape, giving mythic significance to every Murugan temple, no matter how small. The cult of Murugan is thus a symbolic vehicle for Tamil pride and identity, and since the number six has connotations of completeness—as in the six directions, or the six chakras in the subtle body—it also suggests that nothing outside is needed. For further information see Fred Clothey, “Pilgrimage Centers in the Tamil Cultus of Murukan,” in the Journal of the American Academy of Religion, Vol. 40, No. 1, 1972.

Swaminarayan Sect
Modern religious community devoted to the god Vishnu; its practice is based on the life and teachings of Sahajananda Swami (1781–1830), who was born near the sacred city of Ayodhya in eastern India but spent much of his life in the western Indian state of Gujarat. Sahajananda took initiation as an ascetic and soon became a mahant, or ascetic leader. His followers revered him first as a religious preceptor (guru), and later as a partial incarnation of the god Krishna himself. They believed that manifestations of the god Vishnu, such as Krishna, are born on earth in times of extreme trouble. It was in this latter aspect that he was given the name Swaminarayan (“Lord Narayan”), and his followers believed that he was the highest manifestation of God in human form. The Swaminarayan sect has several million lay devotees (bhakta), most of whom are affluent Gujarati merchants. In keeping with the community's ascetic roots, however, its most important figures are the ascetics who run the organization and who serve as teachers and advisers to them. For further (Siddha Yoga Dham America) Religious organization founded by Swami Muktananda (1908–1982), which has ashrams and centers around the world. Siddha Yoga's metaphysics are a modified form of Kashmiri Shaivism, but its signature teaching is the notion that the guru’s grace can immediately awaken the disciple's latent kundalini (spiritual power, the most vital substance of the subtle body) and speed the process of spiritual development. This teaching puts an even greater emphasis on the importance of the guru as spiritual teacher, and the overwhelming emphasis pervades the whole movement. Although it has Indian members, most of its followers are non-Indian converts, who may be engaged in a spiritual search but who have little interest in becoming culturally Indian. The organization was headed by Muktananda until his death in 1982; for most of the time since then it has been presided over by his successor, Chidvilasananda.
SYDA

Tad Ekam

("That One") Epithet used in Rg Veda hymn 10.129, the so-called Creation Hymn, to designate the first living being on the earth. The four Vedas are the oldest Hindu religious texts, and based on its style and content, the Rg Veda is the oldest of the Vedas. Most of the hymns in the RgVeda are invocations addressed to various divinities, sung to propitiate these divinities so that human beings may enjoy the good things of this life. The Creation Hymn takes a far more speculative tone, standing in marked contrast to the confidence and optimism found in the earlier hymns. In the Creation Hymn, the poet begins by imagining a time before the existence of Being and Nonbeing and speculates on how the world came to be.

In the end, the poet ascribes all creation to a single impersonal agent, That One (Tad Ekam). This hymn is noteworthy for ascribing the creation of the world to a single power, an idea that foreshadows the notion of Brahman in the Upanishads, the speculative texts that form the final stratum of the Vedic literature. The name Tad Ekam, which is grammatically a neuter noun, also foreshadows the notion found in the Upanishads that Brahman is an impersonal force. After describing how That One formed the cosmos and knew all its secrets, the poem ends with the conjecture that perhaps That One may not be omniscient and omnipotent after all. This hymn thus further foreshadows the Upanishads in its speculative tone and its admission that the ultimate answer may be unknown.

Tagore, Rabindranath

(1861–1941) Poet and Nobel laureate in Literature, an honor bestowed in 1912 for his Gitanjali ("Garland of Songs"). Tagore came from an influential and extremely wealthy landed family and was thus able to focus all his energy on his literary work. Aside from his prodigious literary output, he lectured extensively both in India and in other countries; in the latter he emphasized the need to retain spiritual values, whereas in India he more often gave his attention to the need to fulfill people's material needs. In 1921 he established the Vishva-Bharati University at Shantiniketan in the state of West Bengal. The university was dedicated to providing an education that would satisfy both of these needs and thus develop an integrated human being. For further information see Krishna Kripalani, Rabindranath Tagore: A Biography, 1980; and Donald R. Tuck, “Rabindranath Tagore: Religion as a Constant Struggle for Balance,” in Robert D. Baird (ed.), Religion in Modern India, 1998.

Tagore Jayanti

Holiday marking the birth date of the Bengali poet, writer, and thinker Rabindranath Tagore, celebrated on May 8, the day he was born in 1861. As with most twentieth-century figures, Tagore's birthday is celebrated according to the solar calendar of the common era, rather than the lunar calendar that governs most religious observances. Although Tagore is best known for his literary work, he was also considered a religious preceptor (guru), and thus his birthday carries extra meaning.

Tai

Tenth month in the Tamil solar year, corresponding to the northern Indian solar month of Makara (the zodiacal sign of Capricorn), which usually falls within January and February. The existence of several different calendars is one clear sign of the continuing importance of regional cultural patterns. One way that the Tamils retain their culture is by preserving their traditional calendar. Tamil is one of the few regional languages in India with an ancient, well-established literary tradition. See also Tamil months, Tamil Nadu, and Tamil language.

Takshaka
In Hindu mythology, a venomous serpent-king from whose bite King Parikshit is killed. After insulting a powerful sage, Parikshit is cursed to die of a snakebite within seven days. Parikshit takes all possible precautions to avoid his fate: He builds a house on a huge pillar, has all things entering the house carefully searched, and surrounds himself with physicians who can cure snakebite. Six days pass without incident, but as the seventh day ends, people begin to relax and bring in some fruit to eat. Takshaka has concealed himself as a tiny worm in one of the pieces of fruit and, when the fruit is cut open, changes into his real shape, bites the king, and kills him.

Despite his fearsome role in this story, an earlier story illustrates that Takshaka is not entirely evil. Takshaka's mother, Kadru, bets her sister Vinata that the tail of a certain celestial horse is black, whereas Vinata claims it is white; the sister agrees that the loser will become a servant to the winner. Kadru asks her children, the serpents, to hang from the back of the horse to make it appear as if it is black and thus takes unfair advantage. Some of her children, including Takshaka, refuse to take part in such deceit, and Kadru curses them to be killed by Janamjeya, King Parikshit's son. Takshaka manages to escape this curse—one of the few times that this happens in Hindu mythic stories—but most of his siblings are not so lucky.

Tala
In Indian music and dance, the most general term for “rhythm,” either as an accompaniment to music or dance or played on a drum as a solo instrument. The rhythmic systems in all varieties of Indian music are extremely rich and complex and require years of study to master.
Talikota
City in the Bijapur district of the state of Karnataka, which in 1565 was the site of a battle between the Vijayanagar dynasty king Rama Raja and a coalition of Muslim sultans from farther north in the Deccan peninsula. Rama Raja's disastrous defeat brought the Vijayanagar dynasty to an abrupt end. The sultans sacked the empire's capital at Hampi, and it has never been inhabited since that time.

Tamas
("darkness") One of the three fundamental qualities (gunas) believed to be present in all things, the other two being sattva ("goodness") and rajas ("passion"). According to this model, the differing proportions of these qualities account for the differences both in the inherent nature of things and in individual human capacities and tendencies. Of the three, tamas is always negative and is associated with darkness, disease, ignorance, sloth, spoilage, and death. The notion of these three gunas originated in the metaphysics of the Samkhya school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy, and although much of Samkhya metaphysics connected with the gunas has long been discredited, the idea of the gunas and their qualities has become a pervasive assumption in Indian culture.

Tamil Epics
Collective name for three early Tamil epic poems: the Shilappadigaram, the Manimegalai, and the Shivaga-Sindamani. These poems were composed in about the sixth and seventh centuries of the common era, when religious forms and cultural influence (among them, the composition of epic poems) were seeping in from the north and influencing indigenous forms. Aside from Sanskrit, Tamil is the only major ancient literary language. All three of these poems provide important information about life in their contemporary times, including religious life. In brief, the Shilappadigaram ("The Jeweled Anklet") is a tragedy that highlights several important themes that have pervaded Hindu culture, particularly the need for a king to rule righteously and the power gained by a wife through her devotion to her husband. The Manimegalai focuses on a young woman of the same name, who is wooed by the local prince but eventually becomes a Buddhist nun. Although the story clearly has a Buddhist bias, Manimegalai has numerous debates with people from competing religious traditions. Finally, the Shivaga-Sindamani describes the adventures of Shivaga, a man who excels at every possible manly art, who with each new challenge wins a new wife for his harem but in the end renounces everything to become a Jain monk. Although the later two epics are respectively biased toward Buddhist and Jain religious values, they all give valuable information about contemporary religious life. See also Tamil language.

Tamil Language
One of the four Dravidian languages, along with Kannada, Telegu, and Malayalam; all four languages are spoken primarily in southern India. Tamil is the predominant language in modern Tamil Nadu, which is one of the "linguistic states" formed after the Indians gained independence. This state was formed to unite people with a common language and culture under one state government. Although all four languages have literary and cultural significance, Tamil has by far the richest history as a literary language. Tamil literature begins in the early centuries of the common era with the Sangam literature, eight collections of poetry that focused equally on the external description of battle or internal descriptions of love. The Sangam literature was followed by the three Tamil epics: the Shilappadigaram, the Manimegalai, and the Shivaga-Sindamani. Between the seventh and tenth centuries came the devotional (bhakti) literature composed by the Alvars and the Nayanars, with the former expressing their devotion to the god Vishnu and the latter to the god Shiva. Their devotional poetry was unprecedented in Hindu religious history because it utilized everyday vernacular language as a spectacular vehicle for profound religious expression. The Alvars’ poems became a foundational text for the Shrivaishnava community, and the Nayanars’ for Shaiva Siddhanta, and thus both of these collections continue to be important in Hindu religious life. Even today Tamil is a vibrant literary language and a source of intense regional pride to the people living there; some of the most violent recent demonstrations in southern India were the so-called language riots, protesting the imposition of Hindi as the government language, a move that was seen as a conscious attempt to marginalize Tamil language and culture.

Tamil Months

Although the lunar calendar is by far the most important means for determining the Hindu religious calendar, these lunar months are also set in the framework of a solar calendar. The latter is used for the calculation of the intercalary month, which helps keep the lunar and solar calendars in rough correspondence. In northern India the months of the solar calendar correlate with the zodiac, with each month named after the sign into which the sun is reckoned as entering at the beginning of that month. In southern India the divisions of the solar calendar are exactly the same as in the north, but the twelve months are given different names. The Tamil months take their names from some of the nakshatras, or features in the lunar zodiac, or from modifications of the lunar months. The Tamil year begins with the month of Chittirai, which corresponds to the northern Indian solar month of Mesha (the zodiacal sign of Aries), which by the Indian calculations, falls within April and May. The eleven months following Chittirai are Vaikasi, Ani, Adi, Avani, Purattasi, Aippasi, Kartigai, Margali, Tai, Masi, and Panguni. Such different calendars are one clear sign of the continuing importance of regional cultural patterns. This regional culture is particularly important in the Tamil cultural area because Tamil is one of the few regional languages with an ancient, well-established literary tradition.

Tamil Nadu

(“land of the Tamils”) Modern Indian state at the southern tip of the subcontinent, on the Bay of Bengal. Tamil Nadu is one of the so-called linguistic states, formed after Indian independence in 1947 to unite people with a common language and culture under one state government. Tamil Nadu was thus formed from the Tamil-speaking areas of the former state of Madras. Tamil Nadu has a long and rich history, and the Tamil literary tradition stretches back to the early centuries of the common era. Successive regional dynasties—the Pallavas, Cholas, and Pandyas—built a host of temples in the characteristic Dravida architectural style, and even today Tamil Nadu has hundreds of temple towns, that is, towns in which the urban hub is an enormous temple complex that includes shops, markets, offices, and residential space. Modern Tamil culture is the product of this long and ancient tradition, and Tamils pride themselves in having been influenced little by outsiders—neither by the Hindu influences from northern India, nor by the Muslim culture whose influence was so profound in regions farther north. Tamil Nadu has so many cultural sites and holy places that it is impossible to name them, but the most important are Rameshvaram, Chidambaram, Madurai, Tiruchirappalli, Kanchipuram, Mahabalipuram, Kumbakonam, Thiruvaiyaru, Tanjore, and Kanyakumari; there is also a network of six temples to the god Murugan scattered in different areas of the state, which between them lay out the parameters of the Tamil country. For general information about Tamil Nadu and all the regions of India, an accessible reference is Christine Nivin et al., India, 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998. See also Tamil language.

Tamoyoga

One of the three classes of beings in the Dvaita Vedanta philosophical school, founded by the philosopher Madhva (1197–1276). Madhva's fundamental assumption was that God was utterly transcendent, above and beyond the world and human beings. The strength of this conviction led him to stress the importance of grace as the sole means of salvation because human beings were unable to save themselves. Given this dire view of human capacities, Madhva divided the beings of the world into three classes: The muktiyogas were destined for final liberation, the nityasamsarins were destined for eternal rebirth, and the tamoyogas were predestined for eternal damnation.

Tandava
Name denoting one of the two broad categories in Indian dance. The tandava style is athletic and dramatic and conveys violence and power, whereas the other dance form, lasya, is soft and lyrical and conveys a mood of love. The tandava style received its name from the tandava dance of the god Shiva. According to tradition, this is the dance through which Shiva destroys the world when its time has come. Not all of the dance’s mythic connotations are violent, since this athletic dance is also said to be the one through which Shiva vanquished the goddess Kali in a dance contest, when her feminine modesty prevented her from imitating his style.

Tanmatras
The tanmatras are the subtle elements, the subtle forms of the five gross elements (earth, air, fire, water, and akasha) from which the gross elements are derived. The senses corresponding to the subtle elements are gandha (smell) for earth, sparsha (touch) for air, rupa (shape) for fire, rasa (taste) for water, and shabda (sound) for akasha. The tanmatras first appeared in the account of the evolution of the universe propounded by the Samkhya school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy. In the Samkhya account, the subtle elements are the stage of evolution preceding the evolution of the gross elements. The Samkhya school espoused an atheistic dualism in which the two fundamental principles were purusha (spirit) and prakrti (matter); all of this evolution was associated with prakrti because, according to the Samkhyas, the purusha never changed. The Samkhya account of evolution was appropriated by other groups—although these groups often adapted it to reflect theistic assumptions in which the world came from God—and thus the notion city’s Brhadeshvar temple, and his son Rajendra (r. 1014–1042 C.E.), whose greatest monument is the temple at Gangaikondacholapuram. The Brhadeshvar temple is dedicated to Shiva as the “Great Lord”; some of the most notable of the other temples built or improved by the Cholas were at Kumbhakonam, Thiruvaiyaru, Chidambaram, and Shrirangam.

Tanka
Name for a small chisel used by stone workers, one of the characteristic objects in Hindu iconography. The tanka is mainly associated with Shiva and is a minor artifact because it generally appears only when the deity has multiple arms and is holding a number of objects.

Tanjore
City and district in the southern Indian state of Tamil Nadu, the eastern boundary of which is the Bay of Bengal. The Tanjore district lies in the Cauvery River delta, south of the river’s main channel; even today this extremely fertile area grows a large percentage of India’s rice. This district was the core homeland of the Chola dynasty, and the land’s agricultural fecundity was the underlying source of the dynasty’s power, which at one point stretched through most of southern India and even extended to Malaysia. The Chola dynasty used their wealth and power to build enormous temples throughout Tamil Nadu, but especially in the Tanjore district and Tanjore city, their capital. The Chola zenith came with King Raja Raja (r. 985–1014 C.E.), who built Tanjore of the subtle elements became an accepted philosophical convention.

Tantra

General term for a genre of secret ritually based religious practices. These are most often laid out in texts also known as tantras (“loom”), so named because these texts weave a distinctive picture of reality. In popular Hindu culture, tantric practitioners (tantrikas) are associated with illicit sexuality, with consuming forbidden things such as meat and liquor, and with having the ability to kill or harm others through black magic. Such power and perceived amorality make tantrikas objects of fear, a quality that some people have used to their advantage. A more neutral assessment of tantra would stress three qualities: secrecy, power, and nondualism, the ultimate unity of all things.

Secrecy in tantra serves two functions. On the one hand, it conceals the rites and practices from the uninitiated, who are seen as unqualified to receive it, and on the other, it creates a religious subcommunity with a particularly defined identity and sense of privilege. This sense of exclusivity, of being privy to something to which few have access, is one of the reasons that tantra is seen as a higher religious practice. Even when the text of a tantra has been written down, it is always assumed that the texts are lifeless without the instruction of a qualified person. This stress on personal transmission means that diksha (a type of initiation) is the only way to gain access to this tradition, and thus tantra stresses the importance of the guru-disciple relationship even more strongly than does the Hindu tradition as a whole. Gurus are free to initiate anyone they deem qualified. Although many tantrikas are twice-born men, that is, members of the three highest classes (varnas)—brahmins, kshatriyas, and vaishyas—who have received the adolescent religious initiation known as the second birth, in theory tantric practice is open to all people, regardless of gender or social status.

Power in tantra is manifested in various ways. One of these comes in the transmission of the teaching itself, in which the guru’s empowerment is believed necessary to “activate” the transmitted material, particularly mantras. Tantric practice is also claimed to be far more powerful than regular religious practice and thus more efficacious in bringing final liberation of the soul (moksha). The usual claim is that tantra’s potency can bring such liberation in a single lifetime, whereas other forms of religious practice take untold aeons. Such powerful forces must be kept secret from the uninitiated, thus the stress on secrecy. It is widely accepted that the spiritual attainments gained through tantric practice also bring superhuman powers (siddhi), as a natural byproduct of such attainment. Although aspirants are discouraged from seeking such powers because the act of seeking is seen as rooted in selfish desire, those who gain such powers without seeking are believed to be able to exercise them without being corrupted.

For tantrikas, nondualism—the assertion that all reality is ultimately one thing—is both a philosophical affirmation and the operative principle behind their religious practice. Tantrikas usually conceive of this unity theistically, seeing their chosen deity (ishtadevata) as the material, efficient, and final cause of all reality. For tantrikas, definitively realizing the essential oneness of all things removes the mistaken understanding that causes bondage and rebirth and brings final liberation. Tantric practice affirms this nondualism, often through rituals stressing the unification of opposites. For this reason, some tantrikas make ritual use of things that are normally forbidden, most notably the “Five Forbidden Things” (panchamakara): fish, wine, meat, parched grain, and sexual intercourse. In theory, this rite is a means to break down duality because it violates societal norms forbidding consumption of intoxicants, nonvegetarian food, and illicit sexuality, in a conscious effort to sacralize what is normally forbidden. Although this rite collapses conventional boundaries of good and bad, pure and impure, the goal is to replace external rites (bahiryaga) with interior ones (antaryaga), thus exploding the duality of subject and object. The paradigm for this interior practice is tantric yoga. This is usually some variant of kundalini yoga, in which the two divine principles of Shiva and Shakti are ultimately united in the expert’s subtle body. The final vehicle for tantric practice comes in rituals using symbolic diagrams (yantra), of which one example is the shri chakra. These are often particular to specific tantric lineages (parampara) and thus ground the aspirant in a particular tradition. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; Swami Agehananda Bharati, The Tantric Tradition, 1977; and Douglas Renfrew Brooks, The Secret of the Three Cities, 1990.

Tantrika
Name denoting a practitioner of tantra, a secret ritually based religious practice.

Tapas
(“heat”) Term denoting any physical asceticism, or what in earlier times was referred to as mortification of the flesh. The term tapas encompasses rites of denial, such as fasting (upavasa) or celibacy, as well as rites of enduring physical pain, such as the “five fires” (panchagni) rite. In this rite a person sits during the hot season surrounded by four fires, with the fifth fire being the sun overhead. Other rites include enduring cold from bathing (snana) in snow-fed rivers, and enduring any other sort of physical discomfort. The word tapas can also describe bizarre and even masochistic behaviors, such as remaining standing for years on end; keeping an arm upraised until the muscles atrophy, and it cannot be lowered; lying on beds of thorns and nails, and so forth. The governing assumption behind all of these practices is that they generate spiritual power (seen figuratively as “heat”) and that a person who generates and amasses enough of this power will gain supernormal powers or the ability to demand boons from the gods themselves. Even though many contemporary Hindus are skeptical of the more extreme practices and may dismiss them, there is still great cultural respect for ascetic self-control, and combined with the right personality, such practices can still confer considerable religious authority.

In Hindu mythology Indra, king of the gods, pays close attention to those amassing such powers to protect himself from being replaced by someone more powerful. When an ascetic starts to amass enough power to displace him, Indra’s heavenly throne becomes hot through the “heat” generated by the tapas. Indra must search for the aspirant and defuse this power in one of two ways—either by giving the aspirant a boon, which in many cases is the reason for performing the tapas in the first place, or by sending a celestial nymph (apsara) to seduce the ascetic, whose power will be discharged along with his semen. This mythology reflects the basic Hindu belief that the starting point for ascetic power is celibacy, which conserves a man’s vital energies by conserving his semen.

Taraka
In Hindu mythology, an extremely powerful demon, who endures such severe physical asceticism (tapas) that he receives a boon that he can be killed only by a son of the god Shiva. This boon seems to make Taraka invulnerable because at the time, Shiva is lost in meditation and is still grieving for his dead wife Sati. For a long time Taraka grows more powerful and more arrogant until he is eventually able to defeat the gods in battle and exile them from heaven. In their despair the gods turn to the god of love, Kama, and beg him to shoot Shiva with an arrow of desire so that he will marry the goddess Parvati, and thus make it possible to bring about Taraka’s death. Shiva, however, destroys Kama before he can shoot, burning him to ash with a stream of fire from his third eye. Shiva later marries Parvati, and their son, Skanda, kills Taraka in battle.

Tarakeshvar
City and sacred site (tirtha) thirty miles northwest of Calcutta in the state of West Bengal, which because of its proximity to Calcutta, is the most widely visited pilgrimage place in the state. Tarakeshvar is famous for the temple of Baba Tarakanath, who is the god Shiva in his form as the “Lord of Liberation.” Shiva is present at Tarakeshvar in the form of a linga, the pillar-shaped object that is Shiva’s symbolic form. The Tarakeshvar linga is claimed to be a “self-manifested” (svayambhu) image, which was not made by human hands but established through an act of divine self-revelation. The site’s charter myth describes how the linga of Shiva is buried in the earth but is discovered when a cow habitually lets down her milk on the spot above it as an act of worship. The charter myth also describes how a man afflicted with agonizing hemorrhoids finds relief by drinking the water that has been poured on the linga as an offering and thus is blessed by Shiva’s touch. With these two stories, the charter conveys the image of a deity who is present and responsive to his devotees (bhakta) as well as the sense of a place where human beings can go to find relief from their afflictions. One of the most unusual manifestations of this is the practice of dharna, in which pilgrims lie on the temple’s outer porch, fasting (upavasa) for as long as it takes the deity to communicate with them, usually in a dream. For further information see E. Alan Morinis, Pilgrimage in the Hindu Tradition, 1984.

Tarapith
(“Tara’s seat”) Town and sacred site (tirtha) in the state of West Bengal, about 130 miles northwest of Calcutta. Tarapith is famous as one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the Goddess that spreads throughout the subcontinent. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess; in the case of Tarapith, the body part was Sati’s cornea (tara). Tarapith’s presiding goddess, Tara, is a fierce form of the Goddess, who has strong associations with tantra, a secret ritual based religious practice. In modern times much of the shrine’s fame comes from an unusual ascetic named Vamakhepa (1843–1911), whose apparent irrationality and lack of respect for generally accepted norms—he once urinated on the temple’s image of Tara to show his contempt for a deity made of iron—was a perfect match for Tara herself. Tarapith is said to bestow supernormal powers (siddhis) on those who worship there; this makes Tarapith not only a very powerful place but also a potentially dangerous one. For further information see E. Alan Morinis, Pilgrimage in the Hindu Tradition, 1984. See also pitha.

Tarjini Hasta
In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, tarjini hasta is the name for a particular hand gesture (hasta) in which the hand is closed except for the index finger, which is pointing upward as if to admonish or scold the viewer. The word tarjini is derived from a verb that can mean either “to threaten” or “to censure”—both of which can be understood from this gesture.

Tarka
(“reasoning”) In Indian logic, tarka denotes the mode of argument that focuses on the identification and classification of fallacies. When it is used in argumentation, tarka does not advance one’s own point of view but is used to discredit an opponent’s assertion, either by reducing it to absurdity, by showing that the argument does not fulfill necessary conditions, or by showing that it suffers from a fallacy that renders it untenable.

Tarpana

("satisfying") Tarpana is a memorial rite performed for the satisfaction of one's ancestors, in which one offers them libations of water to quench their thirst. Tarpana satisfies the “sacrifice to the ancestors,” which is one of the Five Great Sacrifices. These five sacrifices are mandatory daily religious observances (nitya karma) for a “twice-born” householder, that is, a householder who has been born into one of the three “twice-born” groups in Indian society—brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya—and who has received the adolescent religious initiation known as the second birth. Tarpana is also sometimes an occasional religious act (naimittika karma), which should be performed on occasions when one is bathing (snana) at pilgrimage places (tirthas). The rite itself is quite simple. The performer first bathes to become ritually pure, scoops up water in his joined hands, then tips his fingers forward to let the water drain out. Some sources also specify that the water should be mixed with sesame seeds, a substance associated with offerings to the dead. Tarpana was considered a companion rite to the memorial ceremony known as shraddha, although as an obligatory daily act, tarpana was performed much more frequently. In the shraddha ritual, one symbolically feeds one's ancestors to satisfy their hunger, whereas in the tarpana ritual, one gives them water to quench their thirst.

Tat Tvam Asi

("You are that") In the Hindu philosophical tradition, one of the “great utterances” (mahavyakyas) expressing the ultimate truth. The truth referred to here is the identity of atman (the individual Self) and Brahman (Supreme Reality); this identity is the heart of the speculative texts called the Upanishads. This particular passage is found repeatedly in the sixth book of the Chandogya Upanishad, in which the boy Shvetaketu is being instructed by his father. The boy's father uses a series of analogies to convey his instruction regarding the identical natures of the atman and Brahman, ending every such analogy with this concluding phrase, which contains the wisdom of the whole.

In addition to its textual importance, this and three other mahavyakyas—as utterances that capsulize fundamental truth—were appropriated as identifying symbols by the four divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasi ascetics. Each division had a different mahavya, just as each had a different Veda, a different primary sacred center, and a different paradigmatic ascetic quality. Tat tvam asi is the mahavya associated with the Kitawara division of the Dashanami Sanyasis.
Teej

Teej is a name denoting two different Hindu religious observances, both falling in the lunar month of Bhadrapada (August–September). Kajari Teej falls on the third day of the dark (waxing) half of the month and Hartalika Teej two weeks later, on the third day of the bright (waxing) half. Both of these observances have a mythic charter connected with the god Shiva and his wife Parvati, but the latter is far more important. Kajari Teej is a festival marking the coming of the monsoons, a season that once rendered travel impossible. For lovers who were together, the monsoon months were very sweet, but for those who were apart, the coming of the rains foretold a time of separation. One of the standard poetic images is the woman watching the darkening sky, wondering whether her beloved will make it home in time. On this day people sing songs in the Kajari raga, a melodic mode associated both with the rains and with songs of separation and longing. On this day people also welcome the rainy season by setting up swings and swinging on them. The festival is celebrated through much of India, but especially in the Benares and Mirzapur districts of the eastern part of Uttar Pradesh.

Hartalika Teej (also known as Hariyali Teej) is a religious observance practiced by young unmarried women in order to gain a good husband and have a happy marriage. In Hindu culture the model for the ideal husband is the god Shiva, who despite his wild appearance and his unusual habits, is completely devoted to his wife. One sign of this devotion is that Shiva and his wife Parvati are married only to each other, no matter which forms they take—as, for instance, when one or the other is cursed to be born as a human being. As the ideal divine couple, Shiva and Parvati are the patron deities of this religious observance. Women observing this festival should worship Shiva and Parvati (as the model couple whose happiness they hope to share), decorate their houses, put on new clothes, and pass the night singing songs of auspiciousness. This festival reveals the cultural importance of marriage for Indian women. Because the identity for many Indian women is still formed primarily through their traditional roles as wives and mothers, for many women their marriage is the most important event in their lives.

The charter myth for Hartalika Teej not only underlines the importance of a happy marriage but also points to the woman’s role in gaining her husband. After the death of the goddess Sati, she is reborn as Parvati in the house of Himalaya, the mountains personified. Very early in life, Parvati vows that she will have no husband except for Shiva. Her parents try to discourage her from this wish because Shiva has taken a vow of asceticism and passes his time deep in meditation on Mount Kailas. Undeterred, Parvati goes up into the mountains and begins to do harsh physical asceticism (tapas) of her own. The power generated by her asceticism eventually awakens Shiva, and on Hartalika Teej he comes to where she is staying, disguised as an aged brahmin. He first tries to discourage Parvati by making disparaging remarks about Shiva’s lifestyle and personality, but Parvati refuses to listen and remains unshaken in her resolve. Eventually Shiva reveals his true form to her, and on that day they are betrothed to be married.

Teli

Traditional Indian society was modeled as a collection of endogamous, or intermarried, subgroups known as jatis (“birth”). These jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group’s hereditary occupation, over which each group had a monopoly. In traditional northern Indian society, the Telis were a Hindu jati whose hereditary occupation was making vegetable oil by pressing oil seeds.
Temple Cars
Name for the ceremonial carts in which the movable image of a deity (utsava murti) can be transported throughout the town or, in the case of the temples of southern India, around the processional streets that often ring the temple in concentric layers. In some cases the carts are made new every year, as at the temple of the god Jagannath in the city of Puri; in other cases (as one finds in many of the southern Indian temples) the temple car is one of the deity's standard accouterments, and it is made from precious metals and is richly decorated. In either case the deity is being treated in a manner parallel to that of a king, and the car is a means to move the deity in procession to view his or her earthly domain.

Tengalai
One of the two main subsects in the Shrivaishnava religious community, the other being the Vadagalai. The Shrivaishnavas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their roots lie in the devotional hymns of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. Two centuries later, the Alvars’ devotional outpouring was organized and systematized by the philosopher Ramanuja (11th c.), who is considered the Shrivaishnava founder. Ramanuja was convinced that Brahman, or Supreme Reality, was a personal deity rather than an impersonal abstract principle, and he was also convinced that devotion (bhakti) was the most important form of religious practice. Vishishthadvaita Vedanta, his philosophical position, stressed both of these convictions and thus opposed the Advaita Vedanta school, founded by the philosopher Shankaracharya, which believed that the Supreme Being was impersonal and that realization (jnana) was the best spiritual path.

The split between the Tengalais and the Vadagalais came several centuries after Ramanuja and stemmed from differing perspectives on what the individual must do to gain final liberation of the soul (moksha). The Tengalais emphasize the need for absolute surrender (prapatti) to the grace of God, through which devotees will be saved with no action of their own; the Vadagalais stress that devotees must also exert themselves on their own behalf. The Tengalai founder was Pillai Lokacharya (14th c.), who is also the community’s most important figure.

Thakur

(“master”) The model for traditional Indian society was as a collection of endogamous subgroups (i.e., groups in which marriages occurred only between members of the same group) known as jatis (“birth”). These jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group’s hereditary occupation, over which each group had a monopoly. In northern India, the Thakurs were a jati considered to be kshatriyas, who have traditionally functioned as landlords and village leaders. Its most famous member was the Nobel laureate Rabindranath Tagore.

Thandai

(“cooling”) A refreshing sweetened drink made of milk or yogurt, ground nuts, and spices often used as the medium for the consumption of ground marijuana (bhang). As with all milk products, the thandai is considered to have cooling properties; this effect may be intended to balance the bhang, which is considered to be “hot” because of its intoxicating properties.

Thaneser

City and sacred site (tirtha) adjoining the sacred site of Kurukshetra in the northern part of the state of Haryana. Thanesar is a famous site in the Mahabharata, the later of the two Sanskrit epics. The epic’s climax comes at Kurukshetra in an eighteen-day battle between two factions of an extended family, along with their allies and supporters. On one side, there are the five Pandava brothers, who are the epic’s protagonists, and on the other, their cousins the Kauravas, who are the antagonists. According to the epic, on the eve of the battle, the Pandavas worshiped the god Shiva in a temple at Thanesar, and after their worship Shiva assured them that they would be victorious. Aside from the temple, Thanesar also has a renowned bathing tank said to contain all the sacred rivers of India, at which the primary bathing (snana) day is Sunday. Nearby is the Gita Mandir, at which Arjuna, one of the Pandava brothers, is said to have received the teaching of the Bhagavad Gita from Krishna in the moments before the battle began.

Thanjavur

A variant name for the southern Indian city of Tanjore. See Tanjore.
Thief Castes
The model for traditional Indian society was as a collection of endogamous subgroups (i.e., groups in which marriages occurred only between members of the same group) known as jatis ("birth"). These jatis were organized (and their social status determined) by the group's hereditary occupation, over which each group had a monopoly. Although it sounds bizarre, this specialization extended to all occupations, and there were hereditary occupational groups whose profession was thievery and banditry. The most famous individual from these was Tirumangai (9th c.), by far the most picturesque of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. In the nineteenth century the British composed a list of several hundred such groups, who were subject to relentless scrutiny, opposition, and in many cases resettlement.

Thiruvaiyaru
Temple town and sacred site (tirtha) in the Tanjore district of Tamil Nadu, about 170 miles south and west of Madras. Thiruvaiyaru's major temple is dedicated to the god Shiva, but the site is most famous for being the home of the late-eighteenth-century saint and musician Tyagaraja.

Thoreau, Henry David
(1817–1862) American writer and philosopher, who by his own account was powerfully influenced by the Hindu religious text known as the Bhagavad Gita, particularly the text's instruction to perform one's duties selflessly for the good of society, without any thought of personal reward. Thoreau refers to this text in both Walden and A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers, and in letters to his friends, Thoreau talks about his desire to practice yoga.

Three Debts
According to tradition, repayment of three “debts” was incumbent on all “twice-born” men, that is, men born into one of the three “twice-born” groups in Indian society—brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya—who had undergone the adolescent religious initiation known as the second birth. The first of these debts was to the gods and was repaid by offering sacrifices. The second debt was to the sages and was satisfied by studying the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative religious texts. The final debt was to the ancestors (pitr) and was satisfied by procreating a son, to ensure that the ancestral rites would be carried out without interruption.

3HO/Sikh Dharma Brotherhood
Modern religious organization founded by Yogi Bhajan; the movement's two names reflect differing emphases in the phases in Yogi Bhajan's teaching. His initial teachings were the traditional disciplines of hatha yoga and kundalini yoga, with his followers organized into a group known as the Happy, Healthy, Holy Organization (3HO). Hatha yoga is a system of religious discipline (yoga) based on a series of bodily postures known as asanas; this practice is widely believed to provide various physical benefits, including increased bodily flexibility and the ability to heal chronic ailments. Kundalini yoga is the religious discipline whose primary focus is awakening the kundalini, the latent spiritual force that exists in every person in the subtle body. The kundalini is awakened through a combination of yoga practice and ritual action and is believed to bring further spiritual capacities and final liberation (moksha) of the soul.

These two disciplines remain an important part of Yogi Bhajan's teachings, for he claims to be a master of tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice. In the 1970s his teaching widened to include traditional Sikh teachings and symbols. The most prominent of these symbols are the “five K’s” that all Sikhs are supposed to wear, so called because each of them begins with the letter k: uncut hair (kesh), a comb (kangha), a bangle on the right wrist (kara), shorts (kacch), and a ceremonial sword (kirpan). Many of Yogi Bhajan’s followers keep the Sikh symbols far more strictly than most people born as Sikhs, but the movement has two important divergences with the traditional Sikh community. One of these is its emphasis on tantra, which has little importance in the Sikh community. The most significant difference, however, is the religious authority that Yogi Bhajan holds over his followers, which is very different from the decentralized, essentially democratic form of the traditional Sikh community.

Thug

In the colonialist mythology describing the savagery of the East and the demonic qualities of Hinduism, one of the most compelling stories is that of the Thugs, a group of robbers who were devotees (bhakta) of the goddess Kali. According to popular belief, the Thugs were widespread throughout India and frequented the highways, seeking travelers as their prey. They would travel with their victims, sometimes for days on end, and then kill them—sometimes after giving them sweets laced with drugs, and sometimes simply by taking them by surprise. The victims would be strangled with a silken scarf, and whenever possible, no blood would be shed, for the victims’ blood was considered an offering to the goddess Kali and thus should not be spilled and wasted. The victims’ worldly possessions were claimed by the Thugs themselves, in a division of the spoils between deity and devotee. This demonic practice persisted until the 1830s, when it was finally uprooted and destroyed by the British.

Although the tale of the Thugs makes a gripping story, much of it has been dispelled by more careful recent scholarship. One of the major factors in the rise of the Thugs was the radical economic dislocation caused by the arrival of the British themselves. Many of the people marginalized by these forces took to wandering and, in their desperation, resorted to banditry. These small-scale and essentially local depredations were transformed into a widespread religious conspiracy. The myth of the Thugs certainly showed concern about the prevailing law-and-order situation in central India, but it may also have reflected British colonial fears about their ability to control their territory. Even though there are references to the Thugs in texts predating British contact, on the whole, this was one of the more enduring colonial stereotypes. For further information see C. A. Bayly, Indian Society and the Making of the British Empire, 1988; and The Raj, 1990.

Thursday

(Bhraspativar) The fifth day of the week, whose presiding planet is Jupiter (Bhraspati). Since in Hindu mythology the sage Bhraspati is the religious preceptor (guru) of the gods, another common name for Thursday is Guruvar. In Hindu astrology (jyotisha) Jupiter is an extremely powerful planet, and because in religious life one’s spiritual preceptor is often likened to a god, this makes Thursday a ritually important and powerful day. One of the “deities” to be honored and served on this day is one’s religious preceptor.

Another deity worshiped on this day is the goddess Lakshmi, who is worshipped mainly by women. Lakshmi is the wife of the god Vishnu and the embodiment of wealth, prosperity, and good fortune, which she brings with her wherever she goes and removes when she leaves. As the human counterpart to Lakshmi, married women worship her to obtain these things or to retain them if they already have them. Because it is well known that good fortune is not permanent and can often change, Lakshmi is also seen as a capricious and somewhat fickle divine presence. One of the taboos for women, at least in parts of northern India, is changing their jewelry on that day because this is said to annoy Lakshmi and raise the danger that she might depart because of her vexation.

Tiger
In Hindu mythology, a tiger or lion is the animal vehicle of the powerful forms of the Goddess, such as Durga. Modern iconography shows both lions and tigers with no apparent difference between them, perhaps reflecting the fact that the Hindi word sher can refer to either animal. In either case, the fact that the Goddess rides such a dangerous animal is clearly a symbol of her power and capacity, because in her mythology these animals are often described as her allies, doing battle on her part in response to her command.

Tika
In modern Hindi, a word denoting either a commentary on a text or a colored mark (often red vermilion) on one's forehead. These forehead marks are applied for various reasons: for sheer ornamentation, to indicate sectarian affiliation, or as an outward symbol of having worshiped in a temple that day (since a common element in this worship is to receive some of the vermilion daubed on the feet of the deity's image, as a sign of grace and one's subordinate status). The former of these two meanings is the original sense of the word, but the latter meaning is far more common in contemporary times. The connection between these two meanings could be the notion that just as a primary text is ornamented and highlighted by a commentary, in the same way a forehead mark could ornament the body.

Tilak
A mark on the forehead, also colloquially known as a tika, made from colored powders mixed with oil, sandalwood paste, or cosmetics. These forehead marks are applied for various reasons: for sheer ornamentation, to indicate sectarian affiliation, or as an outward symbol of having worshiped in a temple that day. See tika.

Tilak, Bal Gangadhar
(1856–1920) Maharashtrian political activist who was once characterized as “the father of Indian unrest.” Unlike his Maharashtrian contemporaries Ranade and Gokhale, who stressed working within existing institutions, Tilak never compromised his conviction that the British had no right to rule India. He resigned from Gokhale's reformist group in 1890 and devoted himself to educating and organizing ordinary people in Maharashtra. One vehicle for such organizing comprised two newspapers, one written in English and one in Marathi. The other involved organizing and promoting two new festivals. One of these festivals was devoted to the Maratha king Shivaji, a regional hero who had spent his life fighting domination by the Moghul empire. The other festival was Ganesh Chaturthi, which Tilak promoted as a visible way to assert and celebrate a Hindu nationalist identity during the time of British imperial rule. Given British power, outright rebellion was simply impossible, and the British government heavily restricted all forms of political dissent. The Ganesh festival provided a way to circumvent these restrictions because the British had a long-standing policy of not interfering with religious observances. Tilak was imprisoned several times on the charge of inciting political assassinations, but he always returned directly to the political fray. Aside from his political agitation, his greatest intellectual work is a commentary on the Bhagavad Gita, a religious text, in which he stresses the need for this-worldly activism to defeat evil, including violence if necessary. See also Moghul dynasty.

Time

For various articulations of time in traditional Hindu culture, see cosmic time, calendar, and lunar month.

Tirruppavai

One of the two collections of poetry composed by the poet-saint Andal (9th c.), the other being the Nacciyar Tirumooli. Andal was the only woman among the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All of the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. Andal’s chosen deity was Ranganatha, the particular form of Vishnu presiding at the temple of Shrirangam, yet both collections of her poetry are dedicated to Krishna, a different form of Vishnu.

This seeming divergence may reflect her conviction that all manifestations of Vishnu were the same or else may indicate a difference between personal devotion and literary expression. Ranganatha was a specific form of Vishnu presiding over a specific place—which at the time was true for most southern Indian temples—whereas Krishna was a form of Vishnu for whom there was already a large body of literature, but who was not geographically limited. The contents of the Tirruppavai are poems of separation in which Andal mourns the absence of Krishna, using the language and images of the forlorn lover, feverishly hoping for Krishna’s return.

Tirtha

(“crossing place”) The most general name for any holy place. Just as a ford on a riverbank provides a safe place to cross from one side to the other, in the same way a tirtha provides a way for one to “cross over” from mundane life to a sanctified one or, on an even greater scale, to “cross over” from this ephemeral and ever changing world to the unchanging, blissful, final liberation of the soul (moksha). Many tirthas are actual places—and many of them are on the shores of India’s sacred rivers, particularly the Ganges—and in its most colloquial meaning, the word tirtha connotes a pilgrimage place. Yet the traditional pilgrimage literature is emphatic that tirthas are not just restricted to mere physical places: The word can also refer to holy people (such as ascetics, saints, gurus, and sages) as well as to virtues such as charity, wisdom, compassion, and purity of heart.

A tirtha is first and foremost a place or thing that gives one access to sanctity and religious power, and in the case of the physical places (rivers, mountains, cities, temples, or images), this power is accessible to all. Such holy places are seen not only as giving easier access to the divine but also as being areas where religious merit is more readily and bountifully obtained. When one surveys the literature connected with certain areas, one of the most common themes is the claim that the merit from religious acts performed at place X (the physical tirtha) equals that of a thousand (or a million, or a billion) such religious acts done in ordinary places. The rarefied atmosphere at tirthas has a similar effect on evil acts, multiplying their consequences manifold. In this way the action of a tirtha can be compared to that of a microphone; just as a microphone magnifies any sound, whether harsh or pleasant, in the same way a tirtha magnifies, for good or ill, the consequences of any action. The pilgrimage literature thus commonly reminds people of the religious merit that their acts can bring, and it warns them that careless or evil actions can have equally severe consequences. For this reason, people performing religious pilgrimage (tirthayatra) were encouraged to live an austere, self-conscious life, both to save themselves from any lapses and to make the journey a self-conscious process of transformation. For further information see Diana Eck, Banaras, 1999; E. Alan Morinis, Pilgrimage in the Hindu Tradition, 1984; A. W. Entwistle, Braj, 1987; Ann Grodzins Gold, Fruitful Journeys, 1988; and Peter van der Veer, Gods on Earth, 1988.

Tirtha Dashanami
One of the ten divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. The Dashanamis were supposedly established by the ninth-century philosopher Shankaracharya, in an effort to create a corps of learned men who could help revitalize Hindu life. Each of the divisions is designated by a different name—in this case, tirtha (“sacred site”). On initiation, new members are given this name as a surname to their new ascetic names, thus allowing for immediate group identification.

Aside from their individual identity, these ten “named” divisions are divided into four larger organizational groups. Each group has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by Shankaracharya, as well as other particular religious associations. The Tirtha Dashanamis belong to the Kitawara group, which is affiliated with the Sharada math in the city of Dwarka, on the shore of the Arabian Sea. The Tirtha division is unique in that it is one of the few that will initiate only brahmins. (The other such divisions are Saraswati, Ashrama, and part of the Bharati order.)

Tirtha Shraddha
Name for a particular type of shraddha (ancestral memorial rite) performed when visiting a pilgrimage place (tirtha). A shraddha has two major features: symbolically feeding one’s ancestor(s) by offering balls of cooked grain (pindas), and feeding real food to a group of brahmins representing one’s ancestors. Tirtha shraddhas belong to a class of action known as occasional actions (naimittika karma) because they are incumbent only under certain conditions. Under ordinary circumstances one would not have to perform this action, but it becomes required when one visits a pilgrimage place. The traditional pilgrimage literature, much of it clearly written by the brahmins who received such meals and other gifts, is emphatic that this obligation should not be neglected.

Tirthayatra
(“Journey to a tirtha”) The general term denoting religious pilgrimage, which is seen as an act generating considerable religious merit (punya). The major focus of such travel was a visit to a “crossing place” (tirtha), a sacred site or person through which one could more easily communicate with the worlds beyond. One of the major themes in the traditional pilgrimage literature was the inherent holiness of whatever place was being described at that time, which was invariably described as bringing incalculable benefits, even for actions performed unknowingly or in jest. A second and seemingly contradictory theme was the stress on the inner state of the pilgrims themselves and the warning that they would gain no benefits unless they were serious about their visit. In its ideal, pilgrimage to the holy places was not a pleasure tour but a vehicle for spiritual development, through bathing (snana) in holy rivers, visiting and worshiping powerful deities, enduring hardships, making offerings to the ancestors, gift-giving, and living a sober, disciplined life.

In fact, the traditional literature affirms both sides of this tension—the need for individual commitment and the inherent sanctity of the places themselves—although the emphasis may shift depending on the needs of the moment. One explanation, combining both of these themes, is that these holy places amplified the effects of all of one’s actions there, whether good or bad. Pilgrims were thus encouraged to benefit from performing meritorious actions but warned of the heightened consequences from evil deeds, which were much more severe than normal.

In earlier times pilgrimage required a large investment of time and money. People would often spend months or years on pilgrimage, usually visiting a series of pilgrimage places. This was seen as a religiously meritorious use of one’s money, a notion still current in contemporary times. For most people, such an opportunity would come only once in their lifetime, generally in their later years, and this long-awaited fulfillment must have heightened their experience. The advent of railroad travel in the late 1800s largely reshaped this pattern, although it persisted in the Himalayas until well into the twentieth century. With the advent of railroad travel, people were able to visit places with relative ease and speed. This convenience encouraged multiple visits, but also ones in which the person stopped at fewer places on the way.

The most recent change in pilgrimage patterns has come with the development of tourism, which is being marketed by state governments as a way to generate income for the local people. It cannot be denied that “seeing the sights” has always been a part of pilgrimage, which provided a religiously sanctioned motive for travel. Yet the ideal, then as now, was that this journey should not be undertaken merely for enjoyment, but for serious purposes. Some contemporary Hindus worry that the growth of tourism has commercialized the sanctity of their holy places; other more sanguine souls consider the stress on tourism simply a stronger manifestation of trends that have always existed, which will have no effect on the truly pious.

Tiruchendur Temple and sacred site (tithra) on the Bay of Bengal in Tamil Nadu, sixty miles up the coast from Kanyakumari. Tiruchendur is part of the network of six temples in Tamil Nadu built to honor Murugan, a hill deity who has been assimilated into the larger pantheon as a form of the god Skanda, the son of Shiva. Five of these temples have been definitively identified, and each is associated with a particular region, a specific ecosystem, and a particular incident in Murugan's mythic career. In the case of Tiruchendur, it is said to be where he killed a demon enemy and thus presents him in his warrior aspect. The sixth of these temples is said to be every other shrine to Murugan in Tamil Nadu. The cult of Murugan is thus a symbolic vehicle for Tamil pride and identity, and because the number six has connotations of completeness—as in the six directions or the six chakras in the subtle body—it also connotes that nothing outside is needed. For further information see Fred Clothey, "Pilgrimage Centers in the Tamil Cultus of Murukan," in Journal of the American Academy of Religion, Vol. 40, No. 1, 1972.

Tiruchirappalli
City on the Cauvery River in the central part of the state of Tamil Nadu, and the capital of the district with the same name. The city's strategic position meant that it was contested by various southern Indian dynasties, of which the most recent were the Nayaks of Madurai, who built an imposing fort on a stone outcrop in the center of the city. It is most famous, however, for the great temples of Shrirangam and Jambukeshvar, both of which are on an island in the Cauvery, north of the city. The former is a temple to the god Vishnu, which has important symbolic associations with southern Indian kings and kingship; the latter is dedicated to the god Shiva in his aspect as “Lord of the Rose-Apple (jambu) Tree.”

Tirukkural
One of the most important pieces of early Tamil literature, along with the slightly later Naladiyar. The Tirukkural is a collection of brief verses on religious, social, and moral life, organized according to various themes; it is attributed to the poet Tiruvalluvar and is believed to have been written late in the fifth century. The Tirukkural's underlying assumptions are theistic, and in this it differs from the Naladiyar, the tone of which is primarily ethical, with no mention of divinity. Many of these epigrams have become proverbial expressions in Tamil and have become the cultural property of Tamils from all religious communities. See also Tamil language and Tamil epics.

Tirumalai Nayak
(r. 1623–1659) Greatest ruler in the southern Indian Nayak dynasty, who took advantage of the collapse of the Vijayanagar dynasty to rule much of modern Tamil Nadu from the capital city of Madurai. The peace and prosperity during Tirumalai's reign was expressed with two large pieces of monumental architecture—his royal palace, and the enormous Minakshi temple, named after the goddess considered to be Madurai's patron deity. Interestingly, the temple was the real ritual center of the city, as is clearly shown by its placement and the processional streets surrounding it.

Tirumalisai

(9th c.) One of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All of the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. According to tradition, Tirumalisai was the son of a sage and a celestial nymph (apsara), who was abandoned by his parents at birth. He was found and raised by a man of very humble status who called his foster son by the name of their village. For further information see Kamil Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975.

Tirumangai

(9th c.) By far the most picturesque of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. According to tradition, Tirumangai was born into a caste of thieves, and theft, robbery, and deceit play an important role in the stories associated with him. One story reports that after taking a vow to feed 1,008 Vaishnavas for a year, he resorted to highway robbery to raise the necessary funds; on another occasion he took to robbery to raise funds to enlarge the temple at Shrirangam. In these and other works, he had the continual help of Vishnu, his chosen deity; regardless of their truth or falsity, these stories reveal a great deal about the passionate devotional commitment of his time. For further information see Kamil Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975; and John Stirling Morley Hooper, Hymns of the Alvars, 1929.

Tirunavukkarashu

(7th c.) This was the given name of the Nayanar poet-saint most commonly referred to as Appar (“father”). Appar was one of the earliest of the Nayanars, a group of sixty-three southern Indian poet-saints who were devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva and who lived in southern India in the seventh and eighth centuries. Along with their contemporaries the Alvars, who were devotees of Vishnu, the Nayanars spearheaded the revitalization of Hindu religion through their passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language.

Tirupati

Town in the far southern part of the state of Andhra Pradesh, about 160 miles northwest of Madras. It is most famous for the Holy Hill (Tirumalai) eight miles to the north, which is the location of the temple to Venkateshvara and for which Tirupati is the major gateway.

Tirupati/Tirumalai Devasthanam

Official name for the managing committee of the Venkateshvara temple, near the town of Tirupati in the state of Andhra Pradesh. This temple is the richest one in India, based largely on the popular belief that any wish made in the deity's presence will invariably come true. In earlier times all of the temple receipts were taken by the priests running the temple, but since Indian independence in 1947, the temple committee has been responsible for them. The committee has channeled these funds into hundreds of charities, but particularly into education and temple building: the former in schools from... the primary to the university level, and the latter in providing the funds to help build many of the larger Hindu temples in the United States and Europe.

Tiruppan

(9th c.) One of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All of the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. According to tradition, Tiruppan was a foundling who was adopted by a musician. As he grew up, he developed deep devotion for Vishnu in his form as Ranganatha at the temple of Shrirangam, but because his family status was unknown, he never went into the temple itself out of fear that his presence might render it impure. Tiruppan finally gained entrance when one of the temple’s brahmin priests, who had earlier insulted him, received a divine command to carry Tiruppan on his shoulders to Ranganatha’s image. As with many stories in the lives of the bhakti saints, the lesson here clearly emphasizes the superiority of devotion over birth. For further information see Kamil Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975; and John Stirling Morley Hooper, Hymns of the Alvars, 1929.

Tiruttani

Tirtha (sacred site) in the hills of Tamil Nadu, seventy-five miles of Madras. It is famous for one of the six temples in Tamil Nadu built to honor Murugan, a hill deity assimilated into the pantheon as a form of Skanda. Tiruttani is celebrated as the place where he marries his tribal bride Valli, which gives him a family connection with southern India. Five of these temples are definitively identified and scattered throughout the state, but the sixth is said to be every other shrine to Murugan in Tamil Nadu. The cult of Murugan is thus a symbolic vehicle for Tamil pride and identity, and because the number six has connotations of completeness—as in the six directions, or the six chakras in the subtle body—it also connotes that nothing outside is needed. For further information see Fred Clothey, “Pilgrimage Centers in the Tamil Cultus of Murukan,” in Journal of the American Academy of Religion, Vol. 40, No. 1, 1972.

Tiruppurankunram

Tirtha (sacred site) ten miles southwest of Madurai in central Tamil Nadu. Tiruppurankunram is famous for one of the six temples in Tamil Nadu built to honor Murugan, a hill deity assimilated into the pantheon as a form of Skanda. It is said to be where he marries Devasena, the bride given by Indra and the gods after he has proven his mettle in battle, and thus reflects his acceptance into the larger pantheon. Five of these temples are definitively identified and scattered throughout the state, but the sixth is said to be every other shrine to Murugan in Tamil Nadu. The cult of Murugan is thus a symbolic vehicle for Tamil pride and identity, and because the number six has connotations of completeness—as in the six directions, or the six chakras in the subtle body—it also connotes that nothing outside is needed. For further information see Fred Clothey, “Pilgrimage Centers in the Tamil Cultus of Murukan,” in Journal of the American Academy of Religion, Vol. 40, No. 1, 1972.

Tiruttontar Puranam

(“history of the holy servants [of Shiva]”) Another name for the Periya Purana, a hagiographical account (an idealizing biography of saints or venerated figures) of the lives of the sixty-three Nayanars, written by the twelfth-century figure Cekkilar. The Nayanars were a group of Shaiva poet-saints who lived in southern India in the seventh and eighth centuries. See Periya Purana.
Tiruvachakam

(“holy utterances”) Collection of poetry composed in the ninth century by the Tamil poet-saint Manikkavachakar, who was a passionate devotee (bhakta) of the god Shiva. Manikkavachakar’s work comes in the tradition of the Nayanars (a group of sixty-three Shaiva poet-saints who lived in southern India in the seventh and eighth centuries), although he is not counted as one of them because he was about a century later than the last Nayanar, Sundaramurti. The hymns in the Tiruvachakam bear witness to Manikkavachakar’s intense devotion to Shiva, and in their devotional fervor, they can be seen as the culmination of the earlier devotional (bhakti) tradition. Manikkavachakar’s hymns are also the basis for the development of the philosophical tradition known as Shaiva Siddhanta, which makes Manikkavachakar a pivotal figure in southern Indian Shaivism. For further information see Glenn Yocum, Hymns to the Dancing Siva, 1982. See also Tamil language and Tamil epics.

Tiruvalluvar

(5th–6th c.) According to tradition, the author of the Tirukkural, one of the most important pieces of early Tamil literature. The Tirukkural is a collection of brief verses on religious, social, and moral life, organized according to various themes. Many of these epigrams have become proverbial expressions in Tamil and have become the cultural property of Tamils from all religious communities. See also Tamil language and Tamil epics.

Tiruvannamalai

Temple town and sacred site (tirtha) in the northern part of the state of Tamil Nadu, about 100 miles southwest of Madras, the capital. Tiruvannamalai is most famous as a temple to the god Shiva in his form as Arunachaleshvar, “the Lord of Arunachal [Hill],” the hill on which the temple is built. Tiruvannamalai is also one of the bhutalingas (“elemental lingas”), a network of five southern Indian sites sacred to Shiva. In each of these sites, Shiva is worshiped as a linga, the pillar-shaped object that is his symbolic form, and at each site the linga is believed to be formed from one of the five primordial elements (bhuta)—earth, wind, fire, water, and space (akasha). Tiruvannamalai’s linga is associated with the primordial element of fire, making this an extremely powerful image. Aside from the image and the temple, Tiruvannamalai is also famous as the place in which the modern Indian saint Ramana Maharshi spent most of his life, from 1896 until his death in 1950.

Tiruvaymoli

(“Holy words”) Collection of 1,102 stanzas written in the tenth century by the poet-saint Nammalvar. Nammalvar was one of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All of the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. Nammalvar’s Tiruvaymoli is an outpouring of ecstatic Vaishnava devotionalism and forms the concluding section of the Nalayira Divya-prabandham, the collected compositions of the Alvars. For further information see Kamil Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975; John Stirling Morley Hooper, Hymns of the Alvars, 1929; A. Shrinivasa Raghavan, Nammalvar, 1975; and A. K. Ramanujan (trans.), Hymns for the Drowning, 1981.

Tiruvayur

Southern Indian temple town about thirty-five miles east of the city of Tanjore in the state of Tamil Nadu. The town is most famous for an enormous temple to the god Shiva, and as with many southern Indian temples, the temple is located in the heart of the city and forms a substantial part of the city itself.

Tithi
A lunar day, that is to say, one of the thirty days occurring during a single lunar month, from full moon to full moon. Because these thirty lunar days take place in about twenty-eight solar days, each lunar day is thus slightly shorter than a solar day. Even in contemporary times, most Hindu religious observances are determined by the lunar calendar, which makes the determination of these lunar days an important matter. Most people keep track of these holidays with a panchang, an almanac that gives all the lunar days.

Toddy Palm
Palm tree that is both the source of the slightly fermented beverage tapped from its sap known as toddy, and the long, flat leaves that were traditionally used for writing down all sorts of texts, including religious ones. The former use led this tree to be considered unclean, since alcoholic beverages are proscribed in “respectable” Hindu society; the manuscripts written on the leaves, however, could be the holiest of texts. The poet-saint Ravidas uses this palm to illustrate how the power of the divine name can transform something normally believed to be base and vile. In doing so he is also referring to himself, who as a tanner and leather worker was believed to be defiled because his work involves handling the skins of dead animals.

Tondaradippodi
(9th c.) One of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All of the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. According to tradition, Tondaradippodi was born as a brahmin named Vipra Narayana, and his family's hereditary labor was to arrange the flowers for the worship of Ranganatha, a form of Vishnu who is the presiding deity at the temple of Shrirangam. He became enamored of a courtesan who cast her spell on him, and for a time paid attention to nothing else. In the end he was saved by Ranganatha, to whom Vipra Narayana devoted himself for the rest of his life, taking as a symbol of this his new name (“Dust of the Feet of the Slaves [of God]”). For further information see Kamil Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975; and John Stirling Morley Hooper, Hymns of the Alvars, 1929.

Tortoise Avatar
Second avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu. As with all of Vishnu’s avatars, the Tortoise avatar came into being in a time of crisis and served to restore the cosmic balance that had been thrown out of equilibrium. In this case the source of trouble was the sage Durvasas, who had cursed the gods to become mortal and their heavenly luster to fade. To counter this, the gods made a pact with the demons that they would jointly churn the Ocean of Milk to obtain the nectar of immortality, which would be equally divided.

The image of churning here is based on traditional dairy practices, in which the person churning uses a string to rotate a churning paddle. In this instance, however, the churning takes place on a cosmic scale: The churning stick is Mount Mandara, the mountain that is at the center of the earth; the churning string is the divine serpent Vasuki, who encircles the world; and Vishnu himself, in the form of a tortoise, dives to the bottom of the ocean to provide a stable base for the churning stick. The gods and demons pull Vasuki back and forth, spinning the mountain and churning the Ocean of Milk. The churning separates the Ocean of Milk into... various components, both good and bad. One product is the deadly halahala poison, which is neutralized by having Shiva hold it in his throat. Some of the other products are the Kaustubha jewel, the wishing cow Surabhi, the goddess Lakshmi, and finally the physician of the gods, Dhanvantari, who emerges from the sea bearing the pot containing the nectar of immortality.

The demons grab the pot of nectar and begin to escape, but Vishnu takes the form of the enchantress Mohini and beguiles the demons into giving the pot back to her. She gives the pot to the gods, who take off with the demons in hot pursuit. According to more recent traditions, in their flight the gods stop at four different holy places on earth—Allahabad, Haridwar, Ujjain, and Nasik—over a twelve-(divine) day span; this latter incident is cited as the charter myth for the celebration of the Kumbha Mela at these sites on a twelve-year basis (because a divine day is believed to equal a human year).

The gods finally manage to escape their pursuers and divide the nectar among themselves, but they fail to notice that the demon Sainhikeya slips into their midst in disguise. As the demon begins to drink, the sun and moon alert Vishnu, who uses his discus to cut off the demon's head. Sainhikeya's two halves become immortal because they have come into contact with the nectar, and both halves are considered malevolent celestial beings: the head as Rahu, the body as Ketu. Rahu has particular enmity for the sun and moon, since these deities are responsible for his demise, and tries to swallow them whenever he meets them in the heavens. He always succeeds, but because he no longer has a body to digest them, they escape unharmed through Rahu's severed neck. This, of course, is the traditional explanation for solar and lunar eclipses; the association with the malevolent Rahu has thus led eclipses to be seen as highly inauspicious times. See also ocean, churning of the.

Tota Puri
An ascetic initiated into the Puri order of the Dashanami Sanyasis, as can be seen from his surname. Tota Puri was one of the teachers of the Bengali saint Ramakrishna, who appeared to instruct Ramakrishna in Advaita Vedanta as part of the latter's continuing exposure to many different types of religious practice. In his earlier religious practice, Ramakrishna had been a fervent devotee (bhakta) of the goddess Kali, whereas the Advaita Vedanta philosophy claims that behind all things lies a single impersonal reality that has no defining attributes except for being, consciousness, and bliss (sacchidananda). In the Advaita understanding, because all conceptions of particular deities have specific attributes, they are thus conditioned forms of the ultimate Brahman (Supreme Reality).

Although this conception ran counter to his own previous experience, Ramakrishna practiced diligently under Tota Puri's direction. When Ramakrishna attained enlightenment through the practices of Advaita, he discovered that the essence of this experience was the same as that gained from his earlier devotional practices. This inner experience of identity was a pivotal experience for Ramakrishna and reinforced his conviction that all forms of religious practice led the seeker to the same place. After Ramakrishna's experience of enlightenment, Tota Puri disappeared.

Transcendental Meditation
Religious organization founded by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, whose teachings on meditation comprise its major thrust. As its name would indicate, Transcendental Meditation (TM) stresses the multiple benefits of meditation: For the individual, it promotes physical, mental, and spiritual health, whereas for the larger environment, it is claimed to have pacific effects, resulting in reduced crime and hatred. All of these results can be obtained only by diligent practice, but the initiation itself is easy to obtain—all one has to do is to attend a seminar sponsored by a TM instructor and pay the required fee to obtain one's mantra, or sacred utterance. In more recent years, TM has offered programs leading to the acquisition of superhuman powers (siddhis) at its headquarters at Maharishi International University in Fairfield, Iowa. The claims of these programs have been toned down since a disgruntled buyer—who had been unable to learn to levitate—won a lawsuit for damages.

Although meditation and the use of mantras are well-established Hindu practices, many traditional Hindus are uncomfortable with other elements of TM's marketing. One controversial point is the practice of buying (or selling) a mantra, which was traditionally transmitted from teacher (guru) to disciple only after significant association. A similar problem comes from the notion that one can buy and sell superhuman powers. These powers are seen as highly seductive because they can be used for both good and evil and as having the potential to destroy a spiritually immature person. Traditional wisdom is unanimous that a person should not consciously seek such powers, because the very act of seeking is seen as being rooted in selfish desires. In contrast, when one has gained such powers as a byproduct of spiritual attainment, one is believed to be able to keep them in proper perspective.

Treta Yuga
A particular age of the world in cosmic time. According to traditional belief, time has neither a beginning nor an end, but alternates between cycles of creation and activity, followed by cessation and quietude. Each of these cycles lasts for 4.32 billion years, with the active phase known as the Day of Brahma, and the quiet phase as the Night of Brahma. In cosmic time, the Day of Brahma is divided into one thousand mahayugas ("great cosmic ages"), each of which lasts for 4.32 million years. Each mahayuga is composed of four constituent yugas (cosmic ages), named the Krta Yuga, Treta Yuga, Dvapara Yuga, and Kali Yuga. Each of these four yugas is shorter than its predecessor and ushers in an era more degenerate and depraved. By the end of the Kali Yuga, things have gotten so bad that the only solution is the destruction and recreation of the earth, at which time the next Krta era begins.

The Treta Yuga is the second of the four yugas, lasting for 1,296,000 years. Although the Treta Age is still relatively auspicious, it is less so than the Krta Age, symbolized by its identification with the metal silver—not as valuable as the gold associated with the preceding Krta Yuga, but more valuable than the bronze and iron associated with the two following yugas. In popular belief the Treta Yuga is believed to be the time when the god Rama reigned on earth.

Tribhanga
and sculpture, in which the line of the body has three distinct breaks, or changes in direction. In this pose, the body’s weight is mainly supported on one foot, with the corresponding knee and shoulder inclined toward one side and the hips inclined in the opposite direction.

Tridosha
In ayurveda, the term for the set of three bodily humours, vata (“air”), pitta (“bile”), and kapha (“phlegm’). Each of these humours is associated with certain physiological tendencies, particularly with regard to digestion and metabolism. Every person has all three of these humours, although one of them is generally dominant. In a healthy person the three humours are in general equilibrium, but an imbalance can lead to illness or chronic health problems. The solution to these lies in regaining the proper balance between the doshas, or humours, for which one of the major solutions is eating a proper diet.

Trilochan
(15th c.) A sant poet who is generally associated with the poet-saint Namdev. The name sant is an umbrella term for a loose group of central and northern Indian poet-saints who shared several general tendencies: a stress on individualized, interior religion leading to a personal experience of the divine; a disdain for external ritual, particularly image worship; a faith in the power of the divine name; and a tendency to ignore conventional caste distinctions. Trilochan’s only existing poems are a few verses in the Adigranth, the sacred scripture of the Sikh community. These verses describe his devotion to Vithoba, the presiding deity of the temple at Pandharpur in Maharashtra, who was also Namdev’s chosen deity. Thus, the poems seem consistent with Maharashtrian origins. Trilochan is also mentioned as a devotee (bhakta) by other bhakti poets, most notably by the poet-saint Ravidas.

Trimbak
Sacred site (tirtha) at the headwaters of the Godavari River, in the Nasik district of the state of Maharashtra. Trimbak is famous as the site for Tryambakeshvar, one of the twelve jyotirlingas, the most sacred spot for devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva.

Trimurti
(“three forms”) The three deities of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva, often represented as three faces on a single image, to symbolize the ultimate identity of all three forms of divinity and divine activity: Brahma as creator, Vishnu as preserver and sustainer, and Shiva as destroyer.
Triphala
Another name for the Urdhva-pundra, the characteristic forehead mark of renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. Although there is considerable variation, the basic form is three vertical lines, in contrast to the three horizontal lines worn by Shaivite ascetics. See Urdhva-pundra.

Tripundra
Sectarian mark of three horizontal lines, most commonly applied to the forehead but which can also be applied to the back, heart, shoulders, arms, and legs. The tripundra marks the person wearing it as a devotee (bhakta) of the god Shiva, and although this mark is most commonly worn by renunciant ascetics, householders also wear it. According to one interpretation, the three lines represent the three prongs of Shiva’s trident; according to another, they symbolize Shiva’s third eye. The three lines are drawn by dipping the first three fingers of the right hand into a sacred ash known as vibhuti (“power”) and then drawing them across the forehead. In earlier times vibhuti was made from wood ash that had been sifted through cloth until it was as fine as talcum powder. This is still done today, primarily by ascetics who usually use the ash from a dhuni, or smoldering fire, which has sacred characteristics; vibhuti can also be bought in stores selling religious supplies.

Tripura
(“three cities”) In Hindu mythology, the triple city built by the three sons of the demon Taraka: Kamalaksha, Tarakaksha, and Vidyunmali. Shiva eventually destroyed the demons’ three cities, and as a result one of Shiva’s epithets is Tripurari, the “Enemy of the Three City.”

Tripurari
Epithet of Shiva as the enemy (ari) of the Triple City (Tripura). According to the mythic charter, three demons are dismayed by their continuing defeats at the hands of the gods, and they begin to perform harsh asceticism (tapas) to find the means to counter this. The god Brahma finally comes to them, willing to reward them with boons. However, when the demons learn that absolute invulnerability is impossible, they lay down the condition that each of them should build a city that can move over the earth, which will come together only once in a long time, and that these cities can be destroyed only by a single arrow that pierces through them all at the same time.

This boon renders the demons practically invulnerable, and they proceed to build three magnificent cities—one of iron, one of silver, and one of gold. They grow rich and prosperous, but over time they are corrupted by power and began to oppress the earth. Finally the gods petition Brahma for help, and Brahma informs them that the only one with the strength to fulfill this condition is the god Shiva. The gods build him a bow and arrow, and when the conjunction of the three cities takes place, Shiva sends a single arrow through all three, kindling a fire that burns the cities and destroys their inhabitants.

This story illustrates one important facet of Shiva's character—unlike the god Vishnu, who often manages to trick those he subdues, Shiva is much less complex and attains his end by using power against which no one can stand. In some of the stories, one of the three demons is himself a devotee (bhakta) of Shiva, and when the arrow is loosed and hurtles to destroy the Triple City, Shiva himself rescues his devotee and his family. This is in character, for Shiva is portrayed as gracious to his devotees and will do just about anything for them. It also shows that the demons are conceived not as completely debased but as another race of beings with different powers and capacities, and who have as much potential as deities and human beings.

Trishanku

(“three sins”) In Hindu mythology, a celebrated king of the Solar Line. He is named Satyavrata at birth but is cursed by the sage Vasishtha to bear the name Trishanku because of three major sins: He abducts another man's wife, he incurs the anger of his father, and he eats beef (which he has earlier obtained by slaughtering Vasishtha's cow). Along with this uncomplimentary name, Vasishtha also curses Trishanku to be a chandala (untouchable), which Trishanku suffers for some time before being restored to his kingship.

After regaining his throne, Trishanku is a good king, but he desires to be taken bodily into heaven. Vasishtha and his sons ridicule this desire, but Trishanku finds an ally in the sage Vishvamitra, who has a long history of conflict with Vasishtha. Vishvamitra performs the sacrifice to take Trishanku to heaven, but when he arrives there, he is pushed back down by Indra, the ruler of heaven, and Trishanku falls head downward. Vishvamitra orders Trishanku to remain where he is, and since Indra will not let him up and Vishvamitra will not let him down, he is suspended in midair. Indra begins to construct a separate heaven for Trishanku, but when Vishvamitra threatens to create a new Indra for the new heaven, Indra relents and takes Trishanku to heaven in his material body. The name Trishanku has since become proverbial to refer to a person trapped between two options.

Trishiras

In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics, Trishiras is a demon ally of Ravana, the demon-king of Lanka. Along with Ravana's brothers, Khara and Dushana, Trishiras leads a frontal attack against the god Rama, the epic's protagonist. The attack is an effort to avenge the insult to Ravana's sister Shurpanakha, who has been mutilated by Rama's brother Lakshmana. Although he is a valiant warrior, Trishiras is eventually killed by Rama, as are Khara and Dushana. The failure of such frontal attacks convince Ravana that Rama is too powerful to kill in combat, so he decides to take revenge by kidnapping Rama's wife Sita.

Trishul

(“three points”) The trident, which is an important weapon associated with both the god Shiva and the Goddess. The trident is a modified form of the spear (shula).

Tristhalisetu

(“The bridge to the Three Holy Cities”) Pilgrimage text written by the great scholar Narayana Bhatta (approx. 1513–1570) that was intended to give the readers precise instructions for correctly performing the pilgrimage rites at three important sites: Allahabad, a bathing (snana) place at the junction of the Ganges and Yamuna Rivers; Benares, which is renowned as a city of culture and religious learning; and Gaya in Bihar, a major site for the shraddha rites for the dead. The text begins with a section devoted to pilgrimage in general, giving the rules for its performance, and continues with three sections giving the prescriptions for pilgrimages to Allahabad, Benares, and Gaya. The Tristhalisetu is an important example of the class of commentarial literature known as nibandhas (“collections”). The nibandhas were compendia of Hindu lore, in which the compilers culled references on a particular theme from the Vedas, dharma literature, puranas, and other authoritative religious texts, and then compiled these excerpts into a single volume, often with their own commentary. Narayana Bhatta was one of the most learned men of his time, and he was attempting to define everything precisely, based on his sources, so that people would know how to do the right thing. The initial section of this text has been edited and translated by Richard Salomon as The Bridge to the Three Holy Cities, 1985.

Triveni
(“Triple stream”) Traditional epithet for the confluence of the Ganges and Yamuna Rivers in the city of Allahabad, in the state of Uttar Pradesh. Although only two rivers can be seen at the confluence, the name Triveni comes from the traditional belief that they are joined by a third river, the Saraswati, which flows underground and is unseen to the naked eye.

Tryambakeshvar
Temple and sacred site (tirtha) in the village of Trimbak in the Nasik district of the state of Maharashtra, at the headwaters of the Godavari River. The temple is named for its presiding deity, the god Shiva in his manifestation as the “Three-Eyed Lord.” Shiva is present at fifteen miles down from Kedarnath. The site for Triyuginarayan is on the top of a mountain, surrounded by forest. Triyuginarayan’s major temple is dedicated to the god Vishnu in his form as Narayana, and in front of the temple is a pit in which a fire is said to have been smoldering for the past three cosmic ages (tryyugi). According to its charter myth, Triyuginarayan is the site at which the deities Shiva and Parvati were married, a ceremony to which this continuously smoldering fire (in its guise as Agni, the fire-god) stands as the witness.

Tryambakeshvar
In Hindu mythology, Trnavarta is one of the demon assassins sent by Kamsa, the demon-king of Mathura, in an attempt to kill his nephew, the child-god Krishna. Trnavarta is a whirlwind that sweeps Krishna up into the air, but Krishna holds tight to Trnavarta until he simply blows himself out.

Truth, Power of
In popular Hindu belief, truth is seen as having magical power of its own, a power to which people can appeal in their time of distress. One way of appealing to this power is through the famous act of truth, a conditional statement in which the first part is a true statement about one’s past behavior and the second part a request for some specific result (for example, “If I have always given to those who begged from me, may this fire not burn me”). The power of truth was also invoked in trial by ordeal and was seen as the power that made the ordeal a valid means of testing people.

Tryambakeshvar
Temple and sacred site (tirtha) in the village of Trimbak in the Nasik district of the state of Maharashtra, at the headwaters of the Godavari River. The temple is named for its presiding deity, the god Shiva in his manifestation as the “Three-Eyed Lord.” Shiva is present at Tryambakeshvar in the form of a linga, the pillar-shaped image that is his symbolic form. The Tryambakeshvar linga is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites deemed especially sacred to Shiva and at which Shiva is uniquely present. The charter myth for Tryambakeshvar begins with the sage Gautama, who unwisely hits an old cow with a stick, killing it, and thus incurs the sin of cow slaughter. Gautama is told that to expiate his sin, he first has to amass enough merit to bring the Ganges down to earth, and after he has purified himself by bathing (snana) in the Ganges, he has to make and worship 10 million Shiva lingas formed from the sand on its banks. Gautama undertakes his penance (prayashchitta) diligently. Upon worshiping the 10 millionth linga he is rewarded by a vision of Shiva, who grants his wish that both the Ganges and Shiva will remain there forever—the former in her form as the Godavari, the latter as Tryambakeshvar.

Tuesday
(Mangalvar) The third day of the week, presided over by the planet Mars (Mangal). The planet Mars is deemed inauspicious, both because of its red color (reminiscent of blood) and because of its associations with war and disorder. Tuesday is widely considered an unlucky day, and many people abstain from certain kinds of activity on it. Travel is particularly discouraged unless absolutely necessary. Cutting the hair and beard is also discouraged, and in much of northern India, barbers take Tuesday off. To counter the day’s potential inauspiciousness, many people also perform rites of protection, such as worshiping strong protective deities such as Hanuman—who is close enough to human beings to understand the problems they face, but divine enough to be able to protect them. Paradoxically, the literal meaning of the name for Tuesday is the “auspicious” (mangal) day. Giving it this euphemistic name may simply be a bit of reverse magic; that if one calls it the lucky day, it may, in fact, turn out to be.

Tukaram
(1598–1650) Poet and saint in the Varkari Panth, a religious community centered on the worship of the god Vithoba, at his temple at Pandharpur in the modern state of Maharashtra. According to tradition, Tukaram was a shudra (in traditional Hinduism, there are four main social groups, the shudras being the lowest and least influential) born in the small village of Dehu, where his father was a petty merchant. Tukaram continued in the family business, which eventually failed because he had little interest in worldly life. He longed instead for the life of a renunciant, in which he could completely devote himself to God. As with many of the other bhakti saints, he is reported to have suffered considerable persecution by traditionally minded brahmins, who were uneasy about a person of his low status gaining spiritual greatness. An unlettered man, he is most famous for the songs known as abhangs, which are still widely sung in Maharashtra. He had many disciples, including the poet-saint Bahina Bai, and according to tradition, he ended his life by being taken up to heaven in a chariot of fire. For further information see G. A. Deleury, The Cult of Vithoba, 1960; and Justin E. Abbott (trans.), The Life of Tukaram, 1980.

Tulsi
A small shrublike plant commonly denoted the “holy basil.” For devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, the tulsi plant is a form of Vishnu’s wife Lakshmi, who is cursed to take birth as a plant. According to the story, Lakshmi sits with Vishnu’s wives, the goddesses Ganga and Saraswati. Ganga makes amorous eyes at Vishnu, and when Saraswati protests this indecency, a quarrel breaks out. By the time it is over, Ganga and Saraswati have cursed each other to be born on earth as rivers. Vishnu has been cursed to be born as a stone (the shalagram); and Lakshmi, who tries only to mediate the quarrel, is cursed to be born as a plant. This plant is thus a form of Lakshmi, and pious Vaishnavas cultivate a tulsi plant as an act of devotion. The plant is especially dear to Vishnu, and it is believed that all parts of the plant are purifying. Any parts of it used in worship are especially meritorious—whether grinding the leaves to a paste to mark one's body, taking the leaves as prasad (food offered to a deity as an act of worship), or using tulsi wood for implements or sacrificial fuel.

Tulsidas
(1532–1623) Poet-saint and devotee (bhakta) of the god Rama, whose greatest work, the Ramcharitmanas, retells the epic Ramayana in the vernacular language of his day. According to evidence in his poetry, Tulsidas was born into a desperately poor brahmin family, but his life was transformed by the power of Rama's name. This can be taken as a reference to his teacher, who is believed to have been a Ramanandi, but it can also be taken literally. Tulsidas continually stresses that the name of Rama embodies the divinity's power and thus makes that power accessible to devotees. According to tradition, he lived a fairly hard life despite his fame, and because of his emphasis on devotion, he reportedly faced problems from other brahmins, who were concerned about maintaining their social status.

As with all of the Ramayana’s vernacular retellings, Tulsidas did not merely translate the story of Rama but interpreted it according to his own religious convictions. The two most important shifts are his overwhelming emphasis on the importance of devotion (bhakti) and the saving power of the name of Rama, to which Tulsidas gives greater importance than Rama himself. Tulsidas also brings in mythic material from a variety of other sources, most notably the Shiva Purana and the Adhyatmaramayana. This material is largely added to the first and last chapters, where Tulsidas makes his greatest changes from the original epic. One theory to explain why Tulsidas brought in this other material is that he was trying to transcend narrow sectarian boundaries, and a sign of this is that much of the text is narrated by the god Shiva, in the form of a dialogue to his wife Parvati. For part of the final book, Shiva is supplanted as narrator by the crow Bhushundi, who symbolizes the power of devotion to rescue even a common carrion-eating crow. Aside from the Ramcharitmanas, Tulsidas composed many other works in varying regional languages and dedicated to various deities; the most important are the Kavitavali, the Vinaya Patrika, the Ramavali, and the Shrikrishnavali.

Tulsidas himself refers to writing down his poems, and although the manuscript tradition is uncertain for some of his texts, the transition from song to written text took place much faster than for most of his contemporary poet-saints, many of whom were illiterate. For further information see F. Raymond Allchin (trans.), Kavitavali, 1964; W. Douglas P. Hill (trans.), The Holy Lake of the Acts of Rama, 1971; and John Stratton Hawley and Mark Juergensmeyer (trans.), Songs of the Saints of India, 1988.

Tulsidas Jayanti
Festival falling on the seventh day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Shravan (July–August), celebrating the birthday of the medieval devotional (bhakti) poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623). Tulsidas composed many different texts, and he is one of the few medieval poet-saints believed to have been literate and to have actually written down his work. His most celebrated text is the Ramcharitmanas, a vernacular retelling of the epic Ramayana.

Tulsi Vivah
Festival marking the marriage of the goddess Lakshmi and the god Vishnu, celebrated on the eleventh day of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Kartik. It is also celebrated as Devotthayan Ekadashi. On this day devotees (bhakta) place a shalagram (a black stone containing the spiral-shaped fossil shell of a prehistoric sea creature, understood as a “self-manifest” form of Vishnu) in a pot containing a tulsi plant (considered a form of Lakshmi). Thus they symbolically unite Vishnu and Lakshmi and perform the marriage ceremony for them, complete with festive songs.

Tumari
Vessel used by renunciant ascetics. In earlier times it would have been made of a gourd, although today the shape is often replicated in brass or some other metal. The tumari is taller than it is wide, with an open top over which the carrying handle arches. Unlike another piece of ascetic equipment, the kamandalu, which has both a spout and a covered top, the tumari is an open vessel. When made of a gourd, it would simply have entailed cutting parts off of the top for the opening, with the remaining top parts forming the vessel’s handle. Because of its simplicity and use of readily available materials, the tumari was a symbol of ascetic life.

Tungabhadra River
Important tributary of the Krishna River, which has its source in the Western Ghats in southern Karnataka and then flows north and east toward the Krishna. The most important place on its banks is Hampi, the ruined city that was the capital of the Vijayanagar empire. See also Vijayanagar dynasty.

Tungnath
Temple and sacred site (tirtha) in the Garhwal region of the Himalayas in the valley between the Mandakini and the Alakananda Rivers, fourteen miles by footpath north of the village of Ukhimath. The temple's presiding deity is the god Shiva in his manifestation as the “Lofty Lord.” Tungnath is one of the Panchkedar, a network of five sacred sites spread throughout the Garhwal region; the other four are Kedarnath, Kalpeshvar, Rudranath, and Madmaheshvar. This network of five sites is seen as a symbolic representation of Shiva's body, understandably so, since Shiva is believed to dwell in the Himalayas. Of these five, Tungnath is believed to be Shiva's arm.

Turiya
(“fourth”) The name for the innermost quarter of the Self (atman), as described in the Mandukya Upanishad, one of the speculative religious texts that form the latest stratum of the Vedas, the oldest Hindu sacred texts. As with most of the Upanishads, the Mandukya Upanishad's underlying concern is to investigate ultimate questions, in particular the nature of the Self. The upanishad describes the Self as having four quarters, each of which removes another layer of egoism. The first quarter is waking consciousness, which is characterized by perceptions of subject and object; the second is dream sleep, which is sheer subjectivity; the third is deep sleep, which has neither subject nor object; and the last is a mysterious state simply called “the fourth” (turiya), which is the Self. This state is identified as the ultimate truth, and knowledge of this brings final liberation of the soul (moksha).

Tvashtr
(“maker of carriages”) In the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts, Tvashtr is a minor deity known as the workman of the Vedic gods. The Vedic hymns frequently mention wheeled chariots as military devices, and his name’s literal meaning shows the esteem in which this craft was held, as the apex of creative work. In the Vedas, Tvashtr is famous for crafting the weapons of the gods, especially the mace with which the storm-god Indra slays the serpent Vrtra (Rg Veda 1.32). In later times Tvashtr is identified with the minor deity Vishvakarma, who in later Hindu life becomes the architect and craftsman of the gods. Since Tvashtr has a much older textual presence than Vishvakarma, this seems to be an attempt to identify one divine workman as another, based on their similar functions.

Twice-Born
(dvija) In its most specific sense, this word denotes a man from the highest traditional social groups (varnas)—brahmin, kshatriya, and vaishya—who has undergone the adolescent ritual initiation known as the upanayana samskara. This initiation gives the entitlement and the obligation to study the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts, and definitively divides society between those who have this entitlement and those who do not—namely, all children, women, and men not belonging to these three groups. Because of this initiation’s ritual significance, it was known as the second birth, and thus the initiates were “twice-born.” The first birth was biological and based on nature, whereas the second was cultural and marked higher religious status. Although in its strictest sense this word refers only to such initiates, in a more general sense it can denote any person belonging to a varna whose members are eligible for this initiation—that is, any brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya.

Twilight Language
One of the translations for the term Sandhabhasha. Sandhabhasha is a symbolic language used in tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice, in which the elements of tantric worship are described in a coded language often drawn from the private parts and functions of the human body. This is done to hide the tradition’s particulars from the uninitiated. See Sandhabhasha.
Tyag

(“renunciation”) Practice of renunciation stressed most by ascetics, but even among this group, some stress it more than others. Some ascetics carry this to extreme lengths. One famous ascetic, Swami Karpatri, was famous for receiving the food he was given as alms into his cupped hands, signifying the renunciation of an eating-vessel. The most extreme examples are ascetics who have given up all clothing as a symbol of renunciation of conventional standards, including shame. The ultimate purpose in such renunciation varies with the individual, but one of the common themes is to serve as a model of how little one really needs to live a happy and fulfilling life and thus to illustrate the fundamental values that people often forget in the bustle of everyday life. Many ordinary people also share this value in seeking to simplify their lives through giving up attachments and entanglements.
Udana
In traditional Indian physiology, one of the five bodily “winds” considered to be responsible for basic bodily functions, the others being prana, apana, vyana, and samana. The udana wind is considered to reside in the throat and to be the force that conveys things out of the mouth—primarily speech and song, but also burps and (presumably) vomit.

Udasi
Ascetic community founded by Shrichandra (traditional dates 1492–1612), the elder son of Guru Nanak, the first of the ten Sikh gurus. According to one tradition, Nanak passed over Shrichandra as his successor because Shrichandra had become an ascetic. Guru Nanak disapproved of this, believing that his followers should live married lives in society. The Udasis have always been an ascetic sect, and since their formation they have been seen as distinct from the two other major ascetic communities, the Sanyasis and the Bairagis. The latter are separated on sectarian grounds: The Sanyasis worship the god Shiva, and the Bairagis the god Vishnu, whereas the Udasis worship the Panchayatana grouping of five Hindu deities (Shiva, Vishnu, Ganesh, Surya, and Durga) rather than one or another alone. During the bathing (snana) processions at the Kumbha Mela, the Udasis march third, behind the Sanyasis and the Bairagis. Through the legacy of their founder, they have retained some informal connections with the Sikh community, but by and large they have always been considered to belong in the Hindu fold. There was considerable friction between the Udasis and the Sikh community in the early twentieth century because the Sikhs were more self-consciously asserting their separate identity. See also Panchayatana Puja.

Udayagiri
Village just north of the city of Bhopal in the state of Madhya Pradesh. Udayagiri is famous for its rock-cut cave sculptures from the Gupta era (350–550 C.E), particularly a twenty-foot sculpture of the god Vishnu in his form as the Boar avatar, with the earth balanced on his tusk. See also Gupta dynasty.

Uddalaka Aruni
A character in the Chandogya Upanishad, one of the speculative texts that form the latest stratum of the Vedas. In the upanishad, Uddalaka is the father and teacher of the boy Shvetaketu Aruneya, and the two are a model for the transmission of secret teachings passed between guru and disciple. According to a story in the upanishad’s sixth chapter, Shvetaketu is sent away by his father to study the Vedas, and when he returns twelve years later, having mastered all the Vedas, he incorrectly considers himself learned. His father punctures his arrogance by asking Shvetaketu questions about the nature of the cosmos and thus shows him the difference between memorization and true knowledge. When Shvetaketu cannot answer these, he admits his ignorance and accepts instruction from his father on the nature of the Self (atman). This instruction contains the teaching “That thou art” (Tat tvam asi). This is one of the “great statements” (mahavakya) in Indian philosophy and asserts the ultimate identity between Brahman and atman, the cosmos and the individual Self.

Uddhava
In Hindu mythology, one of the god Krishna’s friends and companions. In the devotional (bhakti) literature, Uddhava is most famous for the message he carries from Krishna back to the gopis, the cowherd women of Braj (a northern Indian region on the Yamuna River south of the modern city of Delhi) who are Krishna’s devotees (bhakta) and who love him more than life. Uddhava tells the gopis not to be concerned with Krishna’s physical absence, since as the supreme divinity, Krishna is always with them, even though he may not be visible. The gopis reply that such talk is fine for intellectual folk such as Uddhava, but that for simple women like themselves, who have had the delight of associating with Krishna in the flesh, such abstractions are absolutely useless. Uddhava and the gopis are symbols for two different types of religious life: one cool and abstract, focused on an impersonal divinity, and the other based on passionate love for a particular deity. Differing accounts of this story give different endings, according to the writers’ inclinations. In some of the stories, including the earliest version in the Bhagavata Purana, the story ends in a standoff, with each side unable to convince the other. Yet in at least one of the accounts, Uddhava is converted to the gopis’ point of view. For further information see R. S. McGregor (ed. and trans.), Nanddas, 1973.

Udgatr
Type of sacrificial priest in the Brahmana literature, one of the later strands in the sacred literature known as the Vedas. The Brahmanas largely functioned as manuals describing how to perform sacrificial rites—which primarily involved burning offerings in a sacred fire—and the care and attention devoted to detailing these sacrifices leads to the inference that these were the primary religious act. These rites were so complex that they required specialized ritual technicians: the adhvaryum, the hotr, the udgatr, and the brahman. Of these, the udgatr was the sacrificial priest who chanted the hymns from the Sama Veda that were used in the sacrifice.

Udupi
Town and sacred site (tirtha) on the Arabian Sea in the state of Karnataka, about thirty miles north of Mangalore. Udupi’s most famous temple is to the god Krishna, but it is best known as the home of the philosopher Madhva, founder of the Dvaita Vedanta.

Ugrasena
In Hindu mythology, the king of Mathura who is the grandfather of the god Krishna. Ugrasena is supplanted by the evil Kamsa, who is believed to be Ugrasena’s son but is actually not. According to legend, Kamsa is the son of a demon who has taken Ugrasena’s form, and who under this guise has intercourse with Ugrasena’s wife.

Ujjain
City and sacred site (tirtha) on the Shipra River in the state of Madhya Pradesh, about 100 miles west of Bhopal, the state capital. Ujjain is the traditional center of the Malwa plateau and has a long history as a commercial, political, cultural, and sacred center. In earlier times Ujjain was a major stop on the central trade route, through which goods from southern India were funneled to other places farther north. Just before the common era, Ujjain is said to have been the capital of King Vikramaditya, after whom the Vikram era was named. Vikramaditya's stepbrother, Bharthari, reportedly renounced the throne to become an ascetic but is best known for his poetry. In later days Ujjain was the de facto capital of the Gupta ruler Chandra Gupta II (r. 380–414 C.E.), under whose patronage the greatest Sanskrit poet, Kalidasa, is said to have worked.

As a sacred center, Ujjain has multiple attractions, and this is its major source of contemporary importance. It is one of the Seven Sacred Cities of India. Dying in one of these cities is said to bring liberation. Every twelve years Ujjain plays host to the bathing (snana) festival known as the Kumbha Mela, although the mela there is smaller than the ones at Haridwar and Allahabad. Given its history, Ujjain is studded with important religious sites. The most important site is the temple to Shiva in his form as Mahakaleshvar, the "Lord of Death." Shiva is present at Mahakaleshvar in the form of a linga, the pillar-shaped image that is his symbolic form. The Mahakaleshvar linga is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites deemed especially sacred to Shiva and at which Shiva is uniquely present. Ujjain is also famous for a temple associated with Matsyendranath, the religious preceptor (guru) of Gorakhnath, the founder of the Nathpanthi ascetics. In addition, Ujjain has a temple to the nine planets, as well as one of the baithaks, a group of 108 sacred sites associated with the life and activity of the philosopher Vallabhacharya. Ujjain's most unusual site is the temple to the deity Kal Bhairav. Kal Bhairav is another name for Bhairava, a horrific form of Shiva, and the traditional offering at the temple is liquor—a substance proscribed and condemned by "respectable" Hindus and thus the ideal offering for a marginal deity such as Bhairava. See also Gupta dynasty.

Ukhimath
Himalayan town on the Mandakini River in the hills of Uttar Pradesh, across the river from Guptakashi. Ukhimath is the winter seat of Kedarnath, a form of Shiva whose summer home is a temple in the village of Kedarnath, high in the mountains at the Mandakini's headwaters. The village is at such high altitude that it is only accessible between late April and October, after the snows have melted; in October the temple is ritually closed until the next spring. When the temple at Kedarnath has been closed for the winter, the deity (symbolically represented by a movable image) takes residence in Ukhimath for the winter and then moves back to Kedarnath the following spring.

Ulatbamsi
("upside-down language") Word denoting paradoxical language in which the speaker's utterances are reversals of "normal" events, such as "The cow is sucking the calf's teat," "Mouse stalks cat," "Rain falls from earth to sky." The most famous composer of such utterances was the devotional (bhakti) poet-saint Kabir, who inherited a tradition of coded language (sandhabhasha) from the Nathpanthi and Sahajiya religious communities. Ulatbamsi utterances are not intended to be simply nonsensical, nor is it simply a coded language in which one term stands for another; they are rather intended to stimulate the hearer to active listening, interpretation, and searching for a truth that lies beyond right side up and upside down. For a long discussion of
Uma

Epithet of the goddess Parvati, wife of the god Shiva. The name supposedly comes from the exclamation uttered by Parvati's mother, Mena, when Parvati announces that she intends to perform asceticism to win Shiva as a husband. According to the story, Mena covers her ears with her hands and replies "U Ma!" (Oh, don't!) As with all forms of Parvati (and all married goddesses), Uma is a beneficent and benevolent presence, maternal and life affirming, although at times she can be capricious and spiteful if insulted. For more information on Uma and all the goddesses of Hinduism, see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Untouchable

Name denoting certain jatis who were considered so impure that their very presence was polluting to caste Hindus, that is, Hindus belonging to the four varnas (major social divisions). Jatis are endogamous social subgroups—groups in which members are forbidden to marry outside of their particular group—that were often defined by the group's hereditary occupation. Untouchability usually stemmed from occupations considered impure or debased, such as working with leather, in the case of the Chamars, or the groups whose hereditary occupation was to remove night soil, often by carrying it in baskets balanced on their heads. In traditional society, untouchables were subject to numerous restrictions and prohibitions on where they could live, work, draw water, and even move about. In many cases they had to announce their presence to allow caste Hindus to remove themselves from the area. Although untouchability has been illegal since independence, social attitudes supporting it persist, and in a country in which one's name often conveys one's jati, such discrimination is difficult to escape. In many places these people are still underprivileged and desperately poor, as a legacy of the past. In recent years they have become more militant—among other things, adopting the name dalit ("oppressed") to describe themselves—and have begun to exercise their power at the ballot box, trying to take advantage of their considerable numbers.

Upachara

("honoring," "entertaining") In its literal meaning, this word denotes the act of showing politeness, courtesy, or honor to any superior. In the context of worship, the meaning has been extended to refer to the things that are normally offered to the deity as part of the standard hospitality that would be offered to any honored guest. Although there are differing enumerations of these offerings, one of the most common lists has sixteen of them: summoning (avahana), offering a seat (asana), water for washing the feet (padya), thirst-quenching beverages (arghya), water for rinsing the mouth (achamaniya), bathing (snana), clothing (vastra), affixing the sacred thread (yajnopavit), fragrant unguents (anulepana), flowers (pushpa), incense (dhupa), lamp (dipa), food (naivedya), reverential salutation (namaskara), circumambulation (pradakshina), and dismissal (visarjana). To give all sixteen offerings is a long and detailed ritual, and the most common of the offerings is the eleventh, the offering of light, which is also known as arati.

Upadana

In Indian philosophy, the word upadana denotes the "material cause" for something, that is, the stuff from which it is formed. Although this notion seems obvious to modern materialist ears, it carries several important assumptions that not all Indian philosophical schools were willing to concede—namely, that there were real objects in the world, that they were made from other things, and that these things underwent real transformations. The notion of a material cause was held by the “realist” schools, most notably the Samkhya, Nyaya-Vaisheshika, and VishishthadvaIta Vedanta. It was opposed by the Buddhist schools, whose assumption that reality was constantly changing made the notion of real things problematic. It was also opposed by the Advaita Vedanta school, whose starting assumption was that ultimately there was only one “real” thing—the formless Brahman (Supreme Reality)—and thus that the notion of anything becoming anything else was in error.

Upadhi
("obstruction") In Indian logic, a counterexample that renders an inference (anumana) invalid by showing that the reason (hetu) given as evidence for the initial assertion (sadhya) is not invariably true. For example, the inference that “there is smoke because there is fire” was judged invalid because of the counterexample of the red-hot iron ball, which was considered fiery but not smoky. Since the red-hot iron ball was a class of fiery things that did not smoke, it showed that the reason given for the inference did not account for every case of the thing to be proved (sadhya)—and thus raised the possibility that there were other such cases as well. This invalid inference fails the requirement known as pervasion (vyapiti), in which the reason must account for every possible case; this is critical for validity in an inference. Needless to say, the search for such counterexamples was an essential part of Indian logic, since one such example could discredit an opponent’s argument. For further information and elaboration, see Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India’s Philosophies, 1972.

Upamana
("analogy") According to some philosophical schools, upamana was one of the pramanas, or the means by which human beings can gain true and accurate knowledge. The classic example of this pramana describes a traveler going to a certain region who is told that he will encounter a certain animal that looks somewhat like a cow; upon going there this analogy helps him identify the animal. Some philosophical schools deny that this is a separate pramana and classify it as a variety of inference (anumana). Those who accept it as a fourth pramana—primarily the Nyaya-Vaisheshika school—stress that according to the rules of inference, a valid inference must be grounded in previous perceptions. In the case of the traveler, his ability to identify is not based on any differences drawn from previous perceptions of that type of animal, since he has never before seen the type of animal he actually encounters. He knows what it is because it looks “somewhat like a cow.” Thus an additional pramana was needed to account for this. See also philosophy.

Upanayana
("bringing-near") Samskara
Traditionally, the eleventh of the life cycle ceremonies (samskaras), in which a young man received a religious initiation that functioned as a symbolic “second birth,” conferring on him new capacities and responsibilities. This ceremony marks the symbolic end of childhood and, as with many such rites of passage, the creation of a new social identity. After this rite the initiate becomes a brahmacharin, the first of the stages of life (ashramas) for a “twice-born” man. This initiation gives the entitlement and the obligation to study the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts, and according to the traditional model, the young man would have done this while living in the household of his guru. With this entitlement came responsibilities, particularly to observe purity laws, to which younger children were not subject. If nothing else, this rite is an essential prerequisite to marriage, since without it the young man is still considered a child, and in some contemporary cases it is performed immediately before the wedding.

According to the dharma literature, this rite was restricted to young men from the three highest traditional social classes (varnas), namely, brahmins, kshatriyas, and vaishyas. Indeed, it is the entitlement for this rite that makes these three the “twice-born” groups. For each group, a different age was prescribed for initiation and a different duration fixed for study, with brahmins being both earliest to start and the longest to study. The heart of the upanayana samskara is investing the young man with the sacred thread (janeu), which he must wear from that day forth, and teaching him the sacred formula known as the Gayatri mantra. This rite is still important and still widely performed, although it tends to be stressed most by brahmins. This is not surprising, given their traditional position as teachers and scholars and their concern for conserving that status, even in modern times. For further information see Pandurang Vaman Kane (trans.), A History of Dharmastra, 1968; and Raj Bali Pandey, Hindu Samskaras, 1969. The former is encyclopedic and the latter more accessible; despite their age, they remain the best sources for traditional Hindu rites.

Upanishad

The latest textual stratum in the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts. The literal meaning of the word upanishad is “to sit near [a teacher],” but a better sense of its true meaning would be “secret teaching.” The Upanishads mark a clean break from the immediately preceding Vedic literature, the Brahmanas, in which the essential concern was to lay out the concrete procedures for performing highly complex sacrificial rites. In contrast, the Upanishads were concerned with more speculative and abstract questions: the essential nature of the cosmos, the essence of the human being, and the relationship between these two. The conclusion in the Upanishads is that the essence of the universe is an impersonal reality known as Brahman, and that the essence of the human being is called the “Self” (atman). The fundamental insight and essential teaching in the Upanishads is the identity of Brahman and atman, and thus of the macrocosm and the microcosm. This identity is one of the most fundamental Hindu religious ideas and underlies religious thought up to the present time.

The twelve or thirteen oldest upanishads are not a cohesive set but a series of independent documents, although the later ones were clearly influenced by the earlier ones. The two oldest are the Brhadaranyaka Upanishad and the Chandogya Upanishad. Each is much longer than all the others combined, they are written in prose as a series of dialogues between famous sages, the Sanskrit language in them is clearly more archaic, and their ideas are embryonic and undeveloped. Later upanishads—such as the Isha, Kena, Katha, Prashna, and Mandukya—are much shorter, are written in verse, and have well-developed ideas. Some of these introduce the notion of theism, but not until the Shvetashvatara Upanishad is the Supreme Being identified as a god, in this case Rudra. For much of their history, the Upanishads would have been transmitted orally from master to student; this makes it unlikely that these texts were widely known because they would have been secret and carefully guarded teachings.

The Upanishads are important because of the speculative questions they ask and because many of their teachings are fundamental assumptions in Hindu religious life, even today: the notion of an eternal Self that gives a being continuous identity; the idea of reincarnation (samsara) commensurate with one's deeds; the concept that some single unifying power lies behind the world's apparent diversity; and the conviction that this can be attained only through individual realization, usually described as a flash of mystic insight. As texts carrying the religious authority of the Vedas, the Upanishads were also extremely important in the development of Hindu philosophical schools, particularly Advaita Vedanta, which shares this overriding emphasis on inner realization. For information on the Upanishads themselves, see Robert Ernest Hume (trans.), Thirteen Principal Upanisads, 1965. See also philosophy.

Upasaka
("servant") A person engaged in upasana—that is, having an intent focus on serving and worshiping a deity.

Upasana
("service") General term denoting religious practice or spiritual discipline as a whole. Aside from the explicit notion of serving the deity (or guru), the word also connotes an intent focus on the part of the performer—not so much the particular things one is doing, but the overall attitude of care and attention with which one does them.

Upavasa
General term denoting fasting, which is sometimes performed as a prescribed action for particular religious observances such as festivals and vows (vrats), and which is also done as a means of expiating one's sins. Although upavasa can refer to total abstinence from food and drink, it usually entails modification of one's diet. In some cases, as on the festival of Shivaratri, such “fasting” entails abstaining from cooked grains, which are considered such an essential element in a meal that in parts of India the word rice is also used to mean “food.” In other cases one will abstain from certain types of food, such as for the Santoshi Ma Vrat, in which the person must not eat anything containing sour or bitter flavors.

When fasting is performed as expiation (prayashchitta), the prescriptions are usually concerned with the amount of food eaten rather than the particular type. The best-known rite of this kind is the chandrayana, a penitential rite lasting for one lunar month in which the penitent's food consumption mirrors the monthly course of the moon. The performer begins by eating fourteen mouthfuls of food on the first day of the waning moon, then one less mouthful on each successive day, with a complete fast on the new moon day. On each successive day during the waxing moon, the penitent eats one more mouthful, finishing at fifteen on the day of the full moon.

Upendra
("junior Indra") Epithet of the god Vishnu. It is first used in some late hymns in the Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious texts, in which Vishnu is portrayed as a subordinate and companion of the storm-god Indra, who is the primary Vedic deity. The epithet continues to be used later despite Indra's eclipse as a significant deity, and thus its literal meaning is no longer true. See Vishnu.

Upside-Down Language
Term designating the type of utterances known as ulatbamsi, so called because these utterances intentionally describe things contrary to the way they are in the “normal” world. See ulatbamsi.

Urdhvabahu
("[one whose] arm is upraised") Name for a person practicing a particularly severe form of physical mortification, in which one or both arms are kept continually raised. After some time the muscles atrophy, and the arms cannot be lowered again. Although urdhvabahu is not very common, it has a long-attested history as an ascetic practice. As with all such harsh physical asceticism, this is believed to give one the great benefits of spiritual awareness and magical power. This belief is based partly on the culturally accepted notion that the willingness to endure physical suffering generates such spiritual power, but this belief could also stem from the strength of will needed to carry this out—a strength of will that would presumably have correlates in other dimensions of one’s personality.

Urdhvatāmaka

An ascetic with the urdhvapundra mark on his forehead. It consists of three vertical lines and indicates that he is a devotee of the god Vishnu.

Urdhvapundra

Name denoting the characteristic forehead mark (tika) worn by the ascetic devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. The urdhvapundra’s basic pattern is made of three vertical lines, in contrast to the three horizontal lines worn by the Sanyasis, who are devotees of Shiva. There are many variations in the design, and many different materials can be used: sandalwood paste, white clay, yellow clay, and red vermilion. The only thing that is never used is the sacred ash (vibhuti) characteristic of the Sanyasis. The design and materials used for the urdhvapundra are quite distinctive among various Vaishnava ascetic communities, and from this, one can easily identify a particular ascetic’s affiliation. For further information see A. W. Entwistle, “Vaishnava Tilakas—Sectarian Marks Worn by Worshipers of Visnu,” IAVRI-Bulletin 11 and 12, 1982.

Urdhvaretas

(“[one whose] semen is drawn upward”) Epithet for someone keeping a vow of celibacy, particularly a lifelong vow. In the Hindu tradition, celibacy is important not only for removing one from enjoying the pleasures of the flesh but because on a more basic level, semen is considered the concentrated essence of a man's vital energies. Expending semen is necessary for procreation, but otherwise it should be retained, as a way to conserve one's vital forces. In popular belief, when a man has been celibate for a certain time, the semen is drawn upward to the brain, where it nourishes one's intellectual and spiritual faculties.

Urushringa
Architectural detail in the temple architecture of Khajuraho, one of the major forms of the northern Indian Nagara style. The Nagara style's primary feature is a shikhara, or tower. This primary shikhara is often surrounded by smaller, subsidiary towers, to lead the eye up to the highest point, which is directly over the image of the temple's primary deity. The urushringas are turrets built on the sides of these towers, whose shape replicates that of the tallest central tower and that serve to draw the eye upward to the highest tower.

Urvashi
In Hindu mythology, a particular celestial nymph (apsara) who is most famous for her association with King Pururavas. Urvashi comes to stay with Pururavas under several conditions, including that she should never see him naked. When she has been gone from heaven for a while, the god Indra notices her absence and schemes to get her back. One night he sends several minor deities to steal two lambs of which Urvashi is very fond, and when Pururavas leaps up to regain them, a flash of lightning reveals him naked, and Urvashi leaves him. They are separate for some time but are eventually reunited—in some accounts for good, and in others for only one night a year.

Ushas
In the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts, Ushas is a goddess associated and sometimes identified with the dawn. She is described as lighting the path for the sun and driving away the darkness and evil; her presence is thus associated with the regularity of the cosmic order. Ushas is most notable not for what she does—she is a minor deity, mentioned in only a handful of the Vedic hymns—but because she is one of the few goddesses in the Vedas. The virtual absence of female divinities in the Vedas is one of the factors behind the notion that the great Goddess, one of the three major deities in later religious life, has her roots in indigenous goddess worship. For more information on Ushas and all the goddesses of Hinduism, see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986.

Utkala
Northern Indian brahmin group that makes up one of the five northern brahmin communities (Pancha Gauda); the other four are the Kanaujias, the Maithilas, the Gaudas, and the Saraswats. Utkala brahmans are found only in the coastal regions of Orissa, on the Bay of Bengal, but their ritual control over the pilgrimage sites there, particularly the city of Puri, have helped them remain a significant group.

Uktutikasana
Sitting posture (asana) in yoga practice in which the legs are contracted, with the soles of the feet pressed against each other and the outer part of the feet and legs flat on the ground. This posture is the one in which images of the deities are portrayed in Hindu iconography, and it seems to be the position called samasthana in the commentaries to the Yoga Sutras. This position is also notable because it appears to be portrayed on one of the seals from the Indus Valley civilization; the figure in this position is the mysterious horned deity that some viewers have sought to identify as a “proto-Shiva.”

Utpanna Ekadashi
Religious observance falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Margashirsha (November–December). As for all of the eleventh-day observances, this is dedicated to the worship of Vishnu, and on this day especially, in his form as Krishna. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, which usually involve fasting (upavasa) and worship and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. Those observing this vow should fast completely on the tenth and perform full worship during the brahma muhurta of the eleventh. On this ekadashi, only fruits should be offered as food for the deity. Faithfully keeping this festival is believed to bring liberation of the soul (moksha). The name Utpanna means “born,” and the charter myth for this celebration is that of Anasuya, wife of the sage Atri. Anasuya is famous for her devotion to her husband, and the wives of the gods become jealous of her. Lakshmi, Parvati, and Saraswati send their husbands (Vishnu, Shiva, and Brahma) to try to compromise her fidelity; the gods come begging for food, but they refuse to accept it unless Anasuya gives it to them naked. Through the power she has gained from her devotion to her husband, Anasuya turns the three gods into infants and then nurses them until they are satisfied; these three gods are later “born” into her household: Vishnu as Dattatreya, Shiva as Durvasas, and Brahma as Chandra.

Utsava Murti
(“festival image”) Image of a deity that is able (and intended) to be moved. These are used mainly during festivals, when the image of the deity is paraded around the town or city on the model of a kingly procession, symbolically surveying his or her realm. The other general class of Hindu images is the sthala murti, which is fixed in one place and never moves from it.

Uttara (“Later”) Mimamsa
Another name for the philosophical school also known as Vedanta, which was called Uttara Mimamsa to distinguish it from Purva Mimamsa, another philosophical school. See Vedanta.

Uttararamacharita
(“Later Acts of Rama”) Drama written by the Sanskrit playwright Bhavabhuti (8th c.), which retells the story of the Ramayana, the earlier of the two Sanskrit epics. Bhavabhuti’s play largely follows the plot of the original Valmiki Ramayana, with one important difference. Valmiki’s text ends with Rama’s banishing Sita because of suspicions about her virtue and Sita’s being swallowed up by the earth, which is her mother and witness to her chastity. The Uttararamacharita, on the other hand, ends with a complete reconciliation between Rama and Sita. This change may have been prompted solely by the desire for a happy ending, which is one of the characteristic features of Sanskrit drama. It may also indicate that some people were not comfortable with the moral ambiguities of the original text, in which Rama, although claimed to be divine, sometimes acts in unscrupulous and disturbing ways.

Uttarayana
Term denoting the six months of the solar year in which the sun is believed to be moving northward. In the common era, this would be the period between the winter solstice and the summer solstice (roughly December 20 to June 20) and would be based on the actual motion of the sun with respect to the earth. The Indian solar year is based on the motion of the sun through the zodiac, which is calculated differently than in Western astrology. The uttarayana begins on Makara Sankranti (the day... the sun is calculated as entering Capricorn, usually January 14) and ends the day before Karka Sankranti (the day the sun enters Cancer, usually calculated as July 14). The uttarayana is considered a more auspicious time than the Dakshinayana (in which the sun is traveling toward the south) because the guardian deity for the southern direction is Yama, who is death personified.

Uttarkashi
("northern Benares") Himalayan town and sacred site (tirtha) on the Bhagirathi River in northern Uttar Pradesh. As its name indicates, Uttarkashi is claimed as the northern form of the city of Benares, the city of the god Shiva that is one of the most sacred sites in India. Uttarkashi's charter myths also claim that in the present age, Shiva no longer dwells in Benares, but instead lives in Uttarkashi. To buttress the claim to being the northern Benares Uttarkashi shows many parallels and homologies with Benares itself: In both, the Ganges River flows in a northern direction through the city; both have their core region defined as the area between the Varuna and Asi Rivers; both are enclosed by a panchakroshi pilgrimage route; and in both, the primary deity is Shiva in his form as Vishvanath. Uttarkashi is a site of great antiquity—inscriptions have been discovered from the seventh century C.E.—and although these parallels to Benares might seem slavish, the basis of this claim is not just that Uttarkashi is a holy place, just as Benares is a holy place, but that the holiness of Uttarkashi is equal to that of Benares. Aside from its importance as a pilgrimage town, Uttarkashi is also the district headquarters and a major supply point to the other sites in the region. The town was severely damaged in an earthquake in early 1993 and has been rebuilding slowly since that time.

Uttar Pradesh
("northern state") Modern Indian state running along the border with Nepal. Uttar Pradesh is India's most populous state and is thus one of its most politically important. The state has a range of different ecosystems, from the high Himalayas to the rice-growing plains in its eastern basin, which gives it immense natural and social variety. Uttar Pradesh also contains the sources and much of the length for both the Ganges and Yamuna Rivers, and the state thus contains many of the holiest sites in India. Although a full catalog would be difficult to give, some of the state's major sacred sites (tirthas) are the four Himalayan Dhams ("[divine] abodes"), Yamunotri, Gangotri, Kedarnath, and Badrinath; the sacred cities of Haridwar, Allahabad, and Benares; the city of Ayodhya, the mythic home of the god Rama; and the Braj region south of Delhi, which is mythically associated with the god Krishna. For general information about Uttar Pradesh and all the regions of India, an accessible reference is Christine Nivin et al., India, 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998. See also four dhams.
Vachaspati Mishra

(ca. late 15th c.) Commentator and compiler of the dharma literature. He composed dozens of texts in his working life, including a number of digests (nibandha) organized around various subjects, including daily religious rites, purification, pilgrimage, death rites (antyeshti samskara), political life, judicial procedures, and funeral rites. In these digests, Mishra would draw material relating to the theme from a number of different religious texts, weigh them, and sometimes interpret their position on a religious issue. Mishra was much respected for his learning and piety, and his texts were an important resource to those who followed him.

Vadagalai

One of the two main subsects in the Shrivaishnava religious community, the other being the Tengalai. The Shrivaishnavas are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and the community’s roots lie in the devotional hymns of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. Two centuries later, the Alvars’ devotional outpouring was organized and systematized by the philosopher Ramanuja (11th c.), who is considered the Shrivaishnava founder. Ramanuja was convinced that Brahman, or Supreme Reality, was a personal deity rather than an impersonal abstract principle, and he was also convinced that devotion (bhakti) was the most important form of religious practice. Vishishthadvaita Vedanta, his philosophical position, stressed both of these convictions and thus opposed the Advaita Vedanta school, founded by the philosopher Shankaracharya, which believed that the Supreme Being was impersonal and that realization (jnana) was the best spiritual path.

The split between the Tengalais and the Vadagalais came several centuries later and stemmed from differing perspectives on what the individual must do to gain final liberation of the soul (moksha). The Vadagalais not only stress the saving power of God’s grace, but also assert that the individual must respond to that grace and take an active role in his or her salvation. This belief is in complete contrast to the Tengalais, who emphasize the need for absolute surrender (prapatti) to the grace of God, through which devotees are saved with no action of their own.

Vagish

(“Lord of Speech”) Epithet of the poet-saint Appar, reflecting the power of his devotional poetry. Appar was one of the earliest of the Nayanars, a group of sixty-three southern Indian poet-saints of the seventh and eighth centuries who were devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva. See Appar.

Vaidyanath

Form of the god Shiva, in his manifestation as the “Lord of Physicians” (vaidya). A temple is named for him at Deoghar in the state of Bihar. Shiva is present at Vaidyanath in the form of a linga, the pillar-shaped image that is his symbolic form, and the Vaidyanath linga is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites deemed especially sacred to Shiva, and at which Shiva is uniquely present. Vaidyanath’s charter myth is associated with the demon-king Ravana, who is said to be a great devotee (bhakta) of Shiva. Ravana travels to Shiva’s home on Mount Kailas and practices harsh asceticism for years, hoping to gain a vision of Shiva. When his asceticism proves unsuccessful, the ten-headed Ravana proceeds to cut off his heads, one by one, and to offer them to Shiva. As he is about to cut off the last of his heads, Shiva appears before him and grants Ravana a boon. Ravana asks for Shiva to come and live in his palace in Lanka, a request that would have made Ravana invincible. Shiva agrees to come in the form of a linga, but warns Ravana that wherever the linga touches the earth, it will stay there forever. As Ravana begins traveling back to Lanka, he feels the urge to urinate (which in some versions is described as being caused by Shiva himself, because the other gods have begged Shiva not to go to Lanka). Given the condition of his boon, he cannot put the linga down; moreover, since urination renders one ritually impure, the linga would be defiled if he holds it while answering nature's call (or touches it before he has taken a purifying bath). Ravana ends up handing the linga to a cowherd, giving him strict orders to keep it off the ground. The linga is so heavy, however, that the cowherd eventually has to let it rest on the ground, where it sticks fast, and remains there to this day.

Vaijayanti Shakti
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, this is the name of an all-conquering weapon that the storm-god Indra gives to the warrior Karna. Karna has been born wearing earrings and a suit of armor, and Karna's father, the sun-god Surya, has ordained that as long as Karna wears these, he cannot be harmed. Indra gains them from Karna by taking the guise of a brahmin, and begging for them as alms from Karna, who is famous for his generosity. Despite being warned in a dream, Karna cannot bring himself to refuse and gives them to Indra. When Indra gives him a boon in return, Karna asks for the Vaijayanti Shakti. Karna keeps this weapon in reserve to kill his nemesis, Arjuna, but is forced to use it against another mighty warrior, Ghatotkacha, when the latter proves unconquerable during the Mahabharata war. The loss of this weapon leaves Karna at a disadvantage against Arjuna, and Karna is eventually killed.

Vaikasi
Second month in the Tamil year, corresponding to the northern Indian solar month of Vrshabha (the zodiacal sign of Taurus), which usually falls within May and June. This name is a modification of Baisakh, the second month in the lunar calendar. The existence of several different calendars is one clear sign of the continuing importance of regional cultural patterns. One way that the Tamils retain their culture is by preserving their traditional calendar. Tamil is one of the few regional languages in India with an ancient, well-established literary tradition. See also Tamil language, Tamil months, and Tamil Nadu.

Vaikuntha
In Hindu mythology, the name of the heaven in which the god Vishnu lives.

Vaishali
City and region in northern Bihar; the region's western border is the Gandaki River, and its southern border the Ganges river. Although now the region is extremely backward, at the time of the Buddha, Vaishali was one of the largest cities in India and a center of intellectual culture of the time. Vaishali is famous as the birthplace of Mahavira. He was the last of the Jain tirthankars, the founding figures in the Jain religious tradition. Tradition also holds Vaishali as the site of the second Buddhist council, convened one hundred years after the death of the Buddha (ca. 386 B.C.E.), at which the Buddhist community split between the Sthaviravadins and the Mahasanghikas.

Vaisheshika
(“noting characteristics”) One of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy, and a school whose special concern was the elucidation of physics and metaphysics. The Vaisheshika analysis of the categories for the universe was later combined with the stress on reasoning in another of the six schools, the Nyayas, to form the Nyaya-Vaisheshika school, sometimes called the Naiyayikas. The Vaisheshika school was atomistic—that is, it espoused the belief that all things were made up of a few basic constituent things—and this atomism was the root of the school's metaphysics. Philosophically speaking, the Vaisheshikas were realists—that is, they thought that the world was made up of many different things and that these things actually existed as perceived, except in cases of perceptual error. They believed that all things were composed of nine fundamental substances—the five elements, space, time, mind, and Selves—and that whatever exists was both knowable and nameable. The Vaisheshikas subscribed to the causal model known as asatkaryavada, which posited that when a thing was created, it was a whole new aggregate, completely different from its constituent parts. This causal model tends to multiply the number of things in the universe because each act of creation brings a new thing into being. It also admits that human efforts and actions are one of the causes influencing these effects, making it theoretically possible to act in a way that brings final liberation of the soul (moksha).

According to the Vaisheshika analysis, the objects of experience can be divided into six categories: substances, qualities, activity, universals, particulars, and inherence (samavaya); some later Vaisheshikas add a seventh category, absences. The first three categories can be perceived, whereas the others must be inferred, but the concept of inherence is central to their system of thought. Inherence is the subtle glue connecting all the elements of the universe: wholes and their parts, substances and their qualities, motions and the things that move, general properties with their particular instances, and most important, pleasure and pain to the Self. The philosophical problems with inherence—particularly the notion that it was one single principle and not a collection of things—caused them great difficulty and were responsible for the rise of Navyanyaya school, which attempted to explain these relationships in a more sophisticated way. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Vaishnava

Name denoting a devotee (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, in any of his myriad forms. Vaishnava theology is most prominently characterized by the doctrine of the ten avatars, or divine incarnations: Fish, Tortoise, Boar, Man-Lion, Vamana (dwarf), Parashuram, Rama, Krishna, Buddha, and Kalki. It is generally accepted that the avatar doctrine provided a way to assimilate smaller regional deities into the larger pantheon by designating them as forms of Vishnu, and it is in the form of these avatars that Vishnu is most commonly worshiped. Of the ten avatars, the two most important ones have been Rama and Krishna, although in the early centuries of the common era, the Boar avatar and the Man-Lion avatar were influential regional deities.

Early Vaishnava religion is cloudy and mysterious. Although Vishnu appears in several hymns in the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts, he was clearly a minor deity, and it is difficult to get from there to being the supreme power in the universe. Some scholars have speculated that the cult of Krishna—a deified local cowherd hero—originally came from outside the Vedic religious matrix, and that Krishna was identified with Vishnu as a way to assimilate Krishna's cult into respectable Vedic religion. Such ideas are intriguing but have little hard evidence to support them. Inscriptional evidence clearly shows that the worship of Krishna was well-established by the first century B.C.E. These devotees are generally described as Bhagavatas ("devotees of the Blessed One"), a name that for the next thousand years is used to refer to Vaishnavas in general. One particular subset of this early Bhagavata community was known as the Pancharatrikas ("followers of the Pancharatra"), who later evolved distinctive cosmological doctrines. These mainstream Bhagavatas expressed their devotion to Krishna by composing texts, including parts of the Bhagavad Gita, the Harivamsha, and various puranas, culminating with the Bhagavata Purana in about the tenth century.

Alvars, a group of twelve devotional (bhakti) poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. Singing their hymns in the Tamil language, the vernacular tongue of their times, the Alvars propounded a bhakti that was marked by passionate devotion to God and characterized by a profound emotional attachment between deity and devotee. Along with their Shaiva counterparts, the Nayanars, the Alvars spearheaded the revitalization of Hindu religion vis-à-vis the Buddhists and the Jains, and in the process, transformed the tradition as the devotional wave they had begun moved northward. The period between the twelfth and sixteenth centuries saw the development of various Vaishnava communities, often stemming from a particular charismatic religious figure.

This process began in southern India, where the philosopher Ramanuja (11th c.) founded the Shrivaishnava community, while the philosopher Madhva (1197–1276) founded the community that bears his name. The next great center was in Maharashtra, particularly in the Varkari Panth, which was centered on the temple of Vithoba in Pandharpur; some of this community’s greatest figures were Jnaneshvar (1275–1296), Namdev (1270–1350), Chokamela (d. 1338), Eknath (1533–1599), and Tukaram (1598–1650). The Maharashtra region also saw the rise of the Mahanubhav sect, from the thirteenth century. At Puri on India’s eastern coast one finds the worship of Jagannath, a tribal deity assimilated into the pantheon as a form of Krishna. This was well established by the twelfth century, as the poet Jayadeva’s Gitagovinda clearly shows. Finally, in northern India one finds several vibrant religious groups. A very early figure is the twelfth-century philosopher Nimbarka, whose Nimbarki community bears his name; several centuries later came Vishnuswami, about whom little is known. The greatest explosion of northern Indian devotionalism came in the sixteenth century, with the philosopher Vallabhacharya founding the Pushti Marg, the Bengali saint Chaitanya founding the Gaudiya Vaishnava community, and the poet-saint Harivamsh (d. 1552) founding the Radhavallabh community. All these were based in the Braj region that is Krishna’s mythic home, and all of them worshiped Krishna: The Pushti Marg and the Gaudiya Vaishnavas considered him to be the supreme divinity, whereas the Nimberks and the Radhavallabh community worshiped him in conjunction with his consort Radha, whom they considered Krishna’s wife and equal. It is also in northern India that the worship of Rama has its deepest roots, as exemplified in the songs of the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?). Many of these schools with long histories are still vital in modern times.

The final Vaishnava community that must be addressed is comprised of ascetics. Vaishnava asceticism is a more recent development than that of the Shaivas (though dates are uncertain), and it is largely located in the northern part of India (the Shaivas are spread throughout the country). Vaishnava ascetics are known as Bairagis (“dispassionate”) and are primarily organized into four sampradays (religious sects distinguished by unique bodies of teachings), each connected with a major Vaishnava figure. By far the most powerful is the Shri Sampraday of the Ramanandi ascetics, which traces its spiritual lineage through the poet-saint Ramananda to the southern Indian philosopher Ramanuja, whom they claim was Ramananda’s guru. The Sanaka Sampraday of the Nimbarki ascetics traces its spiritual lineage to the philosopher Nimbarka. The Rudra Sampraday of the Vishnuswami ascetics traces its lineage through the philosopher Vallabhacharya to an earlier figure, Vishnuswami. Finally, the Brahma Sampraday, an ascetic subset of the Gaudiya Vaishnava ascetics, traces its spiritual line through the Bengali saint Chaitanya to the southern Indian philosopher Madhva.
Each of these sampradays is differentiated not only by its founder, but also by its tutelary deity or deities. The Ramanandis worship the god Rama, whereas the others worship the god Krishna and his consort Radha, but differ in the position that they give to Radha. Scholars have noted that these historical claims are either highly suspect or completely spurious and that the distinctions among the sampradays are largely academic. Given that the overwhelming majority of these ascetics are Ramanandis, the others seem important only for symbolic reasons, to include a representative from each of the great Vaishnava religious figures.

Vaishno Devi
Presiding goddess of the Vaishno Devi shrine, located in a cave on Trikut mountain in the hills near Jammu, and one of the nine Shivalik goddesses. Pilgrims to Vaishno Devi travel by road via Jammu to the village of Katra, whence they walk the ten miles to the shrine itself. As with many of the images of the Shivalik goddesses, the images at Vaishno Devi are “self-manifested” (svayambhu), in the form of three stone outcrops. These outcrops are considered to be Mahakali, Mahalakshmi, and Mahasaraswati, the three forms of the Goddess mentioned in the Devimahatmya, the earliest and most authoritative source for the mythology of the Goddess. The presence of all three goddesses is believed to make this site extremely powerful, and according to popular belief, Vaishno Devi grants whatever request her devotees (bhakta) make. According to some accounts, those whose wishes are granted are highly advised to make a second trip, both to thank the Goddess and to bear witness to her grace. The number of visitors to the site has increased dramatically in the recent past, perhaps reflecting anxieties about modern Indian life.

There are several stories connected with Vaishno Devi’s charter myth. The name Vaishno is a derivation of Vishnu, reflecting the claim that Vaishno Devi was born as a partial avatar of Vishnu. One sign of this connection is that Vaishno Devi is a vegetarian goddess, for whom no animal sacrifices can be performed. According to another story, Vaishno Devi was the spot at which the arms of the dismembered goddess Satī fell to earth. Since this story is never further connected to Vaishno Devi, this seems a transparent attempt to tie into the network of the Shakti Pithas, a group of shrines sacred to the Goddess, which stretch throughout the subcontinent. The longest version of the charter myth reports that the cave is discovered by a brahmin named Shridhara. Shridhara, a great devotee of the Goddess (who tested him in various ways), is disturbed by the fact that he has no children. The Goddess reveals the location of the Vaishno Devi cave to him in a dream. After an extensive search he finally finds the cave and is soon blessed with four sons, emphasizing the claim that Vaishno Devi will grant the desires of her devotees, whatever they may be. For further information see Kathleen Erndl, Victory to the Mother, 1993. See also pitha.

Vaishya
In the traditional Hindu social theory of the four major social groups (varnas), the vaishyas were the third group—less influential than the brahmins and kshatriyas, but with greater status than the shudras. In this model of society, the vaishyas’ social function was economic activity, to provide the material basis for social life. This image is reflected in the creation story known as the Purusha Sukta, in which the vaishyas are described as being created from the Primeval Man’s (purusha’s) thighs—a standard euphemism for the genitals, and thus the most direct connection with fruition and procreation. In fact, the jatis (endogamous social subgroups, often determined by hereditary occupation) considered to be vaishyas did all sorts of economic activity, from farming to animal husbandry to all sorts of trades and services.

Vaitarani
In Hindu mythology, a river flowing through the underworld over which souls must cross on the way to their audience with the god Yama, the god of the dead. For righteous people the crossing is fairly easy, and they are widely believed to get over by holding the tail of a cow. For wicked people, on the other hand, the Vaitarani is a river of pus, blood, spit, and other polluting substances, in which various ferocious beasts lie in wait.

Vajapeya
Along with the Rajasuya, one of the two most famous of the Vedic sacrifices. The Vajapeya sacrifice was essentially intended to provide an established king with continuing strength and vitality, magically rejuvenating him after a long reign and in the face of advancing age. In ancient times the rite was elaborate and entailed the sacrifice of animals; when it is performed in modern times it is performed in one day, and the animal sacrifice is symbolic.

Vajra
Name for the thunderbolt, conceived as one of the divine weapons. It has two symmetrical sides, sometimes pointed, with a handle in the middle. The vajra is an enormously important symbol in Buddhism, particularly the tantric forms (i.e., secret, ritually based religious practices) found in Tibet, but it appears very seldom in Hindu iconography. It is attested to be an attribute of certain forms of the gods Ganesha and Vishnu, but on the whole it is not as important as some of the other symbols. See also tantra.

Vajreshvari Devi
(“Goddess of the Thunderbolt”) Presiding deity of the Vajreshvari temple in Kangra, Himachal Pradesh, and the only one of the nine Shiwalik goddesses whose temple is in an urban center. Kangra has a long tradition as a center of Goddess worship and may have been a site for practitioners of tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice. The charter myth identifies Vajreshvari Devi as one of the Shakti Pithas, a network of sites sacred to the Goddess, which spreads throughout the subcontinent. Each Shakti Pitha marks the site where a body part of the dismembered goddess Sati fell to earth, taking form there as a different goddess; in the case of Vajreshvari Devi the body part was Sati’s breast—certainly a highly charged part of the female body, thus making it a more attractive place for tantric practitioners. Another indication of her possible connection comes from her name, in which the image of the thunderbolt carries associations with Buddhist tantric practice. For further information see Kathleen Erndl, Victory to the Mother, 1993. See also pitha.

Vajroli Mudra
Yogic practice attributed to Nathpanthi ascetics, as part of their effort to attain physical immortality through the practice of hatha yoga. The dominant metaphor used in describing the process of gaining immortality in this manner is the union of sun and moon, in which the sun stands for the processes of change and destruction, and the moon for stability and immortality. In some cases this union was described in very abstract terms, as a process in the subtle body, at other times in the most concrete possible fashion, for which the best example is vajroli mudra. This is urethral suction or the “fountain-pen technique,” in which a man, having ejaculated into his female partner, draws his semen, now refined through contact with the woman’s uterine blood, back into his body, along with a certain amount of his partner's blood. Despite some commentators' discomfort and denials (characteristic of most references to sexual activity as part of Hindu spiritual practice), vajroli mudra is consistently named as one of the Nathpanthi practices. For further information see George W. Briggs, Gorakhnath and the Kanphata Yogis, 1982.

Vakataka Dynasty
(4th–6th c.) Central Indian dynasty whose ancestral homeland was in the center of modern India. The Vakataka zenith came between the fourth and sixth centuries, during which their sway extended through most of the Deccan plateau. At the turn of the fifth century, the Vakataka king Rudrasena II married Prabhavati Gupta, creating a marriage alliance with the northern Indian Gupta dynasty that gave the two dynasties sway over much of India. Prabhavati Gupta ruled as regent following Rudrasena's untimely death, during which the Vakataka kingdom was a virtual part of the Gupta empire, but in the time after that the Vakatakas regained greater autonomy.

Vallabhacharya
(1479–1531) Philosopher, teacher, and founder of the religious community known as the Pushti Marg. Vallabhacharya propounded a philosophical position called Shuddadvaita ("pure non-dualism"), in which the Ultimate Reality was conceived as personalized, in the form of Krishna, rather than the impersonal Brahma propounded by the Advaita Vedanta school. Since Vallabhacharya had personalized his conception of the Supreme Reality, the supreme religious goal was conceived in terms of relationship with that divine person. This stress on devotion was soon articulated in elaborately arranged forms of image worship in the Pushti Marg's temples. The devotees (bhakta) would visualize themselves as Krishna's companions during his daily activities—waking, eating, taking the cows to graze, coming home, etc.—and thus gain the opportunity to take part in the divine play (lila). This emphasis on visualization and participation was fostered through the development of vast liturgical resources, which were composed by eight poets (the aśṭachap) who were associated with Vallabhacharya and Vitthalnath, his son and successor. For further information see R.K. Barz, The Bhakti Sect of Vallabhacarya, 1976.

Vallabhis
Popular name for the followers of Vallabhacharya. As the suffix clearly shows, this term is one term formed by non-Hindus that was used to describe a particular Hindu group. In earlier times it was used by British government officials, but today it is used mainly by scholars, usually foreigners. Vallabha's own followers would be far more likely to describe themselves as belonging to the Pushti Marg.

Valli
In the mythology of southern India, the god Skanda (in his southern Indian form as Murugan) becomes enamored of and marries Valli, a young girl from a group of tribal hunters. The marriage takes place despite his earlier marriage to the goddess Devasena, who has been given to him by Indra and the established Hindu gods. Murugan's marriage with Valli is a sign of his connection with the land and probably reflects his earlier past as a tribal deity. The marriage is described as taking place at Tiruttani in Tamil Nadu, but he is also described as settling at Kataragama in Sri Lanka.

Valmiki
In Hindu mythology, a sage who is regarded as the first poet, and who is traditionally cited as the author of the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Sanskrit epics. According to legend, Valmiki is a bandit in his early life. One day, one of his victims asks him whether his family will also share the sins he is committing, and when Valmiki finds out that they will not, he has a change of heart. He sits down in a secluded place and begins to do japa (recitation), but his heart is so blackened by his sins that the only words he can say are “mara mara” (“death, death”). After a long time the syllables become reversed, and by reciting “Rama Rama” he expiates his former sins. This recitation is so long that a colony of white ants (in Sanskrit, named “valmika”) builds a hill over him, and when he emerges from this he is given the name Valmiki.

After his emergence, Valmiki builds an ashram on the banks of the Tamasa River and lives a quiet life. He gives shelter to Sita after she has been exiled from Ayodhya by her husband, Rama, and also cares for her sons, Lava and Kusha. One day when Valmiki is walking by the Tamasa River, he sees a hunter shoot a pair of courting Krauncha birds, and in his intense anger, his rebuke to the hunter comes out in verse; according to legend, this is the first poem ever composed. After this first verse composition, the god Brahma appears, and at Brahma’s encouragement Valmiki composes the Ramayana.

Valmiki Jayanti
Festival celebrated on the full moon in the lunar month of Ashvin (September–October). This day is considered to be the birthday of the poet Valmiki, who according to tradition is the author of the Ramayana, the earlier of the two Sanskrit epics.

Vamachara
(“left-hand practice”) In the secret, ritually based religious practice known as tantra, this term denotes a type of tantric practice that makes ritual use of forbidden substances, such as the Five Forbidden Things (panchamakara), or promotes behavior that the orthodox would consider scandalous or objectionable. When seen in a tantric context, the use of such normally forbidden substances is not mere license, but a powerful ritual tool. One of the most pervasive tantric assumptions is the ultimate unity of everything that exists. From a tantric perspective, to affirm that the entire universe is one principle—often, conceived as the activity of a particular deity—means that the adept must reject all concepts based on dualistic thinking. The “Five Forbidden Things” provide a ritual means for breaking down duality because in this ritual the adept breaks societal norms forbidding consumption of intoxicants, nonvegetarian food, and illicit sexuality, in a conscious effort to sacralize what is normally forbidden.

Within the tantric tradition itself there is a long-standing debate about the propriety of such acts, and whereas the vamachara practice uses these elements in their actual forms, in the dakshinachara (“right-hand”) practice, other items are substituted for the forbidden ones. This distinction between “right” and “left” hand also reveals the pervasive polarity between right and left in...
Indian culture, with the former being deemed better.

Vamakhepa
(1843–1911) Ascetic devotee (bhakta) of the Goddess in her fierce and powerful form as Tara; his presence and supposed miraculous powers are largely responsible for the importance of Tarapith as an important regional sacred site (tirtha) in West Bengal. From his earliest childhood, Vamakhepa was occupied with thoughts of the Goddess, and from an early age he took up residence in the cremation ground at Tarapith, where he undertook the worship of Tara. Various stories describe his power to heal people of all sorts of ailments, as well as his complete disregard for all accepted standards—according to tradition, he once urinated on the temple's image of Tara, to show his contempt for a deity made of iron, and was struck in punishment by the Goddess.

Vamana Avatar
Fifth avatar of Vishnu, this one in the form of a dwarf (“vamana”). As with all of Vishnu's avatars, the Vamana avatar comes into being in a time of crisis and serves to restore the cosmic balance that has been thrown out of equilibrium. In this case the source of trouble stems from a demon (asura) named Bali, who has grown so powerful that he is able to rule the entire universe, doing as he wishes. As in many other cases, Vishnu is able to counter and conquer this disruptive force through cunning and trickery, rather than simple overt power.

The mythic tale describes how Bali is sponsoring a great sacrifice, to which all the gods and sages have come. Vishnu comes in the form of a dwarf, disguised as a mendicant brahmin. Bali gives many rich gifts to those attending, as part of the gift-giving (dana) associated with sacrifice, and he offers to give Vamana anything that he asks for. Vamana refuses the offer of riches, land, and material wealth, and asks only for three paces worth of land to set up his own sacrificial altar. Bali is amused by the request and grants it flippantly despite the warnings of Shukra, his religious preceptor (guru), that he should not do this.

As soon as Bali pours water on Vamana's hand, marking that the gift has been given irrevocably, Vamana suddenly begins to grow. He grows so large that he takes up all the space in the cosmos and then begins to take his three steps. With his first step he traverses the earth, with his second the heavens, and with his third step there is nowhere else to go. Bali realizes that he has been defeated, and as a gesture of submission indicates that Vishnu's third step should fall on his head. Vishnu's third step pushes Bali down into the netherworld, where he still remains as the ruler. As for many of the other avatars, Bali's fate gives an important lesson: Vishnu's purpose is not to destroy him, but to restore the cosmic balance that has been lost through one being gaining disproportionate or inappropriate power. Through his submission to Vishnu, Bali remains a powerful being, but on a diminished scale.

The motif of measuring out the universe in three steps is part of the oldest stratum of Vishnu's mythology. In one of the few hymns to Vishnu in the Rg Veda (1.154), the oldest Hindu religious text, he is described as a protective and benevolent deity, who with three steps defines the boundaries of the universe. This manifestation of Vishnu is named Trivikrama (“[taking] three steps”); it seems likely that the motif from this hymn was grafted onto the Vamana story as part of the process of assimilation into the pantheon.

Vana Dashanami
One of the ten divisions of the Dashanami Sanyasis, renunciant ascetics who are devotees (bhakta) of Shiva. The Dashanamis were supposedly established by the ninth-century philosopher, Shankaracharya, in an effort to create a corps of learned men who could help revitalize Hindu life. Each of the divisions is designated by a different name—in this case, vana (“forest”). Upon initiation, new members are given this name as a surname to their new ascetic names, thus allowing for immediate group identification.

Aside from their individual identities, these ten “named” divisions are divided into four larger organizational groups. Each group has its headquarters in one of the four monastic centers (maths) supposedly established by Shankaracharya, as well as other particular religious associations. The Vana Dashanamis belong to the Bhogawara group, which is affiliated with the Govardhan Math in the city of Puri, on the bay of Bengal.

Vanamalin
(“wearing a garland of forest flowers”) Epithet of the god Krishna. See Krishna.

Vanaprastha
(“forest-dweller”) According to the dharma literature, the vanaprastha was the third of the idealized stages of life (ashrama) for a twice-born man, that is, a man born into the brahmin, kshatriya, or vaishya communities, who had undergone the adolescent religious initiation known as the “second birth.” According to this idealized pattern, after engaging in religious learning as a celibate student (brahmacharin), the first stage; marrying and raising a family as a householder (grhastha), the second stage; a man should, in the third, gradually disengage himself from the world by giving up his attachments and withdrawing to a more secluded place. The renunciation in this third stage of life is less severe than the last stage, the Sanyasi—the texts are very clear that he should remain with his wife and that he should continue to perform the prescribed daily domestic sacrifices. Although in contemporary times it is fairly common for older people to live a more retired life, bequeathing the bulk of the family affairs to their children, few people live by the strict prescriptions for the vanaprastha. The prescription for this third stage of life is generally considered to be a reaction to the growth of asceticism in the centuries before the turn of the common era, particularly the monastic asceticism of the Buddhists and Jains, which they claimed was religiously superior to the life of a householder. The vanaprastha is a transitional stage that paves the way for an ascetic life, but it is set in one's old age and thus allows for the fulfilling of one's duties to family and society.

Varada Hasta
In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, a particular hand gesture (hasta), in which the left hand is held with the fingers pointing downward and the palm exposed to the viewer, with the fingers either fully extended or slightly curled. The word varada means “boon-granting,” and the gesture is meant to indicate beneficence and generosity.

Varaha Avatar
The third avatar or incarnation of the god Vishnu, in the form of a boar. See Boar avatar.

Varanasi
Traditional name for the sacred city of Benares. The name Varanasi may be generally used to denote the whole city, but in a more specific context this refers to one of the concentric sacred zones surrounding the Vishvanath temple, the city’s ritual center. The smallest of these zones is called Avimukta, the second is Varanasi, and the largest is named Kashi. The sacred zone of Varanasi is conceived as the area between the Varana and the Asi rivers—the traditional boundaries of the city of Benares—but Varanasi’s boundaries do not stretch inland as far as those of Kashi.

Varkari
Religious community of devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, in his manifestation as Vithoba. Varkari worship has centered on Vithoba’s temple at Pandharpur in the southern part of the state of Maharashtra. The community’s history begins with a series of extraordinary devotional (bhakti) poet-saints, dating from the twelfth to the seventeenth century: Jnanesvar, Namdev, Eknath, Tukaram, Chokamela, Gora, Janabai, Bahina Bai, and many others. One of the ways that these saints expressed their devotion was in pilgrimage to Pandharpur, and this pilgrimage is still the major ritual act in the Varkari community. Twice a year Varkaris come on pilgrimage to Pandharpur and time their travel so that all the pilgrims arrive on the same day—the eleventh day (ekadashi) in the bright half of Ashadh (June–July) in the summer, and the eleventh day in the bright half of Kartik (October–November) in the fall. Individual pilgrims travel in small groups called dindis, often made up of people from the same neighborhood or locality. The dindis are organized into larger groups known as palkhis, each of which is associated with one of the Varkari poet-saints and is led by a palanquin (palkhi, an enclosed single-person litter borne on the shoulders of bearers by means of poles) bearing the sandals of that saint. Each palkhi departs from a place associated with its particular saint—for example, the palkhi of Jnanesvar leaves from the town of Alandi in which he lived—and thus he and all the other saints are still symbolically journeying to Pandharpur twice a year. During their journey pilgrims sing the devotional songs composed by these poet-saints. In this way, the pilgrims are emulating the saints before them, both by treading in their physical footsteps and by singing their songs of devotion. Although the pilgrimage concludes with the entry to Pandharpur and the worship of Vithoba, the most important part is the journey itself. For more information see G. A. Deleury, The Cult of Vithoba, 1960; I. B. Karve, “On the Road,” in the Journal of Asian Studies, Vol. 22, No. 1, 1962; and Digambar Balkrishna Mokashi, Palkhi, 1987.

Varna

("color") Theoretical system dividing Indian society into four major groups, each with a differing occupation and status: brahmin, kshatriya, vaishya, and shudra. The highest status was held by the brahmins, who were priests and scholars, next came the kshatriyas, who were kings and soldiers, then the vaishyas, whose purview was economic life, and finally the shudras, who were supposed to serve the others. This picture is articulated as early as the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts, in particular by a hymn in the Rg Veda (10.90) known the Purusha Sukta. The Purusha Sukta describes the creation of the world and of society as stemming from the sacrifice of the Primeval Man (purusha), with the brahmins coming from his mouth, the kshatriyas from his shoulders, the vaishyas from his thighs (a common euphemism for the genitals), and the shudras from his feet.

This four-fold scheme is conceptually neat, but the real picture was far more complex. For one thing, none of these four varnas was as uniform as this scheme might lead one to suppose: Each of the varnas had multiple occupationally defined subcommunities known as jatis, which often competed for status with one another, even though they may have been members of the same varna. The other discrepancy was that local circumstances had a great effect on any particular community’s social status. As one example, the Vellala community in Tamil Nadu had a great deal of status and power, even though they were technically shudras, because they were a landholding community. On the opposite end, it is not uncommon for brahmins in northern...
India to earn their living by trading or other businesses. This four-fold varna plan does give the general status picture, but the specifics are much more detailed.

Varnashrama Dharma

In the dharma literature, varnashrama dharma is the ordering of dharma or religious duty based on the hierarchical social ordering of the four major social groups (varnas) and the four successive stages of life (ashramas). According to this theory, all people would be able to discern their social status and appropriate function based on their social class and stage of life. The interrelationship between these two sets of categories is often used to denote traditional Hindu society, in theory if not always in fact. The term survives in modern times, but because the doctrine of the ashramas is now largely ignored, those who uphold varnashrama dharma are primarily defending the hierarchical social divisions commonly known as the caste system.

Varuna

In the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative religious texts, Varuna is a deity associated with the sky, with waters, with justice, and with truth. Varuna belongs to the earliest layer of the Indo-Aryan deities; this is clearly shown by comparisons with the Avesta, an ancient Iranian sacred text that shows many parallels with the Vedas, and with even older epigraphic sources. As portrayed in the Vedas, however, Varuna's influence has clearly declined—there are far fewer hymns addressed to him than to deities such as Indra, Agni, and Soma, and he seems to have played a far less important role than these other deities in Vedic religion.

In the Vedas, Varuna is portrayed as the guardian of rta, the cosmic order through which the world proceeds. As the deity associated with the high heaven, he also watches over the deeds of human beings and punishes them for any transgressions. The best known hymn to Varuna, Rg Veda 7.86, shows Varuna's connection with justice, moral order, and the waters. The hymn is the lament of a person who has committed some offense against Varuna and whose sin has become visible through being afflicted with dropsy, in which the body retains its fluids and swells. The speaker begs Varuna to reveal the forbidden act, "committed under the influence of liquor, anger, or heedlessness," so that Varuna may be propitiated and the sufferer healed.

Despite his virtual eclipse early in the tradition, in the later tradition, Varuna retains his association as the god presiding over the waters. He is also considered to be one of the eight Guardians of the Directions, each of which is associated with one of eight points on the compass. Varuna presides over the western direction.

Vasant Panchami

Festival falling on the fifth day (panchami) of the bright (waxing) half of the lunar month of Magh (January–February), celebrated as the first day of spring (vasant). This day is considered sacred to the goddess Saraswati, patron deity of the arts, music, and learning. In her honor, celebrants sing songs in melodic modes (ragas) associated with spring. Given Saraswati's connection with learning, this is also traditionally reckoned as the day on which young children should begin their studies.

Vasant Panchami is also associated with Kama, the god of love, since the coming of spring brings the reappearance of flowering plants, with their scents and colors. This is supposedly the day that Kama attempts to instill erotic desire in the god Shiva's heart, first by bringing spring to Mount Kailas, where Shiva is meditating, and then shooting Shiva with one of his flower arrows. Shiva awakens from his meditation, becomes angry at Kama, and reduces him to ashes with a burst of flame from his third eye. Despite being destroyed, in the end Kama is successful—after being awakened, Shiva becomes aware of Parvati’s ascetic practice and eventually becomes her husband.

Vashitvam

(“control”) One of the eight superhuman powers (siddhi) traditionally believed to be conferred by high spiritual attainment. This particular power gives one the ability to control others, while remaining free from outside control.

Vasishtha

In Hindu mythology, one of the Seven Sages whose names mark exogamous clan “lineages” (gotra; in exogamous groups members must marry outside the group); the others are Gautama, Bharadvaja, Kashyapa, Bhrigu, Atri, and Vishvamitra. All brahmins are believed to be descended from these seven sages, with each family taking the name of its progenitor as its gotra name. In modern times, these gotra divisions are still important, since marriage within the gotra is forbidden. After her marriage, the new bride adopts her husband’s gotra as part of her new identity.

In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics, Vasishtha is a very powerful sage who is the guru to the kings of the Solar dynasty, including King Dasharatha and his son, Rama. Vasishtha is also famous for his long-standing feud with the sage Vishvamitra, which causes numerous confrontations. The feud’s genesis is ultimately rooted in the difference in status between kshatriyas and brahmins. Vishvamitra is a king who stops with a host of retainers at the forest ashram of the brahmin Vasishtha. Upon asking for food, Vishvamitra is amazed at the ability of Vasishtha’s cow, the Kamadhenu, to provide food for everyone. Vishvamitra first tries to buy the Kamadhenu, then tries to take it by force, but his minions are defeated by the magic powers generated by Vasishtha’s tapas (ascetic) practices. Vishvamitra finally admits defeat and begins to do ascetic practices to generate power of his own. Two of their most celebrated clashes are over King Trishanku and his son, Harishchandra; in each case the real issue is the mutual antipathy of these two sages. See also marriage prohibitions.

Vastra

(“clothing”) The seventh of the sixteen traditional upcharas (“offerings”) given to a deity as part of worship, on the model of treating the deity as an honored guest. In this offering, the deity is offered clothing, either through symbolic presentation or through physically dressing the image. The underlying motive here, as for all the upcharas, is to show one’s love for the deity and minister to the deity’s needs.

Vastradhari

(“wearing the clothes”) Name for a newly initiated Sanyasi ascetic, one who has put on the ascetic robes, but still has to undergo a period of training as a disciple to his guru.

Vasudeva

The god Krishna’s father. His most important role in Krishna’s mythology comes on the night of Krishna’s birth, when Vasudeva is able to spirit the infant Krishna out of prison, his birthplace, to the home of his foster parents, Nanda and Yashoda. Vasudeva returns that night, bearing Yashoda’s newborn girl, who is really the goddess Bhadrakali in disguise. The next morning Kamsa kills the child by dashing it against a stone, but from the body arises the goddess, who taunts Kamsa that the person who will slay him has escaped.
Vasudeva
(2) ("son of Vasudeva") Epithet of the god Krishna, a patronymic formed from the name of his father, Vasudeva, by lengthening the initial vowel. See Krishna.

Vasuki
In Hindu mythology, a famous Naga (mythical serpent). Vasuki's most famous mythic role comes in the story in which the gods and demons churn the Ocean of Milk to obtain the nectar of immortality (amrta). In the form of his Tortoise avatar, the god Vishnu serves as the churning-base, Mount Mandara serves as the churning-stick, and Vasuki, with his enormous length, as the churning-rope. With the gods on one side and the demons on the other, they pull Vasuki back and forth until the sea of milk gives up its treasures.

Vata
("air") Along with pitta ("bile") and kapha ("phlegm"), one of the three humors (tridosha) in ayurveda, the traditional system of Indian medicine. Every person has all three of these humors, but usually one is predominant, and this marks a person in certain ways, particularly with regard to health, digestion, and metabolism. Vata is associated with the element of air, which is quick, light, and dry. People whose predominant humor is vata are said to have quick minds, light bodies, and tend to always be doing something. At the same time, they lack substantiality and can run down easily if not careful.

Vatsalya ("calf-like") Bhava
The fourth of the five modes of devotion to God that were most prominently articulated by Rupa Goswami, a devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna and a follower of the Bengali saint Chaitanya. Rupa used differing types of human relationships as models for differing conceptions of the link between deity and devotee. These five models showed growing emotional intensity, from the peaceful (shanta) sense that comes from realizing one's complete identity with Brahman or Supreme Reality, to conceiving of God as one's master, friend, child, or lover. In the Vatsalya mode of devotion, devotees consider themselves as God's parents, lavishing love and care on the deity as a cow cares for her calf. This is an emotionally intense mode of relationship, but without the erotic element present in the fifth mode, madhurya bhava.

Vatsyayana
According to tradition, the author of the Kama Sutra. This text is usually associated with an exhaustive catalog of sexual positions and pleasures, which it certainly contains, but in fact, the text goes far beyond this. Vatsyayana was interested in exploring desire in all its manifestations, and the text begins with a consideration of the four aims of life (purushartha): worldly goods (artha), desire (kama), religious duty (dharma), and liberation of the soul (moksha). Vatsyayana argued that because desire was one of the established ends of human life, its pursuit was thus a good thing, as long as this pursuit did not interfere with the other ends.

Having established the legitimacy of desire, Vatsyayana then talks about how to foster it. The Kama Sutra's second book contains the text's best-known material, the discussion and categorization of various types of sexual union. It begins by characterizing various types of sexual endowment, both male and female, then proceeds to describe different sorts of embracing, kissing, scratching, and biting as symbols of passion, sexual positions, and oral sex. This is followed by chapters on gaining a wife, attracting other men's wives (which the text discourages, except in cases where one's passion is "too strong"), courtesans, and general remarks on attraction. The text is thus a manual for all phases of erotic life, in which sex can be refined into a vehicle for aesthetic experience, as well as pure carnal pleasure.

Vatsyayana
(2) (4th c.) Writer and commentator in the Nyaya school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy, which since early in the common era has been combined with another of the six schools, the Vaisheshikas. Vatsyayana is best known for his commentary on Gautama’s Nyaya Sutras, themselves the foundational text for the Nyaya school.

Vayu
In Hindu mythology, the deity who is wind personified. Vayu is a minor deity who is one of the eight Guardians of the Directions; his direction is the northwest. Aside from being the external winds, Vayu is also believed to be present inside the body, in the five “vital winds” (prana) through which all physiological processes are believed to occur. Although Vayu is a minor deity, two of his sons are extremely significant. His son, Bhima, is one of the five Pandava brothers who are the protagonists in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Sanskrit epics. Bhima is famous for his size and strength, and also for his earthy appetites, both of which reflect the wind’s raw, uncontrollable nature. Vayu’s other famous son is the monkey-god, Hanuman. Even though mythically Hanuman is most famous for his devotion and service to the god Rama, in practical terms he is one of the most popular and widely worshiped deities in northern India. This popularity may stem from his intermediate status; because Hanuman is also a servant, he is less remote and majestic than Rama and, therefore, accessible to human petitions. Another important factor is that this accessibility is coupled with power and the ability to protect those who call on him.

Veda
(“knowledge”) The oldest and most authoritative group of Hindu sacred texts, also designated by the term shruti (“heard”). According to tradition, these texts were not composed by human beings, but are based in the primordial vibrations of the cosmos itself. The ancient sages, whose faculties of perception had been honed through arduous religious practice, were able to “hear” and understand these vibrations, and transmitted them to others in a lineage of learning. On one level, the term veda is part of the names of four individual texts—the Rg Veda, Sama Veda, Yajur Veda, and Atharva Veda, each of which has a differing focus and content. The term veda is also a collective term for the material in these texts or their associated appendices: the Vedic hymns (samhitas), the Brahmanas, the Aranyakas, and the Upanishads. Although these four groups of texts are all considered part of the Vedas, they have very different forms and characteristics. The samhitas are hymns of praise addressed to particular deities, and are found mainly in the Rg Veda and the Sama Veda. In contrast, the Brahmanas are detailed ritual manuals, giving the instructions for performing complex sacrificial rites; the Aranyakas and the Upanishads are speculative ponderings on the nature of the cosmos. The Vedas were considered so sacred that for 3,000 years they were not written down, but transmitted orally, a mode of transmission that still persists today. The Vedas’ power comes not from their literal meaning, but from their very sound, which is the identical sound heard by the sages long ago. To safeguard this tradition, Hindus developed an elaborate system of mnemonics to ensure that the texts would not be altered or corrupted, thus preserving their efficacy.

Vedanga
(“[subsidiary] member of the Veda”) General name for six classes of works considered auxiliary to the Vedas because they were intended to facilitate its use. These six were guides to proper articulation and pronunciation (shiksha), metrical forms (chandasa), Sanskrit grammar (vyakaranasa), etymological explanations of archaic words (nirukta), determining astrologically appropriate times for sacrifice (jyotisha), and ritual and ceremonial guides (kalpa).

Vedanta
The latest of the six schools in traditional Hindu philosophy. The name Vedanta literally means “the end of the Vedas,” and reflects their contention that they were revealing the ultimate meaning of these sacred texts. Vedanta proponents gave particular attention to the Upanishads, which were also the latest stratum of Vedic texts, and thus their “end” in a different sense. These texts have served as authoritative sources for several major schools, with widely differing philosophical positions. The best known and most important of these is the Advaita Vedanta school, propounded by the philosopher Shankaracharya and his followers. The Advaita school upholds a philosophical position known as monism, which is the belief in a single impersonal Ultimate Reality that they call Brahman. For Advaita proponents, reality is thus “nondual” (advaita)—that is, all things are nothing but the formless, unqualified Brahman, despite the appearance of difference and diversity. For the Advaitins, this assumption of diversity is a fundamental misunderstanding of the ultimate nature of things and a manifestation of avidya. Although often translated as “ignorance,” avidya is better understood as the lack of genuine understanding, which causes human beings to be trapped in karmic bondage, reincarnation (samsara), and suffering.

Whereas the Advaita school conceives of this Ultimate Reality in abstract impersonal terms, the other Vedanta schools are theistic—that is, they conceive the Ultimate Reality as a personal God, namely the god Vishnu. The two other major schools are the Vishishtadvaita vedanta (“qualified nondualism”) propounded by Ramanuja and the Dvaita Vedanta (“dualist”) propounded by Madhva. The major differences between these two schools stem from assumptions about connections between God, human souls, and the world. Ramanuja tends to see these in a continuum, with the world and human souls sharing in the divine nature, whereas Madhva stresses the great gulf between God and all other things. Another minor school is the dvaitadvaita vedanta (“dualism and nondualism”) of Nimbarka, which strives to find some middle ground between Advaita Vedanta’s monism, and Dvaita Vedanta’s dualism. Nimbarka stressed that the world and souls were dependent on God, in whom they exist, and with whom they had a subtle connection. Even from their names, it is obvious that there are significant differences between these positions.

Vedanta Deshika
(13th c.) Writer and commentator in the Vishishtadvaita Vedanta philosophical school. Vedanta Deshika was a follower of Ramanuja and interpreted Ramanuja as teaching that there were two sorts of liberation: a lower one in which one was subject to no outside forces, and a higher one in which one’s entire being was focused on the Lord, whom Ramanuja identified as the god Vishnu. The human being is considered both identical to and different from the Lord, which means the perfect identity is never possible; God’s transcendence leads to the exaltation of devotion (bhakti) and the stress on submission to God’s grace.

Vedanta Society
The oldest Hindu missionary organization in America, established in 1897 by Swami Vivekananda. The society stresses the philosophical teachings of Vedanta, which it understands as referring solely to the Advaita Vedanta school, Vivekananda’s major emphasis. The society’s tone has been nontheistic, nonritual, and rationalist; its constituency has been drawn from liberals and intellectuals, such as the writer Aldous Huxley.

Vedanta Sutras
Text ascribed to the sage Badarayana in the third to fifth century B.C.E. Along with the Upanishads and the Bhagavad Gita, the Vedanta Sutras is one of the three traditional sources for the Vedanta school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy. The text itself is a collection of 555 brief aphorisms (sutras), which are so terse that they presuppose a commentary. The sutras focus particularly on the ideas about Brahman, hence their other common name, the Brahma Sutra. In content, the first section describes the nature of Absolute Reality, the second responds to objections and criticizes other positions, the third details the means to acquire knowledge, and the fourth describes the benefits of such knowledge.

Vedarambha (“beginning of Veda [study]”) Samskara
Traditionally, the twelfth of the life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras). In this ceremony, a newly initiated brahmacharin—a young man who had entered the celibate student phase of life—would commence to study the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. This rite is not mentioned in the earliest texts in the dharma literature, perhaps under the assumption that Veda study would commence at an appropriate time, after learning had commenced with the earlier vidyarambha samskara.

Vegetarianism
A dietary practice that carries extremely high status among Hindu people, probably because of its associations with strict brahmin practice; even people who are nonvegetarian themselves will commonly think of a vegetarian diet as “purer.” Strict vegetarians eat no flesh or eggs, but milk and milk products are always eaten and are considered pure and health-giving, probably because they come from the cow. Those people who keep the strictest diets will also often refrain from onions and garlic, which are considered to excite the passions. This religious commitment to vegetarianism by a certain part of the population, and the general status given to “pure” vegetarian food, are both responsible for the great variety of vegetarian cooking found in Indian culture. Despite the higher status given to a vegetarian diet, most modern Hindus are not vegetarian—a recent poll of urban Hindus found that only about 25 percent were pure vegetarian, although the number may be higher in villages, which tend to be more traditional.

Vellala
The landlord community throughout much of traditional Tamil Nadu. Although technically the Vellalas were of shudra status, their control over the land gave them considerable influence and prestige in the region. The Vellala community was the source for many of the Alvars, a group of twelve poet-saints whose stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to the god Vishnu transformed and revitalized Hindu religious life. Most of the Alvars’ influence undoubtedly stemmed from the strength of their religious devotion, but this was undoubtedly reinforced by Vellala status as a landholding community.

Velur
Village in the Aurangabad district of the state of Maharashtra, a few miles from the cave temples at Ellora. Velur is famous as the site for the temple to the god Shiva in his form as Ghrneshvar, the “Lord of Compassion.” Shiva is present at this temple in the form of a linga.
the pillar-shaped image that is his symbolic form, and the Ghrneshvar linga is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites deemed especially sacred to Shiva, and at which Shiva is uniquely present.

Vena

In Hindu mythology, a wicked king who prohibits all religious rites and gift-giving except those dedicated to him. He is finally killed by a group of outraged sages, who through their magic powers transform blades of sacred kusha grass into spears. After Vena has been killed, the problem of the royal succession arises. The sages first churn from his thigh a small, malformed, dark-skinned man named Nishada, who is believed to be the ancestor of the tribal people known as the Nishadas. Nishada takes upon himself all Vena's manifold sins, thus purging them from Vena. After Vena has been cleansed, the sages churn his right hand, from which emerges a radiant and shining boy, who is King Prthu.

Venkateshvara

("the Lord of Venkata [Hill"]) Presiding deity of the Venkateshvara temple near the town of Tirupati in the state of Andhra Pradesh; the temple is north and east of Madras. Venkateshvara is a local deity who has been assimilated into the larger pantheon as a form of the god Vishnu. The temple is in the Tirumalai hills, a cluster of seven hills believed to represent the seven cobra hoods of Shesha, the mythic serpent who serves as Vishnu's couch. Venkateshvara's image is unusual, in that his forehead is covered with a plate. The two branches of the Shrivaishnava community, the Tengalais and the Vadagalais, each wear distinctive sectarian markings, and this plate conceals these markings on the image and thus allows both communities to claim him as their own.

Venkateshvara is also famous for having the single richest temple in India. People come to Tirupati from all over the country, largely because of the popular belief that any wish made in the deity's presence will invariably be granted. Aside from significant monetary offerings, it is also very common for pilgrims to have their heads shaved, as a sign of their visit and to make an offering of the hair, as well. In the time since independence the temple's wealth has been administered by a trust, which has been particularly attentive in fostering publishing, educational institutions, and in helping to build Hindu temples outside India.

Venu

("bamboo") A bamboo flute, which is an important instrument in Indian classical music. In Hindu iconography, it is the characteristic instrument of the god Krishna, who used its sweet sounds to summon his devotees (bhakta) to him, to spend their nights dancing on the shores of the Yamuna River.

Venus

In Hindu astrology (jyotisha), a planet associated with love and pleasure. It is considered a strong planet, with pronounced benevolent qualities, although like all the other planets, its powers will vary according to context. Venus presides over Friday, and its positive qualities make this an auspicious day.

Veshara

One of the three developed styles in medieval Hindu temple architecture, the others being the Nagar and the Dravida. The Veshara style is primarily found in western India and the Deccan and was the least significant and widespread of the three styles. Whereas the Nagar style was characterized by vertical uplift achieved by a temple's towers (shikharas), and the Dravida style by lower temples covering enormous tracts of ground, the Veshara style's most identifiable feature is a barrel roof above the sanctuary, which has its roots in the rock-cut caves (chaityas) first sculpted by the Buddhists. This sort of roof is midway between the Nagara towers and the Dravida horizontal tiers, just as the Deccan was the intermediate region between the two.

Vetala
In Hindu mythology, one of the classes of malevolent spirits that can be subsumed under the general rubric of demons. Vetalas are usually described as eating human flesh and are sometimes said to haunt battlefields to get their fill.

Vibhishana
In the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Indian epics, Vibhishana is the youngest brother of Ravana, the demon king of Lanka. In their youth Vibhishana, Ravana, and their third brother, Kumbhakarna, have performed harsh physical asceticism (tapas) to gain boons from the gods. Whereas his brothers have chosen boons designed to advance their military ability and glory, Vibhishana asks that he remain righteous in times of danger, and this quality marks his life. When Ravana holds a council of war preceding the battle with Rama’s army, Vibhishana is the only one to vote against battle and instead advises Ravana to return Rama’s kidnapped wife, Sita, and to beg Rama’s pardon. For these words, Ravana expels his brother from the city, and Vibhishana goes over to Rama’s army, where he fights valiantly throughout the war. After the death of Ravana, Rama crowns Vibhishana the king of Lanka, as a reward for his fidelity and his virtue. Vibhishana is a perfect example of the fact that demons (in this case the type of demons known as rakshasas) are not inherently evil in Indian mythology. They are powerful beings who may clash with gods and men, but they have many virtues as well. In the Ramcharitmanas, the vernacular retelling of the Ramayana written by the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?), Vibhishana is portrayed as a great devotee (bhakta) of Rama, in keeping with the emphasis of Tulsidas on the primacy of devotion over all other forms of religious life.

Vibhuti
(“power”) Name for the sacred ash with which devotees (bhakta) of the god Shiva mark their bodies, usually with three horizontal lines (tripundra). According to one interpretation, the three lines represent the three prongs of Shiva’s trident, according to another, they symbolize Shiva’s third eye. Ash is associated with Shiva in several different contexts. On one hand, he is said to smear his body with ashes from the cremation ground, which indicates his lack of concern for all conventional distinctions between purity and impurity (ashaucha); the ash could also symbolize Shiva’s destruction of Kama, the god of love, who is burned to ash by Shiva’s third eye. In earlier times vibhuti was made from wood ash that had been sifted through cloth until it was as fine as talcum powder. This is still done today, particularly by ascetics who usually use the ash from a dhuni or smoldering ascetic fire, which is believed to give the ash a sacred quality; in modern times vibhuti has become available in stores that sell religious supplies.

Vichitravirya
In Hindu mythology, the son of Satyavati and king Shantanu. Vichitravirya dies after his marriage to Ambika and Ambalika, but before he has fathered any children. In her desperation to perpetuate King Shantanu’s lineage, Satyavati calls on her eldest son, Vyasa, to sleep with the two wives. From this union Vyasa sires Pandu and Dhrtarashtra, whose descendants form the major warring factions in the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Sanskrit epics.

Vicious Circle
In Indian logic, one of the fallacies to be avoided in constructing an argument. A vicious circle occurs when a series of things stand in a cause-and-effect relationship to one another, with any one of them standing as both cause and effect. For example, when “a” causes “b,” and “b” causes “c,” (somewhere down the line) “x” causes “a.” This is seen as an extended case of self-residence—saying that “a” is both cause and effect—and is equally objectionable.

Vidhi
Philosophical concept that is found in the Mahabharata and Ramayana, the two great Sanskrit epics. As portrayed there, vidhi is an impersonal force controlling and constraining both the gods and human beings; this notion corresponds best to the idea of fate.

Vidura
In Hindu mythology, the son of the sage Vyasa and the serving maid of Queen Ambika. Ambika and her sister Ambalika are the wives of King Vichitravirya, who has died without heirs. In a desperate attempt to save the lineage, Vichitravirya’s mother, Satyavati, summons her son, Vyasa, to sleep with his brother’s two wives. Ambika and Ambalika both spontaneously recoil from Vyasa, and each of their sons is born with a defect: Ambalika turns pale, causing her son Pandu to be born with an unnaturally pale complexion; Ambika covers her eyes, causing her son Dhrtarashtra to be born blind. Ambika is so repulsed by Vyasa’s appearance that when she is told to sleep with him again, she sends her serving maid instead. In contrast to the two sisters, Ambika’s maid gives herself willingly to Vyasa, and as a reward delivers a handsome son named Vidura.

According to one legend, Vidura is a partial avatar of Dharma, the god who is righteousness personified. Vidura always shows his righteousness in his dealings with the Pandavas and the Kauravas, the epic’s two warring factions. As the Kauravas become more and more wicked, this inclines him more toward the Pandavas, for whom he serves as a trusted and faithful adviser. It is Vidura who realizes the danger in the House of Lac—a house built entirely of highly flammable materials—and makes arrangements for the Pandavas to escape from it. During the Mahabharata war, he remains neutral, but after the war is over he again serves as an adviser to King Yudhishthira, the eldest of the Pandavas, and to Yudhishthira’s brothers.

Vidyadhara
(“wisdom-bearer”) Class of semidivine beings. The Vidyadharas are generally believed to live in the Himalayas and are thus often associated with the god Shiva, whose home is also said to be there. Vidyadharas are generally benevolent toward human beings and are often (as their name suggests) associated with bringing wisdom to those they favor.
Vidyapati
(ca. 1400) Brahmin court poet in the Hindu kingdom of Mithila in northern Bihar. Although Vidyapati wrote works in Sanskrit, he is best known for his love poetry, which was written in the vernacular Maithali language. In this poetry he drew on the literary traditions of Sanskrit love poetry, but his favorite subjects for this poetry were the divine lovers Radha and Krishna. Although later Vaishnavas considered Vidyapati’s love poetry as devotional works, Vidyapati’s own religious writings definitively describe Shiva as the Supreme Being, clearly showing that he was a Shaiva. For further information see Edward C. Dimock Jr. and Denise Levertov (trans.), In Praise of Krishna, 1981; and R. S. McGregor, The Love Songs of Vidyapati, 1987.

Vidyarambha ("beginning of study") Samskara
Traditionally, the tenth of the life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras), in which the child begins formal education, usually by starting to learn the alphabet. Although people in modern India may not perform this rite according to its prescribed form (which includes making offerings to a sacrificial fire and giving gifts to brahmans), families in which education is taken seriously usually have a ritualized commencement of study, often when the child is as young as three.

Vighneshvar
("Lord of Obstacles") Epithet of the god Ganesh, reflecting the belief that he wields control over all obstacles, and thus can make things easy or hard on a person. See Ganesh.

Vihara
An early architectural form, in which a central courtyard was surrounded by a series of small rooms. This was originally a Buddhist architectural form, intended to create a living space for the monks—individual cells in the small rooms and a
Vijaya
In Hindu mythology, one of the gatekeepers of Vaikuntha, who with his brother Jaya, is cursed by the sage Sanaka to be born three times as an asura (demon), and to be killed each time by Vishnu. In their first birth Jaya and Vijaya incarnate as Hiranyaksha and Hiranyakashipu, who are killed by the Boar avatar and the Man-Lion avatar, respectively. In their second they are born as Ravana and Kumbhakarna, who are killed by Rama. In their final birth they take form as Shishupala and Dantavakra, who are killed by Krishna. After this they return to their duties as Vishnu's gatekeepers.

Vijayanagar Dynasty
("City of Victory") The last of the great southern Indian Hindu kingdoms, which took its name from its capital city, near modern Hampi in Karnataka. The kingdom was founded in 1336 by Harihara, a regional governor in the Tughluq dynasty who broke away to carve out a kingdom in the central Deccan plateau. The kingdom went through several periods of expansion and decay. In the early fifteenth century it controlled most of southern India, but then passed through a period of decline and loss of territory; this was followed by renewal in the early sixteenth century, during the reign of Krishna Deva Raya, and finally ended after the battle of Talikota in 1565, in which the ruling prince Rama Raja was decisively defeated by a coalition of the sultans from the northern part of the Deccan. The city of Vijayanagar was abandoned almost immediately, and although it has suffered the ravages of time, it still contains stunning examples of late medieval Hindu art and architecture.

Vijayanagar Dynasty
(12th c.) Author of the Mitakshara, a voluminous commentary on the Yajnavalkya Smrti, itself an example of the dharma literature, or texts on religious duty. This particular commentary played a pivotal role in the British administration of India. The British were largely content to have their Indian subjects governed by traditional religious laws, but to do so, they needed an accepted standard. For large sections of British India, the Mitakshara was given the status of traditional law and was used as a legal code. The only major part of India in which Hindus were not subject to this was in Bengal, where the legal authority was the Dayabhaga. One of

Vijayadyashmi
(“victory tenth”) Another name for the festival of Dussehra, which falls on the tenth day of the lunar month. The festival has two mythic charters, one with the god Rama and one with the Goddess, and both these myths point to this as the day on which the deity wins a definitive victory. See Dussehra.

Vijnaneshvara
Religious observance falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the dark (waning) half of Phalgun (February–March). As for all the eleventh-day observances, this is dedicated to the worship of Vishnu. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, which usually involve fasting (upavasa) and worship and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. Those performing this vow should fill an earthen pot with the seven kinds of grain, set an image of Vishnu on the pot, and for twenty-four hours, remain engaged in chanting the names of Vishnu. On the twelfth the pot of grain should be given to a brahmin. As for results, faithfully observing this festival is said to bring victory (vijaya) over poverty and unhappiness.

Vijnanesvara
(12th c.) Author of the Mitakshara, a voluminous commentary on the Yajnavalkya Smrti, itself an example of the dharma literature, or texts on religious duty. This particular commentary played a pivotal role in the British administration of India. The British were largely content to have their Indian subjects governed by traditional religious laws, but to do so, they needed an accepted standard. For large sections of British India, the Mitakshara was given the status of traditional law and was used as a legal code. The only major part of India in which Hindus were not subject to this was in Bengal, where the legal authority was the Dayabhaga. One of the major differences between the two was in matters of inheritance. The Mitakshara stresses inheritance by survivorship, in which only living males can inherit property, whereas the Dayabhaga stresses inheritance by succession, in which a dead man's heirs can inherit in his name.

Vikramaditya

("Sun of Prowess") Title taken by King Chandra Gupta II (r. 376–415) as a symbol of his royal mastery. This monarch is traditionally identified as the Vikramaditya who established the Vikram era, but because the Vikram era was established a little less than sixty years before the common era, this claim is clearly untenable.

Vikram Era

One of the most common dating systems, particularly in northern India. It is generally believed that the Vikram era takes its name from King Vikramaditya of Ujjain, who is supposed to have ruled over much of India. The Vikram era date is fifty-six or fifty-seven years later than that of the common era; the discrepancy stems from the differing first days of the year in the two systems. In the common era the year begins on January 1, but in the Vikram era the year begins with the sun's transition into Aries, considered in India as occurring on April 14. Hence, to convert a Vikram era date to a common era date, one subtracts fifty-six years for dates between January 1 and April 14, and fifty-seven years for dates between April 15 and December 31.

Vikramorvashiya

("Urvashi won by valor") Drama written by the poet Kalidasa, generally considered the greatest classical Sanskrit poet. The Vikramorvashiya is a musical play in five acts, whose mythic theme is the liaison of King Pururavas and the celestial nymph Urvashi, a story mentioned both in Rg Veda 1.95 and in the Shatapatha Brahmana. In both these earlier sources the story ends unhappily, with the separation of Urvashi and Pururavas, but in Kalidasa's version the estranged lovers are finally happily reunited. This change may have been prompted solely from the desire for a happy ending, which is one of the most characteristic features of Sanskrit drama.

Village Deities

According to popular Hindu tradition, the universe has 330 million gods. The richness of this mythic imagination can be seen in the composition of the Hindu pantheon, in which hundreds of major and minor deities have been given form, identity, and mythic history. Yet aside from these deities, who have been given an identifiable form, there are also a host of village deities found throughout India. In most cases, the village deity is exactly that—the deity who protects, watches over, and acts as a divine overseer for a particular village or locale. One of their most common functions is to protect the village from disease, either of people or livestock, and to provide remedies when disease strikes. They are also the guardians of the village, defending it from ghosts and unseen powers, as well as protecting the villagers from danger and misfortune.

The authority of these deities is generally quite limited—in most cases, it does not extend beyond the village itself. In most cases, village deities have no well-defined mythic history, form, or personality. At times they will have a temple dedicated to them, but in other cases the village deity is believed to be associated with a particular tree or is represented by a post in the village square. Village deities are usually nonvegetarian, demanding animal sacrifices and offerings of blood in exchange for their services. Relationships with these deities are highly pragmatic—the villagers make offerings, and the deities protect, but beyond these offerings there is usually little organized worship. If these deities have any organized priesthood, it is almost always non-brahmin because the impurity (ashaucha) generated by animal sacrifices would be unacceptable to ("vehicle") A word with different specific meanings in different contexts, a common feature in the Sanskrit language. It can refer to the vehicles used by a deity—either in a mythic sense, because each of the deities has an animal considered to be his or her vehicle, or in a literal sense as the cart used to carry them in procession, or to the human being who “carries” them through becoming possessed. In the context of architecture, the word vimana is used to refer to that part of the temple that “carries” the deity, that is, the sanctuary as a whole.
Vimana

Vimarsha
("reflection") In Hindu tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice, vimarsha is one of the bipolar opposites that are used to characterize the nature of all reality, with its counterpart being illumination (prakasha). These two terms are particularly important for the creation of the world, which is said to happen when the pure and radiant consciousness (prakasha) of the ultimate Brahman becomes self-conscious through the reflection (vimarsha) of this original consciousness. From one single consciousness, the absolute then evolves into a binary divinity—the god Shiva and his consort Shakti—whose continued interaction combines to create the world. This dyad of prakasha-vimarsha is particularly important in the Trika school of Kashmiri Shaivism. For further information see Jaideva Singh, Pratyabhijnanahrdayam, 1982.

Vina
Multistringed musical instrument with a long hollow body and a sounding box at the bottom; the top has a large hollow gourd projecting from the back, which further amplifies the sound. The vina is one of the classical musical instruments, particularly in southern India, where its mastery is still held in high regard. In Indian iconography, the vina is most strongly associated with the goddess Saraswati, in keeping with her identity as the patron deity of the arts, culture, and learning.

Vinata
In Hindu mythology, the daughter of the divine sage Daksha, and the sister of Kadru. Vinata gives birth to a line of eagles—of whom the most famous is Garuda—whereas Kadru gives birth to a line of serpents. The proverbial antipathy between these two kinds of animals is described as stemming from conflict between these two sisters. One day the sisters get into an argument about the tail color of a certain celestial horse, with Vinata arguing that it is white, and Kadru asserting that it is black. The disagreement becomes more intense, until they finally agree that the person who is wrong will become a slave to the other. To ensure her victory, Kadru persuades a number of her children to hang from the back of the horse, which from a distance makes the tail appear to be black. When Vinata sees the black snakes, she accepts her defeat, and for many years has to serve Kadru under extremely harsh conditions. She is finally rescued by her son, Garuda, who, when he discovers what has happened, embarks on a program of killing snakes that has never abated.

Vinaya Patrika
(“letter of petition”) One of the later poetic works by the poet-saint Tulsidas (1532–1623?), in the form of a series of 280 short poems written in the Braj Bhasha dialect. The entire work is presented as a letter of petition to Tulsidas’s chosen deity, Rama, using as his intermediary the monkey-god Hanuman. The letter’s general theme is a plea for deliverance from the evils of the current degenerate age (kali yuga). The first sixty-odd verses are a series of invocations paying homage to various deities, showing the ecumenical quality that more generally marks Tulsidas’s devotion. The remainder of the poem is directed to Rama and stresses other themes that run throughout Tulsidas’s poetry. One theme is the corrupted nature of the present cosmic age, the kali yuga, which makes devotion the only effective means to salvation. Another pervasive theme is the power of God’s name and its incomparable ability to rescue the devotee (bhakta). Finally, there are warnings to the hearers not to waste the opportunity of a human birth. Much of the poetry has an intimate personal quality, and it seems to reflect both the poet’s despair at his own frailty and his eventual hope for salvation. From this general tone, the Vinaya Patrika is generally assumed to have been written in the later part of the poet’s life, although it cannot be precisely dated.

Vindhya Mountains
Mountain range running from east to west in central India. Despite their modest height, they have traditionally served as the cultural dividing line between northern and southern India. The Vindhyas themselves were seen as an uncivilized and potentially dangerous place, inhabited by ghosts, demons, and tribal peoples; these dangers were exemplified by the untamed nature of its presiding goddess, Vindhyavasini.

Vindhyavasini
(“dweller in the Vindhyas”) Powerful form of the great Goddess. The Vindhyas are a mountain range in central India that are difficult to reach, inhabited by tribal peoples, and seen as a place at the margins of civilized society. As the goddess who dwells in that place, Vindhyavasini is equally marginal, often seen as a fierce and dangerous deity who demands blood sacrifices from her devotees (bhakta). The mythology of Vindhyavasini is associated with various places in the Vindhyas, but for centuries, her primary temple has been in the village of Vindhyachal near the city of Mirzapur in the state of Uttar Pradesh, although she is worshiped in other places in northern India. One of her charter myths identifies her as the goddess (in infant form) exchanged for the infant god Krishna and killed by Krishna’s wicked uncle, Kamsa. After taunting Kamsa that the child he seeks has already escaped, she flies off and takes up residence in the Vindhyas. Since other accounts identify this goddess as Bhadrakali, this points to the fluidity of the Hindu pantheon, in which the renditions differ in the various accounts, according to the purpose of the writers. For further information see David R. Kinsley, Hindu Goddesses, 1986; and Cynthia Humes, “The Goddess of the Vindhyas in Banaras,” in Living Banaras, 1993.

Vipaksha

In Indian philosophy, one of the parts in the accepted form of an inference (anumana). The accepted form of an inference has three parts: an assertion (pratijna), a reason (hetu), and examples (drshntanta); each of these three have their own constituent parts. The vipaksha is part of the third term, the examples, and is a negative example given to show that the claim made in the initial assertion is one that reflects the action of particular causes. For example, in the inference, “there is fire on the mountain because there is smoke on the mountain,” the vipaksha could be “unlike a lake” since lakes are places with neither fire nor smoke, and thus shows that these conditions are not universally present (fire is found in mountains, but not in lakes). By convention, an inference also had to have a positive example, the sapaksha, to show that similar things happened in similar cases (i.e., that there were other cases in which there was both fire and smoke).

Viparitakhyati

(“contrary discrimination”) Theory of error propounded by the Mimamsa philosopher Kumarila, who lived in the seventh century C.E. All the theories of error aim to explain why people make errors in judgment, such as the stock example of mistaking the silvery flash of seashell for a piece of silver.

Like Prabhakara and the Naiyayikas, Kumarila believes that the simple judgments “that object is silvery” and “silver is silvery” are both true and indisputable. Kumarila also agrees with the Naiyayika that the error comes from a discrimination that is contrary to reality. His difference with the Naiyayikas comes with the latter’s postulation of the inherence-relationship as connecting subjects and predicates (“silver color” and “silver”). Kumarila’s theory is identity-and-difference (bhedabhada) in which all things are what they are and are not what they are not. Thus the perception (pratyaksha) of the shell on the beach would involve its similarities and differences from silveryness, combined with silver’s similarities and differences from silveryness. One can combine the similarities and get a false judgment, or the differences and come up with a true one. As in the Naiyayika theory of error, the root cause for combining the similarities rather than the differences comes from karmic dispositions stemming from avidya, specifically the greed for silver that prompts us to look for such items of value. For further information see Bijayananda Kar, (“hero”) In the context of tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice, the vira is one of the modes of ritual expression. The tantric “hero” is said to be one who not only partakes of the Five Forbidden Things (panchamakara)—wine, fish, meat, parched grain, and sexual intercourse—in their elemental forms, but also uses this inversion of normal moral rules as a way to affirm the ultimate unity of all things in the universe. Aspirants adopting a heroic mode will often worship a powerful but dangerous deity, in which the ultimate affirmation of this unity is to affirm one’s identity with that deity. If one can do this successfully, it is believed to confer various powers, but if one fails it is said to lead to illness, insanity, or death. This is not a path without hazards, but through it the heroes quickly attain their desired goals.
Vira

Virabhadra

In Hindu mythology, a powerful being who is created by the god Shiva to humble the demigod Daksha and to destroy Daksha’s sacrifice. Daksha gives his daughter, Sati, to marry Shiva, but later he feels that Shiva has not shown him proper respect. To humble Shiva, Daksha plans a great sacrifice and invites all the gods except Shiva. When Sati asks her father why he has done so, Daksha responds with a stream of abuse, excoriating Shiva as worthless and despicable. Humiliated by these public insults, Sati commits suicide—in some versions, by leaping into the sacrificial fire, and in others by withdrawing into a yogic trance and giving up her life.

In the most common version of Virabhadra’s creation, Shiva is so enraged when he learns of Sati’s death that he tears out two matted locks (jata) from his head and dashes them to the ground. One matted lock takes form as Virabhadra, and the second takes form as Bhadrakali, a powerful and terrifying form of the Goddess. Just as Virabhadra represents Shiva’s destructive aspect, Bhadrakali represents the ferocious and dangerous side of the Goddess, in contrast with the gentle and loyal Sati. At Shiva’s orders, the two demolish Daksha’s sacrifice, scattering the guests and destroying the sacred fires, until Daksha finally repents and worships Shiva as the supreme deity. Although Virabhadra’s actions in this story are destructive, he is and remains Shiva’s servant, carrying out his divine master’s commands, a mandate that ultimately upholds the created order.

Viragval

(“Hero-stone”) Stone erected in memory of a warrior, often the village headman, who perished in battle while defending the village cattle from pillage. Such stones can be found all over the Deccan region, and Deleury speculates that the origins of the Maharashtrian god Vithoba lay in such a deified hero, who was later assimilated into the pantheon as a form of Vishnu.

Viraha

(“separation”) Well-established poetic genre in classical Sanskrit poetry and in much of vernacular devotional (bhakti) poetry. The genre focuses on describing the pain resulting from the separation of lover and beloved, whether the separated lovers are two human beings or devotee (bhakta) and deity. Such separation is believed to bring on specific physical symptoms, which the poets describe in detail—lack of appetite, insomnia, inability to attend to daily life, or to think about anyone but the beloved. The sort of love felt in such separation is believed to engender an even more intense love for the beloved than love in union because the latter is sweetened by the presence of the beloved, whereas the former has to stand by itself.
Viramamunivar
Pseudonym of Father Constanzio Beschi (1680–1747), an Italian Jesuit who lived in Tamil Nadu for thirty-six years. Like many of the other early Jesuits, Beschi learned the local language and adopted the local way of life. As part of his missionary work, he translated parts of the Old and New Testament into literary Tamil, and his facility with the language and its poetic conventions make this work a significant milestone in later Tamil literature.

Viramitrodaya
One of the latest and the largest of the nibandhas (“collections”), compiled in the early seventeenth century by the scholar Mitra Mishra. The nibandhas were compendia of Hindu lore, in which the compilers culled references on a particular theme from the Vedas, dharma literature, puranas, and other authoritative religious texts, and then compiled these excerpts into a single volume. The Viramitrodaya is a massive compendium of Hindu lore, each of whose twenty-two sections is devoted to a particular aspect of Hindu life, such as daily practice, worship, gift-giving (dana), vows, pilgrimage, penances (prayashchitta), purification, death rites (antyeshthi samskara), law, and so forth, finally ending with liberation (moksha). Aside from citing the relevant scriptural passages, Mitra Mishra also provides extensive learned commentary, and his work became an important source for later legal interpretation, particularly in eastern India.

Virasana
One of the sitting postures (asana) described in commentaries to the Yoga Sutras; this is also one of the sitting postures in which deities are portrayed in Hindu iconography. As described in the commentaries to the Yoga Sutras, in this position one foot rests on the ground, under the opposite thigh, while the other foot rests on top of the opposite knee. In modern yoga manuals this posture is described quite differently, as a sitting posture with the legs folded back outside the body, with the feet pressed against the thighs and buttocks.

Virashaiva
(“Heroic Shaivas”) Another name for the Lingayat religious community, stemming from the Lingayat insistence that the god Shiva was the only real god. See Lingayat.

Virata
In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Virata is the king who shelters the five Pandava brothers, the epic’s protagonists, during the year they spend incognito, following their twelve years of exile in the forest. This year is critical because according to the agreement that the Pandavas have made with their adversary, Duryodhana, if they are discovered during this year the cycle of exile and living incognito will begin again. Due to Virata’s care and foresight the Pandavas are not discovered, even though Duryodhana has sent legions of spies to find them. During the Mahabharata war he continues to support the Pandavas and is eventually killed by the archery master Drona.

Visarjana
(“disposing”) The sixteenth and last of the traditional upacharas (“offerings”) given to a deity as part of worship, on the model of treating the deity as an honored guest. In this offering, the devotee (bhakta) gives the deity leave to go, as the concluding rite in worship. Although the word dismissal sounds presumptuous in any interaction with a deity, this term really refers to the words of parting that one would say to any departing guest. The underlying motive here, as for all the upacharas, is to show one’s love for the deity and minister to the deity’s needs.
Vishakhadatta
(6th c.) Sanskrit dramatist whose only surviving work is the play Mudrarakshasa (“Rakshasa’s Ring”). The play is of some historical interest, for its major theme is the rise of Chandragupta Maurya (r. 321–297 B.C.E.), founder of the Maurya dynasty, although the play ascribes his success to the machinations of his cunning brahmin minister, Chanakya. The play paints the king as a weak figure, with the minister as the real power behind the throne, although in fairness to the historical king this portrayal seems inaccurate. The drama’s plot is highly complex, as with many Sanskrit plays, but its climax comes when the principal characters are dramatically rescued from execution at the last moment. The play has been translated into English by Michael Coulson, and published in an anthology titled Three Sanskrit Plays, 1981.

Vishishthadvaita (“Qualified Non-Dualism”) Vedanta
One of the branches of Vedanta, the philosophical school purporting to reveal the ultimate meaning and purpose (anta) of the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts. Vishishthadvaita’s greatest figure is the eleventh-century philosopher, Ramanuja, who was central to its formation, although he was building on earlier work. Ramanuja was convinced that Brahman or Supreme Reality was a personal deity, rather than an impersonal abstract principle, and he was also convinced that devotion (bhakti) was the most important form of religious practice. Vishishthadvaita Vedanta, his philosophical position, stressed both of these convictions and thus opposed the position of the Advaita Vedanta school, founded by the philosopher Shankaracharya.

The Advaita school upholds a philosophical position known as monism, which is the belief in a single impersonal Ultimate Reality, which they call Brahman. For Advaita proponents, reality is “nondual” (advaita)—that is, all things are nothing but the formless Brahman, despite the appearance of difference and diversity in the perceivable world. For the Advaitins, this assumption of diversity is a fundamental misunderstanding of the ultimate nature of things and a manifestation of avidya. Although often translated as “ignorance,” avidya is better understood as the lack of genuine understanding, which ultimately causes human beings to be trapped in karmic bondage, reincarnation (samsara), and suffering. Since for the Advaitins the real problem is this mistaken understanding, this means that realization (jnana) was the best spiritual path to gain final liberation (moksha).

According to Ramanuja’s formulation, the material world and selves have real and independent existence, although their existence is ultimately rooted in God, whom he identifies as Vishnu. The world comes from God in a process of evolution adapted from the Samkhya model, but since matter is unconscious, it is both similar to and different from God. In the same way, human beings share similarity to God in having God as their source, and difference from him in being subject to ignorance and suffering. For Ramanuja and his followers, God is not identical to Selves or the world, all of which are perceived as having real and independent existence. This doctrine of identity and difference makes the perceivable world real, in a sense that the Advaita proponents would never admit. This same contention of simultaneous identity and difference distinguishes Ramanuja’s position from that of a later thinker, Madhva, whose Dvaita Vedanta stressed the great gulf between God and all other things. Given this difference in capacities between deity and devotee (bhakta), Ramanuja and his followers have stressed bhakti as the most efficacious means to salvation. Even after liberation the souls retain enough of a distinction... from God to make devotion possible; liberation is seen not as loss of identity, but as eternal communion with God. For further information see John Braisted Carman, The Theology of Ramanuja, 1974; and Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds.), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, 1957.

Vishnu

(“all-pervasive”) Along with Shiva and the Goddess, one of the three most important deities in the Hindu pantheon. All three of these are notable for being almost unmentioned in the Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious texts, and the ascendancy of these three and the gradual eclipse of the Vedic gods points clearly to a definitive shift in Hindu religious life. Of the three, Vishnu has the most significant presence in the Vedas. Many of the hymns in which he is mentioned describe him as a helper to the storm-god Indra, the primary Vedic god, and one of Vishnu’s epithets here is Upendra (“junior Indra”). Yet he also appears in some of the late hymns as an independent agent, who is associated with marvelous deeds for the good of the cosmos, such as taking three steps to measure out the universe. Vishnu is also associated with the sun, both in his ability to move through the heavens, and to fall on (and thus “observe”) all things.

In the divine triad of Brahma-Vishnu-Shiva, Vishnu is identified as the sustainer or maintainer of the cosmos. One manifestation of this can be seen in a common creation myth, which begins with Vishnu lying on the back of his serpent couch, Shesha, in the primordial ocean at the time of cosmic dissolution (pralaya). A lotus sprouts from Vishnu’s navel, which opens to reveal Brahma, the creator, who begins the work of creation. Vishnu presides over the creation, and when the time for dissolution comes again, the entire process reverses, and the universe is drawn back into Vishnu, who is thus seen as the source of all.

The other way that Vishnu sustains the cosmos is through the action of his avatars or incarnations, who come into the world to restore balance to a universe dangerously out of equilibrium, usually because of a demon grown disproportionately strong. There are ten generally reckoned avatars. The first four are in nonhuman forms: the Fish avatar, Tortoise avatar, Boar avatar, and Man-Lion avatar. The other six are in human form, often as sages or heroes: Vamana avatar, Parashuram avatar, Rama avatar, Krishna avatar, Buddha avatar, and Kalki avatar; the last has yet to come. In each of these cases, Vishnu takes form to avert some sort of disaster and to maintain the integrity of the cosmos. The doctrine of the avatars provided a mechanism to assimilate existing deities into the larger pantheon and to give them recognizable status of their own. Although most of the avatars are no longer objects of worship (the Boar and Man-Lion avatars each had a substantial following early in the common era), in much of northern India the worship of Rama and Krishna has largely eclipsed that of Vishnu himself, who has largely faded into the background. In southern India, Vishnu is still an important object of worship, particularly in the Shrivaishnava community. Aside from the doctrine of the avatars, important local deities have also been assimilated into the pantheon as forms of Vishnu; the most significant examples are Jagannath, Venkateshvara, and Vithoba.

In medieval Hinduism sectarian rivalry developed between Vaishnavas and Shaivas, with each claiming that their chosen deity (Vishnu and Shiva, respectively) was supreme. Although Vaishnavas see Vishnu as the supreme power in the universe, his mythic character and activity differ sharply from Shiva's. Whereas Shiva is associated with ascetic life and practices (tapas), and thus with the religious power generated by such practices, Vishnu's headdress is a crown, and his persona is that of an all-ruling king. Whereas Shiva destroys his mythic adversaries using raw power, from which all subtlety is absent, Vishnu more often triumphs through cunning, cleverness, and trickery. Each deity's adherents affirm their divinity as the preeminent power in the universe, from which all the other gods gain their power, and both are seen as gracious and loving to their devotees (bhakta).

Vishnuchittar
An epithet of the Alvar poet-saint Periyalvar. The Alvars were a group of twelve poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and tenth centuries. All the Alvars were devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, and their stress on passionate devotion (bhakti) to a personal god, conveyed through hymns sung in the Tamil language, transformed Hindu religious life. See Periyalvar.

Vishnu Purana
One of the eighteen traditional puranas, which were an important genre of smrti texts, and the repository of much of traditional Indian mythology. The smrtis or "remembered" texts were a class of literature that although deemed important, were considered less authoritative than the shrutis or "heard" texts. In brief, the shrutis denoted the Vedas, the oldest and most authoritative Hindu religious texts, whereas the smrtis included the Mahabharata and the Ramayana, the dharma literature, the Bhagavad Gita, and the puranas. The puranas are compendia of all types of sacred lore, from mythic tales to ritual instruction to exaltation of various sacred sites (tirthas) and actions. Most of the puranas are highly sectarian, and as this one's name clearly shows, it is focused on the worship of Vishnu. It gives an exhaustive account of Vishnu's mythic deeds—many of which have become the common mythic currency for many traditional Hindus—as well as instructions for how, where, and when Vishnu is to be worshiped.

Vishnuswami
("[He whose] Lord is Vishnu") According to tradition, the founder of the Rudra Sampraday of the Vaishnava ascetics. (The Rudra Sampraday is one of the four branches, “sampraday,” of the Bairagi Naga ascetics, who are devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu; vaishnava refers to devotees of Vishnu.) Vishnuswami was an ascetic, whom some sources name as the guru of both Jnaneshvar and Namdev. As his name clearly shows, Vishnuswami was a Vaishnava, although other than this little is known about him. His ascetic line and its position as one of the four Vaishnava ascetic sampradays have been appropriated by the followers of Vallabha Chakara, whose Shuddadovaita, or “Pure Monism,” stresses the worship of Krishna, with Radha as his consort.

Vishuddha Chakra

In many schools of yoga, and in the secret, ritually based religious practice known as tantra, the vishuddha chakra is one of the six psychic centers (chakras) believed to exist in the subtle body. The subtle body is an alternate physiological system, believed to exist on a different plane than gross matter, but with certain correspondences to the material body. It is visualized as a set of six psychic centers, which are visualized as multipetaled lotus flowers running roughly along the course of the spine, connected by three vertical channels. Each of these chakras has important symbolic associations—with differing human capacities, with different subtle elements (tanmatras), and with different seed syllables (bijaksharas) formed from the letters of the Sanskrit alphabet, thus encompassing all sacred sound. Above and below these centers are the bodily abodes of Shiva (awareness) and Shakti (power), the two divine principles through which the entire universe has come into being. The underlying assumption behind this concept of the subtle body is thus the homology of macrocosm and microcosm, an essential Hindu idea since the time of the mystical texts known as the Upanishads.

The six chakras are traditionally enumerated from the bottom up, and the vishuddha chakra is the fifth. It is visualized as a sixteen-petaled lotus, located in the region of the throat. The petals each contain a seed syllable formed from a letter of the Sanskrit alphabet, in this case all sixteen of the Sanskrit vowels, the essential connecting elements for any meaningful speech. On a symbolic level, the vishuddha chakra is associated with the human capacity for speech and respiration. It is also identified as the bodily seat for the subtle element of space (akasha), through which hearing is believed to take place. For further information see Arthur Avalon (Sir John Woodroffe), Shakti and Shakta, 1978; and Philip S. Rawson, The Art of Tantra, 1973.

Vishva Hindu Parishad

("World Hindu Organization," hereafter VHP) Modern Hindu religious organization affiliated with the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), a conservative Hindu organization whose express purpose is to provide the leadership cadre for a revitalized Hindu India. The VHP was formed in 1964, when RSS leader Madhav Sadashiv Golwalkar met in Bombay with a group of Hindu religious leaders. Their immediate concern was the upcoming visit of Pope Paul VI to India, which they interpreted as a concealed attempt to convert Hindus to Christianity, and resolved to oppose by forming an organization dedicated to the propagation of Hinduism. For the next fifteen years, the VHP focused its attention on countering Christian missionary efforts in northeastern India, with little fanfare and little impact on the public consciousness.

A watershed in the VHP’s public image came in 1982, following the conversion of some untouchables to Islam in the Tamil Nadu village of Minakshipuram. The VHP used this much-publicized event as evidence that Hindu identity was endangered and countered it by launching a series of innovative public actions, first in Tamil Nadu, but later extending throughout the entire nation. The VHP’s renewed activity corresponded with a more activist bent in its parent organization, the RSS, as well as the decision by the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), a political organization that is also an RSS affiliate, to assume a more militantly Hindu identity. Many of the VHP’s national campaigns coincided with national or state elections, and many of these centered on the campaign to build a temple to the god Rama in the city of Ayodhya, at the site claimed to be Rama’s birthplace. This temple campaign thus carried powerful images of past oppression, as well as the assertiveness of a renascent Hindu identity. The VHP’s activism has enormously boosted the BJP’s political fortunes, and helped make it the dominant political party through much of northern India.

The VHP’s activism has generated sharply contrasting emotions throughout India. Proponents point to its long record of social service and its role in helping strengthen and define a modern Hindu identity. Detractors point to its disregard for the niceties of law, which was epitomized by the destruction of the Babri Masjid in December 1992, its often vitriolic anti-Muslim rhetoric, and its ultimate control by the RSS, despite its separate institutional identity. Other critics have censured the VHP for attempting to declare certain “required” Hindu rites as antithetical to the Hindu tradition and for attempting to define and control the nature of “Hinduism.” Other critics question the organization’s claim to speak for all Hindus, noting that its real power lies in the hands of brahmans and other privileged classes; these critics see the VHP as an organization designed to conceal its true purpose, the maintenance of upper-class influence and privilege. Vishvakarma (“doing all things”) A minor deity whose mythic roles include being the architect of the gods; creator of innumerable handicrafts, ornaments, and weapons; the finest sculptor; and the inventor of the aerial chariots used by the gods. He is the patron and paradigm for all the skilled crafts in which materials are shaped and formed, and in particular he is said to have fixed the canons for carving images of the gods. According to one story, Vishvakarma’s daughter, Sanjna, is married to Surya, the sun, but because of the sun’s radiance cannot bear to be with him. Vishvakarma takes the sun to his workshop and trims off enough of his effulgence so that Sanjna can bear his brightness. He then shapes the cut-off pieces of the sun into the god Vishnu’s discus (Sudarshana), the god Shiva’s trident (trishul), various other divine weapons, and the Pushpak Viman, the most famous of the aerial chariots.

Vishvakarma is sometimes identified with Tvashtr, the workman of the gods in the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts. Yet it seems that these are two different deities, homologized to each other through their common function. Tvashtr’s name means “builder of carriages,” and this seems to have been his primary function, although he is also noted for crafting the weapons of the gods, especially the mace with which the storm-god Indra slays the serpent Vrtra. Still, his name seems to indicate that his major function is in building carriages, which is believed to be highly significant in a Vedic context, since many Vedic hymns mention... the use of military chariots. Vishvakarma, on the other hand, has much more wide-ranging skills, and this would seem to indicate that the two are not the same deity.

Vishvamitra

In Hindu mythology, one of the Seven Sages whose names mark exogamous clan “lineages” (gotra; in exogamous clans, members marry outside their own clan); the others are Gautama, Bharadvaja, Kashyapa, Bhrgu, Atri, and Vasishtta. All brahmins are believed to be descended from these seven sages, with each family taking the name of its progenitor as its gotra name. In modern times, these gotra divisions are still important because marriage within the gotra is forbidden. After her marriage, the new bride adopts her husband’s gotra as part of her new identity. Vishvamitra is most famous for his long-standing feud with the sage Vasishtta, which causes numerous confrontations. The feud begins as a result of the difference in status between kshatriyas and brahmins. Vishvamitra is a king, who once stops with a host of retainers at the forest asram of the brahmin Vasishtta. Upon asking for food, Vishvamitra is amazed at the ability of Vasishtta’s cow, the Kamadhenu, to provide food for everyone. Vishvamitra first tries to buy the Kamadhenu, then tries to take it by force, but his minions are defeated by the magic powers generated by Vasishtta’s tapas (ascetic practices). Vishvamitra finally admits defeat and begins to do ascetic practices to generate power of his own. Two of their most celebrated clashes are over King Trishanku and his son, Harishchandra; in each case the real issue is the mutual antipathy of these two sages. See also marriage prohibitions.

Vishvanath

Form of the god Shiva, in his manifestation as the “Lord of the Universe” at the Vishvanath temple in Benares. Shiva is present at Vishvanath in the form of a linga, the pillar-shaped image that is his symbolic form; the Vishvanath linga is one of the twelve jyotirlingas, a network of sites deemed especially sacred to Shiva, and at which Shiva is uniquely present. Benares, or Varanasi, is one of the most sacred cities in India; it is considered particularly sacred to Shiva, and of all the Shiva temples there, Vishvanath is the most important. The original temple was destroyed by the Moghul emperor Aurangzeb, who built a mosque on the site, and the only remaining part of the original temple is the Gyan Vapi (“well of knowledge”), into which the original Shiva linga was reportedly cast (to save it from desecration by Aurangzeb’s soldiers). The present temple was built in 1776 by the Maratha queen Ahalya Bai Holkar, on a site adjoining the original temple. It was later roofed with gold by Maharaja Ranjit Singh of Lahore, and thus one of its nicknames is the “Golden Temple.”

Even in preceding centuries the history and proximity of the Vishvanath temple and Aurangzeb’s mosque made for delicate relations between the Hindu and Muslim communities, and like many northern Indian cities Benares has seen its share of bloodshed between these two communities. In recent times the destruction of the original Vishvanath temple has been taken up as a political issue by the Vishva Hindu Parishad (VHP), a Hindu activist organization calling for the “return” of this and other northern Indian sites by force if necessary. The VHP’s presence and activity have significantly escalated tensions between Hindus and Muslims as a whole. Given the political gains that these confrontational strategies have brought, it seems likely that they will continue in the future and that the Vishvanath temple will be a site connected with conflict.

Vishva Nirmala Dharam
Religious organization founded by the modern Hindu teacher Nirmala Devi (b. 1923), to propagate her teachings throughout the world.

Vishvedevas
This name can either be construed as referring to all the gods, based on the term’s literal meaning (“all the gods”), or it can refer to a group of deities reckoned as the sons of Vishva, the daughter of the divine sage Daksha. The number of sons differs according to different texts and is reckoned at either ten or thirteen. The Vishvedevas are especially worshiped at the memorial rites for the dead known as shraddhas, although the Manu Smruti, one of the authoritative texts in the dharma literature, prescribes offerings to them every day. These prescribed daily offerings are said to have been their reward for having performed particularly harsh asceticism (tapas).

Vismaya (“surprise”) Hasta
In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, a particular hand gesture (hasta), in which the forearm and the fingers are pointing upward, with the back of the hand turned toward the viewer. This particular hasta is meant to convey any sort of surprise, including wonder and astonishment.

Vital Winds
General term to designate the five internal winds collectively known as prana, through which all human physiological processes are believed to occur.

Vithoba
Presiding deity of the temple with the same name in the city of Pandharpur in the state of Maharashtra; other epithets for Vithoba include Vitthala and Pandurang. Vithoba was originally a local deity—according to some theories, a deified hero—who has been assimilated into the larger Hindu pantheon as a form of the god Vishnu. According to the temple’s charter myth, Vishnu comes to Pandharpur drawn by the filial devotion of a young boy named Pundalika. When Vishnu arrives Pundalika is massaging his father's feet, and when Vishnu asks for the hospitality due to any guest, Pundalika stops only long enough to throw a brick over his shoulder, to give the god a place to stand out of the mud. Impressed that Pundalika’s devotion to his parents supersedes even his devotion to God, Vishnu becomes rooted to that spot and has remained there ever since; Vithoba's image shows him with his hands on his hips (still waiting, perhaps, for Pundalika). Aside from this story, Vithoba has surprisingly little mythic history, although he has become an important regional deity.

Vithoba is most famous for the activities of his devotees (bhakta), the Varkari Panth religious community, who make pilgrimages to Pandharpur twice a year. Pandharpur sits in the Bhima River valley on the edge of the Maharashtra-Karnataka border, and pilgrims come from all directions. Individual pilgrims travel in small groups called didhis, often made up of people from the same neighborhood or locality. The didis are organized into larger groups known as palkhis, each of which is associated with one of the Varkari poet-saints, and which is led by a palanquin (palkhi) bearing the sandals of that saint. Each palkhi departs from a place associated with its particular saint—for example, the palkhi of Jnaneshvar leaves from the town of Alandi in which he lived, and thus he and all the other saints are still symbolically journeying to Pandharpur twice a year. Each of these palkhis travels a prescribed route, and pilgrims time their departure and their travel to arrive in Pandharpur on the same day—the eleventh day (ekadashi) in the bright half of Ashadh (June–July) in the summer, and the eleventh day in the bright half of Kartik (October–November) in the fall. Pilgrims compare their journey to that of a small stream merging with other streams, gradually forming a mighty river converging on Pandharpur. During their journey pilgrims sing the devotional songs composed by these poet-saints, among them Jnaneshvar, Namdev, Eknath, Tukaram, Chokamela, Gora, Janabai, and Bahina Bai. In this way, the pilgrims are emulating the saints before them, both by treading in their physical footsteps and by singing their songs of devotion. Although the pilgrimage ends with the entry to Pandharpur and the worship of Vithoba, the most important part is the journey itself. For more information on Vithoba and the Varkari sect, see G. A. Deleury, The Cult Of Vithoba, 1960; I. B. Karve, “On the Road,” Journal of Asian Studies, Vol. 22 No. 1, 1962; and Digambar Balkrishna. Mokashi, Palkhi: An Indian Pilgrimage, 1987.

Vitthala
Common epithet of Vithoba, the presiding deity of a famous temple at Pandharpur in the state of Maharashtra. The name Vitthala is a more literary form, and according to Deleury, the oldest attested name for the Pandharpur deity. See Vithoba.
Vitthalnath
(r. 1566–1585) Second guru of the Pushti Marg (a religious community), which was founded by his father, Vallabhacharya. Vitthalnath continued the consolidation of the Pushti Marg, in particular the organization of its rites, and in fostering the composition of songs and poetry to accompany them. According to tradition, the eight poets known as the ashtachap were all active during his tenure, although four of them are more closely associated with his father. The four poets associated with Vitthalnath were clearly members of the Pushti Marg, for among their poetry can be found hymns praising him and his leadership. He was succeeded by his son Gokulnath, under whose direction the lives of these and other saints were finally written down, with each being given a Vallabhite emphasis.

Vivaha (“uplift”) Samskara
Traditionally, the fifteenth of the life-cycle ceremonies (samskaras), in which a man and woman became husband and wife. Except for those rare individuals who remained lifelong celibates (naisthika brahmacharin), marriage was an essential element in the life of every man (and woman), since the children procreated through marriage allowed him to retire one of the three debts, this one to the ancestral spirits (pitr). One mark of the importance given to marriage can be seen in the literal translation of the word vivaha—it signifies that by which a man is “uplifted” and made complete. Given the stress on family in Indian society, marriage has also been a gravely important matter, and for many Indians, it remains the most important day of their life. The dharma literature underlines the importance of marriage by cataloging eight different forms. See also marriage, eight classical forms.

Vivarana Advaita
One of the later schools of Advaita Vedanta, a philosophical school, the greatest figure in which was Shankaracharya. The Advaita school upholds a philosophical position known as monism, which is the belief in a single impersonal Ultimate Reality, which they call Brahman. For Advaita proponents, reality is “nondual” (advaita)—that is, all things are nothing but the formless Brahman, despite the appearance of difference and diversity in the perceivable world. For the Advaitins, this assumption of diversity is a fundamental misunderstanding of the ultimate nature of things and a manifestation of avidya. Although often translated as “ignorance,” avidya is better understood as the lack of genuine understanding, which ultimately causes human beings to be trapped in karmic bondage, reincarnation (samsara), and suffering. Because the real problem for the Advaitins is this mistaken understanding, this means that realization (jnana) was the best spiritual path to gain final liberation (moksha).

The Vivarana Advaita school is based on the thought of Padmapada (9th c.), one of Shankaracharya’s disciples, but takes its name from a commentary written by the thirteenth-century Prakashatman. The latter is traditionally a disciple of Padmapada’s, but this seems problematic. As with the Bhamati school, the Vivarana school took definitive stands on several points on which Shankaracharya had remained silent. One of these was on the locus of ignorance, which the Vivarana school describes as being located in Brahman. In explaining how this can be, since it seems to compromise the integrity of Brahman, the Vivarana Advaitins invoke the theory of reflectionism to explain the apparent difference between Brahman and the Self, although, in fact, the Selves are identical with Brahman. Their position seems based more than anything on an uncompromising affirmation of Brahman as the sole “reality,” in which anything that exists must belong to it.
Vivartavada
A philosophical model used to explain the relationship between the Ultimate Reality or Realities and the perceivable world; this model describes the world as an illusory transformation of this reality. The vivartavada model is unique to the Advaita Vedanta philosophical school. The Advaitins are proponents of a causal model called satkaryavada, which assumes that effects already exist in their causes, and that when these effects appear, they represent transformations (parinama) of those causes. The classic example is the transformation of milk to curds, butter, and clarified butter. According to asatkarya's proponents, each of these effects was already present in the cause and emerges from it through a natural transformation of that cause.

The Advaïta school upholds a philosophical position known as monism, which is the belief that a single Ultimate Reality lies behind all things and that all things are merely differing forms of that reality. Advaita proponents exemplify this belief in their claim that reality is nondual (advaita)—that is, that all things are “actually” nothing but the formless, unqualified Brahman, despite the appearance of difference and diversity in the world. The Advaitins' belief that an effect already exists in its cause comes from the principle that all things in the universe ultimately depend on Brahman as a first cause. At the same time the Advaitins are unwilling to admit that Brahman ever undergoes actual change because this would nullify its eternal and unchanging nature. For this reason, they speak of an illusory transformation (vivartavada). For the Advaitins, Brahman never really changes, because it is eternal and thus unchanging; the apparent changes are only illusory, based on human ignorance through changing patterns of superimposition (adhyasa). In this way the Advaitins can maintain the transcendence of Brahman and at the same time account for the (apparent) changes in the phenomenal world.

This position is contested by proponents of another model, which describes the perceivable world as an actual transformation of this single reality. This position is espoused by proponents of the Samkhya, Vishishthadvaita Vedanta, and Bhedabhada philosophical schools, who like the Advaitins are also proponents of satkaryavada. Each of these three schools believes that the world as perceived is real, that it has some single ultimate source behind it, and that this first principle undergoes a real transformation by which the world comes into being. This parinama relationship allows these schools to explain the phenomenal world but in a way that compromises the transcendence of these first principles by making them part of the world. Philosophically, their difficulties come in describing how the transcendent can become mundane, and then become transcendent again.

Vivasvan
("shining forth") Epithet of the god Surya, the Sun. See Surya.

Vivekananda, Swami
(b. Narendranath Datta 1863–1902) Best-known disciple of the Bengali mystic Ramakrishna and also the first Hindu missionary to the West. Narendranath had received a good education and had originally intended to be a lawyer; on meeting Ramakrishna he was initially skeptical and questioning but in the course of a year became transformed. After Ramakrishna's death he spent several years roaming through India, gradually coming to the conclusion that religious life had to address India's material needs as well as its spiritual ones. Vivekananda is most famous for his address to the First World Parliament of Religions in Chicago in 1893, in which Hinduism—in its rational, Vedantic form—was first seriously received by his Western hearers. For the next four years, he lectured in America and in England and returned to India to widespread acclaim. He devoted the rest of his short life to fostering the Ramakrishna Mission, a religious organization intended to promote social uplift as

Vraj

Variant form of the region known as Braj. This is the land in which the god Krishna is believed to have lived, located in the southwestern part of the state of Uttar Pradesh just south of Delhi, the national capital. See Braj.

Vrat

Term denoting a religious vow, usually thought to be derived from the verb meaning “to choose.” As religious observances, vrats are an important part of modern Hindu life. They may refer to religious practices performed once a year with particular festivals, such as the vrat performed on Shivaratri, or to more regular religious observances, such as those connected to the monthly lunar calendar (e.g., the ekadashi rites) or those performed on the day of the week associated with a particular patron deity. The specific prescriptions for these vrats vary widely, but there are several common features. They usually involve modification of diet—sometimes through fasting (upavasa), and other times by eating or avoiding certain types of food. Another constant feature is worship of the presiding deity. Part of this worship usually involves reading or hearing the vrat’s charter myth, which tells how the vrat was established, how one should perform it, and what sort of benefits it brings. Vrats connected with festivals are performed by all sorts of people, but weekly vrats (such as the Santoshi Ma Vrat) are most often performed by married women to promote the health, safety, and prosperity of their families. Although such weekly vrats are theoretically voluntary, they have become an expected element in women's religious life, through which women by their sacrifices can safeguard their family's welfare. For further consideration of women's rites, see Mary McGee, “Desired Fruits: Motive And Intention in the Votive Rites of Hindu Women,” in Julia Leslie, ed., Roles and Rituals for Hindu Women, 1991; and Doranne Jacobson and Susan S. Wadley, Women in India, 1992.

Vrata

In the Atharva Veda, one of the earliest Hindu religious texts, the vratyas were a particular class of vagrant ascetics who were priests of a non-Vedic fertility cult. Not much is known about them because there are no other sources, but they were clearly outside the Vedic cult and thus looked down upon. In later times, the word is used to designate a person who has lost caste through nonobservance of one of the necessary samskaras (life-cycle ceremonies).

Vrindavan

Variant form of Brindavan, the village in southeastern part of the state of Uttar Pradesh in which the god Krishna is believed to have lived from infancy to adolescence. See Brindavan.

Vrtra

("obstruction") The name of the demon killed by the storm-god Indra in one of the hymns from the Rg Veda (1.32), the oldest Hindu religious text. In this hymn Vrtra is described as a serpent obstructing the free flow of waters, hence his name. The action in this hymn is one of Indra’s defining deeds, in which he destroys the serpent, cuts it into pieces, and releases the waters to run free. Some interpreters inclined to read the Vedas as historical record have seen in this hymn the breaching of the dams constructed by the Indus Valley civilization by the incoming Aryans, but there is little proof that such an incident ever happened.
Vyakarana

(“analysis”) One of the six Vedangas. These were the auxiliary branches of knowledge connected with the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts, and all the Vedangas were associated with the use of the Vedas. In its essence, vyakarana is the study of Sanskrit grammar, which was obviously essential to understanding the Vedic texts (which were written in Sanskrit). Vyakarana’s role as the gatekeeper to the Sanskrit language made grammar the queen of the traditional learned sciences, and in many contexts it is what is meant by the term vidya (“knowledge”). Aside from vyakarana, the other Vedangas are shiksha (correct pronunciation), chandas (Sanskrit prosody), kalpa (ritual instructions), nirukta (etymology), and jyotisha (auspicious times for sacrifices).

Vyakhyana (“teaching”) Mudra

In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, a particular symbolic hand gesture (mudra), in which the tips of the thumb and index finger are touching, with the rest of the fingers extended, and the palm facing the viewer. This is the hand gesture used to signify explanation or exposition; for this reason, it is also known as the sandarshana (“expositing”) mudra. Since the teaching gesture indicates a person of higher spiritual attainment, it is also known as the chin (“consciousness”) mudra.

Vyana

In traditional Indian physiology, one of the five bodily “winds” considered to be responsible for basic bodily functions, the others being prana, apana, udana, and samana. Unlike all the others, which are given specific locations in the body, the vyana wind is believed to pervade throughout the body, to keep things moving and mixed together.

Vyapti

(“pervasion”) In classical Indian philosophy, vyapti is the key condition determining the validity of an inference (anumana). The accepted form of an inference has three terms: An assertion (pratijna) containing the thing to be proved, a reason (hetu) containing evidence to support the assertion, and supporting examples (drshanta). In the stock example “there is fire on the mountain, because there is smoke on the mountain,” the assertion is that there is fire, and the reason is that there is smoke—with the underlying assumption that smoke invariably accompanies fire. In a valid inference, the reason accounts for every case of the thing to be proven; vyapti, or pervasion, is the term for this invariable association between cause and effect. For further information see Karl H. Potter (ed.), Presuppositions of India’s Philosophies, 1972.

Vyas

In the traditional Ram Lila (name given to any public dramatic presentation of the Ramayana, the earlier of the two great Hindu epics), vyas is the name given to the stage directors. The Ramnagar Ram Lila is the longest, most elaborate, and arguably the oldest of these dramas. In the Ramnagar Ram Lila, one vyas is responsible for the svarups, the brahmin boys who are playing the parts of the divinities, and who are considered manifestations of the deities when they are “in character.” The other vyas is responsible for the rest of the cast. Between them they shift the action between chorus and cast, give the actors minute directions for their acting, and prompt them when they forget their lines. As such, they are visible agents themselves and an important part of the Ram Lila.

Vyasa

In Hindu mythology, a sage who is traditionally considered to be the author of the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Sanskrit epics. Vyasa is the son of the sage Parashara as a result of his dalliance with the ferrywoman Satyavati. Later in life Satyavati marries King Shantanu but only after extracting the promise that their children will rule, instead of Shantanu's eldest son, Bhishma. Satyavati's first son dies in childhood, and the second dies after his marriage but before having any children. In her desperation to preserve Shantanu's line, Satyavati calls on Vyasa to sleep with her younger son's wives, Ambika and Ambalika. According to tradition Vyasa is very ugly, and both of the women involuntarily react when Vyasa appears in her bed. Ambalika turns pale, causing her son, Pandu, to be born with an unnaturally pale complexion, and Ambika covers her eyes, causing her son, Dhrtarastra, to be born blind. Vyasa also has sexual relations with Ambika's maidservant, who gives herself to him willingly, and from her is born Vidura. The descendants of Pandu and Dhrtarastra are the Pandavas and Kauravas, respectively, who are the two warring factions whose enmity drives the Mahabharata. Thus Vyasa is not only the author of the Mahabharata, but also the source of the two families whose struggle is described in it.
Water

One of the five elements in traditional Indian cosmology, the others being earth, fire, wind, and akasha. In some philosophical schools, each of the elements is paired with one of the senses; here water is associated with taste. Within the body, water is also associated with certain bodily functions, especially reproduction (involving the mixing of fluids) and the elimination of fluid wastes.

Wednesday

(Budhvar) The fourth day of the week, the presiding planet of which is Mercury (Budh). Although not inauspicious, the day has few strong associations and is not linked to the worship of any major deity. The planet Mercury is seen as an auspicious but weak planet, based on its small size and its quick rotation around the sun.

Week, Structure of

The Hindu week has seven days, just like the European calendar. Each of the days has a presiding planet, is associated with one or more presiding deities, and (in keeping with the general Indian attitude toward time) is deemed more or less auspicious. The most unlucky days are Tuesday and Saturday, associated respectively with the planets Mars and Saturn. Monday (the moon), Thursday (Jupiter), and Friday (Venus) are usually regarded as auspicious days since these are judged to be benevolent and powerful planets. Sunday (the sun) and Wednesday (Mercury) have no strong associations, because although these bodies are seen as benevolent, they are also seen as relatively weak in their influence.

West Bengal

Modern Indian state. It was formed after Indian independence in 1947, after the partition of the state of Bengal into West Bengal and West Pakistan, the latter now known as Bangladesh. Most of the state lies in the lowland of the Ganges River delta, although in the north, Darjeeling extends into the Himalayas. West Bengal’s capital, Calcutta, was the administrative center of British India until the beginning of the twentieth century. It was also a hotbed of anti-British resistance and has remained one of India’s great artistic and intellectual centers. West Bengal has a number of important religious sites: Kalighat, in the heart of Calcutta, and Dakshineswar, Tarakeshvar, Taraphit, and Navadvip. For general information about West Bengal and all the regions of India, an accessible reference is Christine Nivin et al., India, 8th ed., Lonely Planet, 1998.

West Indies

A cluster of Caribbean islands with a significant Hindu diaspora population. As in many other cases, they were originally brought to the West Indies as indentured agricultural laborers, particularly on the sugar plantations, but have now lived there so long that they have become a part of the local community. On some of the islands, particularly Trinidad, Hindus have constructed temples and established sacred sites (tirthas) there, as a way of connecting their religious lives to their local environment.

White Yajur Veda

Along with the Black Yajur Veda, this is one of the two major forms of the Yajur Veda, one of the oldest Hindu religious texts. The major difference between these two forms comes from the differing placement of explanatory notes on the Vedic mantras and their significance. The “White” Yajur Veda gathers these notes into an appendix known as a Brahmana—namely, the Shatapatha Brahmana, which gives its name to the second major stratum of Vedic texts. In contrast, the four recensions of the Black Yajur Veda include these notes in the text itself.

Widows

Given the traditional assumption that a Hindu woman’s central role is as a wife and mother, becoming a widow is deemed the worst fate that can befall a woman and is seen as the karmic fruition of some ghastly former deed. Because the underlying assumption of the marriage ceremony is that the bride’s identity becomes assimilated to the groom’s, a woman without a husband was seen as having lost her identity. Furthermore, because she had already taken on her dead husband’s identity, remarriage was not an option for her. Immediately after her husband’s death a woman was supposed to remove all the symbols of a married woman—rubbing the red vermilion from the part in her hair, breaking her glass bangles, and in southern India, cutting the thread on her mangal sutra. For the rest of her life, she was forbidden to wear jewelry, colored clothing, or other bodily adornments, was supposed to keep her hair cropped short, and was supposed to devote herself to religious acts for the benefit of her dead husband. Because she had been widowed, she was also considered an unlucky and inauspicious person, banned from any and all auspicious events, living out her life doing the drudge work in the household. In certain parts of India, it was common practice to burn a widow on her husband’s funeral pyre, a rite known as sati, although there were many other regions in which this practice was unheard of.

In real life, there was considerable variation on this grim picture. The most significant factors were a woman’s age at the time she was widowed, whether she had children, and the social status of her husband’s family. A woman widowed in old age would likely continue as matriarch of the family, a young widow with sons would retain family status through her children, while even a child widow in a wealthy family could have a fairly comfortable life, although subject to numerous restrictions. Where one or another of these factors was lacking, then a widow’s position would be much more precarious, and there is no doubt that in earlier times many widows led very difficult lives. Even in modern times a woman whose husband dies at a young age is often considered to be inauspicious, and thus a source of bad fortune. Ameliorating the condition of widows was one of the major goals of nineteenth-century Hindu reformers, and it has become more common for widows to remarry, although some of the most traditionally minded people do not accept this.

Wind

One of the five elements in traditional Indian cosmology, the others being earth, fire, water, and akasha. In some philosophical schools, each of the elements is paired with one of the five senses; here wind is associated with touch. The various “vital winds” (prana) inside the body are also associated with a number of bodily functions, including respiration and circulation.

Witchcraft

The existence of witchcraft is generally accepted in many segments of contemporary Hindu culture, even by many “modern” urban Hindus. The root forces behind witchcraft are malevolence, envy, and greed, through which some people try to harm others or to ruin what they have gained. Witches may work through spells, through the evil eye (nazar), or through pronouncing curses on others. Pregnant women and young children are thought to be particularly susceptible to their powers, and these parties are also deemed particularly likely to be cursed, because the envy over their good fortune is said to excite a witch’s passion. The appropriate counteraction is to perform various rites of protection, which will safeguard the person from being affected. Those afflicted by witchcraft may exhibit this as an unusually persistent illness or as strange behavior; for these people, stronger remedies are needed. As Sudhir Kakar masterfully shows, the language of possession and exorcism can be interpreted as an “idiom” (using traditional Indian cultural categories) for what modern psychiatrists might call the diagnosis and treatment of mental illness. For further information see Sudhir Kakar, Shamans, Mystics, and Doctors, 1991; and David F. Pocock, “The Evil Eye,” in T. N. Madan (ed.), Religion in India, 1991.

Women

In the dharma literature, women from all social groups were considered at the same ritual level as shudras—they could not undergo a second birth, were forbidden to hear the Vedas, were forbidden to perform certain religious rites, and in many places could not own property or resources, except by extension through their husbands. At the same time, women played (and play) an immensely important part in Hindu religious life, as daughters, mothers, wives, and patrons. According to the traditional dharma literature women had their own special role to play, based on their status as women. See also stridharma.

Woodroffe, Sir John

(1865–1936) Calcutta High Court Justice who also, under the pseudonym of Arthur Avalon, translated and published works on tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice. Woodroffe was one of the earliest European exponents of tantra as a coherent religious path and served as an apologist for the seemingly “impure” or “immoral” ritual acts described in the texts. In his expositions of the tantras, Woodroffe was trying to convince a dual audience, both of whom were horrified at the licentiousness described in the tantric texts, which involve violating deeply embedded taboos on nonvegetarian food, consumption of alcohol, and illicit sexuality. On the one hand, Woodroffe was addressing the British, who were the political masters of the time, and on the other, educated Indians, many of whom would have preferred to dismiss the tantras as an aberration. His publications and lectures were instrumental in helping make tantrism respectable, although more careful scholarly work has been done since that time.

World Parliament of Religions
Meeting in Chicago in 1893 to which representatives from major world religions were invited, including Asian religions. It marks a watershed in the Euro-American conception of non-Christian religions, in which they were no longer seen as simple idolatry but taken seriously as genuine religious paths. It is also notable that many mainline Christian churches were not represented there, and that the main Christian presence came from historically black churches. One of the Parliament's highlights was the address by Swami Vivekananda, in which Hinduism—in its rational, Vedantic form—was first seriously received by his Western hearers. Vivekananda's presence was charismatic enough that he spent the next four years living in America and in 1897 founded the Vedanta Society.

Worship
Two separate words can be used to describe Hindu worship, with two groups of assumptions that come with it. The first and most common act of worship is called darshan ("seeing"), in which devotees (bhakta) view the image of the deity, and believe that the deity is also looking at them. Darshan is thus an interaction between deity and devotee, an exchange of glances that carries understanding. Worship involving offerings and objects usually falls under the rubric of the word Puja ("homage").

Worship of Tools
A rite traditionally performed on the festival of Dussehra by members of certain artisan groups. This festival has two different charter myths, both of which mark the triumph of good over evil. It is celebrated as the day that the god Rama slew the demon Ravana, and is also associated with the triumph of the Goddess over a demon named Mahishasura. For the artisans, such worship ritually marks the importance of their tools as a means to earn their livelihood, and such propitiation is also believed to guarantee success for the following year.

Worship of Weapons
In earlier times, a common rite among the warrior classes on the festival of Dussehra (usually occurring within October and November). This festival has two different charter myths, both of which mark the triumph of good over evil. It is celebrated as the day that the god Rama slew the demon Ravana, and is also associated with the triumph of the Goddess over a demon named Mahishasura. Given the martial tone of both charter myths, it is easy to see how it would be associated with soldiers and fighting, and thus this was considered a day to worship one's weapons, as a symbol of the deity. According to popular belief, any endeavor begun on this festival day will invariably succeed, and for this reason, Dussehra has been a favored day to begin military campaigns. Since Dussehra comes after the end of the monsoon rains, in which any travel is nearly impossible, this is a favorable time from a strategic perspective as well.
Yadava

In Hindu mythology, the tribe from which the god Krishna is said to have come and over which he ruled after he gained his kingdom in the city of Dwaraka. In Indian history, the Yadava dynasty controlled the Deccan region in modern Maharashtra between the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. In northern Indian society, this is the name of a particular jati, an endogamous social subgroup that was organized (and whose social status was determined) by the group’s hereditary occupation. In past generations the Yadavas had fairly low status, but they have recently gained much greater political power—Mulayam Singh Yadav has twice been elected chief minister of Uttar Pradesh and has also served as India’s minister of Defense; Laloo Prasad Yadav has been the chief minister of Bihar (either directly or by proxy through his wife) throughout the 1990s.

Yadunandana

(“joy of the Yadus”) Epithet of the god Krishna. The Yadus were reckoned as Krishna’s clan, and thus he was their joy. See Krishna.

Yajamana

(“patron of the sacrifice”) In the cult of sacrifice found in the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts, the yajamana was the person who commissioned the sacrifice and paid for its performance, and who thus stood to gain its anticipated benefits. This term draws a crucial distinction between priest and patron and points to the relationship between them—the former were learned men and ritual technicians, who knew how to perform complex sacrificial rites, but they were dependent for their livelihood on the patronage of their sponsors.

Yajna

(“sacrifice”) A fire sacrifice, which was the primary religious act in the earliest stratum of Indian religion. This cult of sacrifice is elaborated in the greatest detail in the Brahmana literature, in which sacrifice is portrayed as the means by which the universe came into being. The performance of sacrifice needed highly trained priestly technicians (rtvij), who were differently responsible for chanting parts of the Rg, Sama, and Yajur Vedas, as well as building and maintaining the sacred fire that was the heart of the sacrificial action. This cult of sacrifice was essentially based on burning things in this sacred fire, conceived as the god Agni, so that Agni could convey the offerings to the other deities. These rites were so elaborate and expensive that they eventually fell into disuse; by the turn of the common era, there was also considerable ambivalence about the animal sacrifices that were originally an important part of many of these sacrifices. These ancient rites are rarely performed today, but in the present context the word yajna can be used for any rite involving the sacred fire, particularly one carried out by a brahmin for a patron.

Yajnavalkya

In the Upanishads, the speculative texts that form the latest textual stratum in the Veda, Yajnavalkya is named as a sage associated with the court of King Janaka, who was able to show that he had greater wisdom than the others. He is also ascribed as the author of the Yajnavalkya Smrti, one of the texts that comprise the dharma literature, based on the pattern of mythic ascription found in these texts.

Yajnavalkya Smrti

One of the smritis or “remembered” texts, a class of literature deemed important but less authoritative than the other textual category, the shrutis or “heard” texts. This smrti is ascribed to the sage Yajnavalkya and is an example of one of the Dharma Shastras, which were manuals prescribing rules for correct human behavior and ideal social life. Unlike the Dharma Sutras, which are ascribed to recognizable individuals, the Dharma Shastras are usually ascribed to mythic sages, as a strategy to reinforce the authority of these texts. The extant text is about a thousand verses, divided into sections on religious custom (achara), the administration of justice (vyavahara), and expiation (praya-shchitta). Estimates on its date of composition range from the first to the sixth century, but it is clearly later than the Manu Smrti because some parts of the middle section are far more developed. The Yajnavalkya Smrti was the subject of numerous commentaries, one of which, the Mitakshara, was given the status of a legal code for the greater part of India during the British empire.

Yajnopavit
Another name for the sacred thread. See sacred thread.

Yajur Veda
Traditionally, the third of the four Vedas. As with the Rg Veda and the Sama Veda, the Yajur Veda was associated with sacrificial rituals, and the text itself consists mainly of the mantras to be uttered while the sacrifice was being carried out. The Yajur Veda exists in five major recensions, of which four are “black” and one is “white.” Their differences stem from the placement of explanatory notes on the mantras and their significance: The recensions of the Black Yajur Veda contain these notes in the text itself, whereas the White Yajur Veda gathers these notes into an appendix known as a Brahmana—namely, the Shatapatha Brahmana—and this Brahmana literature becomes the next major stratum of Vedic texts.

Yaksha
(feminine yakshi) A class of minor deities who are essentially nature spirits and are often narrowly associated with particular places. Yakshas are reckoned as the attendants of the deity Kubera, who is regarded as the guardian of the northern direction and the lord of wealth. The yakshas are generally regarded as beneficent toward human beings, and because of their associations with the generative power of nature and with Kubera’s wealth, they are often regarded as bestowing wealth and fertility. Yakshas have a long history of appearances in Indian sectarian literature, where they are either portrayed as guardian spirits or as examples of depravity. Although it is fairly old, the only extensive monograph on yakshas is Ananda Coomaraswamy, Yaksas, 1971.

Yama
God of death and Death personified. Yama is one of the eight Guardians of the Directions, associated with the southern direction, and for this reason, the south is considered an inauspicious direction. Yama first appears in the Vedas, the oldest Hindu religious texts, where he is described as the first mortal. By virtue of being the first person to suffer death, he was seen as presiding over the World of the Fathers, where the virtuous dead feasted and enjoyed themselves (much as they had on earth). As the tradition developed, conceptions of Yama shifted in turn, until he was considered the judge of the dead, ruling mainly over the regions of punishment, primarily hells, in which people suffered until they were reborn. Yama is often portrayed holding a noose, with which he draws out the person’s spirit at the time of death and leads it bound to judgment. Modern poster images of Yama show him seated on a throne as king of the dead, majestic and dark in color; to his left sits the scribe Chitragupta, who keeps a ledger book recording the actions of human beings. Yama’s role as the judge of the dead makes him greatly feared in everyday Hindu life. Ideally, this fear can have a positive outcome—reinforcing people's inclination to abstain from evil—and one of the names for Yama is Dharmaraja, the "Lord of Righteous Action." Hindu mythology also has tales of people who somehow manage to outsmart Yama, of whom the best known is Savitri, who manages to gain back the life of her husband, Satyavan.

Yama

(2) In the ashtanga ("eight-part") yoga first codified by Patanjali (1st c. C.E.), yama ("restraint") is the first and most basic of the eight constituent elements of yoga practice. Patanjali lists these as five: abstaining from harm to other living things (ahimsa), abstaining from theft, truthfulness, celibacy (brahmacharya), and abstaining from avarice. These can all be characterized as "restraints" because their intent is negative—they do not call for positive actions as much as they entail refraining from certain thoughts or actions deemed especially injurious.

Yamunacharya

(10th c.) According to tradition, a devotee (bhakta) of the god Vishnu, who is claimed to be the grandson of Nathamuni, and the teacher of Ramanuja. Nathamuni was the compiler of the Nalayira Divyaprabandham, the collected hymns of the Alvars, a group of poet-saints who lived in southern India between the seventh and the tenth centuries. All the Alvars were devotees of Vishnu, and they expressed this devotion in passionate hymns sung in the Tamil language; among southern Indian Vaishnavas (devotees of Vishnu), these hymns are so holy that they are referred to as the "Tamil Veda.” Ramanuja, on the other hand, was a philosopher who organized and systematized this devotional outpouring into a coherent philosophical position and thus is considered the founder of the Shrivaishnava religious community.

It is generally believed that Yamunacharya was Nathamuni’s grandson, and thus he was heir to the religious tradition his grandfather had helped create. There is much more doubt about the claim that he was Ramanuja’s religious preceptor (guru) because it seems more likely that Yamuna’s influence on Ramanuja was transmitted by Yamuna’s disciples. Still, what is indisputable is that these three are the three main figures in the development of the Shrivaishnava tradition, and thus that Yamunacharya occupies a pivotal spot.

Yamuna River

west and south of the Ganges River, which the Yamuna finally joins at Allahabad in the state of Uttar Pradesh. The Yamuna is traditionally considered one of the seven sacred rivers of India, along with the Ganges, Godavari, Saraswati, Narmada, Indus, and Cauvery. The Yamuna flows through the Braj region south of Delhi, which is traditionally associated as the homeland of Krishna, and his devotees (bhakta) revere it even more than the Ganges. For his devotees, places throughout the Braj region carry strong associations with the life of Krishna, but the most important sites are at Mathura and Brindavan.

Yamunotri
Sacred site (tirtha) in the Himalayas at the headwaters of the Yamuna River. Ritually speaking, Yamunotri is considered to be the source of the Yamuna, although the actual source lies farther upstream, at the foot of the Bandarpunch Mountain. Its high altitude also means that it is only accessible between late April and October, after which it is closed for the winter months—a pattern echoed at Ganguotri, Kedarnath, and Badrinath, the other three major Himalayan pilgrim sites. One ritual center in Yamunotri is the river itself, in which pilgrims bathe (snana), braving the frigid waters. There are also several temples—the oldest built by one of the kings of Nepal—but the temples at Yamunotri are quite modest compared with those at Ganguotri, and the only large one was built in the 1980s. Aside from the holy river and its temples, Yamunotri is also noted for several hot springs from which water emerges almost boiling; some of these hot springs have been channeled into a tank, and many pilgrims take advantage of the hot baths.

Yantra
(“instrument”) In astrology (jyotisha), and in tantra, a secret, ritual-based religious practice, the word yantra most commonly refers to a symbolic diagram, often believed to confer magic or spiritual power on those who know how to use it. In some cases such yantras are considered to be an aniconic form of a deity, as is the case of the most famous yantra, the Shriyantra or Shrichakra, which is used in ritual for the worship of the goddess Tripura Sundari. The most literal meaning of the word is “device for restraining,” and in an astrological setting the yantras of the various planets are used in rituals to change their effects, usually to restrain or diminish the power of planets judged to be malefic or inauspicious.

Yashoda
In Hindu mythology, the god Krishna’s foster mother, who receives him on the night he is born, and cares for him until he is old enough to return to Mathura to claim his throne. Yashoda is a paradigm for selfless devotion, who loves Krishna as if he is her own biological child. Her mythic example of loving, motherly care has provided the model for vatsalya bhava, one of the five modes of devotion most prominently articulated by Rupa Goswami, a devotee (bhakta) of the god Krishna and a follower of the Bengali saint Chaitanya. In the vatsalya mode of devotion, devotees consider themselves as God’s parents, lavishing love and care on the deity as a cow cares for her calf.

Yaska
(5th c. B.C.E.?) Traditionally cited as the author of the Nirukta, a text giving etymological explanations for archaic words in the Veda. Almost a quarter of the words in the Veda appear only once. Even by Yaska's time, the meanings for many of these words had become either uncertain or completely lost, as the spoken language had changed. Although at times it is clear that Yaska himself is guessing—as when modern linguists can make comparisons to the Iranian Avesta, a related sacred text—his work was immeasurably helpful to later readers.

Yathakhyati
(“discrimination [of things] as they are”) Another name for the theory of error known as satkhyati. See satkhyati.

Yati
(from Sanskrit yam, “to restrain”) From the time of the Vedas, the earliest Hindu religious texts, the word yati has been one of the terms used to designate an ascetic, as someone who had gained control over himself. At the time of the Vedas there seems to be some ambivalence for the yatis, since the storm-god Indra is said to have fought with them, but in later times the word takes on an unequivocally positive connotation.

Yatra
(“journey”) Although in its literal meaning the word yatra can refer to any sort of travel, in modern Hindi its semantic field is considerably narrower and connotes travel with some serious purpose, rather than a stroll around the block or a sightseeing trip. The word yatra's most important connotation is travel for religious purposes, particularly pilgrimage to the sacred sites (tirthas). A yatra is thus a journey, but a particular type of journey.
Yatri

In an ascetic context, the word yatri denotes a novitiate Bairagi, a renunciant ascetic community comprising devotees (bhakta) of the god Vishnu. As an everyday word it means a person performing a yatra (“journey”; more specifically, a trip with the significance of a religious pilgrimage).

Yayati

In Hindu mythology, the son of King Nahusha and a king in the lunar dynasty.

Year, Structure of

The Hindu ritual year is determined according to both a solar calendar and a lunar calendar. Aside from the Gregorian calendar and the common era, there are two indigenous Hindu calculations of the solar year, both of which have twelve solar months. In northern India these months correspond to the twelve signs of the zodiac, and the months change as the sun moves through them. As in the Western zodiac, the year begins when the sun enters Aries, although according to Indian astrology this transition takes place around April 14, rather than March 21, as figured in Euro-American astrology. In southern India there is an identical solar calendar, whose names are drawn from the names of certain nakshatras or lunar asterisms. Aside from the solar months, the solar year is also divided into halves based on the movement of the sun: the Uttarayana for the period when the sun is moving north, and the Dakshinayana in the time the sun is moving south. The sun begins its northward journey, considered the more auspicious time, on Makara Sankranti, reckoned as falling on January 14; it begins its southward journey six months later on Karka Sankranti on July 14.

Far more important for religious purposes is the lunar calendar, which has twelve lunar months: Chaitra (March–April), Baisakh (April–May), Jyesth (May–June), Ashadh (June–July), Shravan (July–August), Bhadrapada (August–September), Ashvin (September–October), Kartik (October–November), Margashirsha (November–December), Paush (December–January), Magh (January–February), and Phalgun (February–March). In northern India, the calendar usually begins in the first day of the bright half of Chaitra, meaning that the last days of the year are those in the dark half of this same month.

Since these lunar months are based on the phases of the moon (ending with the full moon in northern India and the new moon in southern India), the festivals determined by this lunar calendar fall at different times each year with respect to the solar calendar. This is because the twelve lunar months are completed in about 354 solar days, and thus, each lunar year begins eleven days earlier than the last. About every 2½ years this discrepancy is corrected by the addition of an extra lunar month, known as the intercalary month, through which the solar and lunar calendars are kept in general correspondence. The intercalary month is added to any lunar month in which the sun does not enter a new sign of the zodiac and can thus fall in any month of the year. In this way, although the solar calendar is less important in everyday life, it helps maintain the general correspondence between the lunar calendar and the seasonal festivals associated with that calendar.

At least in northern India, the three major seasons (hot, monsoon, and cool) have important links with the festival calendar. In general, the most ritually active time is the cool season between October and February; in many places this is also the time following the harvest, when many people have more time and money to spend on religious observances. The hot season has many rites associated with heat, whereas the rainy season, as a time of peril, is often connected with rites of protection.

Yellamma

Presiding goddess of the shrine on Yellama hill, in the town of Saundatti in the Belgaum district of the state of Karnataka. Yellama’s temple is infamous for being a traditional center for the dedication of devadasis ("[female] servant of the Lord"), a class of women kept in temples as singers and dancers in the service of the temple’s presiding deity and to whom they were usually considered to be “married.” In Yellama’s temple, however, both boys and girls can be dedicated. Although for the past two centuries the devadasi tradition has carried associations with common prostitution, in earlier times it was far more common for a devadasi to live with a single man for her entire life, although she could not marry him because she was considered dedicated to the deity.

At times this dedication is done because of a demand by the goddess herself, revealed through possession; in other cases the parents do this, hoping to gain some concrete benefit, particularly healing from disease. Yellamma is associated with fire and also with causing (and potentially curing) skin diseases, which can be seen as symbolic “burning.”

According to the traditional model, devadasis held a definite social position and had special legal rights—they were entitled to family inheritance and to perform religious rites, which other women were not. These special rights have disappeared with the outlawing of the devadasi system, done, in part, by the British, and definitely in post-Independence India. Although such dedications still take place, in many cases they are little more than a cover for procurement, with the girls being shipped to brothels in Bombay, Pune, and other central Indian cities. In most cases the girls come from extremely poor families, and the dedication to Yellamma is a way to avoid paying for a wedding, a major expense in contemporary Indian society. The dedications take place on the full moon in the lunar month of Magh (January–February), and are reportedly widespread, but because of secrecy, the laws prohibiting this are rarely enforced. For further consideration of the devadasi system, in this case at the Jagannath temple in Puri, see Frederique Apffel Marglin, Wives of the God-King, 1985.

Yoga

The literal meaning of the word yoga is “the act of joining,” and it is cognate with the English word “yoke.” Just as the latter word can serve as either a verb or a noun—either the act of yoking, or the thing to which animals are yoked—in the same way the word yoga can refer both to the act or process of spiritual development and also to a specific set of teachings fostering this development. Both these meanings can be conveyed by the word “discipline,” and this is one of the preferred translations.

There are many specific teachings styling themselves as yogas. The oldest one is laid out in the Yoga Sutras attributed to the sage Patanjali; this system is known as ashtanga ("eight-limbed") yoga, because of its eight constituent parts. Other well-known yogas are the three “paths” described by the god Krishna in the Bhagavad Gita, an important religious text: the yogas of action (karma), wisdom (jnana), and devotion (bhakti). Another well-known yoga is kundalini yoga, the practice of which is entirely internal, in the alternate physiological system known as the subtle body. Kundalini yoga stresses awakening the kundalini, the latent spiritual power that exists in every person, and through this gaining spiritual benefits. These make up the main categories of teachings, but the members of many particular religious communities will describe their religious practice as yoga: Thus there is the surat-shabd-yoga of the Radha Soamis, the Raja Yoga of the Brahma Kumaris, or the Siddha Yoga of the SVA Foundation. In such cases the word is used to identify a particular religious group’s characteristic teaching, which usually includes elements from the classical articulations of yoga.
Yoga Mudra
In Indian dance, sculpture, and ritual, a particular symbolic hand gesture (mudra), in which the right hand is placed flat on the left, with both palms pointing up, and the joined hands are laid on the crossed legs. In a sculptural image, this mudra indicates that the figure is adept in yoga.

Yogananda, Paramahamsa
(b. Mukunda Lal Ghosh 1893–1952)
Modern Hindu teacher and founder of the Self-Realization Fellowship. Yogananda was one of the earliest Hindu missionaries to come to America. He came to Boston in 1920, to address the International Congress of Religious Liberals in Boston and never returned to India. He eventually settled outside Los Angeles, where he established a center and lived for the rest of his life. In his early years in America he was considered something of a curiosity, and there are photos of him taken with President Calvin Coolidge. Yogananda’s teachings were largely based in the ashtanga yoga of the classical Yoga Sutras, but he also stressed the doctrine of kriya (“active”) yoga, which is claimed to accelerate spiritual attainment. Most of Yogananda’s disciples and both his successors were Americans, and the Self-Realization Fellowship is essentially an American organization with historical roots in India. For further information see Paramahansa Yogananda’s Autobiography of a Yogi, 1997.

Yoganidra
(“sleep of yoga”) Epithet of the Goddess in the first episode of the Devi-mahatmya, the earliest and most authoritative text for the mythology of the Goddess. In this episode, the Goddess has lulled Vishnu into a stupor through her power of illusion, making him oblivious to Brahma’s cries for help when he is menaced by the demons Madhu and Kaitabha. Brahma is saved when she praises the Goddess, after which she withdraws her yogic sleep from Vishnu; he then regains consciousness and rescues Brahma by killing the demons.

Yoga Sutras
(“aphorisms on yoga”) A set of brief sayings traditionally ascribed to the sage Patanjali, which are the foundational texts for the Yoga school, one of the six schools of traditional Hindu philosophy. Patanjali’s Yoga Sutras are usually read with a commentary ascribed to the sage Vyasa, and this commentary has become accepted as an integral part of the text. The text of the Yoga Sutras is divided into four parts, with each part devoted to a particular theme: The first part focuses on concentration (samadhi), the second part on the mechanics of spiritual development (sadhana), the third part treats various attainments (vibhuti), including magic powers (siddhi), and the last part describes the state of yogic isolation (kaivalya), which the text describes as liberation. The text presupposes the cosmology taught by the Samkhya school, another of the six schools, and the Yoga school is often considered the “practical” articulation of Samkhya theory.

Yogi
Literally meaning “one possessing yoga,” in practice the word refers only to a yogic adept—someone who “possesses” yoga in the sense of having mastered it—rather than to anyone simply practicing yoga. True yogis are widely believed to have superhuman powers (siddhi) as a by-product of their long spiritual development, which they can and will exercise for the benefit of their disciples—for physical healing of diseases, for psychological help, or for giving guidance on both spiritual and mundane matters. The yogi is seen as a spiritually realized person, and their authority stems completely from this attribution, which paradoxically is not subject to any sort of external verification.
Consequently, there are significant differences of opinion on whether or not any particular person is a yogi.

Yogi Bhajan
(b. Harbhajan Singh Puri, 1927) Modern Hindu missionary and founder of the 3HO/Sikh Dharma Brotherhood. He first came to the United States in 1969, leaving behind his position as a customs official at the Delhi airport. His initial teachings were the traditional disciplines of hatha yoga and kundalini yoga, with his followers organized into a group known as the "Happy, Healthy, Holy Organization" (3HO). Hatha yoga is a system of religious discipline (yoga) based on a series of bodily postures known as asanas; this practice is widely believed to provide various physical benefits, including increased bodily flexibility and the ability to heal chronic ailments. Kundalini yoga is a religious discipline, the primary focus of which is awakening the kundalini, the latent spiritual force that exists in every person in the subtle body. The kundalini is awakened through a combination of yoga practice and ritual action and is believed to bring further spiritual capacities and ultimately final liberation (moksha) of the soul.

These two disciplines remain an important part of Yogi Bhajan's teachings, for he claims to be a master of tantra, a secret, ritually based religious practice, but in the 1970s his teaching widened to include traditional Sikh teachings and symbols. The most prominent of these symbols are the “five Ks” that all Sikhs are supposed to wear, so called because each of them begins with the letter k: uncut hair (kesh), a comb (kangha), a bangle on the right wrist (kara), shorts (kacch), and a ceremonial sword (kirpan). Many of Yogi Bhajan's followers keep the Sikh symbols far more strictly than most people born as Sikhs, but the movement has two important divergences with the traditional Sikh community. One of these is its emphasis on tantra, which has little importance in the Sikh community. The most significant difference, however, is the religious authority that Yogi Bhajan holds over his followers, which is very different from the decentralized, essentially democratic form of the traditional Sikh community.

Yogini Ekadashi
Religious observance falling on the eleventh day (ekadashi) of the dark (waning) half of the lunar month of Ashadh (June–July). As for all the eleventh-day observances, this is dedicated to the worship of Vishnu, particularly in his form as Narayana. Most Hindu festivals have certain prescribed rites, which usually involve fasting (upavasa) and worship and often promise specific benefits for faithful performance. On this day the prescribed action is to give gifts to poor brahmins; faithfully observing this festival washes away the sin of cutting down a pipal tree (ashvattha) and also brings one birth in heaven.

Yogmaya
Powerful form of the Goddess, particularly noted for her power to bewitch and bewilder people—in other words, her ability to wield maya, the power of illusion. In some modern sources Yogmaya is named as the deity who takes the form of the infant girl exchanged for the infant god Krishna and is later killed by Krishna’s wicked uncle, Kamsa. According to these sources, it is under her spell the previous night that all the inhabitants of Kamsa’s palace fall asleep, and Krishna’s father, Vasudeva, is able to spirit the infant away. Later in Krishna’s career, Yogmaya is believed to facilitate his clandestine meetings with the women of Braj—when Krishna plays his flute, the women come to him, but all the others fall into the spell cast by Yogmaya and are unaware of their absence. Because of her ability to wield maya, Yogmaya is a powerful deity; she is worshiped on the fourth day of the fall Navaratri, the festival of the “nine nights” that are sacred to the Goddess in her varying forms.

Yoni
Although in modern Hindi this has become a vulgar word for female genitalia, its most literal meaning is “womb,” both in a literal sense as the place of gestation and in a metaphorical sense as any place of origin, source, or generative power.

Yudhishthira
(“firm in battle”) In the Mahabharata, the later of the two great Hindu epics, Yudhishthira is the eldest of the Pandava brothers who are the epic’s protagonists. Yudhishthira is magically born when his mother, Kunti, uses a powerful mantra to have a son by Dharma, the god of righteousness. Yudhishthira is in all ways his father’s son; he is described in the epic as the manifestation of Dharma on earth. He is proverbial for his strict adherence to the truth, is courteous to all, and is committed to righteousness. His only personal flaw is a love of gambling, a love matched only by his complete lack of gaming skill, and this flaw has major repercussions.

Because of his virtues, Yudhishthira is selected as heir to the throne by his uncle, Dhrtarashtra. This choice raises the jealousy of Dhrtarashtra’s son, Duryodhana. He first tries to kill the Pandavas by building the flammable house of lac. The house is burned, but the Pandavas are able to escape unharmed. Some time later, Duryodhana decides to win Yudhishthira’s rights to the kingship in a game of dice. Here Yudhishthira’s love for gambling gets the better of his judgment, for he is playing against Duryodhana’s maternal uncle, Shakuni, who is very skilled. As Yudhishthira begins to lose, he keeps betting bigger and bigger stakes, in an effort to win back what he has lost. After losing their kingdom and all their possessions, Yudhishthira wagers himself and his brothers. After losing this bet, he wagers and loses the Pandavas’ common wife, Draupadi. This loss leads to Draupadi’s humiliation, in which she is paraded through the assembly hall by Duryodhana and his brother, Duhshasana, her clothes stained with her menstrual blood. This event sharpens the already strong enmities between the two groups. Shocked at such treatment, Duryodhana’s father, King Dhrtarashtra, gives the Pandavas back their freedom, but because of the loss in the game of dice, the Pandavas agree to go into exile for twelve years and live incognito for the thirteenth, with the condition that if they are discovered in the thirteenth year the cycle will begin anew.

Yudhishthira and his brothers peacefully pass their twelve years in exile. During the thirteenth year, they live in the court of King Virata, where they remain undiscovered, despite frantic searching by Duryodhana’s spies. When the thirteen years have passed, Yudhishthira and his brothers return to claim their part of the kingdom. Yudhishthira hopes for some sort of peaceful settlement and sends a message to Duryodhana saying that they will be satisfied with a mere five villages, one for each brother. When Duryodhana responds that they will not get as much land as could fit under the point of a needle, Yudhishthira realizes that they will not get their rights without a battle. He reluctantly mobilizes his brothers for war. He fights valiantly in the great war and is crowned the king after their victory.

After ruling for many years, Yudhishthira sets out with his brothers and their wife, Draupadi, for the Himalayas, followed by a small dog. As they climb the mountains Draupadi and his brothers die one by one, but the dog remains with Yudhishthira. At the top of the Himalayas Yudhishthira finds the god Indra, the king of heaven, waiting for him in a golden chariot. Indra tells Yudhishthira that he will take him to heaven but that Yudhishthira will have to leave the dog behind. Yudhishthira flatly refuses to abandon his faithful companion, even if it means that he will not go to heaven. The dog then reveals himself to be the god Dharma in disguise. The lesson in this story is that throughout his life Yudhishthira never allows himself to stray far from righteousness; even at the end he refuses to forsake it.

Yuga
A name denoting a unit of cosmic time, with two possible meanings. According to traditional belief, time has neither beginning nor end, but alternates between cycles of creation and activity, followed by cessation and quietude. Each of these cycles lasts for 4.32 billion years, with the active phase known as the Day of Brahma, and the quiet phase the Night of Brahma. In cosmic time, the Day of Brahma is divided into one thousand mahayugas (“great cosmic ages”), each of which lasts for 4.32 million years, and this is one possible meaning of the word yuga. The more common use is to refer to a mahayuga’s four constituent yugas, named the Krta Yuga, Treta Yuga, Dvapara Yuga, and Kali Yuga.
Zodiac

The signs of the zodiac in Indian astrology (jyotisha) are virtually identical with that of Western astrology, and it is generally accepted that the Greek zodiac was brought to India in the first to third centuries via the Greek kingdoms in modern Afghanistan. There are slight differences in the nomenclature; the Indian zodiac has Dhanus ("bow") in place of Sagittarius, Makara (a sea monster sometimes identified as a crocodile) for Capricorn, and Kumbha ("water pot") for Aquarius. As with Western astrology, each of the twelve signs has certain characteristics, with which people born in these signs are imbued.

The two systems differ sharply in how they figure the annual starting point, although both begin with the sign of Aries. The zodiac used in Western astrology begins on the vernal equinox, on which the sign of Aries is the beginning. By Indian accounts the starting point of the zodiac comes when the sun intersects the midpoint of a group of stars named Ashvini. It is thus based on the position of the sun with regard to the fixed stars, whereas the Western zodiac is based on the position of the sun with regard to the earth—that is, when it intersects the equator, and is thus independent of the fixed stars. These differing methods have produced a discrepancy between the two systems, which are now more than three weeks apart—in the Western zodiac Aries begins on March 21, whereas in the Indian zodiac it does not begin until about April 14. This discrepancy can also be seen in the account of Makara Sankranti and Karka Sankranti, which are judged to be the winter and the summer solstices but occur in the second weeks of January and July. Given a difference of about three weeks, it is not surprising that there are significant differences in the astrological calculations between these two systems.
A Note on Transliteration

I have transliterated Hindi and Sanskrit terms into English to match their original pronunciation as closely as possible. In most cases, the transliteration is a straightforward substitution of Hindi or Sanskrit letters with their counterparts in English. However, discrepancies in the languages create some difficulties in transliteration.

In this book, Hindi and Sanskrit words are made plural by adding the English s to the end. This is done to conform the transliterated words to English grammar, even though this is not standard in Hindi or Sanskrit.

For some terms there exist both Sanskritic and Hindi forms, each with different pronunciations. I have transliterated these words from Hindi or Sanskrit depending on the most appropriate context; Sanskritic forms seem fitting when one is discussing Sanskrit texts, but not when reporting a remark by a Hindi speaker.

Transliteration also becomes complicated for words where there is a Hindi or Sanskrit letter that does not directly correspond to a letter in English. For example, single characters in the Hindi alphabet represent sounds that require consonant combinations in English, such as “ch” and “sh.” I have used these letter combinations to substitute for the Hindi letters whenever possible. In other cases, transliterating Hindi and Sanskrit pronunciation is not as straightforward. The following list contains Hindi and Sanskrit terms from this book that do not follow standard English pronunciation. They are written here with diacritical marks to indicate the proper pronunciation.
Pronunciation Guide

Vowels
- a as in but
- ā as in father
- ai as in bite
- au as in trout
- e as in pay
- i as in kit
- ī as in feet
- o as in coat
- u as in put
- ū as in boot

Consonants
- c as in check
- l as in lip (with the “l” sound rolled)
- ṭ This is the Tamil “l.” To make this sound place the tip of the tongue back in the palate and hold it there while making an “l” sound.
- ň This indicates that the previous vowel is nazalized (pronounced through the nose)
- ň as in sing or sink
- ň as pronounced in Spanish (eg. mañana)
- r as in rip (with the “r” sound rolled)
- Ṳ This sound is found in Tamil, but not Sanskrit. The “r” sound is pronounced with a trill.
- š as in shirt

As for t/ṭ, d/ḍ, ṇ, and ṣ, these are pronounced by placing the tip of the tongue at the top of the palate and flexing it forward.

James G. Lochtefeld, Ph.D., holds a B.A. from Colgate University, an M.T.S. from the Harvard Divinity School, an M.A. in Asian languages and literature from the University of Washington, and an M.Phil. and Ph.D. from Columbia University. He is an associate professor of religion at Carthage College in Wisconsin, where he has taught since 1992.

Dr. Lochtefeld specializes in Hinduism and is particularly interested in contemporary Hindu religious life. He did fieldwork for his dissertation in the North Indian pilgrimage town of Haridwar under the guidance of the American Institute of Indian Studies and Delhi University. Aside from Hinduism, his areas of teaching have included the Buddhist tradition in India, China, and Japan; Islam; Chinese religion; and Sanskrit. Lochtefeld was three times named a President’s Fellow at Columbia University. In 1990, he received the Charlotte W. Newcombe Fellowship, the most prestigious award for dissertations in religion and ethics. In the summer of 1996, he returned to Haridwar to conduct fieldwork. He was awarded a Senior Research Fellowship by the American Institute of Indian Studies, through which he was able to study the Kumbha Mela, the world’s largest religious festival, during a sabbatical leave in Haridwar in the spring of 1998.
